VERY pretty is the central idea of this fantasy—that of a Naiad emerging from a fountain and falling in love with a young sculptor, sitting for him as his model, and afterwards, when he fell in love with his statue, changing into a flower; but Mr. Gill has not been at all happy in his treatment of it. Characters are introduced which have nothing whatever to do with the progress of the story; scenes, one of them a visit to a night-club, are interpolated quite unnecessarily; and why, at this time of day, spend ten or twelve pages in describing a performance of "Tannhäuser"? Careless proof-reading has brought about an annoying repetition of whole paragraphs; one sentence concerning the "small, sensitive mouth" of the Aphrodite occurs four times. There is too much erudition in the book; it is as though the author said, "See how deeply I have studied Greek art!" Many pages would be quite pleasant in an essay on Praxiteles, for instance, or on the influence of Attic sculpture, which are out of place in a novel. Mr. Gill can write well; but his book leaves us cold; it is like a stained-glass window with the light withdrawn.

The Waster. By MRS. HENRY TIPPETT. (John Long. 6s.)

The whole of this book is taken up in proving that the waster is not a waster at all, but a very kind-hearted if somewhat unconventional person. Like so many of the heroes of present-day fiction, he is an artist, preferring to paint pictures rather than accede to his father's wishes and enter the Army. The tale is prettily told, and there are several embellishments in the way of stories related to a child, and accounts of one or two dreams; but it is not possible to see very far into the lives of any of the characters. None of them develops to any great extent; they are handled very lightly by their creator, with the result that they do not make a very insistent appeal to the reader. There is no saving grace of humour, and the continual repetition of the phrase, "I am only the waster you know," with one or two variants, is very irritating. Evelyn, the woman of the world, and Chloe, the child beautiful, both love the hero in their different ways, and they who read to the end of the book will discover in what manner the waster made his choice.

Musical Anarchy

THE production of five orchestral pieces by Arnold Schönberg at Queen's Hall has created quite a sensation. We had thought that we had gone as far as it is possible in the direction of the Ultra Modern, but Schönberg leaves his most advanced colleagues panting after him in vain. He is avowedly an unabashed "anarchist" in music; key, harmony, and melodic outline have absolutely no meaning for him. He starts and finishes most of his pieces with what sounds like a combination—one hardly likes to call it a chord—consisting of all the notes of the scale. It is seldom possible to disinter anything that suggests a melodic phrase, and his scheme of orchestral colour is as unusual as his ideas regarding the other constituents of music.

It is very difficult to know how one should treat such a phenomenon. One's first inclination is to say everything that the critics of the 'sixties used to say about Wagner, and their descendants in the 'nineties used to say about Strauss. One might say that Schönberg's music is what those people thought Strauss' and Wagner's music to be. At the time they were both absolutely wrong, yet one cannot help thinking that in this case it is absolutely right to point out that there are limits. It must not be forgotten, however, that there are quite serious people in Germany who are making a cult of Schönberg, and that Schönberg himself is a man who thinks seriously about his Art, and has embodied his thinking in a solid volume. One should be just, and try to discover what his aims are, and he helps us by telling us in writing that he is not concerned with what he himself or others may or may not think beautiful, but with that which inner necessity compels him to express; to which, if the epigram were not so old-fashioned, one might retort, "Je n'en vois pas la nécessité."

Further, he says that his music expresses the experiences of his own soul. If that is so, all that can be said is that Providence treated him in a very stepmotherly fashion when it gave him a soul which lives through such horrid experiences.

It should be added that Schönberg is a painter who paints Futurist pictures. Perhaps it would make his music easier to understand if we realised that his outlook on music is analagous to his idea of painting. One might be inclined to say that his music is to that of the classics as a Cubist picture is to the Sistine Madonna, but that would be only half the truth. One should compare his orchestral pieces with "Don Quixote" and "Heldenleben." By contrast they are models of classical austerity and restrained beauty.

It is not only in respect of the harmonisation and the shape, or lack of shape of his themes only, that Schönberg prefers to be a law unto himself; it is also in respect of the kind of noise that he causes his orchestra to make so persistently that one can see no trace of design, unless it can be that his one wish is to make all the instruments do the most unusual things all the time, with results which, to the ordinary listener, are unredeemed monotony.

In the circumstances one need not be ashamed to admit that it is quite impossible to say whether or not the music was well played. One can only assume that it was, knowing that a good deal of trouble was taken in the preparation. One had not suspected Sir Henry Wood of being a great musical humorist, but certainly the contrast between the Gounod "Hymne à Ste. Cécile" and Schönberg, which were next to each other on the programme, was exceedingly piquant.

Developments in Photography—I

By HALDANE MACFALL.

THE last few months have been full of rumours, veiled hints, and aggressive boastings as to the advance of photography towards the conquest of colour. The marvellously fine colour work of the Scala Picture-Theatre, especially in its yachting series, and in the reviews of troops in India by the King, has shown that in luminous work—that is to say, in transparent colour flung upon a screen—the advance has been very great. It was inevitable that the artist-photographers should bend all their powers towards conquering the colour print on opaque paper—a very different problem, a far harder nut to crack. The scientific colour-printing on the glass plate has been conquered, only to prove that colour could be caught but in crude fashion—and it is little likely that this skill will be bettered, since, as far as it goes, it is being done marvellously well. That this scientific printing should be transferred to paper followed as a matter of course, since three-colour printing itself could reproduce it by mechanical means. But the personality of the photographer is lacking therein quite as much as the print is on the other hand crude and untrue to the mellowing perception of the human eye. Then there has been much fuss about Paget and other colour-printing papers, which have revealed a poor sense of colour in their champions. It was clear that the artistic printing of the photograph must not only depend upon an ingrained faculty to see the monochrome picture with personal vision, but that the colour-handling must be under the personal control of the artist-photographer. Of the methods which give this control, there can be no doubt that the bromoil and the bichromate work are leagues ahead of all others.

The display of the Photographic Salon in Pall Mall East will be memorable for the impetus it has given to these prodigious advances in England; and it will redound to the honour of the generous and self-effacing policy of that body in the years to come that they gave this display. In this province the exhibition now being held in the gallery of the Old Water-Colour Society is one of the most important London has seen for a long time. For two or three seasons, the influences at work within the Society have steadily been building up the position that was to lead to this triumph; and it is only just to give credit to the spade-work before we cheer for the success. The Society is to be congratulated upon the liberal and generous policy that impelled it to keep its doors open to all comers—above all, in its self-abnegation in showing no favour to its own members—and, mark you, this is all the more a matter for recognition when we remember that the Society, without any help or subsidies from without, has to fall back for all financial support upon these very members who came out into the arena and took their falls, foot to foot, with all comers. Such a policy calls for a generosity not easy to overrate; how rich has been the result and the reward! We are all full of fine sentiments, but when it comes to putting our hands in our pockets we recall the old schoolboy saw: "Are you certain?" "Yes." "Will you swear?" "Yes." "Will you bet?" "I never gamble."

The Society had two well-marked policies from which to choose. On the one hand was the close Society wherein a group of exquisite craftsmen decide to stand together, allow no work to be shown that is not as technically fine as their own, send but a very limited number of exhibits, and display these to the best advantage without any conflicting neighbours of a differing craftsmanship. This system has many fascinating advantages. It has, however, its own punishment. Mere technical excellence in one narrow field soon leads to a hide-bound convention and a limited achievement—if a very exquisite achievement. Soon decay sets in, for no new blood enters into its vitals—new blood is sensitive as well as vitalising, and, once turned aside, it avoids the channels that lead through the portals of the close society. The Salon wisely set aside all such temptation to self-glorification, and doggedly made for the larger adventure. That the colour movement met with considerable suspicion there is scant room for doubt; but that there was some astute and masterly spirit—or that there were several—who persuaded the others to break new ground, and that the others were liberal enough to be persuaded—these things all add to the dignity of the Society. That there are those who look upon colour-printing as bastard photography, whilst they hail monochrome as sacred, it passes the wit of man to justify; but we must not become entangled in the logic-chopping of legitimacy.

That the catholicity of the Salon has freed the display from all second-rate work it would be idle to maintain. There are monochrome prints of such high achievement that it follows that the same craftsmen must have had fine works among the rejected. But this is the fortune of war—and war is rampant with injustices. That there is an absence of "faked" stuff it would be vain to deny—indeed, there are too many Wardour Street dressed-up ladies of the Georgian days, bowing or the like to cocked-hatted models with swords and elegancies. What has all this to do with the essentially modern eye of the camera's lens? Why dress up in a bygone crinoline when all life and nature are pulsing to be "took"? The finely stated street scenes of Mr. Blake; the richly observed "Bavarian Village," with its foreground bridge, of Mr. McKissack; the "St. Paul's" of Mr. Anderson; the "Spirit of the Temple" of Mr. Romano; the excellent work of Mr. Pecsi, especially his lighting in the portrait of a lady; the craftsmanship of Mr. Reinard; the poetic moods of Mr. Buckham's "Haunted House" and the "Mall Arch," and of Mr. Hofmeister's "Summer Evening"; the beautifully designed "Man's Handiwork" of Mr. Sellors; the portraits of Miss Lilian Braithwaite and Mr. Laurence Irving by Mr. Velicogna; the portraiture of Mr. Paulus and of Mr. Kalmar; the work of Dr. Boon; the fine "Carmen" of Anny Heimann; the remarkable character study of Hermann Bahr by Rudolph and Minny Dührkoop; the portraiture of Mr. Dorrenbach, of Mr. Meyer, of Mr. Seyton Scott, of Grete Rosenberg; the finely lit "Miss Mona Limerick" and the "Mrs. Charles Buchel" of Mr. Bertram Park; the "G. K. Chesterton" of Mr. Murchison; the "Mr. John Tower" of Mr. Maynard; the charming "Fruit and Sunlight" of Mrs. Keene; the beautifully lit "La Chanteuse" of Mr. Puyo; the treatment of flesh in the nude by Mrs. Tilden; the glowing "Portrait mit Sonne" of Schlosser u. Wenisch; the portraiture of Mr. Hollyer; the decorative nude of Mr. Pecsi; the "White Cottage" of Mr. Chislett; the "Mother and Child" of the Maynards; the tender white harmonies of Mr. Adams's "Goldfish"; the "Mother and Child" of Mr. Szekely; the "Blossom" of Grete Back; the rich designs of Mr. Mortimer-Lamb's "The Vase" and "At the Organ," and of Mr. Holding's "In the Studio"; the vivid sea-pieces and sea-moods of Mr. Mortimer; the masterly "Siebenbürgische Landschaft" of Olga von Koncz; the action of Mr. Erfurth's "Dance"; the rural life of Mr. Keighley's "Village Fair"; the work of d'Ora; the street scenes of Dr. Evershed, of Mr. Dubreuil; the landscapes of Mr. Meyer, especially his "Winter," and of Mr. Penman; the "Concarneau" of Mr. Demachy; the "Pont Neuf" of Mr. Charles Emanuel; the compositions of W. and G. Parrish; not to mention several others—all this is vital stuff, far removed from the studio "fake" that has been such a blight upon much painting. Not only is there this wide achievement, but the large policy of the Society has drawn to its gallery the work of some of the first artist-photographers of Europe. There is freedom from a narrow intention, not only of personality, but of craftsmanship, of tone, of quality, ay, even of papers and materials. This is all to the good. One would like to see the life of the day more widely interpreted, and action outside the arrangement of the studio more keenly essayed; but that will come as soon as the studio "fake" is properly scorned.

Our Public Schools and their Critics

By PROFESSOR HERBERT STRONG.

OUR larger Public Schools have been recently the object of much criticism coming from different quarters, and this criticism has in some cases taken the form of violent invective. It is admitted by most of the critics that these institutions play a very important part in our national life and in the formation of our national character; the question proposed for solution by these critics is whether the influence on our nation exercised by these important schools is altogether a healthy one.

The main charges against them fall under two heads: the first and more recent is that they artificially foster a spirit of caste, so that those who leave these schools, by their mere demeanour, excite the resentment of those whom they consider as the lower classes, and hence tend to augment the existing unrest. The second is that the education given at our Public Schools is not that best fitted to enable them to fight the battle of life and to fake their place in the community as good citizens.

My comment on the first charge is that the word caste is a question-begging word, and needs before usage to be defined. Mr. Gladstone remarked of the English people that one of their main characteristics was their attachment to inequality. It seems quite true that we as a nation love liberty, but care little for égalité in the French sense of the term. Probably most of us have the feeling, though it mostly remains unspoken, that it is good for us as a nation and as individuals that our society should form, as it were, a hierarchy in which each successive grade when attained should offer special attractions. The qualities which enable any given person to rise in the social scale are manifold—wealth, talent, uprightness, refinement, all play their part, and the reward for the acquisition of such qualities is social promotion. The vice attendant on our system is snobbishness: the besetting sin of a nation with a passion for equality is envy and hatred, and of the two the English system seems productive of the least evil.

If, however, caste is to be understood in the sense of a class standing aloof from and despising its fellow-citizens, it must be looked on as unreservedly bad. It may be observed that whenever we meet with a body of men brought into close contact with each other and animated by a common aim we have all the elements which go to form a caste of some kind, i.e., to take some place more or less well defined in the social scale. Each profession forms a caste. People of similar fortunes form a caste. The Universities form a caste, and no amount of democratisation will ever succeed in abolishing this tendency, for should a new commission flood our old Universities with working men, castes will still be formed there of those who have similar refinement, similar tastes, and similar social position. And these castes will become more and more exclusive as their position is more and more assailed, just as the old Knickerbocker families in New York have by sheer aloofness from the multitude managed to create an aristocracy of birth probably more exclusive than our own aristocracy.

It is generally felt among us that the fact of belonging to a caste or particular grade of society entails the performance of some particular duty to the nation, higher castes as a rule feeling this obligation more strongly than the lower. The question then arises whether the caste feeling existing in public schools really is different in kind from, or more pernicious in its effects than, that prevailing in other grades of society, such as in the learned professions. In my opinion it is probably somewhat stronger than in most other grades, from the fact that the boys in schools are necessarily brought into closer contact than in ordinary cases of caste formation. It must be conceded, however, that this very compactness permits the influences of the school authorities to permeate the mass of boys entrusted to their care. But to the question whether the caste feeling in a public school promotes snobbishness I emphatically say no. Any boy who boasted of his superior wealth or family would at once be tabooed by his fellow-scholars as guilty of "putting on side," an unpardonable offence in a schoolboy.

As to the education given at these schools I think that there is much truth on the side of the critics, though they hardly seem to me to hit the exact blot. They complain as a rule that the subjects of education taught in the schools are unsuitable. This criticism has something of truth, as Mr. Benson has shown in his account of the teaching at his own great public school. But what seems to me a deeper defect than the unsuitability of the subjects themselves is the unliterary way in which these subjects are taught.

This is the weakness in our public school teaching complained of by foreign critics, such as M. Taine, whose charge against our schools is that the scholars in them are not trained to take a disinterested intellectual interest in things of the mind. "No trouble," he says, "is taken to point out the literary excellence of the great classics which are the subjects of study. The boys do not seem to have caught the spirit of the history they are reading; the reflections which they make on great authors show no thought or originality; they do not seem to realise the difference of ideas current in different epochs or centuries. The master does not speak to his pupils as a critic to persons of taste, he does not seek to refine their literary tact, he does not induce them to form independent literary judgments on the great authors of their country." The young Frenchman, on the contrary, according to M. Taine, possesses at the age of nineteen a good general education, a store of ideas, a decided preference for certain authors and certain styles; embryo theories, vague views on the theory of the Beautiful, on history, on philosophy; and he has at least the idea that there exist vast questions of general interest on which it is advisable to make up one's mind, that this necessity is the more pressing because scepticism is in the air. If a student does not resolve to confront the great problems of life which demand solution, there is no system of religion which can help him, and therefore he must create for himself his own harbour of safety.

The great problem then is, how are we to set about reforming our public schools so as to render the atmosphere of these schools more literary, and to cultivate a feeling of reverence for the boy of studious habits and scholarly attainments such as is at present accorded to the athlete of the school? It seems to me that the movement must begin in the boys' homes: not till the parents have learnt to take a deeper interest in their sons' and daughters' studies, and to realise the fact that humanism and ideas tend to develop nobility in life, can we expect a real change in the intellectual atmosphere of our schools. At the same time, we must desire to see that the masters shall be chosen, first and foremost, for their scholarship and for their devotion to education, and less for their prowess in athletics. My experience is that in Scottish homes much more sympathy is accorded to the sons and daughters of the house who are at school or college than in the ordinary English homes; the parents converse more commonly with their children on the subject of their studies, and endeavour to excite and sustain their interest in these.

The vexed but important question of the curriculum of studies pursued at our public schools cannot be discussed in this short paper, but there is no doubt that some differentiation should be made between the studies prescribed for boys who wish to devote themselves as specialists to scholarship and those who simply wish to equip themselves in the best manner for fighting the battle of life.

Napoleon the Third*—II

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

IT cannot be claimed that the memoirs of the Baron D'Ambès throw much new light on the history of the Second Empire. The world must wait in patience for fresh sensations and novelties when the memoirs and secret documents of the Empress Eugénie are published at the prescribed period fifty years after her death—a time which we hope will be considerably shortened, as public interest even in matters of world-wide importance passes very rapidly in this strenuous age. The real interest and value of the book under review is the picture it presents of the social, literary, political and military life under the Second Empire, and of the intimate character sketches of the principal actors in that strange and in many ways unnatural epoch. It also brings out very clearly and skilfully the gradual development of the Emperor's character from the time when the Baron first met him as a wandering exile in Switzerland, all through the strange ups and downs of his chequered career, to the last painful scene at Chislehurst when the Emperor, shorn of all his glory, lies dying in an alien land, the guest of the very nation which had held his mighty uncle a prisoner at St. Helena.

The changes, developments, and gradual decay of the character of Napoleon III are worth careful study. The apogee of the man, as also of his Empire, may be said to have been reached at the beginning of his intervention in Italian affairs, and the height of his glory when he returned to Paris to lead through the capital the army which conquered at Magenta and Solferino. From this period to the end the Empire is gradually sinking, and the master daily loses his grasp of affairs. The man who risked all on the coup d'état becomes incapable of arriving at any decision. He is blown first this way and then that by advisers, and, above all, by the masterful character of the Empress. He becomes more and more the dreamer and philosopher, trusting blindly to fate, and content to allow everything to drift onwards to an end he no longer professes to foresee or control. His interest in State affairs evaporates, his physical energy likewise declines, and he resorts more and more to amusements and pageants, which help to blind himself and the French people to the rottenness and decay of the Imperial structure. He no longer makes the Corps Legislative the instrument of his will; he himself becomes a tool in its hand, and the fate of the Empire may be said to have been sealed when the control of the administration was entrusted to Ollivier and the Liberal-Imperialist party, who, blind to facts and to the repeated warnings of Marshal Niel refused to reorganise the French Army and the defences of the Frontier so as to make them in a measure commensurate with the vast forces which Bismarck and Moltke could control.

It is the legend which brings about the ruin of France and the fall of another Napoleonic Emperor. The successes of the French arms in the Crimea, the victories of Magenta and Solferino, and, above all, the conquest of Algeria, had brought to the front a school of soldiers who believed themselves and French arms invincible because they had routed despicable foes. Four hundred and forty thousand Frenchmen, with an Emperor bearing the name of Napoleon at their head, were supposed to be more than a match for 12,000,000 Germans led by a Bismarck and a Moltke. Even with this grave disproportion France might yet have put up a good fight if only the four hundred thousand had been properly organised and properly led. But the organisation was almost non-existent; the transport was lacking; the battalions were short of their proper quota, and the generals were so jealous of one another that they preferred to see a comrade beaten by a superior force rather than go to his assistance. For the deplorable state of the Army and for the dissensions in its ranks Napoleon III is chiefly to blame. He as Emperor was its supreme head, and he possessed every facility for ascertaining the truth. The Napoleonic legend without a military genius to carry it forward is only a grave danger to the country whose fortunes it controls.

Napoleon III was no organiser, was absolutely lacking in any military genius or even military knowledge, and seemed equally incapable of realising the lessons of history that should have been learnt from the many successes and disasters of his uncle. In all history there is surely no more pathetic or ironical incident than that of a Napoleon being ordered off a battlefield by the existing Commander-in-Chief, who refuses to fight while he remains, as he considers the Imperial intervention harmful to the campaign. Yet this is what happened to Napoleon III the day before the decisive battle of Gravelotte, when Bazaine insisted that he should quit the army together with the Prince Imperial and dispatched the cavalry of the Imperial Guard to act as his escort.

These memoirs will be widely read for the picture they present of France during twenty years of splendour, but it is to be feared that they will do little to raise Napoleon III in the estimation of posterity, which is evidently the task which the Baron D'Ambès set himself to perform. The reverse is rather the case. In endeavouring to defend the unfortunate Emperor he has confirmed almost all the charges which historians have brought against him. In trying to place the blame for his miserable mistakes in foreign policy and for his general weakness and vacillation during the second decade of his reign on the shoulders of the Empress Eugénie and his unfortunate choice of advisers, the Baron conclusively proves how unfitted the Emperor was to fill a throne at all, more especially a throne bequeathed him by the greatest monarch of all times. If a ruler is content to be governed by his wife and by a small clique whose interests are chiefly financial, he cannot blame posterity for holding a very low opinion of his qualifications for such an exalted post as the Throne of France. But the Emperor will probably be judged more leniently by posterity, because the world now grasps the salient fact that it was not Napoleon III who created and maintained in almost unparalleled outward splendour for twenty years the Second Empire—it was France which, unable to shake off the Napoleonic legend, deliberately chose to maintain a bastard Napoleon at the head of the State.

If Louis Napoleon had not been available anyone who bore the same name and who was the legitimate successor of the Napoleonic traditions would have been elevated to the head of the State by similar or different means. It was not Louis Napoleon's abilities which elevated him to the head of the State—it was the shadow and traditions of his mighty uncle which clouded the imaginative mind of France to all lesser lights until no ruler except a Napoleon became possible. Guizot, the historian, the Prime Minister of Louis Philippe, foresaw clearly the miseries which were in store for France if she chose to coquette once again with a Napoleon and to entrust her destinies to one of that house. "The genius and the renown of Napoleon Bonaparte have nothing to fear from the light of history. Every succeeding generation will do him justice. Supreme in the arts of war and of civil administration, and all powerful, yet he constantly made a bad use of his power, and took no cognisance of the eternal laws of justice and of truth. The startling dream with which he dazzled France has passed away, but the memory still remains weakened but ever fatal to our unhappy country."

Of the private character of Napoleon III the Baron D'Ambès draws a very pleasing picture. He seems to have been a good friend and to have possessed a kind heart and pleasure-loving disposition. As was only befitting the son of Hortense, he carried on the traditions of her amorous heart far more successfully than the policy and tradition of his great uncle. Always extremely susceptible to the charms of a pretty woman, his passion increased instead of moderating with more mature years. Towards the end of his reign, when he apparently realised that he was incapable of controlling the ship of State, he was quite content to abandon the tiller for prolonged periods and to betake himself to Vichy or to some other favourite resort, and there to get rid of his cares in the more congenial society of his many mistresses, on whom he spent enormous sums of money. The Baron D'Ambès gives us many an amusing picture of these revels and of the unwelcome visits of the Empress to her erring husband when he wished her hundreds of miles away. . . . If the end of Napoleon III was miserable it was no worse than his feeble character entitled the world to expect. Let us conclude by repeating a last picture drawn by a writer who went to see him as he lay in state at Chislehurst after his death: "Once Ambassadors trembled to hear the words that fell from his lips; once Europe could not hold Cæsar and his fortunes, and now a narrow room, a narrow bed, a narrow coffin." A fitting sketch of the end of the legend!

Literary Values

THE bookman is a conservative fellow. He reads and re-reads his favourite books with unflagging zest. He has a fine regard for the niceties of style, and a love for literary traditions and associations. He frankly admits that the work of his contemporaries, with one or two exceptions, has little interest for him, and he will assert with equal frankness that he finds in the literature stamped with the classic imprimatur a compact and all-sufficing little world. He may concede the advance of science, but he will stolidly refuse to believe that classic literature can ever be surpassed, that its literary value can ever change. To him Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, will ever be associated with all that is best in poetry. He will find in the letters of Cowper, FitzGerald, and Lamb the cream of the epistolary art, and supply world-honoured names for every other phase of literature with an exactness that leaves no room for doubt in his own mind. He has a solemn detestation for the philistine, the man who attempts to belittle the work of universally-recognised genius. He objects to the philistine's method of attack, forgetting for the moment that when Johnson's pistol of argument missed fire he was prone to knock down his adversary with the butt-end of it. The bookman regards his treasured books as gods, and woe betide the man, primed with the spirit of revolt, who attempts to throw down those divinities in order to give emphasis to some new-fangled theory.

There is such a thing as a slavish regard for a great literary name. We have met many who would never dare to admit the obscurity of Browning, much less write about him as Wilde did in connection with Meredith, for fear of being regarded as outside the pale of literary respectability. There are many who praise a famous book simply because others have praised it for generations, but only a few who are sufficiently honest to form an independent opinion. Is it possible that our good bookman is in error? Is it possible that some of his gods have feet of clay and are running down the hill of change into the place of the forgotten? When Darwin first introduced his evolution theory, the world was staggered, and religionists pounced upon him as a heretic; but now religion and science go hand in hand, and we have discovered, to our infinite comfort, that the inrush of Truth can never destroy, but rather strengthens our spiritual aspirations. Surely the bookman, who lives for the most part in the past, should be cognisant of the present and not wholly blind to the shaping of the future. He must be willing to adjust his opinion of certain books, willing to admit that the hall-mark of approval expressed five hundred years ago may have become slightly obliterated by the more exacting and more enlightened criticism of a later period. He must get used to the fact that literary values are in a constant state of flux simply because the classics stand still while we are moving forward.

Mr. Albert Mordell, who has evidently read widely but with considerable bias, has recently published a suggestive little volume* in which he states his opinions concerning many great classics. His views are not orthodox, but they are honest, and as such deserve attention. He is not a crude philistine entering the ranks of literary criticism solely for the purpose of trying to smash long-established reputations just for the fun of the thing. He belongs to the progressive school of thought, and is anxious to make us think about the classics instead of dreaming about them. We cannot agree with Mr. Mordell on many points, but we are bound to admit that there is a certain amount of truth in his argument, much to commend in his appeal that we should reverently examine some of our literary gods, and test them, not by ancient tradition, ancient praise, but in the light of modern thought. He observes "that changes in morality must affect literary values, that some of the classics idealise views of life now obsolete, that these books are therefore responsible for the existence of some of our moral and intellectual stagnancy, and that a new and critical outlook upon them is called for."

It is not difficult to discover the main inspiration of Mr. Mordell's argument. He is an ardent admirer of Nietzsche. We may listen to Nietzsche on his interpretation of Dionysus or Zoroaster, pore over his attack on priestcraft and monasticism, and be mildly bewildered, but by no means impressed, by his "superman" theories and his plea for a state beyond good and evil; but we cannot, as Mr. Mordell has done, accept him as a literary guide. Nietzsche was more dogmatic than a Salvationist. He flung his barren idea of joy at us, and remained to the last one of the most joyless of men. His philosophy was Wagner's music turned upside down. But Mr. Mordell sees in his wildest utterances the shining light of truth, and, strong in this belief, he proceeds to examine certain classics, and to taboo those that do not happen to fall in line with what he regards as the spirit of the age. It is a pity that he has blindly followed Nietzsche, for his argument on many points would have stood without dragging in Christianity in a way that will estrange many who would otherwise be grateful for some of his suggestions. But he lays much stress on religion and morality. He is so busy in discovering the truth or falsity of certain classics that he omits to do justice to the style and manner of treatment. It is the actual material, its veracity or otherwise, with which he is concerned, and not the language in which it has been presented. He sees in the literature of the past effete movements that no longer apply to the needs of to-day; ethics incompatible with human nature; religion containing worthless superstition; and because he sees such things he desires us to abandon worshipping books in which such notions are incorporated.

He asserts that monasticism, feudalism, puritanism, and asceticism can no longer be accepted by the intellectuals of to-day. But must we read no books in which these forces were in eminence? Are we to hedge ourselves about with modernity and ignore the rich store of the past just because we consider we have new grain and a more precious harvest? Mr. Mordell writes: "The books that were most impregnated with emotions connected with these false dogmas and creeds are the ones that should not be placed in the list of the world's great books." Mr. Mordell is anti-Christian in his ideas, and for that reason he would have us close St. Augustine's "Confessions" and à Kempis' "Imitation of Christ," and open and study the "Dialogues" of Lucian by way of a salutary remedy. He would have us abhor the sensual women of Boccaccio and revel in the enlightened Noras of Ibsen. Nietzsche may have called Dante "a hyæna poetizing in the tombs" and Walpole may have described him as a "Methodist parson in Bedlam," but such coarse comments do not for a moment conceal the beauty of the "Divina Commedia." If there is feudalism in the "Faerie Queene," puritanism in "Paradise Lost" and the "Pilgrim's Progress," and an effete chivalry in the "Morte d'Arthur," such things do not detract from their literary value. Mr. Mordell's love of modernity surely runs riot when he finds something up-to-date, and therefore to be commended, in Milton's remarks on divorce, and much to be severely criticised in "Paradise Lost."

When he ceases to denounce books that have owed their inspiration to religion, and deals with literary values apart from Nietzsche, he is on safer and more profitable ground. No one will deny that many books published to-day and forgotten to-morrow would have been heralded as masterpieces a century ago. The critics who described Charlotte Brontë as "unsexed" on perusing "Jane Eyre" would have found no words sufficiently strong to describe some of our women writers of to-day. The so-called poems of Ossian created a furore when they were published, but who ever dreams of discussing James Macpherson now? Mr. Mordell's book is decidedly interesting, but he has allowed anti-Christain ideas to bias his opinion on the one hand, and on the other he has not taken into consideration the value of the classics in relation to the age in which they were written. If we have seen more of beauty and have drunk more deeply from the well of Truth than the ancients we have only done so because the great writers of the past have shown us the way.

The Literary Traveller

By W. H. KOEBEL.

I HAVE received a letter from Madeira which refers to a sinister rumour. It seems that there is a report that the number of motor-cars in the island is to be increased, in preparation for the winter season. This may come in the light of good news to some; but, for myself, I sincerely trust that no such innovation will be attempted. Madeira, as it is, is probably one of the most perfect islands in the world. Its mountains, valleys, and sea are of a peculiarly slumberous beauty, which certainly needs no other aid but that of its brilliant wealth of flowers. As to its vehicles, what could be more suitable than the picturesque ox-carro, and the sledges which come gliding down the cobbles of the mountain roads, and dodging the flower and wicker-chair laden groups of the Madeirense in the rapid course of the downward toboganning? Even the few motor-cars which have been plying between the Praça and the Casina are surely superfluous, and to think of an added flock of these noisy wayfarers is to picture desecration. The motor-car is admirable in its place, and I should be the last to decry its merits. But that place is not Madeira. Nevertheless, if the threatened project should actually mature, the very pleasant island will still possess a formidable weapon of self-defence. A motor with tyres which can successfully resist the cobbles of the quaint streets of Funchal has yet to be invented. So it is unlikely that the carros of Madeira will go the way of the London hansom-cab just yet.

Although I have not undertaken any stay of length in Portugal since the disappearance of the monarchy and the creation of the Republic, it has recently been my lot to pay flying visits to the various Lusitanian ports. Putting all questions of actual politics aside, there can be no doubt that the Republic has very distinctly failed to benefit in a material fashion from the social upheaval of a few years ago. Regarding the situation from the tourist point of view, the railway and shipping companies have had little on which to congratulate themselves lately. It is true that the periodical alarums and excursions which have disturbed the peace of the country during the past two years have left the Lusitanian beauty spots untroubled. Nevertheless, the shadow of political unrest has hung heavily over the land. The cautious pleasure-traveller is given to bear in mind the possibilities as well as the probabilities inherent in a situation of the kind. Steamship agencies, for their part, are naturally loth to express an undue confidence in a situation with which they are only a little better acquainted than the general public. Hence the hesitation and the comparative desertion of Portugal.

The Portuguese Government, it appears, is by no means blind to the disadvantages of the present situation, since it has taken over into its official charge the Propaganda Society which in the later days of the monarchy was beginning to effect no little good in rendering the outside world more familiar with the delights of Portugal. I am ignorant, however, whether this State department has actually achieved anything of the kind of late. The thing is to be regretted, for there are some very fair spots in Portugal, the attractions of which await nothing beyond a certain amount of enterprise to become more widely evident. Cintra and Busaco are, of course, sufficiently well known. The seaside resorts, however, such as Mount Estoril, Cascaes, and the other similar spots which dot a very balmy and brilliant coast were only on the eve of attaining recognition when the stream of tourists was turned off, as it were, from the main. But these, after all, constitute a very small proportion of what Portugal has to offer in the way of really pleasant haunts. Indeed, some of the most promising of all are those which are least known. Who, for instance, with the exception of those few who happen to make a speciality of such out-of-the-way districts, has ever heard of the Estrella Mountains and of the Algarve coast? Yet the panoramas of the former are in their own way as charming as those of any other mountain range in the world. And as to the latter, the Algarve, the Africa of Europe, its coast is unique in the Continent for the very reason for which it has been endowed by the Portuguese with its popular name.

With the exception of the haunts surrounding the neighbourhood of the Lake of Geneva, and those others which lie at the foot of Mont Blanc and the Dent du Midi, the average tourist's knowledge of French Switzerland is insignificant compared with his acquaintance with the more popular German portions of the small Republic. Yet among the less rugged districts are many which in their own way are as attractive as the lands of the loftiest peaks. This is, perhaps, especially the case in the Canton of Neuchâtel, where the folds of the Jura Mountains enclose whole nests of quite delightful villages, which are to all intents and purposes untrodden by the common run of pleasure-seekers. The gabled and balconied dwellings of these villages lay claim to a most astonishing average of age, and innumerable are the seventeenth century dates carved clearly on their fronts. Until now the majority of these have remained the property of the peasants alone, and very few have yielded up their secrets to the Kodak. It is not surprising, this, for in a number of these districts the main roads are rare. Secluded spots such as these are still most conveniently approached by the old flagstones of the narrow Roman paths which lead through the forest. They are certainly the most appropriate approaches, but totally unfitted to the motor-car, without the aid of which so many people now refuse to travel.

"Levrak Beyuk"

"Effendi! Effendi! Levrak beyuk . . . ordà!" ("Sir, a great bass . . . down there!")

I SAT drinking black coffee in a vine-roofed garden of Deirmenderé on the south shore of the sapphire Gulf of Ismidt. The coffee was of delicious fragrance, and I had clapped my hands for the cafeji to bring two more of the tiny cups, one for myself and the other for the old greybeard who, having presented me with a large bunch of roses from his garden, was now excitedly pointing out a big fish paddling lazily at the foot of the steps. We were good friends, this old Turk and I, and whenever I sailed across the Gulf from Derinjé for such coffee as might have been served by Ganymede, he joined me with some little gift of fruit or flowers and tried hard to conceal his hatred of the "Committee," then at the zenith of its power, and his passionate devotion to the fallen Abd-ul-Hamid, whom I had seen driven forth from Yildiz six weeks earlier, deposed from the throne of Osman, and ignominiously despatched by a night train, with his women and his gewgaws, to helpless exile at Salonica. True, the eunuchs and spies of Yildiz were in chains or in hiding, but even under the "Constitution" everyone spied on his neighbour, and for this reason my venerable friend did his best to conceal his reactionary politics even from a tourist like myself.

"Levrak beyuk!" Yes; it was a noble fish, yet less by a good five pounds than one I had caught on the rod that same morning. When I mentioned the fact he looked polite surprise, and this is the story which I managed to piece together out of such broken phrases of Greek and Turkish as limped from my tongue.

The break of day had found me asleep in my little caïque anchored off the now deserted lazarette of Solujak, over on the north shore. A few weeks earlier, during that sinister "Affair of April," of which some of the "inspired" correspondents of European newspapers —particularly of Vienna and Cologne—had made such indigestible hash, the lazarette had been occupied by two companies of infantry charged with the special mission of stopping and overhauling every outgoing train on the Bagdad Railway bound for Eski-Chehir, so as to arrest deserters and mutineers. One afternoon I was taking coffee with the officers, when a train from Haidar Pacha came slowly to a standstill, stopped by riflemen posted across the track, and the Commandant, a grizzled war-dog, with memories of '77, made a great haul of more than eighty mutineers disguised as hojas (students of divinity) by a time-honoured ruse that had often done duty elsewhere. The whole company was turned out on a siding, and the old Colonel and his staff suddenly saluted, when the alleged hojas, taken by surprise, gave the military teminah, thereby betraying their true trade, and found themselves straightway under arrest. As I described the incident, I watched the pale blue eyes looking at me over the coffee cup, but, though I afterwards learnt that it was news to Deirmenderé, there was not a flicker. Well, the troops had been removed to the capital, which was still under martial law and the heavy hand of Mahmud Shevket, and Solujak was left to the bats and swallows.

Here, then, with a great moon hanging red over the mountains of Anatolia, and "beginning to faint" in the light that she loved better in those days than I did—since it meant scorching heat after seven or eight in the morning—I awoke and gently kicked my Greek servant to attention. Nikko, swearing softly and respectfully in such Levantine patois as matched the attenuated strain of Hellene blood in his veins, got out the oars, and I soon baited my hook with a bunch of carides (prawns) and paid out twenty-four feet of single gut and fifty more of line beside, slipped the check on the reel and held the light rod out over the stern, while Nikko rowed slowly over the shallows at the edge of the deep water. Heavy buffalo moved lazily in the high reeds. A black stork, a rare and interesting bird, stood listening hungrily to the chorus of frogs just beyond reach of its bill. And still Nikko pulled quietly past the empty lazarette, and I waited, and . . . bang! bang! a great splash in the dim light astern, and the rod bends and the reel raises its querulous voice to a steady hum as fathom after fathom flies out through the rings. There is no wisdom in trying to check that first pride of a big bass. On the contrary, Nikko, now suddenly awake to the main chance, throws all his weight on the paddles and backs water, stopping the caïque within her own length. The levrak is still now, and I get back a little of the line, gingerly enough, for the next rush. . . . ah! there it goes, making obliquely for the reeds, and, as the great fish flounders in the shallows, the shaggy head of a tame water-buffalo looks over the screen and mild eyes gaze with bovine curiosity on the fray.

Another pause; more line in; I can see both head and tail now, and know this for the biggest bass I ever caught. Caught? The "captive" is away again, tearing off the line, bending the rod, dashing out into the deeper water at a pace that it would be madness to dispute. Yet when next I reel in, it is with that sudden confidence that unaccountably inspires the fisherman when he knows instinctively that the prize is his for the taking. This curious premonition that all is well seldom deceives him, yet I needed all my hope on this occasion, for, of a sudden, the bass made a dive under the boat and out of ken, and the line went slack below the rod. This can portend but one disaster. The fish must have broken away. Nikko Yanni, my Asiatic Greek, who must have in his veins some of the blood of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, looks sleepily over the side and utters an ejaculation in a tongue that would have been Arabic to Homer. No wonder, for there lies the bass on its side in the long weed, gasping heavily and obviously anchored to something—it afterwards proved to be a nail projecting from our keel—that prevents it from regaining its liberty. The occasion makes the man, and for once Nikko forswears his brothers of Ephesus, and, grasping the landing-net in one hand, leaps over the side to a most gallant rescue. Next moment, ere I well realise what has happened, he is holding on to the gunwale, with the great bass floundering in the net, and spluttering, "Hedò, mussyu, hedò!" ("Here, sir, here!") With which that good and faithful servant scrambles in over the side.

Seventeen pounds the fish weighed, and the good and faithful servant, to whom, as seemed only fair, it was presented, with a whole holiday, that he might take train to Stamboul to sell it for dollars in the fish-market, had been away all day, doubtless converting one at any rate of the dollars into mastic and raki in which he and his friends at his native Pendik might drink his health.

This is why I am sitting in the vine-roofed café at Deirmenderé watching the sun set in its blaze of gold and violet over the Sea of Marmora and listening to the babble of sunburnt cherry-pickers returning from their day's labours in the climbing orchards behind the village. The old Turk is retailing, in happier phrase no doubt, my morning's experience to some of his cronies. A high-prowed fishing boat, rowed by lean and lusty Armenians, passes close to the shore, and the reis, another acquaintance of mine, gives me cheery greeting as they swing up the Gulf. Far away on the north shore is a trail of smoke from Nikko's train, the last of the day, which has just left Héréké, where the Sultan has his silk factory.

And so I haul my little sail and wave the greybeard Au revoir and run back to Derinjé, with a great basket of ripe cherries, two large lobsters and half a dozen red mullet for my larder. By dinner time, I hope, the lobsters will be as scarlet as the rest. By nightfall I shall leave my pleasant, if lonely, banquet, to sleep once more in my little caïque, dreaming of new conquests on the morrow, with nightingales and frogs singing my lullaby in friendly rivalry beside the moonlit shallows of Solujak.

An Intimate Appreciation

By THOMAS WRIGHT OF OLNEY.

MR. JOHN PAYNE, the distinguished poet and translator, was born on August 23, 1842, consequently he was but a few weeks ago seventy. His childhood and youth were spent in London and Bristol. In the 'sixties he was thrown into the company of George Eliot and George Henry Lewes; and later he formed friendships with Arthur O'Shaughnessy, Ford Madox Brown, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, William Bell Scott, Burne-Jones, and John Trivett Nettleship, the animal painter and mystic who had been influenced by Blake, and made a painting of God with eyes turned inward upon His own glory.

In 1870 appeared Payne's first volume, "The Masque of Shadows," which contains, among other brilliant poems, "The Rime of Redemption," perhaps the most terrific fantasy in the language; and a copy was sent to Swinburne. Thirty-five years later Swinburne said to me, "I well remember the incident. Two young poets sent me their first volumes, O'Shaughnessy and Payne. O'Shaughnessy's had no merit, but I saw at once that Payne was a true poet. His 'Rime of Redemption' is a masterpiece." Swinburne and Payne first met at Madox Brown's, 37, Fitzroy Square, and Payne subsequently formed friendships with Victor Hugo, Theodore de Banville, Leconte de Lisle, Stéphane Mallarmé, Villiers de l'Isle Adam, and other French poets. Between 1871 and 1878 Payne published three more volumes of poems, one of which, "Intaglios," was reviewed by Swinburne, who described its contents as "exquisite and clear-cut," and selected for special praise "Sleepers" and "One that Watches." It was not, however, until the appearance of the splendid translation of Villon that Payne really became famous. He surrounded himself with new glory in 1882-4 by the publication of his matchless version of the "Arabian Nights." Burton's "Arabian Nights," as I proved in my "Life of Sir Richard Burton," chiefly by putting long passages in parallel columns and by citations from Burton's own letters, is simply Payne's altered and spoilt.

Payne next issued his translations of Boccaccio (three volumes), 1886; Bandello (six volumes), 1890; Omar Khayyam, 1898; and Hafiz (three volumes), 1901. His two fine volumes of "Collected Poems" appeared in 1902. Then followed "Flowers of France" (translations from the French lyrists), 1906-7; five volumes of original verse, 1903-9; and the translation of Heine (three volumes) in 1911.

To give a just idea of the poetical beauty, the nimbleness of execution, the surprises, the humour, and the pathos of the Heine is impossible. The work itself must be read. Beside it, all other renderings of this poet are wooden and sapless. Payne has caught the very spirit of the tender, airy, mocking, fantastic Jew; and yet, wonderful as has been his achievement, he has really done no more for Heine than he did for Villon, Boccaccio, and Hafiz. In short, all are classics. The following delightful presentment of Heine at his sweetest is as light and lovely as a soap bubble; but none but Payne could have given it both rondure and iridescence and have set it sailing in our sweet English air:—

ANGELS

(in an Album).

Doubting Thomas, I, in Heaven
I believe not, for our home,
Promised by the Churches Seven
Of Jerusalem and Rome.

But for angels, of their being,
In good sooth I doubted ne'er;
Light shapes faultless, for our seeing,
Still upon the earth they fare.

Only wings I, gracious lady,
To these beings must deny:
Marry, there are wingless angels
As full often seen have I.

Lovesome with their shining glances,
With their tender hands of white,
Man they shield and ward mischance's
Arrows from the luckless wight.

Each with kindness unabated
Solace they, but most of all
Him, that double trouble freighted
One, whom men the poet call.

Fine as was Payne's original work, his later poems eclipse it. He is now preparing for publication a new volume of original poetry, to be called "The Way of the Winepress," from which he permits me to select the following remarkable short poem:—

DRUNK OR SOBER.

Drunkenness (old Hafiz 'twas that said)
Drunkenness is better than dead dryness.
In this world of rottenness and wryness,
Where the sage is silent as the dead,
Where the Gods among the folk might tread
And be no more noted for their nighness.
In this day when lowness scoffs at highness,
Better drunk than sober go to bed.
Either aching heart or aching head;
Take thy choice, O servant of the Highest;
Sick at heart and sober, with the Real
All thy life to languish on, instead,
Day and night to be, until thou diest,
Drunken with the wine of the Ideal.

Well, that is the kind of wine which Mr. Payne has of late quaffed freely; for nearly all these later poems are lighted with what I called a persistent joyousness; but Mr. Payne, interrupting me, said, "Say, rather, exaltation, other-worldliness, beyond joy and pain — in Nietzsche's phrase, 'Jenseits von Gut und Böse.'" Indeed, when speaking of his poems, we always allude to them as if they were the work of a third person. They rush upon him—it is the divine afflatus—and he disclaims all responsibility for them. A whole philosophy is concentrated in almost any one of his sonnets. I wish the reader could also hear them from the poet's own lips, though Mr. Payne would not thank me for the expression of this wish, for he is a recluse of recluses, quite cut off save from a very small circle of friends.

While we were talking, D'Indy, a handsome Persian cat—named after the composer on account of his aloofness—walked unconcernedly into the room, settled himself on a cushion, and gazed into space—"into Africa"—reminding me that some of Payne's best poems are on animals. He is master of, and has translated from, fifteen languages. He is also an accomplished musician. The seventeen volumes of Nietzsche's works—in German, of course—always lie at his elbow. "Ah, Stepmother Nature!" he exclaimed pathetically, "she let Gladstone live to be eighty-nine, and cut off Nietzsche at fifty-six." With the music of the Bible he is supersaturated. His position in English literature is similar to that of Gautier among the French, with the additional powers of scholarship, philology, and translation.

To the Villon Society, which publishes Payne's works, and the John Payne Society—founded in 1905—which seeks to popularise them, I must be content with a passing reference. I trust that his poems and translations will be to the reader's life what they have been to mine—its gold, and its pearl, and its frankincense. Many lovers of the best in literature united on August 23 in wishing Mr. Payne years, health and happiness, so that, great as has been his literary productiveness, it may be still greater. May he many times more be drunken—to use his own phrase—with the Wine of the Ideal!

The Theatre

"The Girl in the Taxi" at the Lyric Theatre

CHARLES LAMB, who delighted in the comedies of the later Stuarts, was content to speak of them as non-moral. None of the amusing plays which kept Whitehall laughing in the wild days of Charles II could possess much more of this negative quality than the gay, sportive, irresponsible musical play which Mr. Faraday has produced with such gorgeous effects. Its success was certain in the middle of the first act, but one became more positive, if possible, as the light and clever dialogue developed the plot and the amusing comedians showed us the lively lines on which the "Girl in the Taxi" was to be run. Mr. Georg Okonkowski's play and Mr. Jean Gilbert's music are admirably mated. The farce is of the old Palais Royal character, that used to be draped in rose-coloured dominos; the music reminds one of all the bright and charming airs one has ever heard. From this sound basis Mr. Frederick Fenn and Mr. Wimperis have raised a delightful structure, an alluring entertainment. But they have done much more than that. They have boldly broken away from the old dull ways of musical comedy, and have made it impossible for these light pieces to be produced again without some admixture of brains.

Mr. Fenn has already written so many clever plays that it is not surprising that, in conjunction with Mr. Wimperis, he should be able to bring about so longed-for a revolution. The time had long since come for this agreeable change, and now we can welcome the men. Never has the rather wide term, musical play, been so justly used. For there is a lively and clearly developed story—on broadly farcical lines—which is lightened and helped and beautified at every point by the accomplished musician. But praise is due to everybody connected with this production, whose attractive numbers will ring in the ears of the town for very many months. Never has Mr. Arthur Playfair displayed so much resource, so much gay authority, such complete command of his many-sided art, as in the part of Baron Dauvray, the heavy father, who is really so light of heart and head. Seldom has Mr. Volpé been so thoroughly amusing and laughter-provoking as the head-waiter of the Jeunesse Dorée. Mr. Robert Averell is far better than he has ever been as Hubert, the son of Dauvray, who is young, and longs to be a "dog," and so soon finds the way to his desires. Mr. Workman has had better parts than that of Pomarel, but he is always amusing, always in the picture. Miss Yvonne Arnaud is the newcomer who filled the audience's cup of pleasure to the brim. Her voice may not be very splendid, but her gaiety is fresh and free, her humour delightful, her skill as complete as it is easy and effective. It is a long while since a lady of such pleasantly wicked and compelling charm has graced the stage of a make-believe Paris. Every one is really charming, but the greatest pleasure of the play is that nothing is real, and at the same time nothing is forced and artificial. For example, the habitués of the famous dancing and supping place, the Jeunesse Dorée, are quite convincing and yet not absurd, and there is no offence in them. The characters are in a way true to life, but so light and funny, so free from any second thought, that no one can be otherwise than vastly amused. I do not know anything about the "young person" who used to trouble producers of plays; all I say is that the story of the "Girl in the Taxi" is non-moral and full of life and colour and merry music. The name may attract, but the play is really "Suzanne," the part in which Miss Yvonne Arnaud won the hearts of a crowded house.

"A Scrape o' the Pen" at the Comedy Theatre

THE domestic note, which has already been sounded rather loudly this autumn in "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" and "Little Miss Llewelyn," rings out again in Mr. Graham Moffat's Scottish comedy, enacted by Scottish players. At the farm kitchen, Honeyneuk, and at the village cross of Minniehive, a group of Scottish persons, none of whom is very amusing or interesting, work through three acts of a truly artificial play. Those excellent, if somewhat conscious, actors, Mr. and Mrs. Graham Moffat, appear as old Mr. and Mrs. Inglis of the farm, and are both as pathetic and as sharp of tongue as the author will permit. Mr. Alfred Brydone as Hugh Menzies is the bluff and, as it appears, rather stupid manager of the estate. He is married to the beautiful Jean Lowther, played with some feeling by Miss Jean Alwyn. This brings us to the subtle plot. Old Inglis had a rather wicked and certainly unattractive son, Alec, played by Mr. Norman MacOwan, who, having done some rather naughty things in the village, removes himself to a far-off colony. But before he goes, he marries, according to a Scottish, and quite secret, method, the beautiful Jean. This lady, not being so fully aware of the inwardness of the Scottish laws of marriage as she ought to have been, considers this little affair of two "papers" and a few signatures as a mere betrothal which is not in the least binding. Soon after Alec leaves the land of Scottish comedy, Jean destroys her "paper," hopes for the best, and is married to the bluff and uninteresting Mr. Menzies. They are extremely happy; why, it is difficult to say, unless it is because the action is taking place in 1875, and everybody, however dull, was happy then. But, of course, Alec does very well in the colony he honoured, and returns to claim his bride. He selects, with a proper sense of theatrical fitness, the hours when the old year dies and the new comes in. This time is, of course, a great Scottish festival, and Mr. Moffat tires us a little with the dull details of the occasion, which, after all, do not help the play very much. That does not matter, however, as the play helps itself on fairly well-worn lines. As Jean has disposed of her "paper," there only remains one record in the world which proves her to be married to Alec—the other scrape o' the pen which he held. This, as it happens, has been stolen from him, and comes into the hands of a mysterious lady, who appears from nowhere early in the play and hands the document to old Mr. Inglis. Everybody likes Jean, and wishes to see her happy with her bore of a husband. No one likes Alec—and, indeed, why should they? But Mr. and Mrs. Moffat have a nice little scene as to whether they should burn the "paper" or give it into Alec's hands. At last, after the best bit of acting which the play permits, it is handed to Alec, and he, having been chastened by the sight of his illegitimate daughter, to whom Jean has been a devoted guardian and friend, placed it in the fire, and the Scottish comedy is ended, on the first night, amid generous applause. It had one great charm on that evening—it began at 8.30, and was over by half-past 10 o'clock.

"The Grass Widows" at the Apollo Theatre

IN musical comedy events move fast nowadays, and it needs an agile mind to keep pace with the changing features of the comic muse who rules at our theatres. Perhaps one should say, rather, that it is a poor relation, or a not legitimate child, of the Muse who holds sway where musical comedy is produced; for there are no rules that can be discovered as law which determines its evolution. Certain it is, however, that "The Grass Widows," which in 1910 would have passed for "the last cry" of modernity, has in 1912 been voted old-fashioned by some of the weightiest judges of our lighter forms of amusement. Still, the authorities at the Apollo need not despair; a far worse play has ere now been turned into a huge success; and in "The Grass Widows" there is a great deal of good material which at present is not properly used. Mr. Kerker's music answers its purpose very well, though—or perhaps just because—it has no very definite characteristics. The score contains one song, "My Man," which pleased everybody, and Miss Constance Drever, Mr. Alfred Lester, Mr. Gordon Cleather, and two comparatively new artists, Miss Thelme Raye and Mr. McKeown, make up a strong team which should be able to knock up a very respectable score.

"The Voysey Inheritance" at the Kingsway Theatre

WE think it may be doubted whether "The Voysey Inheritance" was worth revival. It is a long, windy play, relying on a plot which could easily have been exhausted in three not too long acts. As presented at the Kingsway, the comedy—so called on the bill—drags out into five acts, mainly for the utterance of smart sayings reminiscent—longo intervallo—of Mr. Bernard Shaw not at his best. Some of the irrelevant attempts at smartness are positively irritating, notably those put into the mouth of Hugh Voysey.

The plot is simplicity itself. A fraudulent solicitor, endowed with a plausible manner and a reputation for wealth, succeeds over a long course of years in deluding his clients and his friends. He misappropriates their funds and gambles with the proceeds; his one accomplice is a clerk in his employ. With extraordinary fatuity he takes into partnership his son, a young man of the highest moral attributes. The result was a foregone conclusion. The young man, horror-stricken on discovering the systematic frauds which his father and, it is suggested, his grandfather have practised in their profession, has to make a choice of whether he will cloak his knowledge and become an accomplice with his father, in the hope that by so doing the position will retrieve itself, or whether he will denounce his father and consign the firm to perdition.

The father, admirably acted by Mr. Edward Maurice, conveniently catches cold and dies in the early part of the play, and then the good young man, without any support from the rest of his family, enters on the path of restitution, and much that is maudlin, a little which is entertaining, and a great deal which is exasperatingly meant to be Shavian and amusing, but which generally misses the mark, follows. Altogether too long and not worth the length must be the verdict.

The acting was good throughout. Mr. Edward Maurice as the defaulting Voysey—unhappily to disappear early from the dreary void—gave a character sketch of extreme value. That wonderful old actress, Miss Florence Haydon, could not have been surpassed as the wife, widow, and mother. Mr. Arthur Wontner, as Edward the Good, filled an undramatic part with exceptional ability. Mr. Charles Fulton, as the pompous, loud-mouthed, vacuous Major Booth Voysey, was excellent. Mr. William Farren, as the querulous old George Booth, deserved especial mention; as also was the due of the young actresses who did all possible with their respective parts.

Notes and News

Messrs. Holden and Hardingham have nearly ready for publication a powerful new novel by the Hon. Mrs. Julian Byng, entitled "Barriers."

The library of the late Mr. William Yates, of Shepperton, formerly of Preston, Lancashire, is to be sold by Messrs. Knight, Frank, and Rutley during September. It comprises Burton's "Arabian Nights," and many translations from the Eastern, Italian, and French amatory writers, which have been published by private subscription.

Sir Henry Howorth, one of the most distinguished members of the House of Commons that Manchester has sent to Parliament, has not allowed politics to intervene with his studies of antiquarian and historical subjects. Amongst the many questions on which he is an approved authority is early Church history, and a volume entitled "St. Gregory the Great," which Mr. Murray will publish in September, is the fruit of his strong and enthusiastic interest.

"The Favourites of Louis XIV," by Le Petit Homme Rouge, author of "The Court of the Tuileries, 1852-1870," "The Favourites of Henry of Navarre," etc., is published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus this week. The work forms a companion volume to the author's earlier account of the women who influenced the life and reign of the first Bourbon King of France, and again illustrates the views which Le Petit Homme Rouge entertains respecting the part played, directly or indirectly, by feminine royal favourites in shaping the course of French history.

Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co. have just published another book by Mr. E. Keble Chatterton, entitled "Through Holland in the Vivette." His "Down Channel in the Vivette" will be known to many. The most recent addition to the same firm's dainty "Things Seen" Series will be "Things Seen in Palestine," by E. Goodrich Freer (Mrs. H. H. Spoer). They will also publish at the same time "Adventures in Southern Seas"—true and stirring stories of adventures and hairbreadth escapes among men and beasts in the Southern Seas.

James Clarke and Co. are about to publish an important work, "Concerning Conscience: Studies in Practical Ethics," by H. Jeffs, whose books on preaching and speaking have had a large acceptance. Among the subjects treated are the conscience of the business man, the politician, the lawyer, doctor, journalist and literary man, the clerical and ministerial conscience, national conscience, and there is a searching analysis of "The Feminine Conscience." "The Culture of Conscience," from infancy to middle age, is treated in an original and practical way.

The Navy and its efficiency is the burning question of the moment, and, in view of this, the book which Messrs. S. W. Partridge and Co., Ltd., have in the press is an opportune one. It is written by Mr. Fred T. Jane, the best-known modern naval writer of the day. The author traces the development of the "Dreadnought Idea" through the centuries, and indicates how various types of battleships came into existence, then passed away. The book, which is entitled "The British Battle Fleet: Its Inception and Development throughout the Centuries," has twenty-five pictures beautifully reproduced in colour from originals by W. L. Wyllie, R.A., and will be issued at 21s. net.

A book of special import by the Rev. T. A. Lacey, Warden of the London Diocesan Penitentiary, entitled "Marriage in Church and State," is shortly to appear.

and the author has dealt with his subject in a comprehensive, authoritative, and scholarly manner. Though the work is professedly theological, it treats of its subject also from the legal standpoint, but the latter element is as far as possible confined to the strictest limits. Mr. Lacey's new volume is one of a series edited by the Rev. Wm. C. Piercy, and published by Mr. Robert Scott, entitled "The Library of Historic Theology." The revised sheets have been passed for press, and the complete work will be published in time for the Church Congress.

Before Dr. Gomperz died, he had seen and passed the whole of the proofs of the fourth volume of his classic work, "Greek Thinkers," so that the complete work is at last finished with his approval. Mr. Murray hopes to publish this final volume some time in October. It is regretted by all scholars that the distinguished author did not live to see the whole of the English translation of his work on his shelves, but here, at any rate, is the most appropriate possible monument to his learning and memory. Mr. H. De Vere Stacpoole's new novel, "The Street of the Flute Player," is to be published by Mr. Murray on September 19. It is a story of Athens in her most lively days—at the time of Aristophanes—and shows that in their native atmosphere the Athenians were as full of interests, fads, emotions, and passions as the modern can be.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall publish this week Mr. Edward Thomas's new book, entitled "George Borrow: the Man and his Books." Mr. Thomas is particularly suited by temperament and gifts to attempt such a work; but though he is an ardent enthusiast, he is never for a moment carried away by prejudice. It is likely that his picture of the scholar gipsy will be more temperate and truthful than any that has yet been painted. A new volume by Marguerite Audoux is promised shortly by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, under the title of "Valserine." For those who prefer to read the work in the original, the French version is appended to the English translation, which has again been entrusted to Mr. John N. Raphael. On the same day the same publishers will issue a new volume by Mr. Walter Emanuel. The book is to be called "Tommy Lobb: Some Incidents in his Career," and will be freely illustrated by Mr. John Hassall.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

THE EUROPEAN SITUATION.

THE palpable insincerity which characterises the conduct of modern diplomacy is at root the cause of the uneasiness felt throughout Europe. We were on the verge of a general conflagration when Morocco was the question at issue. A settlement of this difficulty was followed by a prolonged discussion in Germany and Great Britain as to the advisability of an early understanding between the two countries. But diplomatists are finding that the task of translating pious expressions of cousinly amity into the letter of an agreement as between two rivals is no light one. Then the action of the United States in flaunting treaty obligations has provided a sore disappointment for those who believed that no serious differences could ever again divide the two great nations of the Anglo-Saxon race, and that, as a consequence of their enlightened example, the dawn of universal arbitration was at hand.

A further indication of the troubled state of the times in which we live is to be found in the gravity of the Balkan situation. The vague character of the proposals originated by Count Berchtold has given rise to not a little distrust in certain responsible quarters. His aim is to strengthen Turkey by a "measured decentralisation" which would not involve the danger of the creation of new Balkan States. How this laudable object is to be attained, he does not explain. Naturally he is careful to point out that he is solely animated by a desire to see permanent tranquillity throughout the Ottoman Empire. There is to be no intervention, no European congress or conference, no question of autonomy for Albania or Macedonia. "Each Power," says Count Berchtold, "will be free to make its representation when and how it may wish, but the moral influence of its action will be enhanced if the quarters to which it is addressed know that all the Powers are substantially agreed in supporting the advice tendered." During the last few days events have moved somewhat rapidly. Turkey has announced that, while she is very grateful for the sympathy of the European Powers, she cannot tolerate interference with her internal affairs.

No less significant is the brief official communiqué that Count Berchtold and Herr von Bethmann Hollweg have arrived at a complete agreement on all points relating to the Near East. The Powers of the Triple Entente are therefore to be asked to pursue a policy already decided upon by Austria and Germany. They cannot, of course, refrain from entering into diplomatic conversations, but it is a foregone conclusion, and all parties to the forthcoming discussions are already aware of the fact that no practical issue can result. What, then, will happen when the Austrian initiative fails, as it is destined, if not designed, to fail? We are warned that Austria will be obliged, without further regard for foreign susceptibilities, to pursue with a free hand a policy protective of her interests alone. Germany, it may be assumed, will do likewise. Consequently the European situation is again developing symptoms of a grave crisis. It is not generally known that before Count Berchtold's proposal was formulated Germany made overtures to Russia, which, had they been accepted, would have led to an attempt to partition Turkey. These overtures were rejected, and Russia remained loyal to the Triple Entente, a compact which of late has been materially strengthened as a defensive weapon. In view of all the present circumstances, and bearing in mind the events that preceded the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina, it is little wonder that anxiety as to the international situation is prevalent.

JAPAN'S DIFFICULTIES.

It is, perhaps, only natural that, at a time when the perplexities of China are engaging the attention of the world, small heed should of late have been paid to the internal problems of her neighbour, Japan. But it is not to be expected that a debtor nation with an adverse balance of trade can long escape the vigilance of her creditors, and, knowing this well, the Japanese Government have with admirable foresight devised a plan to counter the harmful effects of criticism. Realising the close relation which public opinion bears to national credit, they have organised a Press bureau, the ramifications of which extend throughout the capitals of the world. As a consequence, to those who are dependent upon the newspapers for their information, choice morsels, in the form of inspired statements, are offered from time to time, and the investing public of the West is lulled into a sense of security. And yet it is open to everyone who is willing to go tc the trouble to ascertain for himself the actual conditions prevailing in the country in which he has invested his money, and, uninfluenced by inspired statements, to form a true estimate as to the solvency of that country. Such an investigation can only lead to one conclusion—the conclusion that, in electing to pursue an ambitious policy of armaments out of all proportion to the utmost needs of national safety, year by year Japan is living far beyond her income.

Her only hopes of financial regeneration lie in the development of the resources of Korea and of Southern Manchuria, and in an expansion of her export trade. But the question to be asked is: Can the country hold out until such time as these hopes are realised? There is a party of economists in Japan, with which, perhaps, to some extent Mr. Yamomoto, the Finance Minister, may be identified, who treat this question as one of vital importance, and who openly declare that a policy of retrenchment is essential to the salvation of the country. They realise that much money must be expended before either Korea or Manchuria can be made to yield an adequate return to the national exchequer, and that years must pass before an expansion of trade can establish a permanent balance in favour of exports. The mere existence of such a school of thought in Japan is a hopeful sign, but there are other and stronger factors which do not encourage optimism. The militant party still dominates the Administration, and determines policy. Prince Katsura's inclusion among the Genro brings him into intimate relation with his old chief, Yamagata, while his position as Grand Chamberlain and Keeper of the Great Seal places him close to the ear of the Throne. The Marquis Saionji, as head of the Government, has given no indication of departing from the policy of his predecessor, and, whatever influence the economists may exercise upon the country, they are outwitted at every turn when it comes to a trial of strength with the militant party. Meanwhile the people of Japan are groaning under the burden of excessive taxation, and national exigencies, called into being by a policy which wise statesmanship would modify, demand that further obligations be incurred.

MOTORING

ON Monday last a 30-h.p. six-cylinder Sunbeam, driven by the famous Resta, covered 50 miles from a standing start on the track at Brooklands in 32 min. 16 sec., which represents an average speed of 92.96 miles per hour, and thereby broke the world's record for that distance. The previous best for 50 miles was an average of 91.32 miles per hour, accomplished on a 60-h.p. Thames car some time ago. The feat is noteworthy as an illustration of the great advances that have been made in engine efficiency, the Sunbeam being only half the nominal power—judged by the R.A.C. method of computation—of the car which has held the record for several years. However, although there can be no doubt about the increased efficiency of the modern engine, size for size, it should not be overlooked that the R.A.C. system of estimating horse-power is entirely misleading, as it takes no note of length of piston stroke, which is as important a factor in power development as the diameter of the cylinder; and the general tendency of designers in this country, since the introduction of the graduated tax based upon nominal horse-power, has been to secure added power by lengthening the stroke, which does not increase the tax. The result of this tendency has been the production of long-stroke engines, which, although rated at the same horse-power as engines of the "square" type, develop practically twice the real power, owing to the increased length of the piston. Making every allowance for this, however, the Sunbeam performance is distinctly noteworthy as a world's record. It shows conclusively that the British maker is now in a position to teach, instead of learning from, his foreign competitor.

It may be asked: What practical purpose is served by the development of cars capable of attaining such speeds as that of the Sunbeam? The answer is that speed means power, and power, in relation to size and weight of engine and chassis, is exactly what is required for comfortable and expeditious motoring. An ample reserve of power for hill-climbing means the capacity to run on the higher speeds, and this in its turn means economy in tyres and petrol, freedom from the nuisance of continuous gear-changing, and much more comfortable motoring in every way. In the old days the car which could take ordinary hills at a fair speed was, in comparison with its successor, enormously heavy and cumbersome, and ruinous with regard to tyres and petrol. That is why such cars, in perfectly sound and serviceable condition, can be bought to-day for a mere song. And that is why the efforts of the modern manufacturer are directed towards the attainment of the maximum of speed—i.e., power—from the smallest engine.

An interesting event in the Leicestershire Automobile Club's meeting at Beacon Hill, on the 31st ult., was that of "The Old Brigade," a competition open only to cars delivered before the Olympia Show of 1911. Competing cars were allowed bonuses of 5 per cent. for every year by which they antedated 1907. The first prize was taken by Mr. F. H. Gerrard's 6-h.p. De Dion of 1902, which had the distinction of beating a 15-h.p. car of well-known make, four years its junior. In this connection the present writer would like to mention that he has in regular use a 10-12-h.p. De Dion of 1904, which he would rather like to back against any other car of similarly prehistoric date. As a matter of fact, it is impossible to wear out a De Dion car, if it is treated rationally and lubricated properly. And I have reason to believe that this is a source of some anxiety to the De Dion people. Obviously, if a car lasts for ever and gives satisfaction to its owner, there is little inducement for the latter to replace it, even for a more modern one of the same type.

The latest information respecting the tyre trial is dated the 8th inst., when 4,021 miles had been covered, with all the tyres still going strong except one, which burst at 3,850 miles—not the Victor. It is astonishing that four steel-studded non-skids, selected at random, should have done so well on an old-type chain-driven car weighing a couple of tons. Last week, Earl Norbury, one of the observers, accompanied the car for two days, and Viscount Barrington and Lord Tollemache inspected the tyres. The test car has now gone to Devon for Lord Clifford of Chudleigh and other members of the committee to examine, and on its return Admiral Routh and Admiral Sir George Neville will examine and report upon the tyres in their capacity as observers. The outstanding feature of the trial, so far, has been the universal interest excited, and the excellence of all the tyres competing.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

I WONDER whether, when the new account opens, the long foretold boom will burst upon the City. In meteorology long-foretold lasts long, but in the City what is always promised never comes off. We have not arrived at the exact science of stock dealing. It is more complicated than the weather—more variable than the clouds, more dangerous than tempest. Yet it is easy to explain why the long-foretold never comes. Everybody says, "A boom is coming in Kaffirs." So all the clever division, who have no money, only brains, buy. Then the day of carry over arrives. They cannot pay. The money-lenders smell a "bull" account and proceed to break it up. Thus the public, who never come in until the clever division are out, do not get any chance—for the money-lender has shattered the boom at its birth. Greed of the rich against greed of the poor must always come out on top. It is the brazen pot and the earthen over again. For weeks past the City has been full of tales of what will be done in the autumn—how Kaffirs will rise, how Chartered will jump, how we shall all make our fortunes out of land in Rhodesia. But the magnates do not move. Like the gods in "Hyperion," they lie prone and nerveless whilst their worshippers wait for a sign. But a few brave ones have asked for money. The Russian Bank of Commerce, egged on by the energetic Crisp, has offered shares—an offer not unacceptable. Crown Mines have sold their debentures—a good security—and Dalziel asks for money for Central Cheleken—a prospectus of strange impudence which the wise man will disregard.

On all sides we hear of a demand for money. Germany wants large sums for the end of September settlement. She thinks she will get it from France. I believe that she will, for Paris is full of gold, and as the political horizon is clear the diplomats will not intervene. The French banks are ruled by the Quai d'Orsay, but to-day they are given a free hand. Hungary wants money. Russia wants millions for railways—wants it so badly that some of the railways will be financed without the usual State guarantee. These will possibly be the best. The United States has a huge cotton crop, and Canada a large wheat harvest. All want money. Egypt will give us 8,000,000 cantars, and this cries for cash—cannot be moved without it. Then we have the Argentine and Brazil. Indeed, no one needs to complain that our Bank of England put up her rate, or be surprised if the Reichs bank follows the example of her richer ally.

HOME RAILWAYS are dull. The high value of money will stop speculation, and the investor still remains cold. Why, I cannot see. He needs safety above everything, and this he gets in the Railway market. Yet he will gladly buy 5 per cent. Bonds in some foreign railway of which he knows nothing and refuse the Ordinary Stock of a line upon which he travels every day. He is peculiarly stupid, and will one day find this out. Those foreign railways will many of them default, but I see little chance of English Heavy Lines passing their dividend. Traffics are good, trade is booming. But no one wants Home Rails. Gilt-edged five per cent. securities are neglected for so-called Bonds in the wilds of South America. The Scotch results were all good. They will be better for the current half-year. Yet prices don't budge.

YANKEES appear nervous. The Banks want all the money they can scrape together for the crops, and they are not lending freely upon Wall Street. But business people in America are most confident that the next six months will be great months for the Railways. But in the States as in England the whole demand is for high yielding shares in industrial companies, and not for the more slow-moving Railway stocks. But the clever people are laying in a stock of Convertible Bonds. These Bonds are cheap to-day. The price of Unions, Atchisons, Southern Pacific, and the other roads that have issued convertible Bonds is very low to-day, and the Bonds are therefore cheap, for the option is all the more valuable. But the public does not follow the lead of the banker, who always buys these Bonds. The Denver and Rio Grande looks in a bad way—it is almost on the verge of a receivership. These Gould Lines are not satisfactory. I think holders had better get out. The gamble in Canada Pacifics has died down, for New York and Berlin have been scared. But the directors are buying, and they are good enough for me.

RUBBER shares have now lost all interest for the gambler. The East has unloaded its good stocks and is loaded up with the cheap shares. Do not forget that the East is a gambler, not an investor. It is not always safe to follow the lead of Singapore. I think that the Chinaman has made a mistake this time. The British Public is not buying. It has hundreds of thousands of shares which it wants to sell, and will sell when it gets the chance. It shows no desire to retain its holding. Lampard does not appear to have taken any hand in the recent rise, but he must feel anxious for the safety of his trust, which is loaded down to the gunwale with stocks and has no coin. I am afraid that the little spurt has died down. There are many cheap and good shares, such as Pataling, Cicely, Batu Caves, Anglo-Malay, Consolidated Malay, Bukit Rajah, Lanadron, and Linggi. Do not touch the cheap shares puffed in all the papers. They are puffed because there are calls outstanding which those who hold want to get rid of.

OIL shares are out of fashion. There are queer stories about Urals and Emba Caspian, expiring concessions and water in the wells. A curious letter from Russia is given in this week's Stockbroker. The promoters are anxious for a boom, but they make no effort to produce one. They lack any lead. I see nothing to go for in the oil market. There is much talk and little else I keep my opinion that those who want a good oil share should buy Royal Dutch. It gets 60 per cent., and the Shell 40 per cent., of the profits, and yet the price is lower than Shell—an anomaly which only the limited market in Amsterdam is responsible for.

MINES are friendless. The Kaffir magnates are all agreed to put only the best ore through the mill and thus work up the profits. Wernher Beit some months ago having decided to amalgamate Village Main Reef with Village Deep told the manager to crush under the value. But the ruse did not come off, and no one sold Village Deep. Still, I think that the amalgamation will be carried through—a bad thing for Village Deep—a rich and young mine—and a good thing for the Main Reef, which is dying fast.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Mount Elliotts are smelting all their rich ore, and if they go on very much longer the mine will die, for it has not got a year's supply of good ore. Cobar is buying rich ore to keep up returns. Whim Well will amalgamate with Mons. Cupri, and the French will find the money. Ray and Miami are good to buy. Indeed, all copper shares are good. Marconis have been supported by the shop—a dangerous game, which can only end in disaster. West Hartlepool are said to be going to be absorbed by Furness Withy. The shares have risen. They will go higher. RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

THE OILFIELDS OF ROUMANIA.

Roumania as a source of oil production is forging ahead with extraordinary rapidity, and the chief oil companies of the world have found it worth their while to take up oil drilling there, including the great Anglo-Dutch Combine, the Standard Oil Co., of which Mr. Rockefeller is the head, a powerful German group, and last, but not least, a purely British company, the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields, Ltd., who by the combination of six companies has secured control of 7,000 acres of oil land in an advanced stage of development, and now valued at fully £5,000,000 sterling. The company is producing oil on a large scale, and at the same time is proceeding rapidly with a comprehensive scheme of well-drilling, for which purpose it has, in cash in hand and guaranteed, working funds exceeding £300,000. The Roumanian Consolidated has its own refinery and pipe-line, and the present output of about 6,000 tons per month, which is being rapidly enlarged, will eventually reach 1,000 tons daily. In view of the extreme importance which oil supply for power and other purposes has attained, and the rise in the price of oil, the shares of this company must steadily appreciate in value.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEED.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Martin's criticism, I beg to borrow this gentleman's own energetic phraseology and to say that "most people, may, must, should or ought to have long since found out for themselves" that, in "I did not need," " I did not go," I did not give, need, go, and give are in the Infinitive mood; just as everyone knows that, in the following expressions: "It is needed," He is gone, She has given, needed, gone and given are in the Past participle.

I also beg to avail myself of this opportunity to convey to my critics my grateful acknowledgments for their remarks. As the French have it:—"La lumière jaillit du choc des opinions" (Truth is struck out from clashing opinions); and it is this very truth that is needed under the circumstances. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, ADOLPHE BERNON.

61, Talbot Road, Bayswater, W.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I cannot say that I quite follow Mr. T. G. Martin in his interesting remarks on the English auxiliaries and quasi-auxiliaries. Why not, "It does not matter"? We have, "To matter; it matters; it matters not; it does matter; it does not matter." "He dare not go" is distinctly idiomatic; and I would certainly permit the more regular "He dares not go." The fact is that, as Mr. G. H. Powell points out, English is very irregular in the matter of such words as need and ought. I cannot see why this sort of verb should not in all cases have a regularly formed past tense. "I knew that I needed not do it," "I knew that I oughted to." But on the other hand, as the uninflected form produces no ambiguity in the sense, there seems to be no objection to its use: and we must perhaps be guided as much by euphony as by grammatical consistency.

Would it not be an excellent thing if all English verbs followed the excellent example of can, may, might, etc., and dropped the final s of the 3rd person singular, present indicative? This simplification might also be extended to the 2nd person, so that we would say without any hesitation, "I go, thou go, he go." Mr. Martin's "He dare not go," would then be right "anyway." I am, Sir, your obedient servant, IMMO S. ALLEN.

London Institution, Finsbury Circus, E.C.

P.S.—In reply to M. Bernon, surely "replace" may be allowed to have both meanings.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The assumption that the word "need" in "he need not do it" is a verb in the present infinitive, being an ellipsis for "he (did) not need" cannot be accepted. There is no analogy for such an ellipsis, and it does not account for the transference of the negative.

The Oxford Dictionary has the following note on this point:—

"The irregular form need in the 3rd pers. sing. of the present tense (in the place of needs or needeth) becomes fairly common in the 16th century, and is now usual in the forms of expression it (he, I, etc.) need not, why need it? etc."

The loss of the s is perhaps due to the influence of the preterite-present verbs. Compare he dare, he can, he shall, he will. See Sweet's "English Grammar," §1487.

Oxford. A. L. MAYHEW.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

DEAR SIR,—As the grandson of Mr. George Washington Moon, I may perhaps be allowed to point out Mr. T. G. Martin's error in suspecting that Mr. Moon was only the creation of someone's fancy. On the contrary, Mr. Moon died four years ago, after living eighty-four years; and during that time he was recognised by a world that was the very reverse of "mocking" as an authority —I may perhaps say the authority—on questions of English grammar.

Being away from home at the moment, I cannot verify dates, but it was, at any rate, a good many years ago that the late Dean Alford published in Good Words a series of critical articles, under the title, "The Queen's English." Believing that the Dean committed errors as grave as those he criticised, Mr. Moon wrote "The Dean's English" to show that the Dean was himself "but a castaway in matters of grammar." This book went rapidly through several editions, and although now out of print, is still constantly advertised for. Mr. Moon also wrote "The Revisers' English," concerning the Revised Version of the Bible, and several other books on grammar. As well as this, some of his poems, notably "Elijah," were again and again reprinted.

If Mr. T. G. Martin should by any chance be anxious for further information concerning the grammarian whose work he criticises, he may be directed to the volumes of "Who's Who" previous to the year 1909. Faithfully yours, G. BELTON COBB.

RICHARD JEFFRIES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In your interesting article on Richard Jeffries, the writer mentions Gilbert White of Selborne and other naturalists. It is true that our "patron saint" was a sportsman, but it is not quite correct to say that he was not an "undergrad.," for he took his degree at Oriel and for many years was a Fellow of that College. With compliments, yours faithfully,

WILFRED MARK WEBB,
Honorary Secretary of the Selborne Society.

Notes of the Week

THE School Boards of Scotland are endeavouring to induce the Scotch Education Office to alter its scheme of 1906, which provided that the subjects taught in primary schools should be strictly defined and limited, while special schools were set aside for children who after the age of fourteen might wish to take a course of study preparing them for the University. The grievance is that many children are too poor to pass from their villages to these centres, and that even when the parents can afford it they do not care to part with their children at such an early age. Certain bursaries allowed by the Department being of the value of £5, or at most £10, are not, it is contended, enough to pay for residence at one of the central schools. Further, scholars must pass four years at these superior schools, and go through the whole prescribed course of secondary education. More elasticity should be allowed in the regulations, primary schools being permitted to retain their pupils for a part of the course leading to the University; this relaxation would encourage the primary masters to keep up their knowledge, and would raise the dignity of their status. We understand that the question is being widely discussed in Scotland, where the dominie is much respected.

Subject to the correction of the musical critics, it seems to us that, when Dr. Strauss strives to express in melody and harmony things which in themselves have no relation whatever to music, he is wasting time and degrading, not advancing, his art. The achievement may bring forth some extremely clever scoring and orchestration, and may amuse the undiscriminating crowd; but wherein lies its pleasure or use? And what would the master-musicians of the past have said to such tricks? There are many admirers of Bach's fugues and Beethoven's symphonies who can enjoy again and again the light-hearted fantasies of, let us say, Sullivan; but to "set an omelette to music" seems to savour of the business of the musical clown, not of the serious composer.

We wonder what the housewives of fifty years ago would say about some of the recent advances of science into the realm of domesticity. "Washing by electricity, without the aid of soap," says the writer of an article in a contemporary this week, "is already an accomplished fact." After all, one imagines that soap and water must bring a more natural cleanliness. The approach of the Mechanical Age, when everything will be done by merely pressing buttons, seems to carry with it some little decrease in self-reliance and independence. Our restless anxiety to investigate the effect of new processes resembles to some extent the desire of "Toddie" to "see the wheels go round"; operations that used to take years are now completed in as many days—the maturing of wine, for instance: imagine the dignified protests of the good Dr. Middleton if he were asked to taste some of the Patterne port "matured" by electricity! We speed up our trains, milk cows and shear sheep by machinery; we even hustle the growth of plants by means which have nothing to do with enriching the soil or legitimate horticulture; and the result is not all to the good; something of romance, of beauty, is lost.

There is a suggestion in the air that the mere man is to be allowed a greater licence in the matter of his attire; that soon, in fact, he will be able to wear satin knee-breeches, waistcoats of gorgeous hue, and coats of a shape that we should now regard as fantastic. In the nature of things, this ought to be; for events, as we know, tend to move in cycles, and fashions conform to the rule—is not every new change in feminine dress looked upon as an extraordinary vagary until some enterprising journalist or someone with a long memory dubs it a revival from Victorian days? If tasselled canes, stocks, and fanciful costumes arrive once more—to say nothing of snuff as a fashionable commodity—the streets may wear a pleasantly relieved aspect, and the dandy may swagger along Piccadilly again. But he would not rejoice our eyes for long, we fear; we are too busy to tolerate him or to imitate him to-day.

A Man's Bargain

IF I cry out for fellowship,
A comrade's voice, a comrade's grip,
A hand to hold me when I slip,
An ear to heed my groan,
Renew that hour's dark ecstacy,
When all Thy wâves went over me,
And Thou and I, with none to see,
Were joined in fight alone.

If I demand a sheltered space
Set for me in the battle-place,
Where I at times could turn my face,
A screened and welcome guest,
Decree my soul should henceforth cease
From its wild hankering after peace,
And rest in that which gives release
From the desire of rest.

If I for final goal should ask,
Some meaning for the long day's task,
Some ripened field that yet may bask
Secure from hurricane,
Point to Thy locust-eaten sheaves,
The burnt-out stars, the still-born leaves,
And by the toil no hope retrieves
Nerve me to toil again!

So to Thy hard propitious skies
Shall praise go up like sacrifice,
And all the will within me rise,
Applauding, at Thy word;
Thou, in the glory jasper-walled,
By no reproach of mine be galled,
And I, among my kind, be called
The man whose prayers are heard.

The Bore.

IT is a confession which we all have to make, sooner or later, that in this life many things come to us which seem at first sight wholly unnecessary and superfluous. Toothache, for example, is one: there appears to be no valid reason why we should suffer from what Hood punningly termed that "transcendental" pain; a pain which may drive a man nearly mad, yet which brings, should he crave sympathy, merely the annoying advice to "go and have it out." Many others might be mentioned were we in categoric mood; but one more will suffice for the present: the bore. What good is he, and why is he permitted to exist?

The psychology of the bore is an interesting study. "The most worthless creatures are most serviceable for examination," said Meredith, "when the microscope is applied to them, as a simple study of human mechanism." Examined, then, the bore is found to possess determination, perseverance, loquacity, smartness, even courage—all misused in the most pathetic manner. He is impervious to the broadest hints; the bullet from a toy pistol is as effective against the hide of a hippopotamus. It is impossible to disconcert him; he comes up smiling from a cold douche of disapproval that would give any ordinary person the shivers for a month; and perhaps the worst of it all is that he is so dreadfully friendly, so convinced that we really must be pleased to see him. Obviously it is difficult to act the hedgehog to a man who calls you "old fellow" and slaps you jovially on the shoulder; equally difficult, of course, to turn your back upon him and go on with the work in hand, for with that sort of treatment the true bore is simply and unaffectedly charmed; he seems to regard it as a subtle compliment. He can talk to an immobile back view as brightly as ever; the scratch of the busy pen exhilarates him to further efforts; he is wound up, and, like a clockwork engine, he must buzz until, in the course of providence, he runs down.

Various expedients have been suggested for the suppression of the bore. Huge, muscular, pugilistic, pugnacious porters were retained, it is said, in the primitive days of certain American townships, to throw him violently downstairs or out of the window; unhappily, in our advanced state of civilisation, such methods are neither legal nor seemly. The poisoned cup is as out of date as the thumbscrew in the best circles of society; therefore, with murder in our hearts and a growled welcome on our lips, we allow the bore to chatter on.

Let us go a little deeper into his construction before we take leave of him. He generally has plenty of spare time; thus, remembering our existence, he "just pops in" to see us, and unfortunately we cannot just pop out. "Here," he says to himself, "dwells a friend of mine; verily I will go and shake his hand." If we are busy and have the temerity to say so, he prevails over the messenger by his plaintive promise "not to keep him a minute." He keeps us twenty minutes—half an hour, maybe, disorganising thought and upsetting temper. And when he departs we are so relieved that our farewell is unusually hearty, so that he feels sure that his visit has been the one bright spot in our day.

To avoid him altogether, as the only means of escape, is a counsel of perfection, It may be done, if he is seen coming along the street, by vanishing hurriedly into the nearest shop and making a purchase which may be unneeded—supposing the shop to be that of an oilman or a feather-dresser—but which will be cheap considering the happiness of watching the unconscious bore pass by. To greet him boldly and briefly, pleading an engagement, is of no use whatever; he is going the same way, by the pleasantest of coincidences, and will be overjoyed to come with you. How he manages to find the time to attend to his own business is a perpetual mystery; somehow, however, he does, and flourishes like the green bay tree. He is in the world for our chastening. The only thing to do when his advent is suspected is to lock the door and pretend to be out. Even then it is quite likely that he will be waiting on the doorstep with extended hand and beaming face, anxious to cheer us; and the climax, the most unkind cut of all, is that he cannot be bored himself.

Developments in Photography.—II

By HALDANE MACFALL.

TO come to the chief interest of the display—the colour work. The keenest minds in photography are bent on perfecting the colour-print; indeed, the day that the colour-print is perfected, we have the coloured illustrated paper upon us, and a fortune for him who creates it. It would be well, by the way, for the Society to call in the judgment of a few advanced painters to serve as their selecting jury for the colour-prints, as they do abroad—and even if the English painter should lack that wide interest in his brother craftsman, which is a constant source of surprise to foreign artists, there are men even in England of sufficient capacity to realise the honour done them by the invitation. Monochrome men may be very poor judges of colour, though exquisite judges of monochrome. The colour-pieces should have been hung together, to their own enhancement and the enhancement of the monochromes, which should also be arranged with more relation to their values than they are.

To take the narrower colour-faculty of the bichromate process first—by the way, the catalogue would be of even greater value than it is if works were classified by processes—the Viennese lady, Madame d'Ora, and Dr. Quedenfeldt would alone make this display a remarkable one. The mastery of Madame d'Ora in the bichromate process leaves a regret that even this fine worker seems unable to rid the method of the jaundiced yellow tone that mars all her strong craftsmanship with so hot a defect—this yellow is apparently the chief drawback to the process. D'Ora handles the difficulty, 'tis true, with consummate tact, making her prints from subjects which allow a warm tone; at the same time, her flesh tints, even in her masterpiece of "The Red Bodice"—I forget the name of it—are too hot, and it is only after careful survey of its masterly harmonies that one realises the astounding skill with which she has handled the defect of the process. All Madame d'Ora's work is excellent. Dr. Quedenfeldt, a remarkable craftsman who selects from the plate to the point of getting line, gets rid of the hot yellows of the process, but falls into "tintiness," his red or lilac harmonies running into the flesh tones just as does d'Ora's orange hue. Quedenfeldt's prints are exquisitely done, approaching colour woodcuts in effect, and tender in tones. Here we have the work of the foremost craftsmen in the medium, to which we should add, perhaps, the low-toned colour of Mr. Willé's portrait of "Mrs. E."

It is to the bromoil process, however, that we must turn for the finest colour range of the display. Here, at once, we are rid of the severity and the "tintiness," as well as the narrow colour faculty of the bichromate process even in the hands of its masters. I am taking it for granted somewhat that Mr. Baier's poetic snow-scene, "Einsamkeit," is bromoil; however, be it so or not, it is beautifully rendered.

The more personal utterance of the bromoil colour-print—a vastly important matter—is seen throughout the works here displayed. The sweet, tender, cool colours playing throughout the warm tones in Mr. Cocks's "Head of Arab" alone prove the far purer range of harmonies at the command of the oil printing. Having mastered colour—and he is increasing rapidly in its control—Mr. Cocks, inevitably proceeding to quality of handling, will prove himself as consummate a craftsman therein as he has already proved himself in his monochromes of Eastern subjects. He has the right stuff in him; and he is a born hunter, for he "takes a toss" as part of the necessities of the hunting. Mr. Tucker, who must always be given the honour of one of the pioneers of the movement, has made finer colour-prints than the one on the line, "A Grey Day on the Canche," which plays with the greys and greens of a French landscape by a stream, wherein he shows an ugly tendency in places to paint spots with the brush instead of making the gelatine bring up the colour from the brush in pure printing fashion, thereby giving passages of cheap, hard appearance to an otherwise good work—a blemish even more marked in his larger print. Mr. Tucker is too fine a craftsman to go a-stumbling now. I remember his houses along the river and other better things than these; nor do I judge him with the leniency due to a novice—he is a leader.

The enormously large faculty and power of the bromoil over the bichromate is best seen in the prints round about the "Arab Fantasia," where the rich, warm hues, the snowy whiteness of the white dome, and the sumptuous colours of the East do not prevent the interplay of tender lilacs and silvery greys—and, be it remembered, it is in the lilacs, silvers, and golden hues that light reveals its glamour. There are works here to be seen which are so remarkable in colour and in handling that they would make a mark in any display of water-colours or coloured etchings, wholly free from all that unpleasantness of "photography tintiness" that we associate with the wretched product known as the "coloured photograph." Action is caught on the wing, and the play of light recorded with skill. A tender landscape by Mr. Stuart, called "La Bocca," and an Arab by Mr. Mortimer, deserve attention. Altogether a memorable display. The hanging might have made it appear to greater advantage; exhibitions are an affair of compromise, but there are degrees even in compromise. But the show will take rank for its large and generous policy, for its freedom from clique and parochial intention, above all for its liberal attitude towards the advance of photography in colour-printing. It has drawn the eyes of the Continent, and it has thoroughly deserved its position.

REVIEWS

The Critic Scornful

English Literature, 1880-1905. By J. M. KENNEDY. (Stephen Swift and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. KENNEDY'S title is a sort of joke, probably suggested by Mr. Max Beerbohm's "1880," for his book is really a set of essays on the "Yellow Book" authors, on Pater, Wilde, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Wells, and Gissing, with a long note on classicism. He regards these authors as representing a "revived romantic movement" of these twenty-five years. He has no great opinion of any of them, and concludes with this advice to those who care to listen to it:—

> The age of science may be dead; but we must look to it that if an age of faith is to begin such faith shall be aristocratic—Catholic, if you like—and not the narrow Puritanism and Nonconformity to which we have so long been accustomed. Only if this condition is fulfilled shall we witness anything resembling a renaissance in creative English literature. This is an essential principle; and the leaders of such modern literature as we have—if I may use an expression verging on the colloquial—must be educated up to it.

He begins their education. He does not like romanticism at all. Having read Nietzsche, he has become scornful of everything not classical, and by classical he means, and says that he means, "work modelled on the style of the best Greek and Latin authors." He does not include Plato, because he calls Plato and the Platonists the "Christians" of Greece, and he scorns Christians and Liberals as he does romantics. He is a bigot, and his bigotry is amusing. Thus to learn the difference between romantic and classical he asks us to compare Donne with Ovid, and George Herbert with Racine. He expects us to lament with him the pernicious influence of Plato and Ruskin on Pater, though we do not know, and he does not know, what Pater could have been without that influence, which was lifelong. He is not content with "what some critics refer to as the 'freshness' of Philippe de Commynes and Villehardouin," but longs for the touch of Thucydides and Tacitus. Evidently he has less love of variety than his creator.

But the classicist is not merely one who tries to write like a Greek or Roman not under the ban of Mr. Kennedy. He is not afraid to face reality; he says "Yea" to life; he controls himself. There is as little harm as good in this use of the word, but we doubt whether the word is more than a shibboleth adopted in imitation of Nietzsche and for purposes of abusing those whom the author dislikes. It is used in a special secret sense which it is not in the power of his prose to communicate. The word is dead, like the rest of his writing, the mere pedantry of a servile and arrogant Nietzschean. Mr. Kennedy degrades a number of good words so as to make them rough synonyms: classicist, aristocrat, artist, Catholic, on the one hand; romantic, liberal, democratic, Puritan, on the other. In one place he seems inclined to add "Celtic" to the bunch, for he says:—

> The Celt has all the sympathetic feelings for humanity which we usually find developed by the Roman Catholic Church, although he may not possess them in so great a degree as his French, Spanish, or Italian brethren of the faith.

Here this classicist may be seen doing as naive a conjuring trick as any romantic. He does not explain. Your classicist will not explain in addressing the herd; he will advocate his ideas "like a priest of the Church of Rome, who would merely have to give a word of command to an obedient flock," which is a "noble and aristocratic fashion." Mr. Kennedy calls Crackanthorpe's realism "inartistic," and applies the same epithet to Eugenics as a remedy for decay. The real artist in his view is one who > will have no early artistic struggles to endure, for, as the result of artistic tradition on both sides of his family, he will be born with all the requisite artistic instincts, which will then only require purely natural development.

He omits to mention on which side of the grave and of reality this state of things is expected and desired. He pities men "who endeavour to act as artists without having been born with this artistic tradition." In his jargon it is natural to contend that Dickens "never attempted to write a work of art in his life," and to say of the books of Mr. Wells that "we may, if we like, . . . describe them as the works of a self-made artist," and to label Darwin and Herbert Spencer as Puritans and "these people." He turns from Mr. Wells to Gissing with relief as to one who was "acquainted with art."

If a man cannot use language in such a way that each word helps every other and is necessary to every other, he must explain himself at some length. Mr. Kennedy cannot so use language, and therefore speaks in vain when, for example, he pronounces that "Mr. Wells's books show an ingenious use of the scientific faculty, but little artistic imagination." We can have only a vague notion of what is meant by these groups of words. We cannot expect Mr. Arthur Symons to take it as a compliment that Mr. Kennedy says he can only compare his book on Blake to Lionel Johnson's "Art of Thomas Hardy." He cannot expect us to set any value on his random statement that Beardsley was of the "ruler-artist" type because he played fast and loose with Wilde in illustrating "Salome."

Mr. Kennedy seldom confesses to liking anything, but he admires Lionel Johnson and Mr. Max Beerbohm, and asks us to share his admiration for the use of "bleed" in this sentence by Mr. Beerbohm: "If anyone were so sanguine, a glance at the faces of our Conscript Fathers along the benches would soon bleed him." But this is merely a half-serious Paterism, and not English at all. He also admires Dowson's "Cynara," of which he says—surely not in classic style—that it is "as immortal as Catullus in his happiest moments, and not to be compared with anything but a few of the finest efforts of the Latin poet." Nor is he more classic in sneering, as when he makes Mr. Shaw call himself a "feverish little clod of ailments and grievances"—which he never did—or when he writes:—

> That Mr. Shaw, the ardent reformer, revolutionary Socialist, and would-be artist, should have had a short play produced on the boards of a music-hall is, to my mind, something distinctly ironical.

But Mr. Kennedy will have to do even more than digest his Nietzsche and swallow his conceit before he can write about literature.

Post-Prandial Essays

All Manner of Folk. By HOLBROOK JACKSON. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a book with an infallible appeal to all those who love what Shaftesbury so aptly described as "the ingenious way of miscellaneous writing." It is as difficult to define as it is impossible to resist the charm of these essays. They make no great parade of scholarship. They can hardly—any of them—be regarded as ultimate contributions to the subjects of which they treat. They are discursive—colloquial almost. They have all the qualities of good magazine writing. But they leave a pleasant flavour behind them. They entertain. And, after all, to entertain is—or should be—one of the chief functions of the essayist.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson has always the air of being delightfully at home with his subject. He strikes you as being a specialist in everything, and of communicating as much information as he thinks will amuse you—no more. He stops short on the popular side of erudition. He passes lightly over a hundred subjects, lingers lovingly on others, agrees to dismiss some altogether. He has his preferences, of course. In every successful book of essays the personal equation must count for much. Mr. Jackson is frankly a man of his time. He is imbued with the modern spirit, has absorbed Nietzsche, and welcomes with a shout of triumph the advent of the Superman. He is always on the side of the new arrival. Hence such writers as John M. Synge and Max Beerbohm are secure of a generous meed of recognition. His admiration for Poe is not easily distinguishable from idolatry. At times, however, he dips his pen in acid rather than in ink. There is a sharp double-edge about such appreciation as the following. Mr. Jackson is writing of Thoreau and the Walden experiment:—

> The experiment, in spite of its remoteness from comfortable habits, was not remote from the only sort of social life which appealed to the philosopher; it was performed before the only people who would then have understood his aim, the intellectual coteries of Concord; and the loneliness which was mitigated for him by reason of his knowledge that our planet was in the Milky Way, was further mitigated by the fact of Thoreau's kinship with the members of the Concord coterie, who were his frequent visitors.

Equally penetrating is his appreciation of J. M. Synge, the Irish dramatist, who has not yet come into his own:—

> Synge stands for a national, as distinct from a class, drama; a drama which interprets character rather than analyses it, which reveals rather than proves; a drama of humour rather than of wit, and a drama which above all things nourishes the imagination instead of sacrificing everything to the intellect.

Indeed, everything that Mr. Jackson has to say in this volume about the drama and its modern developments is well worth reading.

Mr. Jackson is, as a rule, so scrupulously accurate that one takes a malicious joy in finding him tripping. And trip he does—quite amusingly—on page 151, where he refers to the "devotional writer, Anthony Trahearne." He means, of course, Thomas Traherne. Anthony Treherne is, if we remember rightly, the name of a London publisher. A mere lapsus memoriæ, however, cannot be counted to Mr. Jackson as a defect, and the book is so full of good things that we should be ready to pardon many such mistakes. "All Manner of Folk" is one of the most interesting books of the season, and the reader will return to it again and again.

Poets at Prayer

The Poet's Chantry. By KATHERINE BREGY. (Herbert and Daniel. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE author of this volume has deliberately narrowed her selection. All the poets dealt with here are religious poets, and their purely religious work, and that alone, is considered. Furthermore, they are all Roman Catholics. Much of the finest and most exalted spiritual poetry which our English literature has produced falls outside the purview of Miss Brégy. She can find no place for such singers as Herbert, or Quarles, or Traherne, or Henry Vaughan, the Silurist, or Keble, or Christina Rossetti, or Dora Greenwell. The consequence is that one gets a rather one-sided impression of religion in English poetry.

On the other hand, Miss Brégy will have rendered an important service if she helps the reader to realise the immense influence which Roman Catholicism has exerted over our English devotional verse. Southwell and Crashaw and Francis Thompson—these are names which shine like stars with an undimmed lustre in the splendid firmament of song. There is, indeed, one link that binds together most, if not perhaps all, of these singers to whom Miss Brégy introduces us. It is the link of sorrow. Of such poets as Southwell and Gerard Hopkins and Coventry Patmore it may be said, with the fullest realisation of the meaning of the phrase, that they learnt in suffering what they taught in song. Mysterious are the ways of Providence! Southwell, who opens Miss Brégy's list, was a propagandist by profession, a poet by accident. Flung into a noisome gaol, his spirit returned upon itself, and he wrote that immortal lyric, "Burning-Babe," to claim which Ben Jonson would have willingly destroyed more than one of his own poems. The life of Gerard Hopkins was one long, slow martyrdom. Yet he poured out his soul in pæans of thankfulness, and, while toiling at an uncongenial task among the slums of Liverpool, he had a vision of the world charged with the grandeur of God. Scarcely Francis Thompson himself had a deeper realisation of the nearness of the Divine to the human than this man whose work is known only to the readers of a few casual anthologies. One cannot resist the temptation of quoting here that perfect poem, "Barn-floor and Winepress." There may be a few readers of THE ACADEMY to whom it is even yet unknown, and, as Miss Brégy justly says, "it ought to have the recognition due to a devotional classic":—

> Thou who on Sin's wages starvest,
> Behold, we have the Joy of Harvest;
> For us was gathered the First-fruits,
> For us was lifted from the roots,
> Sheaved in cruel bands, bruised sore,
> Scourged upon the threshing-floor;
> Where the upper millstone roofed His Head,
> At morn we found the Heavenly Bread;
> And on a thousand altars laid,
> Christ our Sacrifice is made.
> Thou, whose dry plot for moisture gapes,
> We shout with them that tread the grapes;
> For us the Vine was fenced with thorn,
> Five ways the precious branches torn.
> Terrible fruit was on the tree
> In the acre of Gethsemane:
> For us by Calvary's distress
> The wine was racked from the press;
> Now, in our altar-vessels stored,
> Lo, the sweet vintage of the Lord!

It is a standing reproach to English criticism that the author of these lines has hitherto received so small a meed of recognition, and it is little less than incredible that no collected edition of the poems of Hopkins has ever been published.

Francis Thompson needs no introduction to any reader of this journal, or to any lover of poetry. He has already taken his position as a classic, and we may confidently anticipate that the judgment of posterity will but confirm the verdict of his contemporaries. Since the days when the unknown sixteenth-century singer entranced our ears and satisfied our souls with such melody as—

> Quite through the streets, with silver sound,
> The flood of life doth flow;
> Upon whose banks on every side
> The wood of Life doth grow, no poet has succeeded in making a surer appeal to the deepest and divinest instincts in man.

Miss Brégy is a safe guide. The dainty, amorous fantasies of William Habington—a lesser Herrick—the pure, white ecstasy of Crashaw, the calm contemplativeness of Aubrey de Vere, the mysticism of Coventry Patmore, the music of Lionel Johnson and of Alice Meynell—all receive adequate recognition in these pages. There will be many readers who will gladly turn aside from the allurements of the world to kneel for a short space in this quiet chantry where the air is sweet with incense and the altar decked with flowers of a wondrous beauty and fragrance.

A Guilty Record

Cameos of Indian Crime. By H. HERVEY. (Stanley Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

THE crimes of a nation, or of a continent like India—which comprises many peoples but is not a nation—are not exactly pleasant reading, but they afford materials for an interesting book. The whole subject of crime in India has been fully exposed lately, in the Report of the Indian Police Commission of 1902-3, in Sir Edmund Cox's book on the Indian Police, in "Oriental Crime," and now in the present work, which gives instances of the crimes most prevalent, with such references to the police and their methods of detection as are necessary. It is worth while, even for people who lead the most immaculate lives, to know something of the crime and criminal classes among which they live. Such knowledge should put them on their guard and afford them protection in many of the common transactions of life.

The reader must beware of forming an impression that the whole population of India is criminal. When a writer sets himself to ransack the criminal records of 315 millions over thirty-five years of his residence there he can have no difficulty in collecting a number of startling cases, to exemplify every form of crime and rascality; but Mr. Hervey rightly points out that, while it has been his business to deal with the seamy side of the Indian native's character, he could also have testified to many noble qualities. He knows the Indian peoples, having spent his life among them, and it is sad to read his final conclusion: "The one insurmountable rock on which they split is a universal disregard for truth, a failing to which the very best of them are prone." Until their tendency to untruthfulness can be cured by themselves, through a general elevation of the moral tone, their religions, education, and political advancement will never produce satisfactory results.

There is nothing that strikes the European in India so forcibly as the inaccuracy of Indian thought and expression; Oriental hyperbole has become notorious. Mr. Hervey says bluntly, "One individual out of a thousand has not any conception of or respect for the truth," meaning, of course, that not one in a thousand has any such conception. But, after all, mendacity is not crime in the same sense as murder, house-robbery, theft, or other offences known to the Penal Code are. Nor do such headings as Beggars and Beggar-faking, Impostors, Disloyalty, Superstition, Anonymous Letters, to which the author devotes separate chapters, connote, as they stand, what are usually regarded as crimes. They would come rather under a general classification of immoralities than of crime or criminal offences. Mr. Hervey might easily have distinguished logically the acts which the Penal Law has scheduled as crimes from conduct and actions which civil society reprobates without attaching to them the punishment authorised by that law.

He has not devoted, by name or designation, a chapter to Cheating, or attempts to cheat, a very common class of offence in India, though sundry of the malpractices which he describes might be regarded as falling under that category. Mr. Hervey is neither a logical writer nor a scholar. He only quotes old Latin tags, but he generally gives them wrong, such as Terence's saying on the tenth page, the words "Flagranti delicto" thrice repeated, and the old catch, "Tempora mutantur et nos," etc., etc. The merit of the book is that the author writes, in a light and easy style, of cases of Indian crime which have come within his own cognisance, or for the authenticity of which he can vouch. He has thus recorded many circumstances in which the native character has appeared in, to say the least, an unfavourable light, and there is nothing so important to the administrator or to the public as to be prepared for the recurrence of possible developments of a similar kind. Religious persons will be shocked to read, what Mr. Hervey truly says, that "in India, religion—or, rather, the pretence thereof—especially if of a fanatical character, is generally the guise under which disaffected natives manifest their disloyalty towards the British Government, and their hatred for the white Christian from the West."

Jewellery of All Ages

Chats on Old Jewellery and Trinkets. By MACIVER PERCIVAL. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

COLLECTORS of old jewellery—and there are many other collections which are far more difficult to justify—will find in the present volume one which should serve them in good stead in equipping themselves for the pursuit of their own particular hobby. Of course, no expert can obtain his lore from book-learning alone; he must always depend on practical experience, but experience alone is insufficient to form the perfect expert. There is other knowledge which should be ancillary to practical experience, whose function it is to supply the polish to it. For this purpose, and as an introduction to the study of old jewellery, no volume could be more useful than that of Mr. Percival.

Mr. Fisher Unwin's series of "Chats" is by now too familiar to require any special introduction or explanation, or even eulogy. Their position in the favour of collectors is assured. The predecessors in the series, taken together, serve as a standard by which additions to it may be judged. Applying this standard to the present volume, one must decide that this, the latest of them, is full worthy to take its place among its predecessors.

Now to the book in itself. The scheme adopted by Mr. Percival has been first to give a general historical sketch of the development of the art of jewellery-making, as illustrated by the specimens which have survived from the earliest times, those of Egypt, Greece, Etruria, and Rome, until last century. Then come chapters devoted to provincial or peasant jewellery, and Oriental (Indian, Burmese, Chinese, and Japanese) jewellery. After these follow chapters which deal specially with brooches, rings, shoe-buckles, painters and goldsmiths, precious stones, cameos and intaglios, paste and other substitutes for diamonds, and pinchbeck or imitation jewellery. The last chapter consists of a brief bibliography of the subjects treated in the volume. There is, moreover, a compendious glossary, a very necessary adjunct to a volume of this description, and, above all, the text is plentifully embellished with photographs of many of the objects described, a feature which of itself renders Mr. Percival's work an object of desire. Among such a multitude of beautiful things it is difficult to express decided preferences, but from the point of view of beauty, if on no other ground, the palm should be awarded to some of the photographs of the jewellery of the Renaissance.

Jewellery in the modern economy, apart from items of utility, such as brooches, pins, etc., or others with sentimental connections, such as finger-rings, serves but one purpose—that of beautifying or decoration. In earlier days its use was more extensive. Among the ancients objects of jewellery were worn as amulets to bring good fortune or to ward off ill. Others signified the rank of the wearer, or had some religious connection. All, however, whatever their original meaning, tended to become decorative also, and gradually degenerated into mere ornaments. In the motive for wearing jewellery the most highly civilised is, after all, not very different from the savage. Both au fond strive to attract attention, the former by means of precious stones and priceless jewels, the latter by glittering or jingling objects. To the naked savage, his or her ornament of tinkling metal is as precious as the tiara of a duchess is to its wearer. Human nature, it seems, undergoes practically no appreciable change, even in the course of ages. The truth of this lesson is emphasised on almost every one of the earlier pages of this book. Another lesson is that, despite all the boasted progress of the present age, in the art of jewellery-making practically no advance has been made on the ancients. The only progress has been the recovery of the ground lost early in the present era. Among the objects found in ancient Egyptian tombs are articles which, in workmanship, not only could not be surpassed at the present day, but have rarely been equalled, even in the periods when goldsmiths' work was the craft in which the leading artistic minds found expression. "The ancient Egyptians carried the art of inlaying pieces of glass and stone into cells of gold to the utmost pitch of perfection, fitting the fragments of materials exactly to the contours of their appointed places with the utmost skill . . . nowadays none but the cleverest workman could hope to equal the workmanship of these pieces." Delicate filagree work has never reached the same degree of perfection of craftsmanship and design as that attained by the Greeks. The works of that race and of the Etruscans, which very rarely come into the market, not only possess extreme antiquarian interest, but are also perfect examples of exquisite craftsmanship.

Indian Aborigines

The Mundas and Their Country. By SARAT CHANDRA ROY, M.A., B.L. With an Introduction by E. A. GAIT, I.C.S. Illustrated. (The City Book Society, Calcutta. 9s. 6d.)

THE publication of this book will serve two useful purposes: it will enable the civil administrator to know better the people whom he has to govern, and it will add to the stock of folk-lore, which is a favourite study of many scientific people. It is satisfactory to note that it is the work of a practising Indian lawyer resident among the Mundas, and it is creditable to him to have produced such a book while following his arduous profession. The notes, as well as the text, display erudition and wide reading. The Introduction by Mr. Gait, the present census officer of all India, himself the author of a "History of Assam," bears testimony to the writer's acquaintance with his subject.

The Mundas are the most numerous of the so-called aboriginal Kolarian tribes—though the propriety of the name Kolarian is disputed—inhabiting the uplands of the Chota Nagpur Division of the new Province of Bihar and Orissa. They number, roughly speaking, half a million souls, of whom about three-fifths are in the Ranchi district. They are regarded as aborigines, because no previous occupants of the tracts they inhabit are known; but the author records at length the traditions—and much early Indian history has no firmer basis than tradition—which tell of the Mundas having migrated from North-Western India, retreating before the Aryan invaders. The route of the Mundas from their ancient home to their present location has been suggested, but it depends chiefly upon conjecture. Munda means, in Sanskrit, the head of a village; it became the name of the tribe. In physical type there is much similarity between the Mundari race and other speakers of Dravidian languages, so that Mundas and other Dravidians may be considered to be racially connected, but the Dravidian have no connection with the Munda languages. Colonel E. T. Dalton, in his "Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal," classified Mundas as Kolarians, not Dravidians. Dr. A. C. Haddon considers they may belong to the primitive Indo-nesian races.

The Munda characteristics are a broad nose, a long head, plentiful and sometimes curly, but not woolly hair, a black or nearly black skin, and short stature. The people present an interesting subject for the ethnographist, to whom the book will be a valuable contribution on their social life, customs, ceremonies, songs, beliefs, and organisation. Their authentic history begins with the British acquisition of Chota Nagpur as part of Bihar in 1765. Their country has been at times the scene of disturbances directed against alien landlords, who oppressed the aboriginals by depriving them of their rights, real and alleged. So late as 1895, Birsa, a partly-educated Munda, proclaimed a new religion, and himself as Bhagwan, or the Deity. Rendering himself amenable to the law, he was imprisoned. In 1900 his second outbreak assumed a political character, in which murders were committed. Troops and police were called out to quell the revolt. Birsa died in jail, while awaiting trial; his followers were appropriately punished.

The success of the various Christian missions at Ranchi, especially the Roman Catholic Mission, is remarkable. It has made nearly 100,000 converts in the Ranchi district alone, among whom Mundas exceed 30,000. The Mission employs over 50 European priests, over 500 aboriginal catechists, and more than 200 schoolmasters; they have 15 solid brick-built churches and over 400 chapels. There is still plenty of scope for their energies, for the Munda continues to take oaths on the cow's tail, on copper and certain leaves—practices borrowed from the Hindus. Swearing on the tiger's skin, he will say: "May tigers devour me if I am guilty." In other respects, their education, though rapidly advancing, is far from complete. Though Mr. Roy's book may not find many readers in England, it will bring him honour in India, where it will be properly appreciated.

Shorter Reviews

The Mystery of Francis Bacon. By WILLIAM T. SMEDLEY. (Robert Banks and Son. 5s. net.)

MR. SMEDLEY has spared neither research nor ingenuity in the preparation of this comparatively slender volume. An ardent Baconian, fully convinced that the great Elizabethan philosopher sunk his own individuality, or rather presented it under the name of Shakespeare, the author seeks for the logical cause of this change of nomenclature. According to Mr. Smedley, Bacon's concealment of his own name and his adoption of that of Shakespeare formed part of a set and deeply-considered plan. The author lays stress on Bacon's conception of the Divine Being, which is made obvious in the preface to the "Advancement of learning" and elsewhere:—"For of the knowledges which contemplate the works of Nature, the holy Philosopher hath said expressly; that the glory of God is to conceal a thing, but the glory of the king is to find it out; as if the Divine Nature, according to the innocent and sweet play of children, which hide themselves to the end they may be found; took delight to hide his works, to the end they might be found out; and of his indulgence and goodness to mankind, had chosen the soul of man to be his play-fellow in this game."

Here, says the author, we have the key to the mystery in which Francis Bacon enveloped his work. In divine playfulness he hid its source, being convinced that in the end his own personality, glowing through the text, would become revealed to the world at large. The arguments produced to this end are certainly ingenious, and the evidence of deep study is apparent throughout the book.

There is no space to follow Mr. Smedley's further arguments here, since he has gleaned much, and has brought a wealth of amazingly interesting grist to his historical mill. If we cannot share his conviction in all respects, more especially with regard to the alleged cryptographical fragment which occurs in an annotation, there are doubtless very many readers who will follow him with enthusiasm throughout. In any case the interest of this work is great, and its value should not be underrated.

Creative Revelation: Four Lectures on the Miraculous Christ. By J. G. SIMPSON, D.D., Canon of St. Paul's. (A. R. Mowbray and Co. 2s. net.)

WE strongly commend these excellent lectures on the Miraculous Christ. Their subject is the problem of miracles, and the Virgin-Birth and Resurrection of Christ. Dr. Simpson admirably criticises the curious and unsatisfactory position of those who combine an attachment to Christianity with disbelief in miracles, and shows how destructive of real spiritual faith is the so-called "Modernity" of to-day. At the same time his work is constructive in itself, and not merely negative criticism. For he ably presents a mode of belief most valuable for thinking minds likely to be influenced by the dogmatic assumptions of "modern criticism."

For example, the Resurrection may appear to one man as an interruption of the laws of nature wrought by the mere will of the all-powerful God. Another may regard it as an example of higher law. Another may be convinced that some day the Resurrection will be explained by science: while yet another may view it as arising from the control of natural forces by spiritual personality. For just as the attempt to define miracles is futile, so also is any attempt to explain the Resurrection, but the "main point on which we must insist is that for Christians the Resurrection is the triumph that leads death captive, just as the faith which receives it is the victory that overcomes the world." Again, "the ground upon which the Resurrection is believed lies deeper than mere documents." Hence the fallacy of such a book as "When it was Dark." Nor could we expect the existence of any documents which "would satisfy the requirements of a modern scientific society." It must not be forgotten that there will always be those "who see only a partial universe, because they can make no venture of faith."

The essay on the Virgin-Birth is very good, especially in its contention that there is no real analogy between the belief in our Lord's Virgin-Birth and the legends of pagan mythology. The only fault we find with this little book is that it is all too short, and we hope that some day it may be expanded further. Dr. Simpson writes with strong conviction allied to a deep and broad sympathy with honest doubts and fears. His book is one for clergy and laity alike, and should find its way into the hands of all who are perplexed by the spirit of modern criticism; and we especially recommend it to the younger clergy and students at theological colleges. It can hardly fail to give some real help to those who read it with understanding, as an antidote to some aspects of "modernity."

A History of Preston in Amoundderness. By H. W. CLEMESHA, M.A. With Maps. (Sherratt and Hughes. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS interesting book is a useful addition to the increasing volume of the local history of English towns, on which so much light is being thrown by the publication of the Calendar of Patent Rolls, and other State Papers. Mr. Clemesha has also drawn his information from the Lancashire Pipe Rolls and Chartulary, the records of the Court Leat and other original sources. There are valuable chapters on the Gild Merchant, and on Government and Town Life in the Middle Ages. But though the writer's aim is to treat of the "conditions of life in mediæval Preston," more than two-thirds of a lengthy book are concerned with its history subsequent to the year 1500, while quite half is comparatively modern. With the exception of incidental references, there is nothing continuous told of the Ecclesiastical History before the Reformation, a rather serious omission.

At the same time, the growth and development of the agricultural community into a trading town, and the transition from manor to borough, are carefully traced. Preston, the "tun" or township of priests (Skeat) is first mentioned in Domesday Book, but the Hundred of Amounderness, or Agemundreness occurs in earlier history. The name is Danish and is equivalent to "the promontory of Agmundr." Roger of Poitou, son of Roger, Earl of Shrewsbury, was lord of Preston (temp. Wm. I), and granted the customs of Breteuil to Preston, which were later embodied in the Preston Custumal, probably 14th century. This Custumal, of which a most interesting transcript is given, still exists in the original MS. in the municipal archives. It defines the rights of the burgesses, privileges, tolls, taxes, laws of debt, of buying and selling, etc. It is amusing to notice that if any man slander or libel a married woman, "he shall pay three shillings, take himself by the nose, and say that he has lied, and there shall be concord."

The story of Preston during the fifteenth century is meagre, but Mr. Clemesha laments lack of records. The Stuart period is fuller; and from the middle of the seventeenth century to the present day there is abundance of material, of which the author has made ample yet discriminating use.

Local histories of this kind are valuable for reference to students of historical law and of the development of municipal life in England.

Love's Victories. By M. M. LEE. (The Happy Publishing Co. 1s. net.)

IN an accompanying letter we are told that "Love's Victories" is the first book issued by the Happy Publishing Company, and that it is "written, printed, and published by women." It must not by this be understood that it is a book dealing in the slightest degree with suffragettes, militant or otherwise. It consists rather of a series of short stories from the pen of Mrs. M. M. Lee. In a brief preface the author tells us that she asked her great friend Betsey to write an introduction, but that she refused, as she could not "string a dozen words together." However, the whole of the preface is taken up with a conversation between Mrs. Lee and Betsey, from which we are able to gather that Betsey has a very good opinion of her friend's efforts. And with that opinion we entirely agree. The stories are slight in form, but each one possesses a charm and merit of its own. Poverty and love form the theme of most of them, and, although pathos has a large share in their composition, the sentiment is never sickly, nor has it the appearance of being put on with a very large instrument. It is not easy to choose one as being the best in the book, but the appeal of the poor neglected little waif, who had lost her mother, to the rich woman as she weeps over her child's grave is very human in its touch. "I know who's down there," says the little ragged one with the elfin face. "It's the boy what had petticoats like a girl! Say, now, when he went away, did he take all his things, every one of 'em, the very oldest an' all?" While Mrs. Lee writes as she does in "Love's Victories" we shall be glad to see more of her work.

Marriage. By H. G. WELLS. (Macmillan & Co. 6s.)

WE believe that in this book Mr. Wells has come nearer than he has yet done to writing a great novel. He has long ago justified a claim to stand among the foremost story-writers of our time: his gifts of imagination are unquestioned—though he shares them with Miss Corelli and Mr. Hall Caine: he has usually a story to tell, but so have many others. He is susceptible beyond the average to ideas floating in the air, but one fatal defect marks all his work—he has not cared to learn the art of writing. No one would ever imagine from reading his books that English prose, properly written, is among the most musical of any in the world, or dream of giving him a place in the long chain of great writers in whose books immortal thought is linked indissolubly with sweeping rhythm and mighty-sounding music. Page after page of harshly-constructed sentences fatigue the ear with persistent creakings which, unlike that funeral car of the Mikado, of which we have just read, never attain even to the dignity of a rhythm of their own. Did ever any writer of Mr. Wells's experience allow such an ungainly sentence as this—which we take leave to divide into bars for ease in reading—stand at the beginning of a book: "An extrémely pretty gírl | occupied a sécond-class compártment | in one of those tráins | which pércolate | throúgh the rúral tranqúillities | of míddle England | from Gánford in Óxfordshire | to Rúmbold Júnction in Ként."

We can well believe, after meeting with this sentence, that Mr. Wells does not hold that reading aloud is any test of the value of prose. The first bar, with its sequence of gradually-shortening words, is a full close; the ear expects a period at "girl"—Mr. Wells uses it as an introduction. The short, clipped words of the third bar strike the ear, by this time attuned to some sort of polysyllabic effect, most disagreeably; "through the rural" is plainly impossible to any but the most slovenly and careless of pens; and "from Ganford in Oxfordshire" is more perverse still, since the author has quite needlessly invented the name of Ganford. It is not, we hope, unfair to select this opening sentence of the book as a specimen of the style; but hardly a page occurs without similar faults of composition. And, forced as we are to deny him any claim to higher powers of writing English than a moderately-successful transcript of the language of ordinary conversation, we are still more forced to deny him that "poetic gift, the gift of the creative and illuminating phrase which alone justifies writing," according to Mr. Wells himself. It is true that he has the gift of summing up the opinions current in certain circles in a neat and effective phrase or epithet—this book has many examples of his powers—but this power is not creative: there is no touch of the maker, the poet, about it. It is one of the great advantages of an incursion into sentimental Socialism for a literary man that he learns to see familiar institutions from a fresh angle, and no one, least of all such a man as Mr. Wells, could come into close association with Mr. Shaw, either as a friend or as an opponent, without catching some of his disconcerting clearness of vision. Fortunately, we do not read Mr. Wells either for his style or his views, but for the tale he has to tell and for the part of himself he puts into what he writes; we can afford to wait for the better while enjoying the good. For the fact remains that we do read Mr. Wells, and will continue to do so even if he never learns—which the gods forbid—to respect the instrument he wields so clumsily.

The story before us reaches, we believe, the high-water mark of his achievement. It is superior to "Tono-Bungay" in subject and treatment; it is altogether free from the malodorous salacity of "Ann Veronica," and from the hardly-disguised personalities of "The New Machiavelli." We shall not this time be bored by quid-nuncs anxious to tell us who it was that kissed Mrs. Blank's servant on the stairs, or how Mr. X behaved very well in shielding Mr. Y. Mr. Wells gives us the story of the married life of two educated people; of an exceptional man in whom the pursuit of knowledge is an unconscious religion, and of a woman able to form some conception of his aims, but far below his spiritual and mental level. He sacrifices his true career to the claims of wife and society, attains success, and finds it a Dead Sea apple in his mouth. The whole institution of modern marriage from top to bottom is discussed in this tale without a single unpleasant reference to the problems of sex. Marjorie is the woman of to-day—she has "come out of being a slave, yet isn't an equal." She is in many respects charming—Rosamond Vincey with a difference—though we fancy she would be less highly estimated by a jury of matrons than by the author. Trafford's mother is an amazingly fine woman, and Mr. Pope—Marjorie's father—is an excellent character-sketch of the domestic tyrant not yet extinct among the leisured class.

Mr. Wells proposes no solution for the problems that arise in the course of the story, and indeed no solution of them is or has ever been possible. He pleads for an interval of quiet thought on many problems of fundamental importance, which are too much pushed into the background to-day, as well as on others thrust before us for an immediate answer. Change is in the air; change in the relations between men and women, parents and children, master and servant; and unless the men who are to direct its stages are animated by full knowledge of what is needed and a spirit of religion in its highest sense, nothing but anarchy can result. It is a serious thesis for a novel, but treated as Mr. Wells has done it, in a quiet, thoughtful, experimental mood, it raises the whole story to a nobler plane. Let us hope that his next book will have all its good qualities, and, in addition, that charm of expression and style which is needed to give the author the place among writers we all wish to see him occupy.

Devoted Sparkes. By W. PETT RIDGE. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

MR. PETT RIDGE'S titles are often rather cryptic; no one would suspect, for instance, that "Sparkes" was a pleasant servant-girl whose Christian name was Hetty. Her mistress, "Miss G.," to whom she is devoted, appears vaguely here and there in the course of the story; more prominent are the friends and fellow-servants of Hetty. From their quarrels, their sarcasms, their courtships, and their villainies plenty of good entertainment is to be gained by the reader who knows his author's peculiar ways. We look for one unvaried style of writing from Mr. Pett Ridge, and although to read two or three books of his consecutively would prove perhaps too much of a good thing, once in a while, as a thorough change, they are very welcome. In the portrayal of characters in a different class of life he is less successful; a page or two in the present volume, describing a society gathering, illustrates the danger of transferring the conversational lapses of the eastern suburbs to the lips of the aristocracy. On the whole, however, "Devoted Sparkes" keeps us pleasantly amused, and at times becomes almost exciting.

The Permanent Uncle. By DOUGLAS GOLDRING. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

YIELDING to the temptation to adopt Mr. Goldring's phraseology, we confess that his book intrigues us to no small degree, though at times the slovenly proof-correcting is more than a little irritating. The permanent uncle, as Joanna remarks on the penultimate page, never did anything to speak of—he just was, and, in spite of his inactivity, we are made to realise his value, and to take leave of him with regret. Joanna herself is an admirable study, and Mr. Goldring has a way of chronicling odd and wonderful moments in human lives—little things so arresting that we know they must have happened—a way which gives reality to his story and make us feel that these people lived.

It would not be fair, although the plot is not nearly all the book, to give that plot away. It is to some extent a good comedy of errors, and of such a depth and character that we want all things to come right at the end, and are not disappointed. The necessary touch of pathos is supplied by Norma Murgatroyd, and, further back, there is a clever chapter or so describing how Joanna leaves her childhood and puts her hair up. We confess to very slight sympathy with Mary, the suspicious wife whose lack of confidence in Tim causes all the trouble. Still, we owe her a debt of gratitude, for, had there been no Mary, there had been no "permanent uncle" for us to read of and, in these days of many bad novels, one witty, clever book like this is unquestionably a matter for gratitude on the part of its readers.

Blinds Down. By H. A. VACHELL. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

FROM simple, everyday people, and their commonplace surroundings, Mr. Vachell has evolved a notable story, and driven home a great moral lesson with the force that comes of implication rather than of expression. Rosetta's life is wrecked by her two half-sisters, kindly, prim souls who are worshipped by Charminster, treated delicately and gently, and assisted in keeping their "blinds down" to the disagreeable things of life. When Rosetta, having married Lord Brough, runs off with the man she had loved from boyhood, her little daughter Rose is kept at home with the sisters for training and upbringing in the dower-house. Here one side of the house looks out on the slums of Charminster, and the blinds are kept down for Rose, to shut out the sight of the slums, as they had been for Rosetta. As the moral blinds of life are kept down for the girl, she comes very near following in the way her mother went; how this is averted is told by Mr. Vachell with great delicacy and skill, yet at the same time with convincing force.

The book suffers a little from the transference of interest from mother to daughter, but when the half-way mark is passed Rose becomes just as engrossing a character as Rosetta. The prim, platitudinous sisters who spoilt Rosetta's life are excellently drawn; the life of Charminster and its people is rendered with fine restraint, and we get an intimate personal knowledge of every character introduced. "Blinds Down" is fine, arresting work, a book to read and remember.

A Daughter of Fate. By EDGAR LEIGH. (Murray and Evenden. 6s.)

CONRAD'S "Western Eyes" gave us a more than usually realistic presentment of the Russian temperament, and here, though in a less measure, we are faced with a similar study. The story is much shorter, but the result is achieved as Conrad achieved his, by a multiplicity of implications, a maze of things half-seen, out of which the Russian character, so different from that of Western Europe, is clearly realised.

The book, though short, is not easy to read. Even in dealing with the English Embassy in Japan, the author views things from a Russian standpoint and gives us half scenes, leaving us to guess their meaning. In Russia itself, and in dealing with Olga, his heroine, he manages to convey the constant plotting and intrigue which make up the life of half Russia with admirable clearness, and without a suspicion of melodrama or unreality. We are impressed by three warily-moving conspirators; we sympathise with Olga, who is an interesting and skilfully-drawn character; the actors in the plot are real people, swayed by real emotions and actuated by real impulses. The tragedy in which the book ends is lightened by a suggestion of what may happen beyond the last printed page, and the story itself is presented to the reader with sufficient force for him to wish that the hopes of Olga and Alexis may be realised. It is a work of originality, though the subject is familiar; it is also a work of much promise.

The Cup and the Lip. By STEPHEN KNOTT. (Murray and Evenden. 6s.)

THE girl is, of course, the cup, and—equally of course—the man is the lip. Julia, as the other girl, provokes the slips which are bound to occur, but the lip and cup, personified in Martin Conory and Beryl, his cousin, come together in satisfactory fashion at the end of the story. The author has treated a rather commonplace phase of psychological development in a very adequate way. We realise Martin Conory and Julia, the daughter of the narrow-minded, obtuse country parson, as two live, recognisable personalities, skilfully and sympathetically drawn. We are deeply interested in the curious—yet not uncommon—form of attraction which actuates them both, a species of physical passion in which their higher attributes are lost for the time. Were they to marry, we feel that they would lower rather than raise each other, and yet matters are brought to such a pass that we see no way out of the marriage. The author might easily have made of this a very ugly story, but it is good, clean craftsmanship throughout, so far as the principals are concerned, though there are amateurish touches about some of the minor characters which render them a trifle unconvincing.

We quarrel, heatedly, with Mr. Knott for solving his problem in the way he does—namely, by killing Julia at exactly the right moment for the convenience of Martin and Beryl. Up to that point, the story, as a whole, is lifelike enough, but from thence—near the end, luckily—it fails. The Fates are not so kind to misguided mortals as Mr. Knott would have us believe, and by abandoning probability for bare possibility he has detracted seriously from the final effect.

"Everywoman" at Drury Lane Theatre

IN the vocabulary of Mr. Arthur Collins there is no such word as failure. Ever since the far-off days of Sir Augustus Harris I never remember an autumn play that was not spoken of as a tremendous success. But I fancy that "Everywoman, Her Pilgrimage in Quest of Love," must have tried the tradition considerably. For it suggests that the producer must effect the latest scientific miracle and make life from nothing. The late Mr. Walter Browne, no doubt, had some very definite plan in view, some morality play which should be as modern and topical as were the fifteenth century moral works in their own day. But by reason of an unfortunate circumstance or two the idea does not get over the footlights, the altruistic undertaking falls to pieces, and lies dead and flat upon the stage. In the crude and unbeautiful writing of the piece we look in vain for the signs of revision by Mr. Stephen Phillips—perhaps it is there, hidden with consummate art. Surely the lines in the book, which one buys in the theatre, are not edited by the musical and profound singer discovered by Mr. Le Gallienne somewhere in the far-off nineties of the last century. However that may be, Mr. Collins has done his best with the "book" before him. Miss Alexandra Carlisle as "Everywoman" sustains her allegorical rôle with constant industry, and is convincing and beautiful in the most worldly part of her career. At the beginning of the "Quest," when she is still the close and idle companion of "Beauty," Miss Gladys Cooper, of "Youth," Miss Patricia Collinge, of "Modesty," Miss Jessie Winter, and the victim of "Flattery," Mr. Austin Melford, Miss Carlisle is rather too intentional, a trifle artificial. But when the lines of the play permit her to be human, she makes the most of her chances. Her companions are quite charming in a vague, light manner, each representing her type with perfect grace, and speaking her halting lines with as much intelligence and meaning as the elusive nature of her stage character will permit. One cannot help feeling, however, that Miss Cooper will be glad to get back, a little later in the evening, to her extremely modern and concrete part in "Milestones."

As "Nobody," Mr. H. B. Irving does much to rob the play of its painfully amorphous tendency, and to endow his difficult part with dignity and a definite note of distinction. The lines he speaks sound fifty times better than they read. The whole "Morality" owes him no small debt, although, after the first dozen times the word "Nobody" has been used, one begins to grow a little impatient of the humour. He begs us—

> Remember! Everywoman in her Youth
> Early was tempted and beguiled from Truth,
> And Nobody will know the bitter ruth.
> If then this play offend or please, I dare
> Make you this promise, Nobody will care.

Notwithstanding Mr. Irving's skill, I fancy very few will be greatly pleased or vastly offended—some may be bored by "Everywoman's" quest for "King Love the First"—that is the worst that can happen. The archtype of womanhood as a star of the stage, and "Stuff," Mr. Denny, "Bluff," Mr. Wenman, theatrical managers, and "Puff," Mr. Tresahar, a Press agent, are by way of entertaining us, so that this part of the play may prove rather more than boring, but the act passes, and there is not much that is new or harmful in it, only a crudity that seems a little unworthy.

One should note that Miss Kate Rorke gives a sincere air to "Truth," that Miss Wilda Bennett sings engagingly as "Conscience," that the "Self" of Miss Vera Beringer is full of character, and the "Vice" and "Vanity" of Miss Beck and Miss Fabian respectively are fair to look upon. Notwithstanding many happy touches, some good stage setting and a general heartfelt effort to make the best of it, the "Morality" is not a work of art that will live. It is rather an essay in a difficult form of stage representation which interests only in a mild degree. It does not require a very accomplished musician to realise that Mr. George W. Chadwick's music is only of a medium class of work, or that, generally speaking, much has been attempted and little accomplished. Yet on the first night the mighty theatre at Drury Lane rang with applause. A queer commentary on the taste of the public—or its generosity. Perhaps, however, we are not catholic enough in our taste, and "Everywoman" may prove a play for all. For it contains shreds and patches of every sort of stage piece. There is something of the fancy of "The Palace of Truth," there is more than a touch of the ordinary "Lane" melodrama, there are stage scenes something like those of the Follies, there is much in the style of musical comedy, there is sentiment in abundance and vulgar cynicism and to spare. There are life and death and spring and winter, but there is no reality, no grip, no truth, no literature, poetry, or beauty. The general effect is as if a stonemason should try to make a butterfly, or an electrical engineer attempt to outshine Shelley or re-awake the rich echoes of the harp of Keats.

"Art and Opportunity" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre

JUST at the zenith of their theatrical vogue, I suppose it would be impolite to hint that we are getting just a little too familiar with the rather small managing woman who always gets her own clever way and appears to delight the whole world en route. In everyday life the type is recognised as a sort of person before whom all men flee. But things are so different on the stage. And then Mr. Harold Chaplin presents a peculiar form of the small managing woman, and Miss Marie Tempest plays the part, so all's well with the theatrical world. The character of Mrs. Cheverelle is not new or true, but it is a pleasant variant on a well-known pattern. In her desire to improve her position as a young widow, rich in requirements but poor of purse, she links to herself the youngest of the great Gossamore family. These excellent people are dukes and earls and all that sort of thing, but they are not quite so clever as the real people of that class, and they are very hasty about falling in love, or, at least, in desiring to marry Mrs. Cheverelle. The Duke of Keels as played by Mr. Graham Browne is a figure of farce dating back far into the past. Mr. Charles V. France as the Earl of Worplesdon is as convincing as possible, and Mr. Edmond Breon as the earl's son is as much so as the author will permit him to be.

Occasionally one feels a touch of Meredith in the drawing of the various figures which form the set upon which Mrs. Cheverelle at first wished to force herself, and later felt she would like to sway through Mr. Henry Bently, M.P., the duke's secretary. This gentleman became sometimes straightforward and unaffected, and sometimes theatrical in the hands of Mr. Norman Trevor, who looked splendidly capable in either case. Of course, all audiences like to see Miss Marie Tempest score heavily against any other characters who happen to be on the stage at the Prince of Wales', but Mr. Chaplin makes all this very, very simple for her, and the comedy loses its grip and that note of vraisemblance without which the cleverest dialogue, the neatest situations, the most elaborate setting, grow to be but of small account. And yet "Art and Opportunity" is full of cleverly-arranged moments and turns of phrase which provoke a fair amount of laughter; irony that might, perhaps, be a little less obvious with advantage, and a general lightness and brightness which must always prove attractive in a dull age.

Of course, Miss Tempest carries the success or failure of the play in the hollow of her little hand. Without her Mrs. Cheverelle constantly in view, without her quick turns of voice, her brave glances, her gaiety, her sadness and her tenderness, I fear that Mr. Chaplin's play would be little more than a trivial, amusing sketch. But with the aid of our most accomplished comedy actresses the play runs brilliantly for a couple of hours, and laughter is heard in all parts of the house. We have not spoken of Miss Serjeantson, for her part of Lady O'Hoyle—the aunt of dukes and earls—is not worthy of her skill. It may be remembered that "The Honeymoon" was greeted but coldly by the world, and that its fine comedy qualities soon won upon the public, and Mr. Arnold Bennett's play was, I believe, an immense success. I should not be surprised if this order of things were changed in regard to "Art and Opportunity." It would be a pity, for the clever author only needs a touch or two of sincerity to achieve a real victory. EGAN MEW.

Music at Prague

THE ardent lover of opera who cannot find his joy in London, who despises the art of Paris, has a difficulty in buying seats for the really first-rate performances in Berlin, and is irked by the Anglo-Americanism of Dresden, might do worse than establish himself for a season at Prague, among the extremely musical Bohemians. There he will find two opera-houses, both of them, like Mr. Gashleigh's silver bread-basket, very rich and handsome. In one of these theatres, operas are given in German; in the other, the Czech language, except in the case of a "guest" singer who does not know it, is supreme. On a recent Sunday evening we might have heard the famous Winkelmann as John of Leyden in "The Prophet," had we not preferred the attractions of an opera by Dvorâk, of which we were entirely ignorant. At first it does not seem easy to patronise the National Opera House, for its advertisements are in the national language, and for the ordinary stranger they might as well be in Persian. But if the said stranger will walk into the music shop of the Frères Urbanek, next door to the Opera House, he will there meet with a civility and kindness for which he will not easily be too grateful. One of these gentlemen, who speaks English, will readily interpret the affiches; nor does his eagerness to oblige the foreigner stop there, for he will accompany him to the box-office and procure whatever tickets are wanted. Such courtesy as this adds greatly to the pleasure of a visit to the Czech opera, and the traveller will find that it is by no means an isolated instance. Except in Spain, we have never met with such unvarying politeness from the inhabitants, high and low, of any country.

We must be in our seats at seven o'clock, and it is as well to know that, if we leave them to smoke a cigarette in the street between the acts, we are expected to return before the curtain goes up again, for no one is allowed to disturb the audience by pressing to his seat while the music is going on. But it is one of those comfortable theatres which are very easy to get in and out of; and this is specially an advantage, because, while the intervals between the acts are unusually short, the attractions of a visit to the street are very great. No one wants to go out of Covent Garden into Bow Street between the acts. But one steps out from the National Theatre at Prague into the midst of beauty and of history. At once you are standing, in the evening light, looking upon one of the fairest scenes that any European city can boast, challenging Buda-Pesth, competing with Edinburgh, out-classing Dresden. Prague shows you its River Ultava, that ancient river Ultava—we do not call it the Moldau any longer—crossed by the famous bridge of Charles IV, whence John of Nepomuk was thrown into the waters; and, rising on the farther bank, are wooded slopes crowned by the Hardcany Castle, the Capitol of Prague. Mozart has looked upon that view, you reflect, as you leave it to listen to another act of "Don Juan"; and the repertoire of this National Theatre is so varied that you would not be surprised were "La Clemenza di Tito" to be presently announced—the opera which brought Mozart on his last journey to Prague, just before his death.

Much is said in these days about the great advantage to the hearers when an opera is sung in the vernacular. We must confess that we do not share the desire that all our operas should be sung to us in English. We have heard a great many in the vulgar tongue; but, had we not known the opera already, or been provided with its libretto, it might almost as well have been in any other language. We would rather have an opera in the language to which the composer set his music, and take the little trouble required to acquaint ourselves sufficiently with the libretto to understand what is going on. It was a very interesting experience to hear a performance, in an entirely strange tongue, of a work previously unknown to us. The programme gave us a long story of the plot; but, as it was in Czech, this was no good to us; we did not even know at the time what the title of Dvorâk's opera, "Cert a Kàca," might mean; but now, since an obliging native has done his best to explain something of the story, in French, for us, we are a little wiser. The title signifies "The Devil and Katharine." The first act showed us a village festa, and the lively dance tunes and the emphatic rhythms needed no explanation. When a well-looking stranger arrived and danced with a lady whom no one else had invited, the music could hardly be expected to certify to us that this was Lucifer in person; but when a trapdoor opened, from which flames burst up, and the pair descended into the abyss, there was no mistaking the identity of the gallant. The apparent indifference of the company to the catastrophe was rather mystifying, nor could we tell why a young man, the tenor of the piece, should presently jump after the Devil and Katharine. We had, however, been quite well entertained by the bright music and the unfailing cleverness of the orchestration. The second act passes in hell, where many devils, horned and tailed, but without cloven feet, danced and joked, and Katharine and the two other protagonists acted in various mysterious ways, eventually quitting the infernal regions and leaving the devils alone.

Next we were introduced to the most sumptuous of baroque palaces, and to an aged Princess, to whom entered servants and peasants and the original Devil and Katharine. What they might be doing was dark, till at the close of the performance it was explained to us that the young man, a shepherd, had exclaimed he would rather go to the Devil than go back to his master; that Katharine, neglected by the swains, had vowed that she would dance with the Devil rather than not dance at all, and that his Infernal Majesty, taking them at their word, had sent a trusty agent to see if they were really fit for hell, and incidentally to try and drag down the Princess; that, when the devils get Katharine, they were anxious to get rid of so unattractive a recruit, and that the Shepherd managed somehow to save the Princess. It was not, as will be seen, the best of opera-books, and, in spite of the liveliness and skill of the music, we cannot recommend "Cert a Kàca" to the syndicate of Covent Garden, interesting as it was to see once.

Another evening we witnessed a ballet-pantomime called "Pohadka o Konzovi," the music by Oskar Nedbal. This told the story of two bumptious brothers and a third who was reckoned very little of by them, but who found favour with the King of the Fairies and was enabled to save the life of the beautiful Princess about to be devoured by a dragon. This was a very pretty ballet, of a rather old-fashioned type; the music unfailingly pleasant, in a manner not unlike that of Humperdinck, but with an unmistakable Slav character. It seemed as though good use were being made of real Bohemian tunes. At this performance, which was certainly a very well-executed one, the theatre was filled with children, as if it had been Drury Lane at Christmas time. No doubt it formed a very suitable entertainment for them, and they looked as if they enjoyed the dancing as much as the dragon, and the tournament in which the despised brother fought and conquered the bumptious ones. They are trained thus early in Prague to become connoisseurs of the ballet, a fortune that will not, we suppose, be the lot of British children as long as "Thamar" and "Scheherazade" form part of Covent Garden evening entertainments. For children are apt to insist on knowing "what it is all about," and it might tax the ingenuity of their elders to explain those remarkable stories.

A third performance at the Czech Opera House was of that loveliest of operas, Gluck's "Orfeo," the Orfeo being a Miss "Theo Drill-Orridgeora." We were told that she was English. We have our doubts. She may have been an American. Well do we remember a charming contralto whose name was Orridge, but she passed too soon from the scene of her successes. From whatever country the prima donna of Prague had come, she sang her part in Italian, as did Amor, and the rest of the artists sang in Czech. The opera was beautifully mounted, and the orchestra, as it was on the other occasions that we heard it, played admirably. The singers were not, perhaps, very good. But, in spite of this, all the three performances that we heard were very pleasant, and we much regretted that we could not remain to hear Swetana's "Dalibor." Conscientiously, then, we can recommend the beautiful city of Prague to the unsatisfied lover of opera. The seats in the theatre are cheap, comfortable, and, if musical variety be sought, there are many delightful public gardens and parks, and islands in the river where excellent regimental bands are often to be heard playing their gay tunes. Only one disappointment waited for us at Prague. We had hoped surely to be able to buy there a long-desired copy of the famous "Battle of Prague," which we used to play in our extreme youth, and would dearly like to play again. Carlyle knew it—"the battle which sounded throughout all the world, and used to deafen us in drawing-rooms within man's memory." And the immortal history of the Sedleys and the Osbornes might conceivably have been different, had not the Sisters Osborne played it in Russell Square when Miss Schwartz was of the company, and found Amelia's name on "Fleury du Tagy," or was it upon the copy of "that sweet thing from 'The Cabinet'"?

The Hereford Festival—Leoncavallo

THE Hereford Festival took place last week, and it was about the hundred-and-eightieth meeting of the Three Choirs. It may be mentioned as a thing characteristically and beautifully British that "The Messiah" has been part of the programme every time since 1747, except once, in 1875. Indeed, the whole Festivals are thoroughly typical of our British way of starting out to do something and doing in the end something totally different. What the Festivals pretend to do is to aid the fund for the widows and orphans of the clergy of the three dioceses: what they really do—and do remarkably well, all things considered—is to foster the cause of music in districts which are, otherwise, artistic wildernesses. The modus operandi is curiously roundabout. The Festivals could not take place if the stewards did not guarantee substantial sums, and the guarantors are always called upon. There are collections at the doors for the Fund, and these collections are not used for making up the deficits on the Festivals. If it were not for the Festivals, there would be no Fund, or at any rate, the Fund would suffer considerably: if it were not for the Fund there would be no Festival—or at any rate it would be even harder than it is to get together the necessary guarantees. This interdependence of music and charity, as though people needed a charity as an excuse to themselves and in the eyes of the world for the support they give to music—where, except in the United Kingdom, could one find it? Further, it is probably only here that one would find cathedral organists willing to undertake the enormous labour of preparing and conducting such Festivals without any hope of reward other than the applause of their consciences. All honour to them. These things are worth considering, and they are set out here in no carping spirit, but rather by way of friendly warning; for it is obvious that the Festivals rest on a foundation wholly artificial and insecure, and it would be tragic if they could not be made safe against accidents or the caprices of patrons.

The fact that the Festival just concluded—the eighth conducted by Dr. Sinclair—has by common consent been among the best of recent times gives additional force to these reflections. The performances of the St. Matthew Passion of Bach, of the Good Friday music of the Grail Scene from "Parsifal," and of Brahms' "Requiem" were on a high level. The human warmth and the welcome absence of sensational trickery which distinguished the Bach performance were specially welcome. The Festival, further, had two personal features of special interest. The first was the return of Miss Muriel Foster, with her powers unimpaired, and, from the interpretative point of view, perhaps even more widely developed than of old. The second was the successful first appearance as a Festival singer of Miss Ruth Vincent, who did great credit not only to herself but to Mme. Albani, who had put the finishing touches to her training and was present to witness her pupil's prowess.

There were several new works produced which were interesting without perhaps adding much to their respective composers' reputations. Sir Hubert Parry's setting of William Dunbar's naively primitive "Hymn on the Nativity" is very Parry-ish. It is full of manly vigour, expressed in easily moving contrapuntal figures, and has the British open-air feeling which we associate with the composer's best work. Dr. Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on Christmas Carols" is very lively and very charming, but very slight. Though it hardly carries guns enough for a Festival, it is sure to be popular all over the country. The "Serenade for Strings" of Granville Bantock is pleasant to listen to, and the last movement is a fine study in the possibilities of varied tone-colour with limited means. He, too, has used folk songs: but the original intermezzo has the greatest intrinsic musical value. The origin of the Serenade dates back to 1895, but it has probably had the finishing touches put to it recently. Sir Edward Elgar contributed two quasi-novelties—one an orchestral version, which is brilliantly able, of his two songs, "The Torch" and "The River," and the other a suite made up of the incidental music to "The Crown of India." It is more effective thus heard by itself than it was in the theatre, and the use of Eastern colour is delightful in its fastidious avoidance of excess.

It is not often that London is chosen as the birthplace of a new opera by a composer of cosmopolitan fame. The last opera first produced here was Massenet's "La Navarraise," about eighteen years ago, though if all had gone well, "The Girl of the Golden West" would first have faced the footlights at Covent Garden. The first performance of Leoncavallo's "Zingari" is therefore an event worth chronicling. Its value is, however, small. The libretto, derived from a story of Poushkin, is inconclusive and, though it deals with tremendous issues of passion, bloodless, and the music is curiously childlike. There is no kind of organic growth about it, no sense of proportion or climax. It ambles on, sensuous and crudely blatant in turn, without any evidence discernible at one hearing of general design or unity. It is very reminiscent of "Pagliacci" and Puccini. It has two or three flowing tunes of rather obvious but distinctly taking sentiment, which will no doubt travel speedily round the civilised world. The enthusiasm of their reception at the Hippodrome on Monday was quite wonderful: the like of it has surely never been seen or heard in London. What its precise significance was is not quite easy to determine. One could not help wondering, too, whether the work, as a whole, would not have made a deeper impression if sung in English by native artists. The interpreters—Signora Pavoni and Signor Caronna and Signor Cunega—were adequate, but Destinn Sammarco and Caruso could not have had a greater triumph. The chorus and orchestra were rough, but Signor Leoncavallo, who conducted, was so placed that his baton must have been all but invisible from both orchestra and stage, for he was in the dark. Metaphorically, the performers seemed more than once in the dark as to his precise intentions.

A Cornish Sketch

THE Cleave and the Beach, which a few seconds before had seemed to be given over either to sleep or silent meditation, suddenly electrified into life.

The men on the lugger had been too oppressed by the heat and scarcity of fish to do aught but smoke, and very occasionally give vent to forcible exclamations of annoyance when a fly or "apple-drone" disturbed them. The question of National Insurance, usually so violently discussed, has had no interest whatever for them to-day.

The younger men were lazily curled up under the shade of the boats, half asleep. One would, every now and then, rouse himself sufficiently to hurl a fierce execration at the children who seemed irresistibly tempted to drop stones and sand on the recumbent figures. It was too hot even for the women to stand at the corner and gossip.

Overhead is a cloudless sky and a blazing sun, the heat of which is reflected relentlessly from white and grey plastered houses and red-tiled roofs: the sea is calm and blue, no breath of wind ruffles its oily surface.

"Mack-ur-rel."

The long-drawn-out cry of the "huer," from the cliff above, instantly dispels this scene of quiet and repose. He has been lying half hidden in the bracken which fringes the lofty rocks, apparently gazing idly into the sea. But there is no idleness; he has been very wide awake indeed, and his roving eyes have incessantly and closely observed every shadow and shade on the unruffled face of the bay beneath him, and his telescope has been in constant requisition. He notes a dark spot a quarter of a mile away and instantly his whole attention is concentrated upon it. It grows and grows like the circles made by a stone cast into a mill pond; the deep indigo shadow surrounded by lighter shades of blue is now speckled with flashes of silver, and over it hover a flock of discordant gulls. Springing from his ferny bed the "huer" sends his stentorian voice through the still air.

"Mack-ur-rel."

The occupants of the lugger rise in haste; the youths spring up from their shingly beds; sleep is banished in a moment, each one is ready for the task before him. The women run from their houses, heat and sunstroke are ignored.

"Mack-ur-rel."

The crew of the seine boat hastily jump into a punt near at hand, regardless of danger from over-crowding, and row to where the long, graceful boat, with the brown net stored in the stern, is moored off the shore.

A hasty glance is cast towards the place where the "huer" stands with outstretched arm, signalling the direction in which the school of mackerel has last played, and away the boats go.

The shouts of men, the creaking of the oars, and the splashing of water, follow. First comes the grey seine boat with her crew of six oarsmen, the helmsman, and the man who helps him cast the net. Age, in a white jumper, unites with youth, in a blue guernsey, for a man can scarcely be too old or a boy too young to go "mackur-reling." The man at the tiller gazes steadily before him, in order that he may get the first sight of the fish when they play up again. One hand rests almost lovingly on the hard meshes of the net, for, besides being the means of providing food, clothing, and rent for many a family, with beer and baccy for the men, the value is considerable, and eighty pounds would barely purchase that brown heap of string, cork, and lead.

Close behind comes the "vollower" with its store of pebbles, and the big stone drilled through the middle, through which a cord is fastened. The rear is brought up by the little "larker" propelled by three laughing boys.

Then the men in the leading boat stop rowing, and she drifts some distance with the impetus they have got on her. All stand up and gaze about. It is most imperative that they should, if possible, see the school themselves rather than wait for the call of the "huer," for there are two other boats racing up behind, and every second is of the utmost importance.

"Mack-ur-rel."

Quite close the fish play up this time, their silver bodies rising out of the azure sea, churning it into a miniature purple maelstrom.

The voice of the helmsman rings out; very forcible and quite unparliamentary in his speech. The oarsmen give way in response with renewed energy, each one putting his utmost strength into the stroke, and the heavy boat flies in a circle, well outside the spot where the mackerel are. The two men in the stern throw out the net, which floats away behind, the ring of bobbing corks show where it has sunk below the surface. The perspiration pours off their faces, which have suddenly become aged and haggard. Immediately the "vollower" comes up, and whilst one man catches the floating cord at the end of the net, two others throw the pebbles with which the boat has been provided, into the centre of the enclosed space, in order to frighten the fish, and make them sink so that they may not jump over the net. Again and again is the heavy drilled stone thrown out for the same purpose, and pulled back each time by the cord strung through it. At length the whole seine has been shot, the huge circle completed. The boys in the "larker" take the anchor of the largest boat, row away with it, and throw it into the sea at a distance: there will now be something to resist the weight of the net when it is slowly hauled in. The shower of pebbles and the incessant plash of the corded stones continue.

The men don their oilskin aprons, and prepare for the heavy work in store for them. The helmsman is still gasping and wiping his brow; it was no light job casting out the seine.

Still the fish are splashing, though every minute their frantic efforts to escape from the trap which encloses them become more subdued, until at length they sink sullenly out of sight; even now they may find a way out of the net which is rapidly forming into the shape of a purse. Very slowly, for the weight is great, the circle contracts, and under the compulsion of those strong arms it becomes an ellipse, and finally only a shapeless mass of string and cork and floating weed. Anxiously the men peer into the clear water. Have their efforts been in vain, and have the fish after all escaped from the toils? A glimmer of silver shines through the dark meshes, and the forms of many victims can be seen. Then the "vollower" takes up a position on the other side; gradually, in a great bag, the seine is lifted between the two boats, and the harvest of the sea is reaped. Silver mackerel, drab-coloured dabs, a couple of speckled plaice, and a flabby dead-white ray, intermingled with shreds of many shades of green sea weed, are poured out in a shining flapping heap. At once the business of re-arranging the seine takes place. Another school may play up at any minute and there is no time for rest yet. One man, more self-indulgent than his fellows, raises the heavy stone jar to his lips. Two others throw the fish from the seine boat into the "larker," counting them by threes as they do so, forty-two of which go to the hundred. This is the first catch for some days, and the quicker to market the greater the gain. As soon as the tally is told, thirty-four hundred, two boys seize the oars and row off to the neighbouring town.

"A decentish catch," the helmsman mutters as he arranges the net, and his thoughts wander to the possible price and what he will realise. The proceeds will be divided into shares; so many for the men, so many for the boys, the boat, and the seine. He is owner of the boat and part owner of the seine, and he will, in addition to all this, receive an extra share for casting the net.

They catch no more mackerel to-day; once again they shoot but only to tear their nets on some rocky ground. The wind has gone into the east whilst they have been out, and the short wash, which always accompanies it, is now setting on the shore.

With much laughter and shouting they bring the remaining boats to land. It is a wet performance and more than one of the men drops into the water as he jumps over the bow, to avoid the waves which splash over the stern. Wives, daughters, sisters, and the few occupants of the lugger greet them with eager inquiries.

The day's task is done, and they wend their respective ways; some of the men homewards, with one child on shoulder and leading another by hand, others to the public-house where the tale of the "shoot," and the result, is told and retold over and over again. Then back to sleep or meditation on the lugger, and the beach, until "Mack-ur-rel" is called again.

"Babu" English

BY GEORGE CECIL

IN the early days of the European occupation of India there was scarcely any need for a native to speak English. The Dutch settlers were settlers in the fullest sense of the term, and during the years which lapsed between their arrival and departure—or demise—they took the trouble to master Hindostani, generally addressing the coloured man in that easily-acquired—and not particularly interesting—language. But as the decades rolled by, the "unchanging East" came within measurable distance of belying its name. To a certain extent the old order made way for the new, the first signs of the times being that the ambitious, far-seeing Mahometan official—though cursing the European in his beard for employing so difficult a lingo—set about learning English, in order that he might further his own ends. The wide-awake Hindu merchant—for the same excellent reason—wrestled with the irritating intricacies of English spelling and pronunciation; and, later on, all natives who hankered after well-paid, pensionary service under the Government, or with a European firm, found themselves compelled to follow the pioneer's shining example. To-day there is not an educated "babu"—as the Indian clerk is termed—who cannot speak, read, and write the perplexing language of his conquerors, the colleges turning them out by the hundred every session. In fact, the question is, what to do with them? There are not enough suitable positions to go round; and when manual labour is suggested the proud graduate's inherent and inordinate self-esteem is up in arms at the thought of anything so infra dig.

The willing native is taught English in much the same manner as that prevailing in England. There is, however, a difference, for, being instructed by a teacher of his own nationality, he is seldom encouraged to overcome the difficulties of pronunciation—difficulties which are as terrifying to the pedagogue as to the mystified pupil. And the obstinate Aryan, for some reason best known to himself, goes out of his way to devise odd innovations, and to give himself the trouble of over-emphasising a letter. Thus, he pronounces the article "the" "thee," and he loves to prefix words commencing with the letters "s" "t" with the syllable "iss," to which he imparts a peculiar hissing sound. Another of his linguistic idiosyncrasies is that he invariably sounds the terminal "y" like double "e," a peculiarity which is as marked as any. "Funny," for instance, is transformed into "funnee," "lovely" into "lovelee," and "o" is occasionally changed to "a." "Babu, have you drawn a horse in the Calcutta lottery?" inquires the genial European jute merchant of his sporting typist, who has expended three months' savings upon a ticket. "Unfortunatelee, my luckee star was far from being in thee desired ascendant," replies the black scribe, adding: "So I am completelee in thee dumps and doldrums, as well as overwhelmed by thee thunder clouds of misfartune. No-a, I am unaccountablee unluckee." It will be perceived that the verbose fellow does not express himself simply—that he claps on full sail. But of this more anon.

The above-mentioned variations on the customary pronunciation of English words are part and parcel of the "babu's" very creditable attempts to make headway with a singularly puzzling tongue. Unconsciously governed by his own language, he cannot, for the life of him, escape its fell influence. The formation of his palate also presents an obstacle which can only be overcome by reconstruction of the organ. For the rest, the speaker of "babu" English adopts a curious, undulating method of pitching his "tenorish" voice, which, while defying description, can never be forgotten by those who have experienced its effect. In moments of anger the tone suggests the wind whistling round the chimney-tops, while there are many occasions when it is reminiscent of the scratchy sound made by the wavelets as they recede from the shingle. In reading verse the accent is placed on the wrong syllable, and undue prominence is given to certain words. Nothing, however, will induce the "babu" to render it otherwise. The proper manner of reciting poetry may be dinned into the pupil, who—parrot-like—repeats the lines correctly; but the moment he is left to his own devices the teacher's injunctions are speedily forgotten. The sing-song intonation, by the way, is partly owing to the Oriental's method of study. Unable to sit at a table, the student needs must squat on his heels, swaying his body—redolent of cocoa-nut oil—backwards and forwards as he commits the lesson to a singularly retentive memory. It also should be remembered that every word is repeated in a carrying voice, which, though audible at a distance of fifty yards, does not disturb the rest of the class.

Shakespeare has been called the "babu's bible"—and not without reason. The moment the enterprising student embarks upon a course of "English as she is spoke" a veneration for the bard is inculcated in him; and when he reaches the pot-hook and hanger stage Shakespearean metaphor slips glibly from his "beetul"-stained lips. Indeed, where the Elizabethan dramatist is concerned, the native's ability to memorise is positively wonderful; he will reel off phrase after phrase and line after line without once repeating himself. But his method is more or less parrot-like; the "babu" who spouts "He jests at scars who never felt a wound" probably would be hard put to it to tell a scar from a wound. For the rest, an acquaintance with Shakespeare's works is the alpha and omega of his knowledge of English. If at a loss for an expression, the voracious scholar dips into "Henry V," "Macbeth," "Coriolanus," or some other play; and should he happen upon something which—in his view—suits the occasion, he does not hesitate to make use of the newly-acquired information. The clerk also garnishes his conversation with random Shakespearean quotations. "I have lost my penknife—and I have my suspicions," thunders the stern "Sahib" to the guilty one. "Sir, dost smell a rat?" is the thief's placid comment.

The "babu's" letters—in which little use is made of periods—are spiced with a wealth of words borrowed haphazard from the same source. The subjoined example, for instance, is typical of his efforts in this direction:—

100, Dhurumtollah,
Calcutta
June 20th 1910.

Honourable Sir There being a vacant post in your Honour's firmament which your Honour has a difficulty in filling owing to few proper candidates presenting themselves I say begone dull care. For I am a suitable one for the post being grave and reverend and well versed in learning and of reasoning mind like Portia. Your Honour wants his pound of flesh no doubt in return for the salary offered. Substitute brains for flesh and measure for measure is yours and if I prove myself incapable of affording satisfaction your Honour may write me down an ass. Ever praying for your Honour's prosperity and happiness now and in the great hereafter I am ever your Honour's humblest petitioner.

The writer of the above effusion, it may be remarked, obtained the coveted position owing to the amusement afforded by his application.

Although "babu" English has been responsible for countless epistles couched in the most remarkable language ever penned, it is generally admitted by European residents in India that the following specimen, which was written by an ailing ledger-keeper, who craved leave of absence to enable him to consult the doctor, has no equal:—

Sir
I most respectfully solicits your esteemed permission to absent myself this morning from your place of business because I have boils as per margin.
Your faithful ledger clerk.

Within a carefully-ruled margin the ingenious sufferer had laboriously inscribed six circles of varying sizes, thus illustrating the painful malady which had overtaken him. Extraordinary though the foregoing is, it must be admitted that the written application for employment which is herewith reproduced, for originality, mixed metaphor, and ornate language, could not be beaten:—

Civil Lines Lucknow
May 6/09.
Munificent Sir
I entrust to your nobleness of character this my most miserable petition. It has come to this crawling worm's knowledge that your greatness has a vacancy for a merely fundamental post as dispatching clerk in order department of your old-established wine business which I am credibly informed maketh glad the heart of man. O enlightened and pitying Sir if you gifted with some bowel of compassion kindly be merciful to me a sinner, for which act of clemency I will never cease to pray unless prevented by cholera or plague. Fill my cup of sparkling happiness by giving me the job, and by hook or by crook I will make thee glorious by my pen. N.B. Of quite catholic religious tastes I can become Christian if desired. P.S. All my relations being non est I need no leave of absence for attending to obsequies of the defunct ones.
Your grateful (in advance)
—— ——— ———."

If the "babu" undoubtedly writes the oddest English ever known, a slavish devotion to the dictionary keeps him from misspelling words. In fact, so great is the pleasure which the seeker after information derives from consulting the indispensable work of reference, that on ferreting out the object of his search he will verify—what he believes to be—its appropriateness by consulting the Scriptures, Johnson's dictionary, and the daily papers. And if, in his search, the diligent creature happens upon some word with which he is not already familiar it will be ear-marked for future reference. That is no doubt why the present scribe, on quitting India, was favoured with the valedictory note which is herewith reproduced:—

Bombay
Friday
Dear Sir and fleeting friend
And so it came to pass you visited our land of Goshen. And, moreover, you now depart from amongst us. Icabod! the glory, like yourself, is departed. Peradventure, you will return, or, peradventure, you will not. But "remember, remember."
Your truly and affectionately
— —— ———

It will be perceived that the writer of this letter, unlike the other educated natives whose epistles have been reproduced, has spared no expense in punctuation. But he took his B.A. at Calcutta University—or, rather, he says he did.

By W. H. KOEBEL.

REGULATION tours are, of course, very delightful in their way: indeed, what the average traveller would do without them it is difficult to conceive. At the same time there is plenty of room left, even in this populous Europe of ours, for individual enterprise on the part of those who are possessed of a fitting amount of initiative and imagination. The possibilities in this direction have recently been illustrated by a friend of mine. It may seem somewhat of a feat for a man already verging on advanced middle age to proceed in an open boat from the Port of London to the Black Sea. Yet this friend of mine achieved all this, and, moreover, he appears to have revelled not a little in every moment that this achievement occupied. It was a trip which would have warmed the heart of a marine gipsy, did such a creature exist—and it is possible that he may, although it has never been my lot to meet him. In this instance the traveller remained the captain of his own small craft from start to finish: it is true that in no case would there have been room for many skippers, since the Araminta was a mere dinghy. His movements were his own, entirely unconnected with railway whistles and steamship hootings, a method of progress that is sufficiently rare in these days. It is needless to say that the production of a book followed the completion of the trip. This was justified by the adventure. But the work was printed for private circulation only, which was modest and abnormal.

From Limehouse Pier to the Black Sea by dinghy sounds a far cry. It is necessary to explain how this was effected. As a matter of fact, the salt-water part of the voyage was confined to the crossing between Dover and Calais, since the Thames and a judicious employment of creeks and canals had assisted in the passage to the English coast. But it is not everyone who cares to pull across the Channel in a dinghy. Once in France, the open sea was done with until the waters of the Black Sea hove in sight. The route lay, as a matter of fact, through the various canals and rivers which lead through Belgium and Holland by way of Ghyvelde, Bruges, and Terneuzen, until the Rhine proper was entered at Dordrecht. After this the voyage becomes a ridiculously simple one—on paper! It was merely necessary to run up the waters of the Rhine and to pass thence into those of the Maine, from which, in turn, the Ludwigs Canal gives access to the upper stream of the Danube. After this a leisurely procession past Vienna and Buda-Pesth, then through the wilds of Hungary, Servia, Rumania, and Bulgaria, until the dinghy floated safely on the waters of the Black Sea at Sulina. There is no space here to enter into the fascination of the journey, which is obvious, nor into the strange wealth of historical country through which it led. An enterprise such as this is not everybody's trip. Its enjoyment is reserved for those who possess the requisite pluck, energy, and, incidentally, leisure. And not a few similar—if rather less ambitious—voyages of the kind still remain to be achieved in Europe.

As we have started on the water, we may as well remain there, for this week at all events. The subject of quite small boats on very broad waters is a fascinating one, and calls to mind the really amazing feats which have been achieved in this respect on the open ocean. To cross the Atlantic in a half-decked boat, or to stagger giddily beneath the Line and from one ocean to another, as did the Falcon in her famous cruise, is an achievement which places its author well outside the common run of humanity, yet these amazing feats are nothing new. Throughout the ages the world can produce others to rival them. The gallant skin-clad barbarian of Europe who went out to sea in his first coracle was braving a totally unfamiliar, and therefore doubly terrifying, force. The vikings who sailed past the ice to Newfoundland must have had hearts stouter than the planks of their frail boats, while the smallest vessels of even the later ocean-going Portuguese and Spanish explorers could have been piled on the deck of a fifth-rate modern tramp without inconvenience. Even I, in my own small way, have ventured, and learned respect for the untried. Did I not embark on a quaint structure, the work of a crank—a hull-less thing, all wire stays and floats, with a bicycle seat perched aloft, from which the navigator worked the treadles, which in turn caused a screw to revolve? And was I not spilt into the very centre of the muddy stream for my pains? I have every respect for the pioneer.

Forsaking this levity, there is a class of mariner who still undertakes voyages as perilous as any of those of a former age. He does this, moreover, for no glory and little profit, in the ordinary course of the occupation which gains him his livelihood. If you have travelled at all widely, you cannot fail to have noticed the number of English-built launches and tugs which serve the various ports and rivers in every one of the five continents. It is unlikely, nevertheless, that you have given a thought to the manner of their arrival, even at the most remote of these places. An astonishing number travel to their destination under their own steam. Once or twice in the course of a lifetime you may chance to meet with one of them in mid-ocean, and from the dry and roomy deck may watch the progress of the flea on the water. It is a wild enough career, this, as the tiny thing leaps and falls over a moderate ocean swell. At her wheel is a man seldom free from anxiety, his mind ceaselessly speculating concerning the coal capacity of his miniature bunkers, his eye continually on the watch for a change in the weather. There have been times, to my knowledge, when the mental strain has proved too much for the humble commander. Then, water-worn after days and weeks of buffeting, the little craft has arrived, to put on shore a vacant-eyed wreck of a man. The sea still holds some grim romance in the course of the ordinary day's work. The difference between the present and the past is that in these days it is wont to fall to the lot of the minority of mariners.

An Oxford Letter

OXFORD is in the throes of the American invasion. Not that this would matter to anyone, save, perhaps, the few savants who still linger at their task, if we could predict with confidence a hurried evacuation upon the approach of the first skirmishers that herald the return of the undergraduate host. On the contrary, we could extend our congratulations to the race of touts who thrive at their expense, no less than to the hotel proprietors, and to that antiquary shop which sells "Old bottles for ale, from the cellars of Lincoln College," which find a market, as the shopman will obligingly tell you, "chiefly amongst American visitors, sir." Nay, more; even the savants aforesaid, if pressed, would own to a preference for the American horde as compared with the undergraduate pest. For this last nuisance, in their eyes, alone mars the perfection of Oxford. Therefore, we would owe our Transatlantic friends no grudge for their vacation inrush if they would but confine their attentions to out of business hours. Unfortunately they are no longer so tactful.

The Americans are a great nation—almost as great as they will tell you that they are—and Cecil Rhodes was a great man; but whatever debt of gratitude his American scholars may owe to him, is not Oxford even more indebted? For they come to teach, not to learn. They have done with their schooling before they come to us. What has Oxford to give them? But they are generous, and only too willing to impart to us the cachet of Harvard and Yale. It is inspiring to watch their efforts to help us, and give old Oxford a wrinkle or two from more modern institutions. You see we are very young and hopelessly lacking in that seriousness of purpose which is writ large all over them. If a sense of humour is not conspicuous among them is it not more than compensated for, since its absence allows them to throw off on every impossible occasion some of those priceless moralisings which, rising as they do almost to the height of the finest platitude, do so much to check frivolous speech? Some foolish youth, for example, will give utterance to the following profound philosophy of life: "I make a point of never paying my tradesmen." Should any American be present there comes the prompt rejoinder, "Wall, across the water we think it dishonourable to live at the expense of our tradesfolk." Any sentiments prefaced by those inspiring words, "across the water we think," may be relied upon to express the most unimpeachable morality. It is, of course, a great blessing for us to be taught the fundamentals of honour and right conduct.

Since these supermen came to Oxford we cannot fail for want of example, for the American Rhodes scholar is not only chosen, as might be supposed, for seriousness of purpose, but rather for a combination of all those qualities, physical, intellectual, moral, which went to make up the Greek ideal. And then, what intuition, what insight into affairs! The young gentleman above quoted expresses his intention: "Now that training is over I shall get 'blind' every night for a week." Should your American chance to see this young hopeful that same night in a somewhat exhilarated state, endeavouring by dint of much noise and effort to appear hopelessly intoxicated, the verdict goes back to the States that among the upper classes in England, far from being held a disgrace to get drunk it is looked upon as something of an achievement! Oxford is, of course, the scene of many a first plunge into the "strong waters" of inebriation, and from this the Transatlantic deduces the marvellous conclusion that English society is rotted to the core by a craving for alcohol.

Similarly, from the telling of a "smoking-room" story is inferred a lack of respect for women in England! A Rhodes scholar once told me that he thought London was the most immoral city in the world. On being questioned it appeared that he had seen so many couples "walking out"—that conspicuous feature among the most respectable of our lower classes—and had assumed that all these ladies belonged to that class known as unfortunate!

The fact is, we have no use for the American at Oxford. He comes to us with his character already formed and his opinions fixed. He does not understand us, and takes away a false impression. The very best type America gives us bears the stamp of ineradicable Puritanism—an excellent birthmark perhaps, but it is an excellence that is exasperating. If a young American is not a Puritan, then he is to be pitied, for he is usually rather despicable. They do not know how to —shall we say—vary the monotony of virtue in a manner that is at all pleasant to behold.

It may be said that they have helped us, at all events, in the realm of athletics. If that is so we would prefer to stand on our own merits and give no handle to captious criticism from our rivals. No, the best we can say of the invaders is that they bring with them from "across the water" some capital "rag-times," for which we are duly grateful.

YOUNG OXFORD.

Mind, a Myth

By SIR CHARLES WALPOLE.

NOW that "the Faculty" have at last condescended to recognise as fact what is variously called Mesmerism, Animal Magnetism, and Hypnotism, instead of ignoring it as the fraudulent practice of impostors and showmen, we are on the threshold of increased knowledge in the Science of Psychology, and apart from any question of the utility or inutility of "suggestion"—as the exercise of certain natural laws is now called since it has put on the garb of respectability—the scientific study of these little-known phenomena, and the accumulation of facts from which to generalise, must largely add to our physical and psychical knowledge.

At the outset, however, there is one great pitfall which must be avoided, or the inquiry will stray from the main track and lose itself on by-roads. This pitfall is the tendency in human nature to personify an idea—the tendency which in religion is anthropomorphic, and which in politics spells "La République" with a big "R," and "the people" with a big "P."

The immediate pitfall to which I refer is the treating of what it is convenient to call "the Mind" as an actual entity. We speak of the Mind, the Intellect, the Will as an existing thing—something individual apart from, and differing from, the body and any part of it; as an existence of which the brain is merely the instrument, and which itself controls the body. We identify it with Self, the Ego, and I know not what beside. We speculate upon the action of mind on matter, the relation of mind to body and body to mind, and on how the one is associated with the other.

Now, what for convenience we call the Mind is none of these things. It has no existence either dependent on or independent of the body. It is neither more nor less than a state of consciousness: and a state of consciousness is the result of the human machine being in perfect working order. The body, including the infinitely complex nervous system, is a machine—a machine which requires constant stoking with food; and when the machine is adjusted, it is capable of receiving impressions, more or less perfect, according as it is well or ill adjusted. A state of consciousness is thus developed, more or less perfect as the adjustment is more or less perfect. How this comes about is another matter; perhaps we shall never solve the problem. Perhaps the reasonable study of Psychology will enable us to do so. But, a state of consciousness having supervened, the machine is enabled to register and co-ordinate its impressions. Hence come memory, discrimination, judgment, introspection, ratiocination. And these phenomena we call "Mind." But there is no entity there beyond the machine. There is only a conscious machine and its action.

If the machine gets out of gear, consciousness is weakened, so is "the Mind." If the machine temporarily stops working, consciousness temporarily ceases. If the machine is so injured, or worn out, that it ceases to work altogether, where is the "Mind"? The mind is absolutely dependent on consciousness, and consciousness depends on the machine being in working order; the machine may work without consciousness, but there can be no consciousness without the machine, and no mind without consciousness.

The quality of the phenomena of "Mind" depends on the quality and condition of the machine. If the machine is inferior, we have the weak "mind" of the idiot; if the machine is fatigued, we have the feeble "mind" of the tired man. Sleep, the result of fatigue, is a condition of the machine, where the phenomena of "mind" for the time being cease. The machine may indeed be open to some impressions, but it is only working at a quarter speed, and the phenomena of "Mind" are absent. The machine is roughly dealt with, and we have the man who has fainted or is stunned. The machine is abnormally stimulated, as where the brain is acted upon by the hypnotist, and we have the machine acting abnormally and producing abnormal phenomena. The machine again may be abnormally stimulated by what we call disease, or by alcohol, and then we have the machine producing the abnormal phenomena of lunacy or drunkenness. But these are all conditions of the machine in a state of more or less consciousness and more or less perfect adjustment. There is no independent entity which suffers, sleeps, wakes, or acts apart from the machine.

When the fœtus has breathed, it becomes finally adjusted, and a rudimentary consciousness develops. Consciousness entails self-recognition. Self-recognition invents the "Ego." And as day by day the conscious machine registers its experiences and recognises the inherited impressions stored in its 1,200,000,000 brain cells, consciousness expands and the phenomena of mind are developed. As day by day the machine is nourished, it gets stronger and more active. But some machines are good, some bad; some are strong, some are weak; some are intellectual giants, some are idiots. Again, the machines are unequal. In some the brain is strong, but the frame and constitution are weak; in others the brain is weak, but the frame and constitution are strong. Where both are strong, the machine is most perfectly adjusted, and the phenomena of mind are the most remarkable. The inequality is largely dependent on health or disease, inherited or otherwise.

It is probable that the phenomena of "Mind" co-exist in a greater or less degree with consciousness. It is unascertained how low in the scale of nature consciousness extends. Consciousness of an extremely rudimentary character probably exists in the lowest animal organisms. Even a jellyfish is probably conscious in some degree of the sensations of pleasure and pain, and whenever any animal organism deliberately acts, or acts not, it exercises an elementary form of discrimination which is in fact the exhibition of mental phenomena. The higher animals undeniably exhibit memory, reason, and judgment; but all such phenomena depend on the existence of consciousness, and consciousness on the machine being in perfect working order.

Another figment, which tends to the confusion of thought, is the conception of the "Mind" exercising its "Will," with a big "W." Ultimate action is the resultant of all the impulses concerned. These impulses are the outcome of heredity and environment, and the ultimate action follows the line of least resistance. The conscious machine, the so-called "Ego," has inherited various impulses from millions of ancestors, stereotyped by the environment of ages; these impulses are also affected by the present environment. The pressure of the strongest impulses, whether "good" or "bad," regard being had to the pressure of existing circumstances and the present environment, will equal the resultant, which will be "good" or "bad" accordingly; and the line of least resistance will be the course finally pursued. If we could know the value of all the factors or forces, we could invariably foretell the product or resultant.

The phenomenon of double and triple personality is instructive. A person's "character" is inherited from his forbears. His personality is exhibited by his "character." After a shock, or under the stimulus of the hypnotist, he exhibits a totally different character, his past being perhaps obliterated. He has a new personality. Under a further stimulus yet a third character is presented, and he obtains yet another and different personality. This may be the result of some slight alteration, mechanical or chemical, in the brain cells under the influence of the stimulus, but it all points to the adjustment and readjustment of the machine, and the absence of any separate controlling entity.

What makes the machine work we do not know. It is convenient to call the motive power "Life"; but what life is, and what is its origin; whether it also is the result of an adjustment, or whether it is a force; or whether it is, like space, matter and energy, quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus, and always has been, is, and will be inherent in the atom, or what not, our scientific men—including Professor Schäfer—have not yet told us. But whatever it is which makes the machine work, it is certainly not "the Mind," for the machine will work more or less when there is no "mind" at all—even when there is no consciousness.

Let us then beware in the study of mental phenomena of treating what it is convenient to call "the Mind" as a separate existing entity.

Notes and News

A new novel by Edith Kenyon, "The Wooing of Mifanwy," a Welsh love-story, is published by Holden and Hardingham. It should appeal especially to all who loved the late Allen Raine's beautiful Welsh stories.

We are requested by Messrs. Chapman and Hall to state that the publication of the Rev. Henry W. Clark's second volume of "The History of English Nonconformity" has been deferred until the early part of next year.

Mr. John Lane publishes this week "The Poems of Rosamund Marriott Watson," at 5s. net, with a portrait; and "Coke of Norfolk and his Friends," by A. M. W. Stirling, a new edition revised and enlarged, with sixteen illustrations, at 12s. 6d. net.

In the Art Gallery of Manchester, from this week until the end of October, an exhibition of works by four Lancashire artists—James Charles, George Sheffield, William Stott (of Oldham), and D. A. Williamson—will be held; and during November and December an exhibition of Dutch work will take its place.

Mr. Charles E. Pearce has entitled his new story, which Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. are publishing immediately, "A Star of the East." This book completes the triology of Mr. Pearce's novels of the Indian Mutiny, of which "Love Besieged" and "Red Revenge" were the first and second.

Messrs. John Long have just published an important novel, entitled "The Gate Openers," by K. L. Montgomery, author of "The Cardinal's Pawn," based upon that dramatic chapter of English history, the Rebecca Riots in South Wales in 1843. They will also issue almost immediately "The Two Rivers," a novel by Mr. E. I. E. Briggs, R.I., the well-known Scottish artist.

Messrs. Partridge and Co., Ltd., announce a new manual intended as a handbook for the would-be probationer. The author, who is the matron of the Westminster Hospital, deals with the preparation of the candidate before she enters upon her new duties, and the various appointments which are open to certificated nurses. The book, entitled "First Steps to Nursing," also warns prospective nurses of many pitfalls to be avoided, and it contains much necessary information in a popular form. It will be published at 1s. net.

The "Reminiscences, Impressions, and Anecdotes" by the late secretary of the Royal Philharmonic Society, Francesco Berger, to be published shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., is to be dedicated by Royal permission to H.M. Queen Alexandra. The same publishing house has added Jane Austen's best work to "Masterpieces of Fiction," a series notable for its bold type, good paper, and handsome illustrations; and will shortly issue a volume entitled "Sketches by Randolph Caldecott." Henry Blackburn, a friend of the artist, and his biographer, selected the sketches and contributed an introduction.

Mr. Fifield publishes shortly "The Notebooks of Samuel Butler" (author of "Erewhon"), arranged and edited by Henry Festing Jones, at 6s. net, with photogravure portrait taken by Alfred Cathie in 1898, a biographical and bibliographical statement of principal dates, Butler's poems and sonnets, and an index; "Trystie's Quest," a fairy tale by Greville MacDonald, M.D., with cover and title-page design and thirty-one line illustrations by Arthur Hughes, 5s. net; and "The Nature of Woman" (3s. 6d. net), by J. Lionel Taylor, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., London University Extension and Tutorial Lecturer on Biology and Sociology.

Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co., Ltd., are about to add "Things Seen in Russia" to their artistic "Things Seen" Series. The book is by W. Barnes Steveni, who was for many years professor of English in the College of Peter the Great, and English correspondent to the Daily Chronicle, and who has recently written on Russian matters for THE ACADEMY. There are numerous charming illustrations. Mr. H. Chapman Jones, President of the Photographic Society, has contributed an extremely interesting book, entitled "Photography of To-Day," to the same firm's "Science of To-Day" Series; the book contains numerous well-chosen illustrations and diagrams, and is thoroughly up to date.

Certain antiquarian, heraldic, and archæological authorities have been trying to pick holes in some of the stage accessories of "Drake," but so far with very small success. Plays such as that now running at His Majesty's Theatre are not produced without a great deal of research work, and so many have been the authorities consulted that it has been found possible to answer every objection which has so far been raised. We note that Mr. John Lane is publishing the text of the play, with illustrations, at 2s. and 1s., and that Messrs. Partridge and Co. are issuing a novel by Mr. Morice Gerard, entitled "A Fair Prisoner," the main incidents of which are supplied by the exciting events enacted in the historical raid by Sir Francis Drake in the harbour of Cadiz.

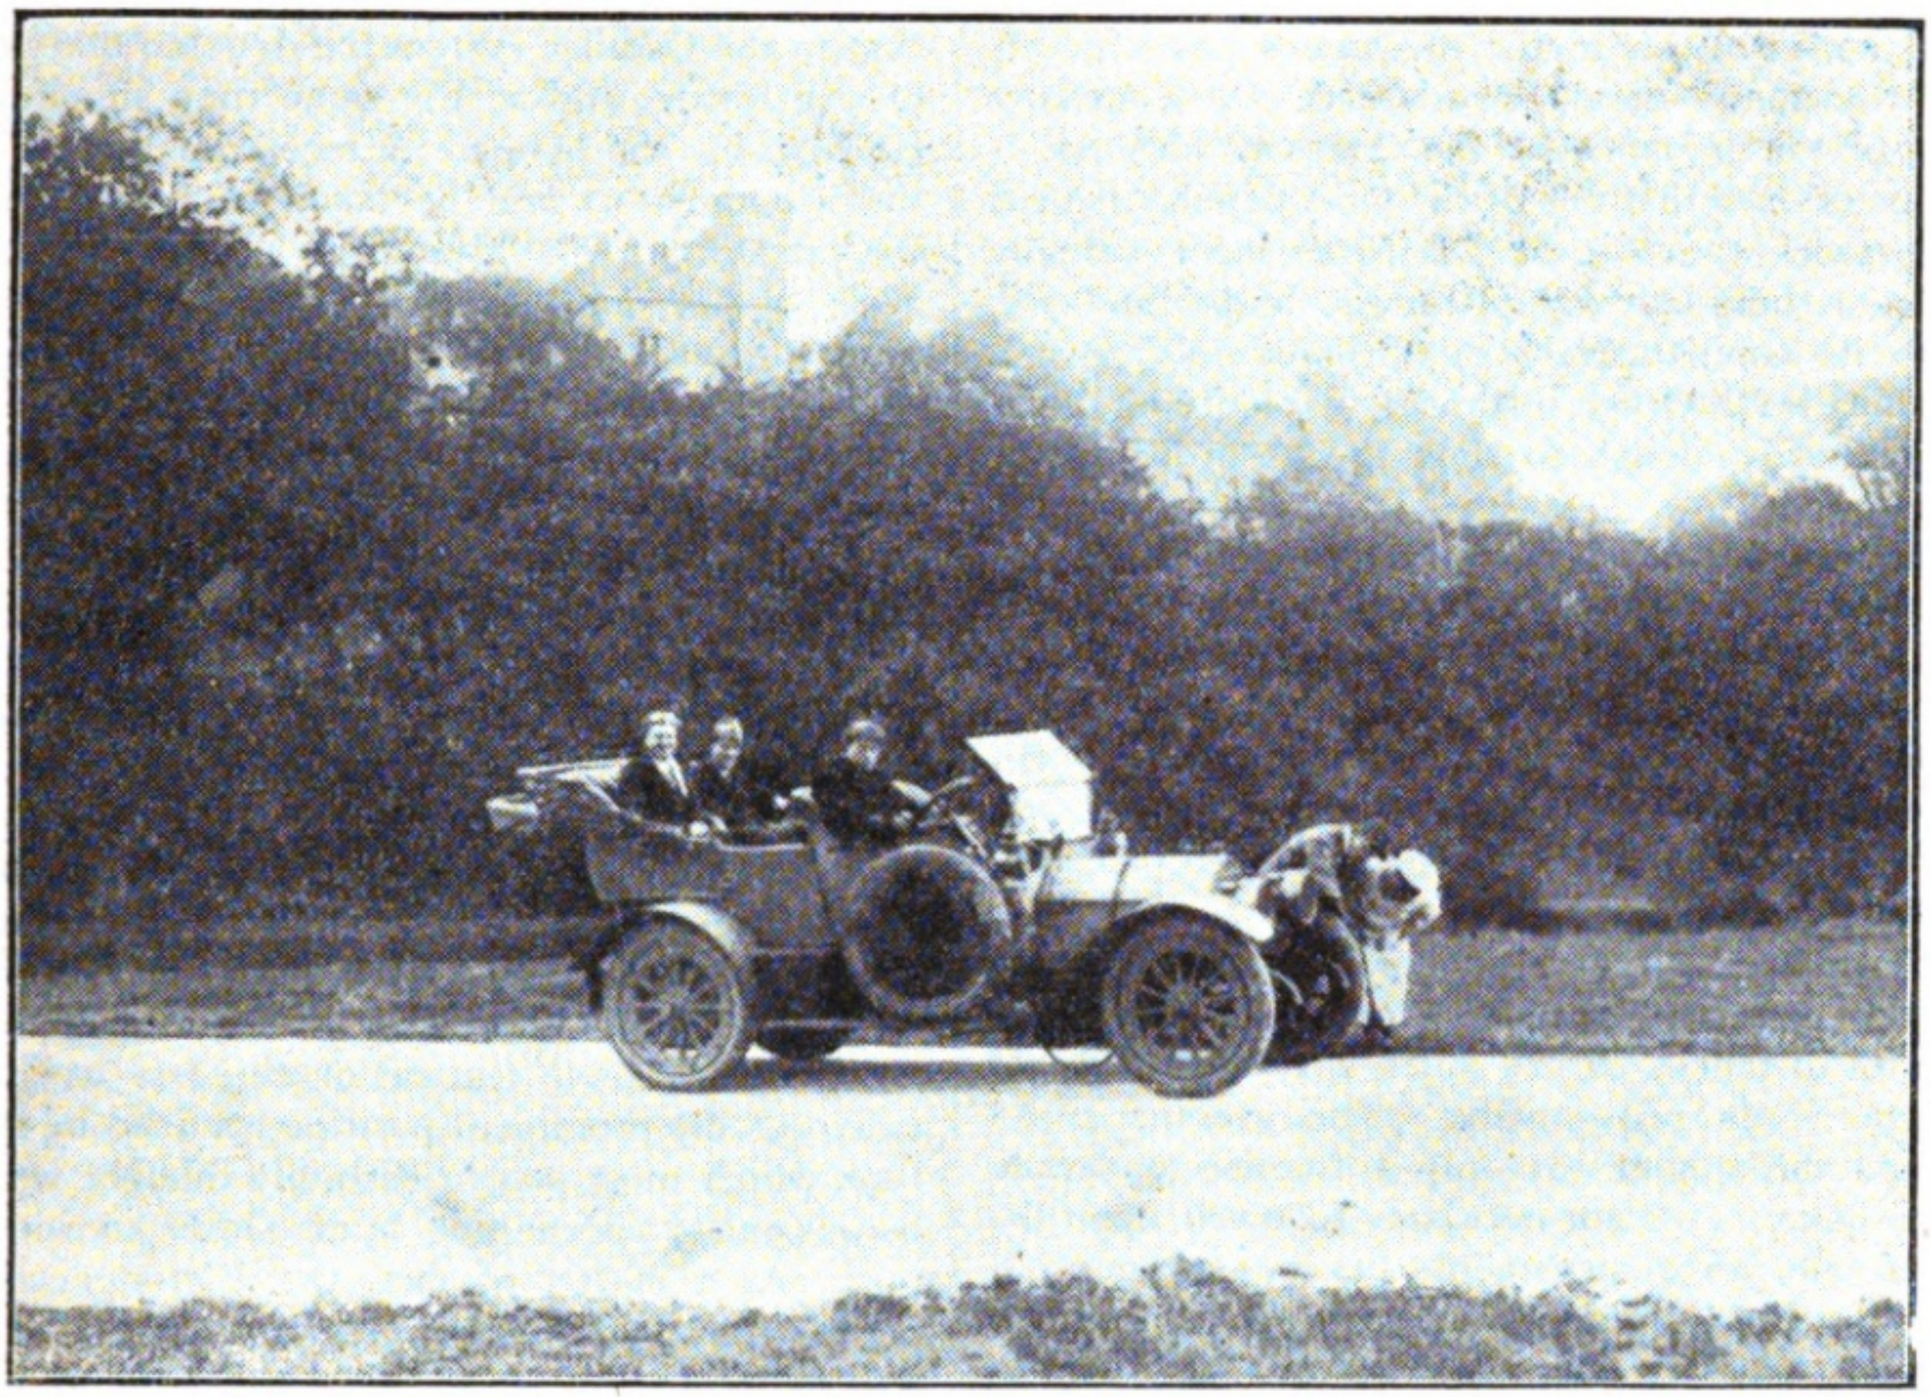
CHINA'S FINANCES.

A REAWAKENED interest in the affairs of China is apparent throughout the world, an interest which, if we mistake not, is likely to be sustained for some time to come. It is scarcely a year since Western opinion was divided as to who would prove the victors in the sanguinary struggle that was precipitated on the Yangtze—the supporters of the dynasty or the "Sons of Han"; and in some quarters international intervention was advocated as the only means of restoring tranquillity in a country where the great Powers held so much at stake. But the ring was scrupulously kept, and, in a fight to the finish, the Republicans demonstrated the capacity of their forces and the righteousness of their cause. Thus the new regime, although formal recognition is still withheld by foreign Governments, has been accepted by the world as a fact accomplished. To-day our concern is for the stability, not for the character, of the Administration that has been established. "We desire," stated Sir Edward Grey in a despatch to the British Minister at the time of the revolution, "to see a strong and united China under whatever form of government the Chinese people wish."



In spite of the opinion held by a certain section of the Press, we do not for one moment doubt the sincerity of this declaration, a declaration which interprets the earnest desire of the trading and commercial communities of the West, and, at the same time, supplies the keynote to British policy in China. But the more closely we examine the present situation, the more pleasing does it appear, and there are not wanting critics who, unjustifiably as we believe, bring the charge of inconsistency against Sir Edward Grey. Let us face the facts. A strong and united China can only be realised by the establishment of an efficient Administration able to enforce its will throughout the entire country. To achieve such an object it becomes essential that the central Government be in possession of a sufficiency of funds. These two axioms are conceded universally. To meet the requirements of the situation, the financial representatives of the six great Powers are prepared to advance money to China on certain conditions, not only involving the supervision of expenditure in regard to any loan contracted, but also in some measure stipulating the purposes to which such loan should be devoted. Hitherto the Peking Government has deemed these conditions irksome, inasmuch as, if they were accepted, they would prove embarrassing to the domestic policy and offensive to public susceptibilities.

In her dilemma China endeavoured to escape from the clutches of the diplomatically supported consortium and, through her Minister in London, to arrange a loan with an independent British group. A good deal of mystery surrounds the transaction, which, during the past few days, has been variously reported as having been frustrated by the intervention of Sir John Jordan, and carried to such a successful conclusion that the first instalment of the £10,000,000 involved—half a million sterling—has been transferred to the Chinese Government. Too much importance cannot be attached to this attempt to secure financial aid outside the powerful ring, the representatives of which are at present jealously watching the course of events in the Chinese capital; for it will constitute a test case by which all similar attempts will be judged and determined. Private enterprise in relation to Chinese finance may be said to be on its trial, for, although in the present instance it is not inconceivable that Sir Edward Grey may base a vigorous opposition to the transaction upon inner knowledge of a certain political factor, unsuspected by the public, but not perhaps unknown to the Russian Foreign Office, the whole circumstances of the case cannot fail to provide a convenient precedent on all subsequent occasions. In the event of the loan falling through, we may expect some definite pronouncement from the Foreign Secretary in response to the inevitable criticism that will arise when Parliament reassembles for the Autumn Session, until which time common-sense dictates that judgment be suspended.

Much as we may regret the fact, all indications go to prove the unassailable position of monopoly at present held by the six-Power group. Independent enterprise, as things stand at present, would seem to be doomed. Had Russia and Japan remained outside the consortium, there might have been some prospect of China securing relief in the open markets of the West, but the inclusion of these two nations has definitely made the question of Chinese finance dependent upon political considerations. The irony of the whole matter lies in the fact that, of all the Powers concerned, only three—Great Britain, France, and the United States—are really competent to lend financial support to the Republican Government. Indeed, Russia and Japan, both debtor nations, are obliged to go, directly or indirectly, to the three countries named to borrow at low interest the very money it is proposed to advance to China at high interest. The case of Japan is particularly glaring. In the columns of THE ACADEMY I have repeatedly drawn attention to the precarious state of her finances, and shown that the excessive taxation of her people, rendered necessary by the service on her foreign debt and by the ambitious programme of armaments to which she is pledged, is proving a burden heavier than they can bear. And now the semi-official Japan Times itself has entered a vigorous protest against the resultant poverty and misery which characterise the conditions of the masses.

"The cost of living," states this journal, "keeps going up: no one seems to be able to reach out his hands

THE TEST TO DESTRUCTION OF VICTOR v. MICHELIN, DUNLOP AND CONTINENTAL TYRES.

A. R. Burton, of "The Daily Mail" (nearest figure to camera at back) acting as observer for the day. He endorsed the daily chart with: "Having completed 101 miles, Birmingham to Leicester via Coventry, I am absolutely convinced that there could not possibly be a more thorough test. I was particularly impressed by the filling of charts by road observers en route."

to bring the steadily ascending balloon to the ground; people helplessly watch its course and gasp. At the same time poverty walks about at large, and the miseries of life increase. Above all, the heads of families of the labouring class seem to have the worst allotment of miseries and tortures. Many of them are daily deserting their wives and families. The labouring men cannot support their families with the scanty wages they get. The little storekeepers find it impossible to balance their ledgers with the credit ahead of the debit, and are universally discouraged by dull business. At home their wives need money, and their children are simply crying aloud from starvation. The hard-pressed and miserable husbands go out in the morning to search for work, and many of them never return again at night. Daily the charity lodging-houses are crowded by women and children begging a night's lodging, to drift away the next morning, to return again at night starving. Many of them are sick, husbandless and fatherless, penniless and homeless. Some of them follow the paths of their husbands to death."

A further perplexing feature of the situation arises from the knowledge that it is to the exploitation of China, political as well as commercial, that Japan looks for a means of recovering her financial stability. The question that remains for serious politicians in this country to consider is whether or not they will permit British policy to be made the catspaw of the aggressive designs of other Powers in the Far East.

MOTORING

THE report of the Government Committee appointed in December last to consider the question of the rating of motor cars for taxation purposes is embodied in a White Paper issued on Monday last. It recommends a graduated scale of taxation for motor cycles, which at present, irrespective of horse-power, pay a uniform tax of one pound per annum, but advises that no change be made in the existing method of taxing cars. This will be a great disappointment to many motorists, especially to those who own comparatively old cars, which develop nothing like the horse-power indicated by the Government (or R.A.C.) rating. The existing official formula upon which the car-owner has to pay his graduated tax is based upon cylinder diameter and number of cylinders only, the other factors—length of piston stroke, degree of compression, and potential engine speed—being entirely ignored. The effect of this system of rating is to make some motorists pay an altogether disproportionate tax, and it is difficult to see what possible defence can be put up for it.

It may be assumed that degree of horse-power is a fair basis of differentiation for taxation purposes, as, generally speaking, the greater the power of the car the greater the capacity of its owner to pay, and the greater the damage done to the roads by its use. But surely some more rational and equitable means of estimating power than the present method—which no practical authority on motor mechanics has ever attempted to defend—should be adopted. As a striking instance of the injustice of the Treasury formula, it may be mentioned that one of the most popular models of the season—the "10-12" Belsize—must actually develop something like 30 h.p. on the brake, and yet, owing to its comparatively small bore, only pays a three-guinea tax. Other instances in plenty might be cited, but this is enough to show the absurdity of the existing system.

At the present time there seems to be something like an epidemic of record breaking by motor cars, and it is gratifying to note that the new figures are being put up by cars of British manufacture. Last week we had to chronicle in this column the securing of the world's 50 miles' record by a 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sunbeam, and two further world's records have since been placed to the credit of a car of the same make.

On Tuesday last the 15-9 h.p. Sunbeam lowered the world's figures for both four hours and five hours, with distances of 319 miles 242 yards and 391 miles 429 yards respectively. The average speed maintained throughout was only a fraction under 80 miles an hour. It is not necessary to dwell upon the merits of such an achievement, but one cannot but wonder what the Continental manufacturers, who had the advantage of a ten years' start in automobile construction, think of the present position.

It will be remembered that a few weeks ago there was a successful trial under R.A.C. supervision of the Cadillac self-starting device, and it is worth noting that the Club now proposes to hold a further exhaustive trial of the Cadillac electrical outfit. The test is to begin on the 23rd inst., and will last for twelve days, during which 2,000 miles will be covered over the Club's standard routes. On this occasion the features of the outfit to be tested will be the lamps and the ignition. The former will be kept alight the whole time the car is running, except during the intervals for the passengers' refreshments, so that the total number of hours during which they will be alight will be equivalent to an average season's use by an ordinary private motorist. The consumption of current will be carefully recorded under the supervision of the R.A.C. observer. With regard to the ignition, it may be pointed out that in the Cadillac system the dynamo takes the place of a magneto, and at the same time supplies current for lighting the lamps. A record of the condition of the accumulators will be taken each morning before the car starts. The trial as a whole, consisting as it does of an authoritative and exhaustive test of electricity as a means of starting and illuminating, as well as supplying the ignition for the car, is one of exceptional interest for the motorist, and the present writer, who has accepted an invitation for a day's run on the test car during the trial, will be pleased to record his impressions of the efficiency of the Cadillac system in a future issue.

References to tests, trials, and records would be incomplete if mention were not made of the tyre "test to destruction"—Victor versus Michelin, Dunlop, and Continental—which has now been in progress for five or six weeks, and continues to excite a quite extraordinary amount of attention on the part of motorists, distinguished and otherwise, all over the country. So far the remarkable feature of the test has been the unexpectedly prominent position attained by the Victor tyre, which most people certainly thought would soon be put out of the running by its better known competitors. As a matter of fact, the Victor, according to private information received, appears at the time of writing almost certain to prove the absolute winner of the first round—the battle of the steel-studded non-skids. Two of its competitors have now gone, leaving only the Dunlop and the Victor to fight for supremacy.

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

STOCKBROKERS complain that they have no business. But they exaggerate their poverty. A Jew will boast of everything except his wealth. Hundreds of years of persecution have taught him that such bragging is dangerous. Therefore when the City says that it is idle, I smile. As a matter of fact most people are busy, and as a result markets are firm. There is no boom anywhere, and the promoter is strangely silent. Indeed, no one but the great Dr. Dvorkowitz has had the effrontery to ask for money. He and his friends capitalise a concession in the Island of Sakhalin at £350,000—a concession that has been hawked round for many months and has found no willing purchaser. Even to-day no work has been done on the property and only opinions as to its prospective value are given. Paris is preparing many schemes, for she is full of money, but London lies low and appears afraid of the money market.

Money will be dear. This we must expect, for there are large crops to be moved all over the world, and large crops mean big advances. Canada will give us a huge wheat harvest, but the quality will be poor. The Argentine is preparing for a big crop. The Southern States of America have a bounteous cotton picking. Egypt will beat all records. Russia, Hungary, and the Roumanian plain will supply grain for the world. This spells prosperity and dear money. There is a chance that if we get much speculation we shall see a Five per cent. Bank Rate in Berlin and possibly here also.

FOREIGNERS are not largely dealt in on the London Exchange. But we are quick to follow the changes of Paris and Brussels. These Bourses are steady. Therefore peace looks secure. Italy and Turkey will make terms. This has long been settled. It is said that Turkey will get an indemnity. It is always the vanquished that gains in these modern wars. Witness Japan and Russia. Tintos are hard on the splendid position of copper. They must rise, but as they are a great gambling counter each rise is sharp and short. Anaconda is another sound copper share that must go up. Perus have been pushed ahead by those who think they know everything—the story that the Debentures will be paid off and a Debenture at a lower rate of interest substituted is now believed to be true and holders of Preference are talking their stock to par. As the company is badly managed to-day any change will be welcome. But to those who bought low down I say take your profit, for no one knows exactly what will happen. Hungarian Rentes are low, presumably because Hungary wants money, and the money-lender desires to get the best terms he can. They are worth buying to-day. The yield is high for so powerful and rich a State. Bulgaria is in the market for a new loan. Paris will find the money. The enterprising Londoners who made the last issue are not in the market: they found that la haute finance was not exactly in their line.

HOME RAILS are quite neglected for the gamble in Metropolitans, which are talked to par. The latest tale is that the Great Western propose to take over the line and guarantee the ordinary stockholders a definite dividend, say, 3½ per cent. No doubt the Great Western must have Westbourne Park Station, and no doubt, sooner or later, they must electrify right through to Maidenhead. The Great Western and the Midland are the most progressive lines in England, and they are also ambitious. But the Great Western should have electrified years ago, before the trams went to Uxbridge. They say that Speyers are bidding for control also; if this be true, which I doubt, then indeed shall we see some fun. People are at last recognising that the Great Central is to be one of the big trunk lines of England, and the Junior Preference shares are now being bought. I have never wavered in my opinion that Great Central Prefs. are the cheapest thing on the Stock Exchange. The new docks at Immingham and the new coalfield at Doncaster must give this railway a splendid and profitable traffic, and as its local trade grows so will its passenger and goods traffic increase. It is not often that people are given the chance of buying preference shares in an English railway at rubbish prices. North Easterns must benefit by the boom in shipping on the east coast, and all the Scotch lines are doing a splendid trade. They are worth picking up. We run about after five per cent. securities in the wilds of Central America and neglect a sound gilt-edged security that can be picked up at our very doors.

YANKEES would appear to be waiting for dear money. They do not move. Yet no one in the United States has any doubt that most of the railway stocks are cheap. Unions are exceptionally low in price, and once again I would point out that the Four per cent. Convertible Bonds are the soundest and cheapest way of speculation. Atchison is another road that must improve in value. The common stock is quoted in Paris, and as the quotation cost a huge sum we may be sure that one day an attempt will be made to get this money back. This company has still to place some big lines of convertible stock, and when the offer is made I advise my readers to apply. Unions, Atchisons, New York Centrals and Pennsylvanias are as good an investment as any man could wish. The trouble on the Wisconsin Railway has made holders of Chicago Great Western nervous. But I am assured that the coupons will be bought, if not met. However, we shall see. This and the Kansas and Orient trouble will make people afraid of second-rate railway securities. The Denver figures show that the line earned about 2½ on its preferred stock. No one quite knows what will be done here, and many holders are very sore with a well-known newspaper that wrote up the Preferred Stock just before the news came that the road was unable to meet its preference dividend. The wretched purchasers will hardly follow that newspaper again. To what a sad end does the optimist come!

RUBBER shares are not now in favour. The dealers found that the public were all sellers, and as the shops are also sellers the little boomlet died down. Port Dickson report was very bad—the cost of production was prodigiously high and the sale price exceptionally low. Apparently there was a great deal too big a proportion of scrap rubber in the harvest. Tenasserim was also bad; indeed, none of the reports over this week is good. Inch Kenneth is nothing out of the common. The cost of production all over the East is rising in a very disagreeable manner, and the sale price does not improve. The public is now educated in rubber, and will not buy unless it sees a clear ten per cent. on its money. I think the public quite right.

OIL. We are promised a rise in Red Sea, the new Shell company will shortly issue its shares in exchange for the property, and as the Red Sea will not liquidate, but use its cash to buy other oil properties, the shareholders will get share for share and also have a gambling chance in the future. The Premier Oil and Pipe dividend put heart into this market, which has been dull for some weeks. Roumanian Consolidated are also promised a rise in the autumn, but the North Caucasian gamble hangs fire, mainly because McGarvey does not bring in his promised new wells. Shells are said to be going to 7. This is an inside tip of the great Sir Marcus Samuel himself. But can we believe in Shell tips? They are an astute crowd.

Mines are deadly dull. Perhaps the magnates find that the public in mines like the public in rubber have more shares to sell than anyone imagines. In spite of good reports prices do not move. Goertz are trying to push up Geduld. But on the whole the magnates are letting the market take care of itself. This is the wrong policy, and they will regret it. They are all, however, crushing much above the value of the reserves, and we may expect much bigger profits for the next few months. The Village Deep game has been exposed in the Stockbroker, and now the mine is making normal returns. When even the best houses are not above ordering their managers to crush the poor ore, I despair of the Rand.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are all strong; 5,000 Beheras changed hands last week, and the Lord St. Davids group were large buyers. I think that we shall see a great revival in Egyptian shares this autumn, for the crop is good and the country quite recovered from the slump. Shipping shares are steady, and West Hartlepool Prefs. are still rising; this share, and that of the Indo-China S.S. Co., are good to buy as a lock-up gamble. Marconis are weak. It is said that the Irish priests are telling all their parishioners to buy Marconis. This is rash, as the share at present prices is only a gamble.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

ROUMANIAN CONSOLIDATED OILFIELDS.

The extensive use to which oil is now being put for raising steam at sea, on railways, and in various industrial undertakings is causing its price to rise steadily; and this, taken with the fact that the Government has lately appointed an influential Commission, with Admiral Lord Fisher at its head, to study the question of oil fuel supply for our Navy, shows that the era of oil has now dawned in real earnest. This is naturally directing renewed attention on the part of buyers to the more substantial and reliable of the oil-producing companies, whose shares, in the near future, are bound to be regarded in the same light as those of the coal companies are at the present time, that is to say fit to be held by the most careful investors. The Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields, an amalgamation of six concerns, occupies a prominent position in this connection, owning as it does no less than 7,000 acres of land in the rich and highly productive oil-fields of Roumania. The Company's wells are now yielding oil at the rate of about 6,000 tons per month; they are fully equipped with storage accommodation, and connected by pipe-line with their own refinery. Moreover, the Company, which is capitalised at £1,750,000, has at its command over £300,000 of working capital, with which additional wells are being drilled with all possible rapidity, the intention being to increase the rate of production as much as possible. The Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields is one of the principal British concerns of its kind, and by far the most important of those working in Roumania at the present day. Its assets have lately been valued at fully £4,200,000, and its prospects are most encouraging. When the report of Lord Fisher's Commission on the supply of oil fuel for the Navy is published, the oil share market is bound to come into greatly increased prominence, and then, if not before, Roumanian Consolidated Shares will unquestionably rise to a substantial premium, and should prove in the meanwhile a most attractive purchase.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEED.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—M. Bernon said, in his former letter, "To my mind, in the expression, 'I need not have troubled myself,' the verb need is in reality in the present infinitive." He now says, in reply to my criticism, that in "I did not need" "need" is in the infinitive mood. How his present statement can be looked on as a reply to criticism of his former one, he does not explain.

Mr. Allen says, "English is very irregular in the matter of such words as 'need' and 'ought.'" If he means that English people are very slovenly in their way of using "need," I quite agree with him. The compiler of the Oxford Dictionary, for example, as quoted by Mr. Mayhew, seems to see something irregular in the fact that the verb "need," when used as an auxiliary, conforms to auxiliary usage: to my mind, the irregularity would lie in its not doing so. Both in English and in German the two distinguishing characteristics of auxiliaries are (1) that the third person singular has the same form as the first person, (2) that the "to" before the following infinitive is dropped. Ordinary verbs used as auxiliaries tend to follow auxiliary usage in both respects: the "s" disappears from the third person and the following "to" is left out: he need not go, he dare not go. "It don't matter" is more correct than "It does not matter," inasmuch as the compliance with auxiliary usage is more complete: so "He dare not go" is more correct than "He dares not go," and, I should think, far more usual. As regards the past tenses which Mr. Allen seems to hanker after, "need" and "ought" are not at all in the same boat. Our object in saying "I knew that I need not do it" is probably to avoid the harshness of "needed." "Oughted" is impossible, for the excellent reason that "ought" is a past tense already. It is typical of the professional grammarian's way of handling these subjects that even Dr. Morris, in dealing with "ought" and "must," makes no mention of the fact that, being imperfect subjunctives, they have naturally taken on a present meaning: cf. "ich müsste"—I mean the real "müsste," not the misprint which appeared in Mr. Powell's letter last week.

I am grateful to Mr. Cobb for putting me on to the track of Mr. Moon and his works, and shall look out for a chance of still further diminishing my ignorance. Men of mature age, who have formulated for themselves some definite ideas on these subjects, can read grammatical works certainly with interest, possibly with amusement, probably without danger. Those who are still at the impressible stage of development would, I think, do well to follow my example, and remain as ignorant as possible of grammarians and their works. The study of language develops a man's mental capacity as probably nothing else can: the reading of what other people have said about language is far more likely to do harm than good. There are quite enough people in the world already to whom a theory is as good as a fact: they have begun by learning grammar out of a book, and they end in too many cases by becoming Socialists, Christian Scientists, followers of Mr. Norman Angell. How far grammarians are responsible for this may seem, to some, an open question; there can be little doubt of their responsibility for the curious fallacy, in symptoms of which this correspondence has been rich. I mean the assumption that one can take a language as one can a lump of clay and mould it into any shape one likes. M. Bernon tells us in his letter on the word "talented" that in quite recent times educated men have thought it worth while to discuss the question whether it is allowable to use such words as "talented" and "gifted"! Would it make the faintest difference whether they said yes or no? Others among your correspondents have suggested that we should do this, that, or the other, by way of simplifying or improving the language. Has it never occurred to these gentlemen what a splendid thing it would be to make our rose trees produce rubber? Why don't we do it? I am, Sir, etc.,

T. G. MARTIN.

MR. WRIGHT AND A CRITIC.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Many a man before now has exclaimed: "Save me from my friends!" The current number of THE ACADEMY contains "An Intimate Appreciation" of John Payne and his work, by Mr. T. Wright of Olney. The only portion of the article which does not invite, and deserve, severe critical castigation is that portion consisting of biographical data. Mr. Payne has done yeoman's service as a translator. I have no quarrel with Mr. Payne; but when Mr. T. Wright of Olney presents us with the following, and declares it to be "a delightful presentment of Heine at his sweetest," in the interests of poetry, in the interests of Heine, and in the interests of Mr. Payne, I quarrel with Mr. Wright of Olney. I quote three of the five verses over which this gentleman pours the fulsome tide of his adulation:—

"Doubting Thomas, I, in Heaven
I believe not, for our home.
Promised by the Churches Seven
Of Jerusalem and Rome.

"But for angels, of their being,
In good sooth I doubted ne'er;
Light shapes faultless, for our seeing
Still upon the earth they fare.

"Only wings I, gracious lady,
To these beings must deny:
Marry, there are wingless angels
As full often seen have I." Etc.

This is not only not poetry, it is not even decent verse. The defects are flagrant. Yet Mr. T. Wright solemnly assures your readers, "none but Payne could have given it" (this translation—save the mark!) "rondure and iridescence and have set it sailing in our sweet English air." Of "rondure and iridescence" those unfortunate verses have nothing; and, far from sailing in sweet air, their main distinction is an uncomfortable waddle on very common earth. In his selection of the original and "remarkable" poem, "Drunk or Sober," Mr. Wright is no more fortunate. He quotes it with unction; yet it has the some crude inversions, the same want of poetic subtlety and sense of fitness. It is a species of bastard sonnet which, in an awkward attempt to fly, conspicuously and ungracefully flops. Mr. Payne well deserves a more discriminating appraiser. Several of our younger poets, and critics of poetry, are already sufficiently confounded; any mature assistance to confusion can be well spared. THE ACADEMY and the "Saturday Review" are perhaps the only London weeklies whose printed verse never makes them ridiculous. I claim this as my excuse for writing in regard to the above. Very truly yours,

Cottingley, Yorks. JAMES A. MACKERETH.

"THE RIKS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I have seen the letter dated August 13, from the author of "The Riks," to you, on the subject of the review of his book which appeared in your No. 2,095 of June 29, but I see no reason to withdraw a single word of the review. He has not attempted to make clearer the "discoveries" he claims to have made.

My quotations from his book establish, I repeat, my two main points, viz.—"He has, indeed, produced a strange jumble of mythology, geology, chemistry, and Sanskrit, which may suit the Hindu intellect and imagination, but it was hardly fair of him to attribute his 'discoveries' to Western learning"; and "It is inconceivable that the authors of the Rigveda, thousands of years ago, embodied therein the geological and chemical meanings which Mr. Iyer educes from the poems."

The author quotes some complimentary letters he has received from some eminent scholars. He fails to see that the letters are, on their face value, mere kindly non-committal expressions of encouragement: one would like to cross-examine the writers.

When scholars and scientists accept his "discoveries" (whatever they are), it will be time for others who, like myself, are not Vedic scholars or geologists to accept them. It is open to anyone to compare the book, my review, and the author's letter. I am confident what their present conclusion would be.

AN event of primary importance for Australia, which few papers have noted, took place last week. The first sod was cut at Port Augusta, in South Australia, of a railway destined in three years' time to unite West Australia with the older and more populous States of the eastern portion of the island-continent. The line will be carried through the heart of the great desert, will be some 1,200 miles in length, and is estimated to cost at least £5,000,000; construction is to be begun at both ends. This route will be of strategic value, as by it troops could be despatched in twenty-four hours from Melbourne or Adelaide to Perth, the nearest port to India. It is also worthy of notice that the Commonwealth, having taken over the administration of the vast Northern Territory, which is at present very scantily inhabited, is making every effort to attract settlers to that region, and from reports furnished by the High Commissioner it appears that all kinds of semi-tropical produce can be grown there successfully. Population is steadily increasing in all the Australian States, and Western Australia, which until lately was the Cinderella of the Colonies, has more immigrants than any other State of the Commonwealth. Our readers interested in education will be glad to know that the new University at Perth has been formally opened, and Sir John Winthrop Hackett, K.C., has been elected Chancellor.

There are many nuisances to the suppression of which the Chief Commissioner of Police might have turned his attention before he issued his ultimatum upon the street distribution of the handbill, which, after all, can be disregarded if we wish. The loafers in the public parks, who accost any genial-looking person and suit their tale to the occasion, might be taken in hand with good results; malodorous house-refuse in byways not far from the City is collected at hours which we thought were illegal; and other small matters pro bono publico will occur to any observer. If it is true, as is stated, that £50,000 a year is spent in Greater London on handbills and their distribution, it seems as though one of our minor, unconsidered industries will suffer extinction.

According to an article which appeared in a daily contemporary last Wednesday, and which we read with feelings of awe, the American golfer must be constructed on a different plan from merely English humanity. It seems that he rises at six, and after several baths drinks a large glassful of iced water, partakes of half a melon, oatmeal porridge, bacon and eggs, baked potato, tea or coffee, more iced water, and "marmalade with toast and sweet cakes" to finish. This takes him safely to lunch-time without any violent pangs of hunger, and, having concluded his business in the city, he returns to the club to play golf; first, however, he must stay his cravings. "Soup, some meat, salad, blueberry pie, iced water, a glass of cold tea with a lump of ice in it and a piece of lemon, a large supply of ice-cream, and a big cigar"—thus internally propped and buttressed, he sallies forth to the game. Afterwards, more baths, a cigar, and then "a long American dinner, with vegetables very fancily done" (sic), corn cobs, sweet salads, plenty of iced water, ice-creams, ginger ale with lemon and ice, "and so forth." What Englishman could stand it for three days in succession, Even a quiet hour at marbles would seem too much to expect of him on a diet so severe!

It makes us think rather contemptuously of the intelligence of our fellows when we read the list of articles left in trains; who could possibly forget a bunch of 212 keys or a lamp-shade? Both of these were found in the Central London Tube, and are unclaimed. In this connection we note that the German railway officials have compiled a volume which might be termed a "luggage portrait album," containing photographs of every imaginable type of box, bag, basket, and trunk; so that the traveller who arrives minus a part of his equipment will only have to scan its pages to describe accurately the shape, complexion, and decorative scheme of the missing article. This sounds pleasant, and may save time; but it seems to leave a loophole for the expert railway thief; and what compensation awaits the Englishman ignorant of German who receives, after the catalogue number has been telegraphed, a bag the same shape and size as his own, containing, instead of the spare clothing for a holiday, a set, let us say, of burglar's tools? How will he escape, if we may not go yachting in German waters without suspicion?

Dans Les Bois

J'ENTENDS là les mille voix
Dont la nature est pleine
Non sans soupirer parfois
Et me remplir de peine.

Pareils à nos hirondelles,
Ces sons harmonieux,
Ont-ils peut-être des ailes
Pour s'envoler aux cieux?

Oui! ces échos fugitifs
Sont adieux à la vie
Que disent des cœurs captifs
Rendus à leur patrie.

J'écoute, l'âme tremblante,
Amour saint, éternel!
Heureuse la voix qui chante
Ton hymne solennel.

The Imitation Critic

THOUGH it is true, within limits, to say that the poet is "born, not made," the real critic may be anything but a critic by birth. He may be of a retiring, contemplative disposition, hating discussion and disagreement, yet compelled by his sense of justice to display before the eyes of other men the knowledge gained in his solitary years, to stick pins into inflated mediocrity, even to wield a vigorous sword in the tourneys of controversy. There is another type of critic, however, in whom, almost as soon as he can walk, flourishes an art of detraction often mistaken for criticism; the genuine critic, bien entendu, dealing as much with approval as with censure.

This imitation critic, as we may term him, possesses in an uncommon degree the happy knack of forming a definite opinion about everything, from the spectrum of Sirius to the latest novel; which would not matter very much, if only he would keep his opinion to himself; by the nature of his mental economy, however, he must orate upon his discoveries. Occasionally, therefore, he wins a fleeting fame in a restricted circle by the sheer weight of his didacticism; he is referred to by superficial observers as one who "knows a thing or two" about most subjects, the fact being that he is like the vagrant sparrow—fat with the crumbs from other people's meals, an expert at nothing but the pompous phrase and the impertinent platitude.

He is sometimes, we must admit, quite a wonderful mannikin, as he leans from his little home-made Olympus and dispenses the spurious ambrosia to the neophytes that twitter round his feet; he apes a divine discontent with the world, has the airs and graces—and often, unfortunately, the eloquence—of Hortensius; and nothing can disturb his belief in himself. For invariably the imitation critic is an egoist of the bluest Patterne blood, delighting in the reverberations of his own voice, bearing charitably with those who are misguided enough to hold opinions differing from his own; and as an egoist, it is a pure pleasure—or a pathetic experience, according to your point of view—to watch him when confronted and tackled by a man of mark. He will argue a professor into silence, if the professor happens to be modest and of an equable temper: for if it be music, he can talk the language of the schools, and by murmuring of "tone-colour," "light and shade," or "balance," reduce you, who are not a professor, to a state of resentful admiration; if it be art, he has all the studio-phrases handy, and will speak familiarly of "values," and perhaps spring upon you a word such as "architectonics," a veritable boulder of a word, when, of course, there is nothing more to be said. But, given an irascible and thoroughly equipped opponent, his contortions make an edifying spectacle and a warning to the unwary. Keep him to the point, and it impales him at once.

As a rule, however, he is ignored by professors, scholars, and the critics genuine; he makes so much noise that they shy at his approach like a restive horse at the sudden squawk of a motor-horn; thus he is generally left to his own spell-bound circle. Here, like the frog of Æsop, he can sit and puff himself out complacently, sure of the hum of applause, sure of the timid question which he will answer so beautifully, sure of being a hero. For to worship is a necessity of humanity, and young humanity in especial has phases when the imitation critic serves as a passable, if transitory, object on whose brow the laurel-wreath may rest. If in a short time the disciple wakes to his prophet's frailty and sees the laurels slipping, so that a slightly intoxicated appearance imperils the aforetime dignity, what matters? Youth easily transfers its adoration—there remain other heroes yet untried; and the kindergarten of the imitation critic, depleted of one member, gains another novice in due course.

By his very agility—his rapidity of fire, if we may so put it—he sometimes manages to hit the target, just as a poor marksman free with his ammunition must find an occasional chance bull's-eye to his credit; and then his friends hear about it until they wish that a beneficent Mother Nature had provided them with earflaps as well as eyelids. Disagreeable sights can be avoided; unpleasant sounds must be borne; and, unless we are sternly resolved to note only the comedy of manners—unless, in short, we are cynico-philosophic by training—the self-satisfied quacking of the imitation critic is a very unpleasant sound indeed. In time, however, it dies down; and in the grateful interval we have leisure to wonder what, if his eyes were opened to the patchwork garment which he takes so contentedly to be cloth of gold, he would find to say about himself.

THE Syrian lover, vice Mr. Clinton Scollard, is a very consistent and very insistent young man. Not to put too fine a point on it, he harps too much on one string. A genius, no doubt, would find endless melodic opportunity in the one string, and this Eastern serenader tinkles very prettily so far, but he scarcely commands the requisite capital. Mr. Scollard's indubitable skill has not sufficient solid material to work on, in spite of all the lovely verbal aid the Syrian fiction lends. Nard, musk, minaret, muezzin, bulbul, djinn, Ras-el-Ain, Trebizond—they all sound well in the rhythmic cadences of verse, though even then Mr. Scollard has a lingering affection for certain Western words and phrases of his own, such as "wraith" and "shut of twilight." But fifty lyrics, averaging eight lines each, trying fruitless comparisons with pretty much the same monotonous triumph for the unique She—well, one is pretty, three is enough, and fifty is satiety. We are convinced, however, that when Mr. Scollard can feel deeply and sincerely enough he has not only lyrical facility but lyric power.

It would be quite just to credit Mr. Clifford King with considerable information, a certain play of imagination, and good intentions—but he evidently has no idea as to what poetry is. He seems to think that as long as his tide of eloquence breaks up into so many "feet," and periodically, by good fortune, a couple of words strike an approximate similarity of sound that does duty for rhyme, the result is poetry, whereas it is really vanity and vexation of spirit. We have found in these pages nearly all the prosodical vices of the beginner: the any-port-in-a-storm leap for a rhyme, the stretch-me-out-and-I'll-just-do-it line endings, the clumsy elisions, awkward inversions and paddings. Here is a brief example of his craft:—

> Yea, all the night is loveliness itself
> And shines with beauties, earthly, heavenly,
> Which charms in luxury the liquid gulf
> Spread like ten thousand mirrors of the sky.
> Oh, God, the glory is most wondrous in > Its hallowed majesty! It dazes the > Rude eye of man—so drunken by the scene—
> That views the whole, multi-divinity!
> Could we but now . . . .

Need we go on any further? As dramatist he is coincidental, bathetic, rife with the tragic "Ha-ha!" As satirist he is pathetic; as sonneteer more than liberal—red radical; as a writer of album verses he comes into his own.

We should like to think that Mr. Inkster's neat little book is misnamed also. There is an air of experiment about it and some promise of issue. His gift is not best adapted, perhaps, to the restricted forms. A number of sonnets, while technically fairly true, are something lacking in conclusiveness, a little inclined to incoherence, while a couple of villanelles scarcely ripple along with that even runlet-music which one expects in a villanelle. A single rondeau is by far the most successful of the experiments in these forms. But the residue of the book contains the best things, as "The Journalist's Chant," a repudiation of Wilde's sneer at the mercenary of the pen, which reveals considerable power; "To My Walls," sub-titled "A Backwater in London," which has a refreshing individuality; and, best of all, the section inscribed "For Sweethearts." We should like to quote from one of his group, called "Portraits," as evidence of Mr. Inkster's felicity when his muse is unconstrained; but space will not permit.

Mr. De La Mare's poems should be read in some haunt of ancient peace, some leafy arbour just within sight of the mellow, creeper-clad brick of an old manor. Yet perhaps we are wrong. If he can call up that association and hold us spellbound in the blasé surroundings proper to modern life his place is emphatically there, and we owe him grateful thanks. In the even, musical flow of his verse, so delightfully innocent of artificiality, so limpid and sure, he recalls the charm now of Wordsworth, now, in some elusive way, of the Vaughans, now of Herrick. He has the gift in a remarkable degree of drawing lyric portraits, such as the lovely little thing of "Rachel" or that of "The Tailor," or this of "poor Miss Loo":—

> Her tabby cat, her cage of birds,
> Her nose, her hair—her muffled words,
> And how she'd open her green eyes,
> As if in some immense surprise,
> Whenever as we sat at tea
> She made some small remark to me.

And presently:—

> . . . . with gaze of vacancy,
> And large hands folded on the tray,
> Musing the afternoon away;
> Her satin bosom heaving slow
> With sighs that softly ebb and flow,
> And her plain face in such dismay,
> It seems unkind to look her way.

Charming he is, too, when he touches the borderland of enchantment, as in "The Witch," "Never-To-Be," "The Dark Château," and "The Listeners." All of these poems are short, but their brevity is full of delicate suggestion. They are like the chaste, translucent thoughts of one who himself looks out on the world with eyes that are clear and soft with the tender simplicity of a child's dreams.

Mr. Greene's songs are pleasant enough, but scarcely confess that breeziness and spaciousness that we are wont to associate with the open air. The greater part are fairly good exercises of a careful pupil of the Muse, but they lack the sufficient personal quality which would make them of the living stuff of poetry. Here and there, however, Mr. Greene seems to respond to a breath of the genuine air, and the pulse of his song is correspondingly heightened. We would instance "Inisfail" (which surely betrays Mr. Greene a son of Erin?), "Ad Canem," "A Mood," and "Snowbell," a musical little poem.

The twin deities of colonial poets seem to be Mr. Kipling and Mr. Geo. R. Sims. We do not presume to quarrel with the election; we simply state it as a curious fact, and bring forward Mr. Stead's volume as the latest example. He rattles along merrily to the measure of a seven-foot or eight-foot line, and is a practised hand at the camp-fire yarn kind of thing:—

> Ned M'Cann owned the Double Star 'way back in the early days;
> He had come out here with a sickly wife and a kid he hoped to raise . . . .

There you have style the first, and for the alternative:—

> He is brand-new out of England, and he thinks he knows it all—
> (There's a bloomin' bit o' goggle in his eye) . . .

Much more worthy of a serious reading is "The Mothering," in which Mr. Stead expresses the call of the virgin land to be loved of its adopted sons. We should like to give it whole, but have space only for two of the concluding stanzas:—

> Then I gave him hopes he could not define and fears that he could not flee;
> And he heard my cry in the long, still night,
> In my spirit-thrall I held him tight,
> And his blind soul-eyes craved for the light;
> But the light he could not see.
> So I held my peace till I saw him sit with children at his knee;
> And I sent them the sun, the wind and the rain,
> And the ferny slope and the flowery plain,
> And the wet night-smell of the growing grain;
> And their love they gave to me.

If we could have a little more of that and a little less of the Kipling-cum-Sims decoction we should begin to listen with quickened interest to the voices that sound from the prairie.

A Teller of Stories

May I Tell You a Story? By HELEN MAR. (J. and J. Bennett, Ltd. 2s. 6d. net.)

"MAY I tell you a story?" The familiar words will awaken many memories—memories of drawing-room entertainments, charity concerts, or comfortable evenings at the theatre. To the present writer they recall, with a quite wonderful vividness, a certain dinner in a central London hotel. The Royal toasts have been duly honoured. The cigars have been lit, the port has gone round. There is a general feeling of post-prandial contentment, and the murmur of many voices rises to the ceiling like an incantation. Suddenly a door at the back of the dining-hall is thrown open. A tall, graceful woman in evening dress appears. She faces the company.

"May I tell you a story?"

There is an instant pause in the conversation. The appeal is frankly irresistible. The lady has the air of one having inadvertently broken in upon some important business. There is a semi-apologetic note in the request so shyly proffered, a note which is somehow emphasised by that frankly American accent which Helen Mar, despite her long residence in this country, has never succeeded in discarding. Heads are turned in the direction of the speaker. There is a moment's pause. Then Miss Mar proceeds to tell us a story. She tells us, indeed, not one story, but many. Ripples of merriment go round the room. At length—but all too soon—the last story is told. With a charming curtsy she descends the platform—vanishes—and leaves us all mightily pleased with ourselves, and still more pleased with our entertainer.

It may be doubted whether Miss Mar has done wisely in entrusting her stories to the unsympathetic medium of print. Told, they are inimitable; read, they are merely funny. They have no force of personality behind them. One misses the delicate inflections of voice, the characteristic gestures, the indescribable smile. Once Miss Mar's peculiar property, they are now the world's. She has relinquished her hold upon them. . . . But perhaps she thinks they have served their turn? Perhaps she intends to delight us with a new répertoire?

The book itself is delightfully feminine. It is one of those chatty, colloquial, inconsequential, discursive volumes that only a woman could write, and that, unfortunately, so few women do write. Professedly an autobiography, it is in reality a series of disjointed impressions. But there is a frankness and a naïvete about it that will ensure for it a hearty welcome from all those who value sincerity in autobiography rather than pretentiousness.

Miss Mar began her professional life as a reciter—a fatal mistake, as she was afterwards to discover. For the world—or, at any rate, that part of it which is willing to pay for its entertainments—does not love recitations. And, incidentally, the world is quite right. Miss Mar learnt wisdom, some years ago, at Prince's Galleries, in Piccadilly. She had been "booked" for a recitation, and she happened to overhear a lady say: "For Heaven's sake, let's make our escape; someone is going to recite." Not very encouraging; but it set Miss Mar thinking. Her mind was quickly made up. Brevity, it has been said, is the soul of wit. She determined that she would try its effect upon her audiences. In the future, not recitations—but stories! And, as she was an American, they should be American stories. "And that," she tells us, "is how I began to tell 'A few American stories.'"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Since that day Miss Mar has established a reputation as the most popular of living story-tellers. She has amused princes and paupers, has assisted at society functions and at humbler entertainments in the East-end, where she is always secure of a welcome. She has some interesting things to tell us about her audiences. Oddly enough, she prefers clergymen. "If I were able to choose those whom I am called upon to try and amuse," she writes, "I should always make sure that clergymen were present. They make absolutely the very best audiences one could have. Broad-minded, enthusiastic, and with a keen sense of humour—which last is, indeed, the saving grace." Here is an unexpected tribute to "the cloth."

Turning to the stories themselves, it seems a little invidious to select any particular one for special praise. Readers will naturally choose their own favourites. But the following deserves—nay, demands—quotation:—

> A very rich American came to London, and met an Englishman, who—strangely enough— liked him and asked him to his house.
> The Englishman was a great collector of antiques, curiosities, etc., and showed the American, among other things, a table and a chair and, pointing to them, said: "That table and that chair once belonged to Milton."
> "Really," said the American, and kneeled down and reverently kissed both table and chair.
> "And," continued the Englishman, "that table was the very one on which that immortal classic, 'Paradise Lost,' was written."
> "What was written?" questioned the guest.
> "'Paradise Lost,'" was the reply.
> "Who wrote it?" again questioned the A——.
> "Milton," replied the host.
> "Who did you say owned that table?"
> "Milton," again answered the host.
> "Gosh!" ejaculated the rich one, in a tone of disgust. "I thought you said Lipton!"

One more—and only one more:—

> A man went up to a friend and said, "Did you know that Jones was going to run away with your wife?"
> "Why run?"

There are some dozens of others. Thank you, Miss Mar, for a very pleasant entertainment!

Mr. Stephen Phillips' New Play

The King: A Tragedy in a Continuous Series of Scenes. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. (Stephen Swift and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

IT is chastening to reflect on the way Mr. Phillips' work has fallen from esteem. A matter of a few years ago, he was spoken of in terms that seemed to hail him as a brother to Shakespeare; now there are none so poor to do him reverence. It is a characteristic of the way journalistic reviewers, having no just standards of appreciation, are always eager to whet their appetites by seeking new loves. For if "The King" be compared with "Olysses," there will not be found a vast difference in their conception and execution. The conception in both is rather theatrical than dramatic; even as the execution has none of that wondrous flexibility that one associates inevitably with great dramatic work. With the exception of "Herod," his work has always seemed to us, from the earliest days, rather workmanlike than passionate, rather preconceived than inevitable. Had reviewers treated his early work with care and discriminating examination, rather than with the merely stupid blame or stupid praise with which they always greet newcomers, a different tale might have been told. As it is, in reading "The King" one has the feeling of an artistic tragedy.

In his Note to "The King" Mr. Phillips tells us that it "is constructed after the Greek and not the Shakespearian model, and is divided into a series of scenes, not acts." In point of fact, in its mobility of scene it is more Shakespearian than Greek. It is not at all desirable that we should nurse these time-worn labels, that more often confuse than elucidate. Moreover, it is questionable if more than half of modern dogmas concerning the construction of Greek Drama are not the result of our ignorance of the conditions under which Athenian Drama was presented. Yet in so far as they mean anything, and in so far as they connote anything, the fundamental distinction between Shakespearian and Greek drama is one of a variety of scene. And when Mr. Phillips divides his play into five scenes, he might just as well have divided it into five acts without affecting anything more than the nomenclature.

When we spoke of his drama as being more theatrical than dramatic, we touched on what has always seemed to us the fundamental weakness of his whole work: and it is very marked in "The King." The story in the present tragedy is that of a king whose son has won great glory for himself, and for whom his father chooses a worthy match with the Princess of Portugal. But that son is in love with one of the ladies of the court; with whom, indeed, he is more deeply pledged than he thinks. For on his return from the great wars he learns from her that she expects a child. So he declares to his father that it is she he loves, and that he can wed no other. Then his father tells him that the girl is no other than his half-sister. At this terrible news the two die together; and the father, who has abdicated in favour of his son, has to resume the throne.

If simplicity of phrase and manner could give conviction to a play, "The King" would convince. But there is no drama where there is no vitality of characterisation; and it is just this that Mr. Phillips lacks. Neither the King, nor Don Carlos, nor Donna Christina, live and move and have their being before us. They are persons of whom something is told. Consequently, to get movement and the hint of vitality into them, Mr. Phillips must employ the uses of the theatre to stuff them with the semblance of life. For example, at the conclusion of the first scene, when the prince has learnt his father's intentions for him, and asks for a delay ere he decide, the dialogue states the situation in a calm economy of words, stirring nothing of the vividness of the situation in us. It closes in an entire lack of conviction. Then, what his characters could not give, Mr. Phillips must needs give us, from without and as the stage-manager of his people. We are told in a stage direction that "the Prince passes his hand over his brow in a gesture of doubt and terror."

To say that this is a fault of versification is to state what is obvious. And yet it is not true to say that a merely accomplished versification could give us great drama. Nevertheless, without a subtlety of line there can clearly not be a subtlety of character; and without a terror of line there cannot be a terror of scene. How well Shakespeare knew this can be seen in many and many a passage where the power of vivid metaphor is made to awaken a power of passion. But Mr. Phillips' verse is stiff, unornate, and static; and these are not qualities that can very well express drama, which is nothing if it is not chiefly subtle, coloured, and passionate. Whatever might and passion are contained in this play proceed outside the borders of the verse, and are to be found in stage directions. The reason simply is that the verse is not of such a quality that it can contain it. Consequently we are irked by a misfit somewhere; and the play falls broken in our hands.

"The King" is slight in proportion; yet in its carefulness of workmanship, and its even melody of phrase, it is, within its limits, an interesting piece of work. There is a depreciation in it from Mr. Phillips' early work; but there is by no manner of means a difference sufficient to account for the present falling away of attention. It lacks inspiration, that strange indefinable thing; but its chief lesson is that it proves that drama cannot be written without passion.

Poetry and Perversity

The Clouds. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. (Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.)

ANY poetry that the reader rebels at should be a challenge to what his conception of poetry is. His conception may pass the challenge, or it may fall before it; in either case, the result is surely healthy if the inquiry be candid. The substantial fact is that the challenge has been made; and that it was right to make it. For no poet delivers his substance to his fellow men without at least the semblance of a worthy and noble motive—and from the word poetry one exempts satires or trivialities in verse. Ambition is not an infirmity, but some kind of an attestation of worth: which may turn awry or may be sound, but which claims the right of an equal tourney in the lists.

To say, therefore, that we do not like, that we can scarcely read with patience, Mr. Doughty's poetry, is to say nothing of moment. Nor does it materially affect the question that our feelings with regard to his work are not confined to the above volume, but no less to the six volumes of the "Dawn in Britain," to "Adam Cast Out," and to "The Cliffs." Of these, "Adam Cast Out," by its stern elimination of all that is not in the severest sense germane to the matter, wins a chastened and rigorous beauty despite much uncouthness, and should have a place among certain individual poems destined to memory. The "Dawn in Britain," despite some passages of beauty, seems to have overawed a certain number of shallow critics chiefly by its length and its perplexity. But in the present volume the whole problem his work raises is put in its simplest form. For "The Clouds" is patriotic poetry of deliberate intention, and for some reason that is not very hard to discover patriotic poetry is a severe test to any poet's performance. In it he abjures the high fountains of poetic inspiration, and has to come down to the ways of declamation; he has to deny the very essence of poetry in denying the unity and brotherhood of Man, and deny it not by neglecting it, but by attacking it. Moreover, he has to deny other things. He may be even called upon to deny a possibly higher worth in another race of men—a more distinguished morality, a stricter and purer loveliness of personal and civic life. Therefore, being without the inevitable aid of inspiration, he will have to rest more securely on his tricks of style, his mannerisms, and methods.

Turning, then, to "The Clouds," what is the element that most strikes the reader as he journeys through the book? Take, for example, the following passage from the "Proeme":—

> A Land of Sighing! shall be vast lament:
> Yet less were all than able to express,
> In Her souls anguish, Britains last distress.
> What marvel if Isle Britains soil once more
> Invaded were, wherein so manifest scars
> Of wounds received in many former wars
> Remain? Where is not of the Invaders foot;
> Reaving, manslaying, burning as he went,
> Some token in Britains earth? What English march
> Is there; whereas some hill-top is not crowned,
> With old fossed rampires of invader armies?
> Mounds of war-slain bear witness everywhere.

There are many passages in the book that are almost laughably grotesque; but to quote such passages is obviously mischievous; and the above, in its consecutive meaning, is a very fair example of the ordinary tenour of Mr. Doughty's style. It is free of the anterior beauty that poetry endeavours to see and express: therefore its method has to stand by itself. And what is that method? There are hints throughout his work (more than hints indeed) that he is seeking to write English poetry deliberately in Arabic syntax. Whether this be so or not, one can but judge from the result; and that result is an insecurity of rhythm (so insecure that it requires to be helped out by accents), and a steadfast habit of inversion that not only inverts the grammatical sequence of a sentence, which is no great matter, but which bears no relation to an emotional sequence of idea. In other words, it is a mannerism deliberately employed to a certain end. One may grow inured to it after reading a number of pages; but that is a different thing from winning the secret of a spontaneous manner.

What, then, is the end to be gained? It would be ridiculous to say that the poetry of the future must merely be bound by the poetry of the past, though it is worth recollecting that beauty is not two things, but one, and that poetry is not its invention so much as its expression. Yet it is a fact that scarcely any great poet has ever sung but has expressed the thing that burned in him in the way of metaphor and imagery. It is not very difficult to see the reason of this. For poetry, avoiding the way of direct statement, expresses itself in a ritual of the imagination, a ritual that is full of significance to the soul. The result is that the expression of great poetry is never obvious; its approach is always incalculable. Now the same quality of indirect approach is characteristic of the passage we have quoted, and of the major portion of Mr. Doughty's work. But how different the two methods are! One floods the mind with a mental excitement almost impossible to bear. The other does not strike on the imagination, but only irritates the intellect.

To say of "The Clouds" that there are moments in it of a quality quite pure and simple is, as doubtless Mr. Doughty would himself be the first to admit, neither here nor there. Such moments must always appear in a continued body of poetry. But that they have a distinct quality of their own only confirms our opinion that he has more or less deliberately adopted the puzzled manner and syntax of the overwhelming portion of the book, not perhaps as an attempt to baffle understanding (no man truly does this), but certainly from a desire to escape the obvious manner, the direct statement, and the lack of an imaginative ritual that marks the thing that is prose from the thing that is poetry. It is, in fact, an attempt to set up another kind of ritual. But to excite the imagination to moods that mean more than words can envisage is quite a different thing from bewraying the intellect by involving the syntax of a sentence.

In the present volume it is characteristic that the poem "The Muses' Garden" is most marked by the spirit of poetry. If one may be suffered to speak in the twisted language of the professional philosopher, in that poem he draws on the poetic content without expressing it in its own high ritual. But the fact remains that he does draw on the poetic content—which is more than one can say of the bulk of the poems in the book. Mr. Doughty's patriotic intention has snared his feet in strange ways. For example, to find working men of the Eastern Counties discussing the foreign invasion in a dialogue constructed on the principles of syntax that prevail in other portions of the book is rather apt to make one think that war has had an unhappy and untoward effect upon them. It is not many carpenters that soliloquise thus:—

Rain miserably again falling, towards the day,
Helped quench vast dying flames; whose bitter breath
Yet covered the cold stars; and borne was forth,
On the immense bosom of the wakening wind.
Parents still wandered, seeking children lost!
Was battle looked for, shortly to be joined.

Nor are we inclined to be particularly lenient towards the one who does.

Yet, apart from the particular faults that attend on the poet who mounts the platform, the underlying fault of Mr. Doughty's work is a much deeper matter. It is that he has put it into an impossible, and sometimes laughably grotesque, mould, and violated the spirit of poetry in so doing.

Jerusalem: Ancient, Medieval, and Modern

The Story of Jerusalem. By COLONEL SIR C. M. WATSON. Illustrated by Genevieve Watson. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 4s. 6d. net.)

Palestine Exploration Fund Annual, 1911. (Published by Order of the Committee.)

MESSRS. DENT and SONS' "Medieval Towns" series has already obtained so secure a position in the favour of connoisseurs that it is hardly possible for any new volume to enhance its reputation. If, however, these books still require a favourable introduction in any quarter to which they have not yet penetrated it is certain that none other of them will the more readily open the portals of favour than that on Jerusalem, one of the most recently issued. Apart from the perennial and entrancing interest which the subject of the monograph wields throughout the civilised world, Christian, Mohammedan, and Jewish, an author has been chosen for the present volume who is without question the one best qualified of all living who use the English language as a medium. Sir Charles Watson, as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund, is in an unrivalled position to become acquainted with and to estimate at their true value even the minutiæ of the discoveries which are being made almost weekly by the Fund and kindred organisations, whereby the interstices of Palestinian history are gradually being filled. In the hands of some this extensive knowledge would prove unwieldy and render an intelligent account within moderate compass impossible; Sir Charles Watson, however, adds to his extensive knowledge of his subject an exceptional power of co-ordination and selection. The facts which he selects with unerring instinct from his abounding wealth he binds together by means of a literary style both easy and pleasing, and as a result he has produced a book that fascinates and holds the attention enchained from the first page to the last.

"The Story of Jerusalem" is in reality far more than that which the general title of the series suggests. The author recognises that the story of Medieval Jerusalem cannot adequately be told unless that of Ancient Jerusalem is offered as a preface; and when he finds his narrative passing out of the Middle Ages it is impossible for him to stop until he has reached almost the present day. Thus the history opens in very early Biblical times, and is continued to the close of the nineteenth century, and the comment of the reader will be one of regret that this story of Jerusalem has come to an end. Under the reverent pen of Sir Charles Watson the perennially interesting Bible narrative is revivified, the romantic history of the most romantic of cities is re-told, and the most interesting of all histories is placed at the disposal of all readers. To the visitor to the Holy City this volume will prove invaluable; to the much larger public to which the Holy Land can be no more than a dream this book should occupy a secure and always accessible place on the book-shelf.

A source of annoyance to the intelligent visitor to Jerusalem is always the numerous identifications—generally in duplicate, as each Christian denomination is always eager to possess all that is desirable in this respect—of the sacred sites, most of which are of course absurdly distant from the truth. It is not surprising that Sir Charles Watson discards practically all the identifications, and is extremely restrained and conservative with regard to those to which he gives consideration. He might, however, have shown much more hesitation before accepting as authentic (p. 99) the passage in Josephus which refers to Jesus. This is now almost universally admitted to be a relatively late and fraudulent interpolation in the text. In his last chapter also, devoted to "Relics of the Past," the author is a little too sweeping in his assertion (p. 309) that there is no evidence that any kings were buried in the "Tombs of the Kings." This is true in regard to the Kings mentioned in the Bible, but, on the other hand, there is no reason to doubt that Queen Helena and King Izates of Adiabene, who embraced Judaism in the first century of the present era and settled in Jerusalem, were buried there. It is unnecessary to comment on the style in which Messrs. Dent and Sons produce these volumes, for that is already well and favourably known; the illustrations by which Miss Watson embellishes the text alone render the volume a bargain.

The Palestine Exploration Fund Annual for 1911, a new departure, is a work of a different description. It consists of accounts of three definite pieces of work of Palestine exploration performed on behalf of the Fund during the year to which the Annual relates. Dr. Duncan Mackenzie describes an expedition to Rabbath Ammon across the Jordan for the examination of the Megalithic Monuments there. He finds many points of resemblance to the similar remains in Sardinia. The same author, who is in charge of the excavations at Ain Shems, in the country of Samson, describes the progress of his work there. Dr. Gustaf Dalman contributes an account of the measurement of the Khazneh at Petra, which he suggests is the mausoleum of one of the latest Nabataean kings. These subjects may seem somewhat technical to the general reader, but the manner in which they are treated renders them of interest to all into whose hands the annual may come.

Savage Indian Tribes

The Fly on the Wheel, or How I Helped to Govern India. By LIEUT.-COL. T. H. LEWIN. (Constable and Co. 6s. net.)

So little is heard nowadays of the Eastern Frontier of India that the dangers of life and service there, which had to be endured forty or fifty years ago, are hardly remembered. But the recent expedition against the untamed Abors to the north of Assam sufficed to remind the Government and the public of the possibility of trouble with savage frontier tribes. Official and private reports of these disagreeable neighbours have occasionally appeared. This volume is a reproduction of a book written thirty years ago, after his retirement from India, by Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Herbert Lewin, one of the bravest and most successful officers who ever laboured in the Chittagong hill tracts which constitute the Eastern Frontier. He did more than his share in taming the wild men with whom he had to deal, and in bringing them under the influence of British civilisation.

The story is so full of life that it seems to preserve its original freshness unimpaired. Lewin did not enter on frontier work without the preparation which he describes. From Addiscombe he was plunged into the Indian Mutiny of 1857, served with British and Indian troops at Cawnpore, in Oudh, and in Central India, and was constantly engaged with the rebels, gaining the experience of actual fighting and military movements. To avoid, if possible, going back to regimental duty, he got himself transferred to a battalion of military police, with whom he enjoyed much varied sport in the intervals of relaxation from duty. When the regular civil police were instituted, he gained further experience of the native character as District Superintendent of police in several Bengal stations until he reached Chittagong. In November, 1865, he voluntarily made an expedition to a frontier tribe, the Shendus. Though the particular project failed, Lewin established a reputation, and soon became the official Superintendent of the tribes on the Chittagong frontier. When the Lushai tribes continued their marauding attacks on British subjects, and measures were required to check their aggressiveness, a regular expedition, consisting of two well-equipped columns, was dispatched against them, and Lewin was obviously the political officer to accompany the southern column under General (now Field-Marshal Sir Charles) Brownlow. The force completely effected all that had been expected of it, mainly through the capacity of the political officer, his "strong personal influence over these tribes, his knowledge of their language and habits, added to his patience and sagacity in dealing with them." From his General he received words of kindness and approbation, but "these pleasant words of praise were my sole reward."

No frontier can ever be permanently pacified, and subsequent attacks have occurred, but the system inaugurated by Lewin has been continued and developed. Instead of the aloofness which had always failed on the North-Western Frontier with the Pathan tribes, Lewin cultivated a policy of direct relations with the border chiefs; to the headmen and to all-comers he was equally accessible; he learnt their speech and visited them, mixing freely among them, though his life was constantly in danger, for he was fearless and ready to take unusual risks. He did not neglect to employ force or deceit when it suited his purpose. Personal influence he found to be the only way of dealing with the simple people, force being reserved for those made of sterner stuff. He studied the natives closely, to understand their point of view.

> The native opinion of Englishmen has been thus summarised. They regard us as an unclean people who eat cow and pig, and whose common beverages are intoxicants; as a species of curious devil, gifted with much brute courage and some human perceptions of an elementary nature, such as the love of justice, the power of making money, and the like—creatures not altogether evil, but most unaccountable, whose presence in India must be endured as an ordinance of Providence or a scourge of Fate.

Lewin found a village-headman named Twekam Tongloyn, and claimed to have the same name and to be of the same clan, making out his own to be Urbut Tongloyn (Herbert Tom Lewin)—he is still remembered on the frontier as Thangliene. This headman recounted to him the native view of the Creation, concluding, "It is a pity that God sleeps so much; for otherwise we should live much longer." In accepting native hospitality, Lewin observed local customs and ate strange viands, but he had to draw the line somewhere and declined to eat dog. On another occasion, he had to take some horrid stuff into his mouth, some tobacco water, the lees of a hookah, "a most unpleasant custom," but he "could not stick at trifles; so with inward loathings and a smiling face I conformed to the requirements of politeness." Though this is an autobiographical work, it is free from egotism or conceit. Frontier officers will learn much from the methods of Colonel Lewin's success with border tribes, and the general reader will find plenty to interest and amuse in his vivid narrative and anecdotes.

Sensations of Paris. By ROWLAND STRONG. Illustrated. (John Long. 10s. 6d. net.)

VEIL after veil is descending on the beautiful Paris of the olden days, till soon she will only appear here and there in some unspoiled corner, some unrenovated café, some historic building too notable to be pulled down or Americanised; and yet, through all the superficial changes, the spirit of Paris and its people remains. In this pleasantly written book Mr. Rowland Strong strives to picture the "city of light" as it is at the present day; by clever contrast he brings the characteristics of Paris and London into proximity, showing the one against the other, and gaining often by this little device an uncommonly clear conception of both. A short quotation will illustrate this point:—

> When it rains in Paris, the effect is no greater than that of a child's burst of tears. The aspect of Paris is for a brief space as hideous as that of the child; but the fit is soon over and the tears are dried, and smiles and gay equanimity return. The persistent weeping of the London streets has the quality and the high seriousness of the gloomiest Scandinavian tragedy. London weeps as one imagines Mrs. Siddons to have wept for fifty consecutive performances in the rôle of "The Mourning Bride," en grande artiste, making a presentment of utter woe which has the abiding dignity, the harmonious atmosphere, and the colour ragoût, of a great painting.

At description the author is exceptionally good; there are many passages which we should like to quote, such as those in the chapter detailing the different colour-effects of the provinces of France, and a lengthy paragraph in "The Panorama of Paris," where, again using London as a background, he pictures the city at night or at sunset. There is a rather laboured essay on the odours of Paris, but, on the whole, the book is excellent and astonishingly true to life. One small point we may make: Mr. Strong should have given his readers credit for knowing at least a little French; he need not have troubled to translate every trifling sentence so particularly.

The illustrations are good and often amusing, and the chapters devoted to the life of the people, such as "A Parisian Marriage" and "A French Soldier's Mother," form portions of the book which other writers of less experience might well study. "Vanishing Paris, 1910," is rather a sad section, with which those who regret the disappearance of old London landmarks will sympathise; but the one conviction which is evident on almost every page is that, however much Paris may apparently change, she is still the same gay, heartening, vivacious city that she has ever been.

A Chronicle of Friendships. By LUTHER MUNDAY. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. MUNDAY trawls with a very wide net through the deeps and shallows of the past. These friendships of his, of which he tells in so amusing a fashion, are infinitely greater in number and more varied in scope than those which fall to the lot of the ordinary man. The main feature of the volume is the Lyric Club—of which the author was the leading spirit and untiring guardian—and the many notable and talented men and women who were associated with this enterprising institution. But the scope of the personalities introduced into this chronicle of friendships by no means ends here. We have records of society folk, politicians, artists in the comprehensive sense of the word, soldiers, sailors—from Wagner to Arthur Roberts, from Nelson to Buffalo Bill, from Sandow to Browning and Whistler, and from the scions of Royalty to the inmates of the Piccadilly cabmen's shelter. As a pot pourri, what more could be desired? Mr. Munday, moreover, has a light touch, and his book positively teems with anecdotes of the humorous order, stiffened here and there by philosophical comments on the world as he knew it. The author does not always intend himself to be taken seriously. Here is a record from Ceylon which throws a vivid light on the meetings of the Planters' Association in the days when coffee was still the staple product of the island:—

> There was then a sort of improvised levée, and I became popular in a day, by means of a frock-coat which I brought out from home. It was a huge success! Imitating "Fregoli," I changed behind a screen, and so, in turn, did sixteen planters, who walked past the chair in my coat and bowed to the Governor. It was also worn by four bridegrooms, and paraded mournfully at two funerals. Its end was sad! One day I found it, buoyed up with microbic life, taking a walk by itself, so I shot it—the only thing I ever killed with a gun.

Perhaps, notwithstanding its joyous note, it is not fair to cull this single extract as a specimen of Mr. Munday's work. Unfortunately there is no space available for more. If there were, the difficulty would still present itself concerning which to choose. For the author has given an amazing wealth of anecdote here, and with mingled frankness and good-nature has dealt with quite an unusual galaxy of prominent humanity. Indeed, so kaleidoscopic and rapid are the changes of scene and names which Mr. Munday conjures up that it is just possible that the reader may suffer from a touch of giddiness—but giddiness of a pleasant order.

La Meilleure Part. By EMILE POITEAU. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

M. POITEAU is a convinced adherent of the popular "régionaliste" or "Barrèsiste" school; at least, for these two are not quite the same thing, he stands for the ideas common to both and for some of the particular theories of each. He is a Catholic, a moralist, an aristocrat, and a provincial. He has produced a tract rather than a novel, but it is a good tract, well written, and dedicated neither to the converted nor to the "dead in sin," but to all those who stand at a "croisée des chemins." The hero, Jacques Morval, is introduced to us at the moment of the completion of his medical studies. He is to be the successor of his father, who, having inherited in his turn a country practice from his father, is about to pay with his life his debt to overwork. Jacques is naturally anxious to establish himself by marriage, and he is at once confronted with a choice between two partis, a dazzling heiress and a penniless saint. The conflict is too one-sided. Jacques is surrounded by good counsellors, and the heiress, though she is described to us as "une intrigante, une charmeuse, une ensorceleuse," plays her cards singularly badly. It is not untrue as psychology, but in real life we think the debate would have been more subtle and the issue more open. The bad angel is, moreover, handicapped by belonging to a family of very unpleasant parvenus; and she sighs for Paris, while all the numerous nice people of the book have a real affection for their native "clocher." We will conclude with a quotation from the noble testament of the elder doctor to his son:—

> Quand tu ne pourras rien au point de vue scientifique n'oublie jamais de faire l'aumône de ton cœur. . . . . Ne considère pas la médecine comme une industrie, mais comme un apostolat.

The Romance of Sandro Botticelli woven from his Paintings. By A. J. ANDERSON. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

JUDGING from its title, the majority of readers will doubtless suppose this book to be a biographical work of the accepted order, in which case, however, they will be mistaken. Mr. Anderson has set out on a more daring expedition than a quest of plain or doubtful fact. As he explains in a note: "The word romance is used in the sense of a fictitious narrative in prose, with imaginary conversations and fictitious incidents, and not in the modern sense of a love-story. Thus the title might be read: 'The story of Sandro Botticelli, reconstructed from his paintings.'"

As it is, the author has given us some very pretty romance, and has told the story, as his imagination pictured it, of the events, loves, disappointments, and triumphs of which the canvases stood as the centre as they became imbued little by little with life and colour. But surely this practice—however successful may be its results in the way of drama and popular interest—is a dangerous one. In this case, the work is interspersed with some really invaluable criticisms and sidelights on those pictures from which the author has drawn his creative inspirations. But the peril remains. Were this method to become common, how many modern artists would go in fear and trembling lest some self-elected benefactor of the dim future should endeavour to reconstruct their lives from some specimen of their art once hung on the walls of the Royal Academy! They would probably have reason for their dread. But even this, speaking generally, does not justify this new departure in the way of romantic biography.

THIS volume contains nearly three hundred letters from, to, or concerning Manzoni. A large number of them, notably the abundant correspondence of the poet-novelist with Claude Fauriel, are in French. They chiefly bear a very intimate character; the stupendous events that were contemporaneous with them are hardly hinted at. The only public subject that seems to have interested Manzoni during these years is the state of religion in France. Even literary matters are in the background, except towards the end of the volume, where he comes within the orbit of some of the great European men of letters, and where the Marquis Ermes Visconti, for instance, draws him into some sort of a literary discussion. The personal note is, however, pleasing, whether it is concerned with his love-affairs, his successful first marriage, the conversion of his wife to the Roman Church, or the death of his friend, Count Luigi Arese. Manzoni is not very hopeful of the Italian language; we know that "I Promessi Sposi" was written in two different dialects, and we find him debating in a letter to Fauriel the question, "What is the true Italian tongue?" In another place he says, "Per nostra sventura, lo stato dell' Italia divisa in frammenti, la pigrizia e l'ignoranza quasi generale hanno posto tanta distanza tra la lingua parlata et la scritta, che questa può dirsi quasi lingua morta." The volume is well supplied with portraits.

Outfit and Equipment. By SIR HARRY JOHNSTON and Others. Edited by EUSTACE REYNOLDS-BALL. (Reynolds-Ball's Guides. 2s. 6d.)

In Camp and Kitchen: A Handy Guide for Emigrants and Settlers. By LUCY H. YATES. (Andrew Melrose. 1s. net.)

BOTH of these small volumes contain a number of useful hints relative to the safety, health, and comfort of the traveller. The first of them is a compilation, including chapters by such eminent authorities as Sir Harry Johnston, Harry de Windt, and F. C. Selous, and contains many suggestions as to the appropriate outfit to be used for travel in the Far East, the tropics, and the Arctic regions, the best sporting outfit for various purposes, a great number of observations upon the care of health under the most trying circumstances: in a word, it furnishes just that sort of advice which makes all the difference between comfort and misery. There is scarcely a journey of any extent which will not be rendered the more enjoyable by the possession of the practical wisdom imparted in these 140 pages.

The second of the two volumes before us deals almost wholly with the problem of cooking food effectively without the use of any save the most rudimentary apparatus. Here the would-be colonist, the traveller, and the explorer will find an exposition of the mysteries of flapjacks, cornmeal pones, dampers, johnny cakes, chupatties, and other delicacies which emanate from the camp kitchen. There is also an exceedingly useful collection of practical hints in the last chapter.

Fiction

A Degenerate

The Confession of a Fool. By AUGUST STRINDBERG. Translated by ELLIE SCHLEUSSNER. (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.)

THERE is a form of naïve conceit, such as that displayed by Pepys and Benvenuto Cellini, that makes delightful reading; but there is also an egotism, so diseased and so persistently sexual, that it repels and disgusts us to the uttermost. Such an egotism is to be found in the late August Strindberg. A better title for this autobiographical novel would have been "The Confession of a Degenerate." It should have been read in manuscript by a brain specialist, destroyed immediately after perusal, and the author put under such restraint as would prevent him from writing another book on similar lines. Do not let the reader of this review imagine that we are adopting a narrow and prejudiced point of view in dealing with a work of this kind. We have made due allowance for the artistic temperament that is popularly supposed to cover a multitude of sins. We have taken into consideration Strindberg's irreligious outlook and the many bitter reverses with which he had to contend. When, however, a man sits down to reveal sordid and perverse secrets associated with the passions, when his photographic realism is entirely pornographic, he is simply producing filth, taking obscene photos from behind his veil of disordered and distorted egotism that no clean-minded person could look at, much less associate with literature.

We gather from the prefatory remarks that a German version of this book was published in 1893, "but it was mutilated, abbreviated, corrupted, and falsified to such an extent that the Attorney-General, misled by the revolting language, blamed the author for the misdeeds of the translator and prohibited the sale of the book." We are unable to judge of the German edition, but in the present version there is more than sufficient material to ban its publication in this country. Strindberg himself has called it "a terrible book," and regretted that he ever wrote it—his one sane and wholesome confession.

These autobiographical pages are concerned with the passion of Axel for the Baroness (Marie). At first sight, indeed for a considerable time, Marie appears to her lover as a pure and splendid type of womanhood, a being altogether too cold and chaste to be capable of anything like an intimate love. Axel pictures her as a virgin mother, and not infrequently compares her with the Madonna. We find, in references of this kind, an old and very despicable trick of the pornographic writer; this building up of an image of womanly chastity simply for the purpose of dragging it down in the mud and producing a striking, if sordid, contrast. In the early pages we read much about platonic friendship and soul union. Axel, after looking through a volume containing illustrations of famous sculptures, comes to the conclusion that Marie does not resemble the "full-bosomed and broad-hipped" Venus, nor Juno, "the fertile mother," nor Minerva, "the blue-stocking, the old maid, who hides her flat bosom under a coat of mail," rather Diana in species, but not in genus. The Madonna theory is on the wane, and soul union conversations cease to exist.

Axel's passion expresses itself without the least restraint. He has a liaison with Marie, to the complete indifference of the Baron, who is making violent and very improper love to his cousin. Passing over many unpleasant incidents, we eventually find the lovers married, and the remainder of the book is devoted to a portrayal of the depraved and utterly worthless Marie. There are innumerable quarrels, innumerable leave-takings, but always Axel returns under the spell of her horrible magic. No matter how stormy the scene, how bitter the words, a glimpse of Marie's stockinged legs is sufficient to make amends for the past. Though Axel's manliness is crushed under the small foot of his wife, he never forgets that it is a pretty foot, with pink toes and exquisitely formed nails. We are expected to sympathise with Axel's mental and spiritual tortures; but we cannot sympathise with a madman who, driven by the power of Karma, returns again and again to a woman who is not only a prostitute, but is also capable of a perverse form of sexuality with her own sex. It is this Lesbian element that particularly revolts us, and has forced us to take a rigid stand in condemning the book as grossly immoral. There is only one unintentionally humorous passage in the volume, and that is probably due to the translator. On page 137 we find: "The Baroness opened the folding doors and secretly kissed me between the wings." Marie could never have kissed an angel. Strindberg writes: "Don't you know that I am the devil incarnate?" After reading these filthy "Confessions" we have no difficulty in taking the author at his word.

Rogues in Arcady. By SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY, BART. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

LOVERS of detective stories always desire, above all, to be puzzled, and far prefer to be mystified over the solution of the plot, never resenting wild-goose chases after false scents, than to have the solution of the mystery made obvious from the beginning. Readers such as these will hardly be satisfied with Sir William Magnay's latest novel, for one needs to enter but a short distance into the book in order to discover the solution of whatever mystery exists. To be fair, it must be admitted that the author makes no attempt to leave his readers in any doubt, but takes them into his confidence without hesitation. Thus the interest of the reader is confined to the manner in which the author in the course of over three hundred pages attains to rough justice. In the first essential of a detective story the present book therefore falls short, and it cannot be said that it recoups in any other respect its failure in this one. The author does not show himself in any manner a master of characterisation. The personæ are crudely and clumsily drawn. They are obviously artificial and altogether lacking in conviction. Not for a moment does the reader, even in the most critical passages, imagine that he is dealing with human beings or living episodes. The strings by which the figures are pulled and the consequential imperfections lie open, unconcealed, on every page. Not once is the reader moved. He feels like a father who has taken his children to a pantomime, in which he himself is not bored so much as untouched by the performance. The best that can be said of this story is quite negative. It is harmless, and may serve to rest a jaded mind, but it will not invigorate it.

Our Nance: A Story of Whitechapel. By W. BRAUNSTON JONES. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

WE had hoped, when we saw the title of this book, that we were going to enjoy a real romance of the slums; but although Nance is a thorough little Cockney, and her brother a costermonger, the West plays quite as important a part as does the East in this drama. And between the two extremes the story filters down until the characters appear very much like middle-class people using the language of Whitechapel; and surely sometimes Nance's excruciating accent and total lack of grammar must have got on the nerves of her artist lover, yet there is no suggestion of any steps being taken to set these deficiencies right, even after they are married. The two men who wish to gain possession of the girl because they admire her physical beauty seem irrelevant and merely introduced for melodramatic effect. If Mr. Jones had confined himself to developing further the characters with whom Nance is first acquainted, we think a much more interesting book would have been the result.

Saïmi Tervola. By HILMA PYLKKANEN. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

THE combinations of this story are not very new; it is one of the variations of the problem sketched in those twelve lines of which the first two are:—

"Ein Jüngling liebt ein Mädchen, Das hat einen Andern erwählt."

It is true that Heine does not introduce the complication of a son born of the marriage of the two real principals, nor does the element of patriotism or nationality enter into his synopsis, but both of these additions are familiar and do not essentially alter the problem. What marks the story as a product of the North is the fact that Saïmi is first estranged from her first husband and lover not by the latter's libertinism but by his occasional, if violent, lapses from sobriety. The parting of these two is told with admirable skill and pathos, and our sympathies are called forth strongly for the erring but wronged husband. His successor is never very sympathetic; it may be that he would exercise a greater fascination for the purists of Finnish patriotism, but to the undiscerning foreigner his rival's generous revolt against Russian oppression seems at least as meritorious, and more unselfish. The Finnish background is full of charm, and the characterisation is good: Saïmi is a little too détraquée, a little too ancient and modern, to be wholly attractive, but the poignancy of her situation, with three passions at strife within her—love of country, child, and of lover—make her at least interesting. We could wish she had been kinder to her first husband.

Shorter Notices

POSSIBLY Mr. Leslie Mortimer intended to make a "shocker" of "The Sin of Youth" (John Long. 6s.), but, granted such an intention, the stilted and ultra-melodramatic phrasing, and the clichés occurring on almost every page, mar even that effect. The plot is a tangle which we feel sure—and rightly—will be unravelled on the last page, where those who have survived poison mysteries, hunting tragedies, broken engagements, and the passionate love of southern—not very southern—temperaments, are made ecstatically happy with the assistance of a pile of buried treasure, valued at one million sterling, and not confiscated by the Government of the country in which it was hidden. All these properties of the melodrama, and many more, are introduced here, but minus the touch of realism which makes such things effective. The characters do not live; we feel in reading that they are mere puppets, jerked hither and thither at the author's fancy, and we close the book with relief. We credit the author with the ability to turn a neat phrase once in a while, but would suggest an attempt on his part to draw consistent portraits before adventuring further in the fiction market.

It is as a study in Scotch temperaments that "A Diana of Quebec" (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.) is mainly to be commended. Mary Simpson, the "Diana" who won the susceptible heart of Captain Nelson, of the Albemarle frigate, and, after he had gone, captured the Scotch Major Mathews, is an admirable specimen of sympathetic portraiture. Mathews himself, precise and methodical, hard and shrewd on the surface, yet tender and deceived even by himself in reality, forms another finely-drawn character. Miss McIlwraith's style is a trifle stodgy at times; Quebec itself is described rather too minutely, and at some points the action is slower than necessary. Still, this is an old-fashioned story of old-fashioned people, bearing a distinct atmosphere of the time and place with which it is concerned; its people are real and lifelike, and on the whole the book is to be welcomed as a fresh, clean story, not dealing overmuch in phychological analysis, but rather showing us a man and a woman—with the inevitable end.

"Sheila Vedder" (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.) is the story of young Jan Vedder, son of the original Jan, and of how he wooed and won Sheila Jarrow at Lerwick, in the Shetlands, before tourists descended on the islands to intone guide-book paragraphs in a sort of Yankee litany. Lest the course of true love should run too smoothly, Sheila's brother Donald makes some slight trouble between the lovers for a time by causing his sister to conceal certain things from Jan, but this is so slight a matter as to lead us to suspect that it was merely introduced in order to spin out the story to a reasonable length. Nevertheless, Miss Barr's book is not one to pass by unread, for it tells of a people concerning whom few records remain, and introduces us to a simple life more desirable than that of hygiene and bacteriological extermination.

The characters in "The Shoreless Sea" (Holden and Hardingham. 6s.) might have been chosen from nearly any newspaper serial. Beatrice, the divorced wife of Armiger, the hero; Cynthia, the woman who married him in ignorance of his past history; Evan Fane, the man who ruined Beatrice's life; and even Armiger himself, are all well-known and well-worn types. Yet there is a quality about this book, a certain richness of expression, marred though it is by a bourgeois stamp on the story, apart from its characters, which lifts it to the level of good fiction. Evan Fane, the villain of the piece, is a somewhat hazy character; we do not see him clearly, and are unable to judge whether Miss Lethbridge intended to make him bad all through or bad with streaks of goodness. Cynthia is a pale and unconvincing character, atoned for by the force and clearness with which Frances, her self-righteous sister, is drawn. Notwithstanding some very evident faults, this is an attractive and—in some moods—a fascinating book. It possesses the fine quality of inevitableness, and the authoress, having written a book of such interest, may yet do great work if she will only find her own characters and work from life.

Adam, "Eve's Second Husband" (Constable and Co. 6s.), is shown to us in such a way that we can well understand how it was that Eve helped him to hide, went with him through the garden of youth and out into the prosaic world of middle age, loving and forgiving always. He makes his entry to the book as purchaser of the Booneville Banner, which the inconspicuous, over-virtuous first husband edited up to the day of his death. Having annexed the paper, Adam annexes the widow, and proceeds to make his way to Congress and the governorship of Tennessee. He accomplishes these aims, mainly by boundless belief in himself and a capacity for bluffing others into a like belief. In telling this story of a second husband Miss Harris has told the story of the wife, and told it well; and, since the book is written in the first person, the very clever—sometimes too clever—epigrams are all of Eve's making, but we feel that they do not belong to her, and are alien from her character. This, however, by no means spoils the book, which is a crisp, forceful, and wholly enjoyable piece of work.

The story which Mr. Upton Sinclair has to tell in "Love's Pilgrimage" (W. Heinemann. 6s.) is a rather commonplace one, for most young authors have trials and disappointments, and many know the bitterness of hack-writing at the expense of creative work. The chief trouble here is that Mr. Sinclair has chosen to imagine his author as a genius with a very large G, and, furthermore, has striven to invest commonplace happenings with tragic significance from page 1 to page 438. The "pilgrimage" does not reveal itself to us as we read, but rather are we conducted along that way by Mr. Sinclair, who, after the fashion of a tourist's guide, pauses at intervals that he may declaim stridently on the wonders of the journey. We are never allowed to forget the presence of our guide, or to judge for ourselves, for this is a "personally-conducted" tour, and the guide is bent on making himself conspicuous. Mr. Sinclair has treated the evils that beset the path of Genius in the States as he treated the Chicago canning businesses in "The Jungle," but literature is not pork-packing, and "Love's Pilgrimage" is not likely to bring a boycott down upon American publishers, nor to modify the inevitable drawbacks attendant on literature and journalism as careers. Again, in matters of sex, the very commonplace relations between the hero and his wife are shouted to us as if they bore an abnormal significance, whereas they embody a lesson which every married couple have learnt and—in spite of Mr. Sinclair—will go on learning for themselves.

Music

Two Concerts

THE music of the week has been unimportant. At the Promenade Concerts we have had one new composition of no special value, but of undoubted cleverness in workmanship. It is a Suite of Intermezzi Goldoniani for strings by Enrico Bossi, who has something to say in twentieth-century idiom better deserving attention than studies in the language of the eighteenth. Queen's Hall is one of the most serious places in London, and the incursion of Mr. Pelissier with his infinite jest gained additional piquancy from the solemnity of the place. Indeed, more than half the public would not believe, till forced to laugh in spite of themselves at Mr. Pelissier's wit and fanciful humour, that the Queen's Hall and the Queen's Hall orchestra could be enlisted in the service of Comedy. The fooling is very ingenius, and never oversteps the limits of good taste. Moreover, it is of the kind possible only to people with an ample store of solid knowledge and a good supply of brains, and that lifts it out of the category of mere flippancy, and makes it worth listening to for the greater part of an afternoon. There is quite a sound artistic moral to be drawn from the bulky frame and vast complexity of the Follyphone and the tiny sounds that proceed from its cavernous depths.

"The Great John Ganton" at the Aldwych Theatre

IT will never be believed, I suppose, but I am sure the London public would love to welcome American plays if only the Fates who rule this sort of thing would permit. "The Great John Ganton," by Mr. Hartley J. Manners—founded on Mr. Eddy's novel—is one more popular success in the States which, with the best will in the world, we are unable thoroughly to enjoy. An American dramatist who has had great successes here was telling me of a new play of his, the other day, and I wanted to know which management would produce it in London. He told me he wrote it for America, and not for Europe. And there lies the heart of the matter. There are certain plays for the New and certain plays for the Old World, and just a very few that are for all countries and almost all time. "John Ganton" is not in the last class, I fear; it is possible that "Milestones" is such an one, for it is written by two cosmopolitans, one of whom is by birth an American, one an Englishman, and wherever it has been produced it has given delight. But if "John Ganton" is of America for the Americans, at least we can appreciate the consistent efforts of Mr. George Fawcett to make something of the title-rôle. It is no easy task to transform an old, self-satisfied pork-packer of Chicago, who eventually becomes sentimental, into an interesting stage figure; but Mr. Fawcett gets near it now and then—far nearer than any other actor we know could do.

The story with its details of stocks that are rigged, and stockyards that are made successful on lines of graft and craft, is not amusing. The Will Ganton of Mr. Eric Maturin is clearly and well played, yet it does not convince. His love affair with the May Kating of Miss Laura Cowie is a convention of the stage, and that lady's outburst in the office of old John Ganton is a trick of the theatre which loses all point by Miss Cowie's violent attempt to make it dramatic. Alas, that such beautiful eyes should hold so little expression just at the moment when it is most needed. Miss Mabel Trevor is able to give a quite realistic performance of Mrs. Wilton, a well-worn type of the worldly wife of a business man, who means to enjoy the days of her vanity while she may. Miss Hemingway's simple and beautiful Hester Ganton, the much-tried daughter of the great and inconsiderate John, was the truest and most pleasant part of the long four acts—but then one does not see very much of her, nor does she really help forward the action of the play or affect its issues. Here and there the dialogue is finely written. The scene between the elder and younger Ganton, in which Will tells of his unfortunate speculation on 'Change, and the father offers to pay his debts if the son gives up his love—of course, the father hates the idea of the marriage because it is a play—is compact and true. But, generally speaking, the conversations of the people of the play are affected and rather dull. In any case, we are grateful to Mr. Louis Meyer and Sir Joseph Beecham for showing us once more just the sort of thing the Americans like, and for allowing us to see Mr. George Fawcett in a part which he handles so boldly and has mastered in every detail.

The Paradox of Literature

By ARTHUR MACHEN.

IT seems sad, but I fear there can be no doubt but that Carlyle, whom our fathers regarded as an inspired seer, was, if a prophet, then a prophet of Baal. For many years we have been waiting for that once tremendous reputation to recover the ground it had lost, to emerge, shining again, from the dark cloud of all those squalid, unnecessary revelations, from the effects of a biography written by a friend of "ter-ewth." One thought that those histories of indigestion, heavy bread, and cross Mrs. Carlyle would fade away like the nightmares they were, and that the great figure of the 'fifties would enter finally on the literary life that is perdurable and immortal. But, alas! people have not only forgotten how Carlyle was dyspeptic and how his wife showed temper; they have forgotten all else as well, so that of the primeval seer nothing remains except perhaps a dark and threatening shadow—a fetish to which men no longer give sacrifice. It is sad, and yet no lover of literature can say that the fate is wholly undeserved. The man who said that Keats possessed nothing but a "maudlin, weak-eyed sensibility," the critic who admired the whisky-and-sentiment vein of Burns, who went through the Waverley Novels and found all (nearly) barren, because there was nothing "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for edification," is surely condemned out of his own mouth. But Carlyle was not content with these minor aberrations; he enunciated the major heresy that genius consists of an infinite capacity for taking pains—perhaps one of the untruest things that have ever been said.

For this, it seems to me, is the paradox of literature—of all art, it may be said, but of literature in a more singular degree—that neither genius nor the result of genius has any relation to effort, to the process of taking pains. Some months ago I endeavoured to show in these pages that the finest charms of the finest books were unconsciously created, and from the theorem thus stated one may deduce the corollary—that conscious effort, taking pains, in fact, never results in the finest work. I am using the superlative deliberately, not for merely rhetorical purposes. "Marius the Epicurean," "The New Arabian Nights," most of Stevenson's books, indeed, may fairly be classed under the heading of fine literature; but one is confident that neither Pater nor Stevenson will ever be accounted by competent critics as makers of the finest literature. Both these men may stand as examples of the summit to which conscious purpose and effort in literature may attain; their achievement is high and fine, but not of the highest nor the finest. We have heard of Pater's long-enduring patient labours, of the fevers and the chills which he suffered in the writing of his masterpiece, of the elaborate system of notes and memoranda, of the manuscript copied and recopied, interlined and altered year after year. Stevenson told us frankly how from his youth upward he toiled in his vocation; how he sought by all means to learn to write, setting himself in the class of the masters. And yet, with all this infinite taking pains, neither the one nor the other accomplished anything beyond the second-rate. We know how a certain player, with a smattering of general information and more general literature, took the old creaking dramas, the chronicles, and the story-books in hand, and hacked and slashed and scribbled away for a livelihood, relishing the work heartily, no doubt, but wholly unaware of the dignity of his task. But Shakespeare's taskwork turned out to be the finest literature in the world. Sir Walter Scott, again, wrote his romances partly, it would seem, for the fun of it, partly that he might build a dubious Gothic palace and buy moors and woods. He wrote faster, and still faster, and the less the pains the better the result. The "bow-wow style" was his phrase for his work, which will live while any romance is left in the world. Then there was an Anabaptist tinker—a fanatical, illiterate, and probably most unpleasant person—who tried to write a tract, and succeeding in inventing one of the best picaros in literature. It is said that Defoe had the infinitely tedious design of making an allegory about somebody's state of mind—I forget whether it was Defoe himself or a friend of his, who refused to speak to his family for twenty-eight years—but the symbol of "Robinson Crusoe" has happily entirely overshadowed the thing signified.

This, then, is the paradox of literature, that its highest rewards are not bestowed on earnest effort and patient endeavour, but on the elect alone, on those who have "taken the trouble" to be born geniuses. In letters patience and perseverance count, it seems, either for nothing or for very little, or, strangely enough, guide the writer by paths which he had never dreamed of, which he may probably have abhorred, to a goal entirely beyond his conception or desire. Christian in the "Pilgrim's Progress" is a rare picaro, as I have said, but how shocked Anabaptist Bunyan would have been if he could have understood the manner of his success. And the principle, which undoubtedly applies to the highest achievements, is not without its application in the lower walks, in the region of the literature of endeavour and studied calculation. For it seems to me that one of the greatest mistakes that a writer can commit is to "read up" a subject with a view to writing about it, to "cram" history for the especial purpose of writing an historical novel, to deliberately make a journey in pursuit of "local colour." This is a dreadful method of writing dull books, the infallible mark which points out the hopeless author. They tell us of persons who spend a fortnight at Paris, and at the end of their visit understand the whole life and humour of the Quartier Latin, and by their works we know them! Burne-Jones, we have heard, drew the inspiration of his pictures from half-forgotten poems, and so must the material of imaginative literature be unconsciously gathered, given to forgetfulness, it may be, for many years, and at last drawn out into the light, having lost and gained somewhat in the darkness. Many of our modern writers, those chiefly of the advertising kind, whom frequent paragraphs proclaim as "studying the cuneiform with a view to writing a romance of early Assyria" or "spending the winter in Barataria in order to investigate the reign of Sancho Panza in the state papers of the period with a view, etc., etc.," are like vintners who bring us their crude new wine, rough from the vat; it is but rarely that we taste the authentic juice, refined and purged by a long sojourn in forgotten darkness.

There can be no question as to the truth of all this; the propositions that the highest art is unconscious, that taking pains does not make for supreme excellence, that even the materials for imagination to work on should be gathered unawares, sublimely secretly, as it were, from the gross substance of life and the world—these are axioms that may be proved by the plainest and most illustrious examples. But the "reason why" might present more difficulty to the inquirer, who acknowledging the fact might very conceivably be puzzled as to the cause. To me it seems that these "irrational" phenomena are to be explained by the very nature and origin of literature, which, in common with all the arts, is so profoundly irrational. Of course, "science," with calm and dignified ineptitude, has "explained" the origin of literature as of everything else; men, it informs us, were tired after their day's work, and felt the need of play; and "plays" were accordingly invented. The explanation is "scientific" certainly, but on the principle of entia non sunt multiplicanda præter necessitatem, it seems a pity that our old friends the early dream and the indefatigable ancestral ghost were not made to account for art as for religion. The truth of the matter is, of course, far otherwise, and though we shall probably never clearly understand the origin of literature, it seems evident that it with all the arts arose from that primordial and universal sense of mystery, from the original ecstasy which separates the man from the brute. Mysterious in its origin it has remained a mystery all through the ages; we can only admire and adore its beauty, and wonder at its work, forced to believe in a miracle which we cannot understand, for which that all-pervading, all-pretending science can furnish no formula. Literature is the key to life, the reflection in a shining and glorious mirror of our imperfect and cloudy actions. And if Carlyle is fast gliding down into the vale of the forgotten it is because, with all his wisdom, he did not perceive the essential things of life, and he was ignorant of life because he was ignorant of literature. Literature is, indeed, a paradox, but it is a paradox that must be most steadfastly believed.

Walter Savage Landor

By E. D. MORSHEAD.

(September 3, 1881.)

NONE of Mr. Morley's excellent series of "English Men of Letters" has greater claim to be considered indispensable than this volume. It is, perhaps, not above several others in literary merit, though assuredly it is not far below any. But it is, in a special sense, called for. Landor, as Prof. Colvin says with truth and force, "has, of all celebrated authors, hitherto been one of the least popular." Those to whom it has not been given to wade through Mr. Forster's cumbrous work possess, for the most part, little idea of Landor except as a man of obscure learning, who wrote "Imaginary Conversations," quarrelled with his wife, wrote Ithyphallics which even Byron found too strong, and closed a long career by practical exile on account of a disreputable libel case at Bath. Recently, no doubt, the homage paid to Landor by Mr. Swinburne and other writers has revived a sense of curiosity as to its object. But even now Prof. Colvin has to allow that "true Landorians may be counted on the fingers," and to define how much has to be done "to extend to wider circles the knowledge of so illustrious a master."

It is this that makes Prof. Colvin's work so well-timed. In little over 200 pages he has told the story of a life which reached its eighty-ninth year, and a literary career which may be regarded as about the longest on record. Landor's first work was published in 1795, his last in 1863; he "was twenty-five when Cowper died, and . . . . he survived to receive the homage of Mr. Swinburne." Nor was this patriarchal life quiet and uneventful. He fought as a volunteer in Spain in 1808; he was in the heart of France during "the Hundred Days"; he claimed to have seen

Napoleon during his final flight from Paris to the West coast after Waterloo. He had relations, either of friendship or enmity, with almost all the great writers of his time. He had sat at the feet of that curious Gamaliel, Dr. Parr; he lived out his last years under the fostering care, if not in the actual presence, of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Of all their claims, many as they are, to the gratitude and admiration of posterity, none is more memorable than their kindly and watchful care for the old dying lion, of whom it may be said, with bitterly literal truth, that, in his eighty-fifth year, he came unto his own and his own received him not. Such a career Prof. Colvin has endeavoured to narrate within the limits indicated above—limits which have also to include a critical estimate of Landor's multifarious writings and obscure "bibliography."

It may be that the interest of the task, and a sense of its extreme difficulty, predispose to a favourable estimate; but the impression left upon the present writer's mind by Prof. Colvin's book is almost completely pleasurable. He uses throughout the language of discriminating praise. Of the permanent worth of Landor's works he entertains no doubt; yet he is not blind to the causes of their comparative unpopularity, any more than he is to the fatal flaws of character (or rather of temper—for of vices Landor seems to have had none) which make the biographical part of the book such melancholy reading. "He had a genius," says Prof. Colvin, with great felicity, "for the injudicious virtues, and those which recoil against their possessor." There is humour and sympathy, too, in the account of his Welsh troubles; it is hard not to smile at the man who avenged himself in Latin verses for the severity of a barrister's cross-examination. Quaintest and most laughable of all is the story illustrative of Landor's passionate dealings with his fellow-men, and his gentle sympathy with inanimate things. He is said to have thrown his cook out of the window into the garden, and a moment after to have looked out in agonised alarm, exclaiming, "Good God! I forgot the violets."

The whole history of his domestic life is full of sadness. Proud, hasty, irritable, yet full of generosity, courtesy, and affection, Landor was neither born to be alone nor incapable of yielding to judicious and loving guidance. Dis aliter visum. On all this part of his subject Prof. Colvin has dwelt briefly, tenderly, yet justly, "nothing extenuating, nor aught setting down in malice," to either party. In one thing, at least, Landor was happy beyond the common lot—in the devotion of his friends. From his lifelong friend Southey, who died murmuring, "Landor, ay, Landor," down to Mr. Browning and Mr. E. Twisleton, who comforted his forlorn old age, he seems never to have met a noble soul who did not love him and was not loved by him.

Speaking with deference, I should be inclined to say that, while full justice is done to Landor's critical power and the noble gravity and majesty of his prose style, something less than their full meed is given to his poetry and his humour. That the former is sometimes bald, and the latter stiff, may be true. But I should be curious to know if the select band of "Landorians who may be counted on the fingers" agree with Prof. Colvin in his disparagement of "The Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare." Lamb's estimate, that only Shakespeare himself and Landor could have written it, was very likely a genial exaggeration; but that it was uttered "with little meaning" seems improbable. The portrait of Shakespeare himself is no doubt slight, and not very effective, but the worthy Sir Thomas Lucy is beyond all praise. Nowhere outside Scott's best novels shall we find more admirable secondary characters than Sir Silas Gough, the rather carnal chaplain; Joseph Carnaby and Euseby Treen, the bumpkin informers against the youthful Willy; nowhere a more demure piece of audacity than Willy's reproduction of the university sermon. It seems as if the sketchiness of the most illustrious character in this dialogue had somewhat deterred Prof. Colvin from recognising the high merit of the others. Nor does he seem to dwell adequately on the admirable prose-poetry of such passages as the description of Acciaioli's retreat at Amalfi, and his death and funeral at the Certosa.

In dealing with a writer so little generally known as Landor, more extracts would have been gratefully welcomed; though no fault can be found with those actually selected. Few will read unmoved the exquisite analysis of the scene between Dante, Francesca, and Paolo—whom Prof. Colvin, for some reason, calls Piero. Nor, perhaps, will Mr. Freeman's most vigorous diatribe move any mind so strongly against the form of slaughter called sport as this touching extract:—

> Let men do these things if they will. Perhaps there is no harm in it; perhaps it makes them no crueller than they would be otherwise. But it is hard to take away what we cannot give, and life is a pleasant thing—at least to birds. No doubt the young ones say tender things to one another, and even the old ones do not dream of death.

As a specimen of the best classical poetry, "The Death of Artemidora" is selected, and who could wish it away? Yet one would fain see "Iphigeneia," saddest and sweetest page of English poetry, or part of "Pan and Pitys," set by its side. And of Landor's epigrammatic power we have hardly anything given us except the severe, but rather ponderous, verses on Melville. Some readers of THE ACADEMY may, perhaps, not resent being reminded of another epigram in quite another tone. It is No. 69 in the "Miscellaneous Poems," and may be fairly conjectured to have been addressed to that Ianthe of whom Prof. Colvin says that hers was the strongest influence of any during Landor's long life:—

> "Proud word you never spoke, but you will speak
> Four not exempt from pride some future day,
> Resting on one white hand a warm wet cheek
> Over my open volume, you will say
> 'This man loved me'—then rise and trip away."

It is little less than a calamity that neither a careful anthology nor an easily accessible and portable edition of Landor's works is obtainable. There is no better corrective of the "snip-snap style" of Macaulay, nor of more tawdry or more fanciful modern literature, than Landor, one of the very few writers who can be grave without being dull, eloquent without being flashy, pathetic without being lachrymose, and poetical without being effusive.

Morality in Book Collecting

By W. ROBERTS.

(LITERATURE, October 8, 1898.)

THE average bookseller will tell you that he has met with an honest book collector or two, but not many; whilst the collector is quite as likely to retort that the only upright bibliopoles of his acquaintance are those ignorant of their trade.

I do not say that morality is a positive hindrance in successful book collecting, but I fear that "trimming" is a quality much more likely to prove satisfactory. Here is an illustration: A few years ago a certain little booklet of Charles Dickens was considered to have survived in only three or four copies. It realised about £20 when it occurred in the sale room, and the whereabouts of all were known. An unrecorded example occurred in the catalogue of a second-hand bookseller at a very moderate price; it was purchased by a collector who had a copy already. The next catalogue included another copy, and the collector began to think. He bearded the bookseller in his den, and then discovered to his dismay that a whole batch of nearly fifty copies had been unearthed at an old warehouse of the printer and that they had been secured by the bookseller. Here was a dilemma. The collector asked himself: Shall I allow every one of my book-hunting rivals to possess a copy at a fifth of the price I originally paid, or shall I purchase the entire remainder? It is almost needless to say that he not only bought the whole, but that, with three or four exceptions, he consigned his purchase to the flames!

It may be urged that a book collector is not obliged to teach a bookseller his business, and certainly the knowledge of rare books is only acquired after long and often costly experience. A certain Holborn bookseller once gained some valuable information in a curious manner. In one of his catalogues he entered a quite unpretentious little booklet as follows, or to this effect:

Hornem (Horace), The Waltz, 5s.

When folding the catalogues for the post one afternoon, a customer happened to come in and take up one of the new lists; in going through he paused at the Hornem entry, and blandly asked to see the book; after a momentary glance he planked down the full catalogue price and carried it home. The catalogues for the London district reached their destinations by the last post the same evening, and, curiously enough, this Hornem article attracted the attention of more than one bookman. As the bookseller lived off the premises, nothing could be done until the morrow. At six o'clock the next morning an enthusiast from the northern heights of London started for town in the full confidence of bringing home the rarity. He arrived at the bookshop at seven o'clock, and, consoling himself with a pipe, took his seat confidently on the doorstep. By eight o'clock two other bookmen had arrived. When the bookseller came to open his shop he was rather astounded at the eagerness of the small crowd. These worthy hunters all wanted the same book, which had, however, gone beyond recall, so to speak, several hours previously! I will not dwell on a description of what their feelings might have been, or what their language certainly was, when they discovered that the book was gone. The bookseller, however, learnt that the little quarto which he sold for 5s. was one of Byron's rarest pieces and worth quite £80.

The legal mind is curiously complex. A distinguished Q.C. had the good luck to purchase a bundle of pamphlets at Hodgson's in Chancery Lane for three shillings and sixpence against a whole room-full of booksellers. Now that little parcel included a first edition of Gray's "Elegy in a Churchyard," worth perhaps £70 or £80. Ever since then the Q.C. has been more or less unhappy—find the rightful owner he cannot; pay the auctioneer commission on the higher amount he will not. To me this unrest is altogether inexplicable, and, to ease the Q.C.'s conscience, I suggested that he should hand the little rarity over to me. I could live quite comfortably with it; but this suggestion he firmly declines. This half-repentant sinner still goes on his way. I mention this little anecdote partly because it is the only recorded instance in which a book collector has half-repented a good bargain, and partly in the hope that so eminent a jurist will one day come to the conclusion that repentance is only good for the soul when it is full and unequivocal.

Book collectors are all pretty much of the same type. For many years Macaulay hunted high and low for a little volume which was known to contain information on a minor problem of historic interest. He had all but given up the quest as a very bad job, but one day he happened to mention the name of the book to a then well-known old bookseller who shook his head and said that he had never heard of the book, and, should it occur, the inquirer would certainly have to pay a stiff price. Now, outside this old man's shop there was a box of what may be described as "malcontents"—odd volumes and despised books generally, offered at a uniform price of about sixpence each. Macaulay turned over a few volumes, and, to his unspeakable joy, discovered the very book which he had so long sought in vain. He rescued it, and, after paying for it, allowed the old bibliopole to see it. What the vendor's thoughts were, there is, as the coroner's jury would say, "nothing to show." Neither is there anything to prove that Macaulay paid more than the stipulated price. Indeed, the art of book collecting may be said to resolve itself into a matter of knowing what you want and buying it "on the nail" when the opportunity occurs. A book collector once saw on a miscellaneous stall in Leather Lane a volume of seventeenth-century plays priced at sixpence. Being uncertain in his dates, and not wishing to risk so large a sum on an uncertainty, he rushed off to the British Museum and discovered that the plays were of the right edition and very rare. Returning to purchase he discovered that in the short interval another man had come along and carried the volume off!

Whatever the morality of book collecting, he who undertakes it should remember the answer of an old bookseller to the man who had purchased his business as a going concern, and who complained, after he had been in it a few months, that the takings had greatly fallen off: "Sir, I sold you my business—not my brains."

Marius the Epicurean

BY J. M. GRAY.

ONE is strongly reminded in this book of Mr. Pater's—the most important and sustained work that he has yet offered to the public—of an earlier fragment, of "The Child in the House," which he contributed some six years ago to Macmillan's Magazine, and which has not yet been republished. In "The Child in the House," in the young "Florian Deleal," we find the initial sketch—truly a "finished" one—for this portrait of "Marius the Epicurean." The sketch, as is the way with artists, is altered, expanded, traced in fuller detail in the picture; yet, substantially, the personality portrayed is the same, though changed in aspect, by this or that new disposition of light or shadow, by this or the other new environment of time and circumstance, which, in our "each and all" of things, modifies and alters the subject. Florian was an English child. The career of his soul was followed no further than the period of early youth. The things that moulded him were, of course, no formal philosophies—nothing in the remotest degree doctrinal—but only the unconsciously-received impressions of external things, impinging, moment by moment, upon his original and sensitive nature—these and the instructions of his elders, which also were received in a childlike and so unconscious way. The career of Marius, on the other hand, is detailed in fullest circumstance from childhood to death in early manhood, and the record deals not only with the influences received passively by the open mind of childhood, and their effects, but also with the conscious acceptance and consequent operation of various systems of belief—of one and the other accepted form of philosophy. . . .

With comparatively little action, with hardly any display of the more ordinary human emotions—with, for instance, scarcely a reference in it to sexual love—the book never fails of interest. It is attractive through the author's vivid sense of beauty, through his constant mode of throwing even the processes of thought into a concrete and pictured form. Its personalities seem not quite the historical Stoic Aurelius, hardly the possibly historical Epicurean Marius: they are raised a little, refined on a little, set on a somewhat higher plane than that of mere actuality. They come to us with a certain sense of strangeness: homely touches, here or there, make us recognise their human nearness; yet their treatment is as far removed as it could well be from the crude realism that is so commonly substituted for delicate artistry, and the cry for which is one of the most unreasoning of the cants of our time.

The exposition of Epicureanism which these "sensations and ideas" of Marius present is more complete than any the author has hitherto given; fuller, also, of "gentleness and sweet reasonableness," more fairly perceptive of the difficulties and weaknesses of a philosophy which manifestly is a scheme of things that possesses the strongest personal attractions for the writer, and the most serious claims, in his view, to be considered as a guide towards a right practice of life. He admits that a career ordered with the aim of making each moment rich, many-coloured and full of exquisite experiences, is open to the constant dread, to the final certainty, that the last of all these moments may come, must come; and surely it can be no perfect philosophy which leaves its followers liable to be startled by each possible chance of every day, by every falling stone that grazes their heel, and which permits their whole life to be shadowed with the terror of its certain end. We have no due prominence given to the fact that this delicate Epicureanism is possible only to the few, and that even they at any moment may be prevented by disease or mischance from participation in it; nor does the author lay sufficient stress upon the dangers that beset such a life: the temptation to seclude one's self in some lovely "palace of art," regardless of surrounding misery—a danger from which Marius was saved mainly by the exceptionally sweet admixture in him of the original constituents of his nature. Again, the favourite doctrines of the book—that the means, not the end, is the main thing, that life should be a jealous calculation of loss and gain, so that each moment may yield its utmost, its most refined, product—do these not smite on the very face the highest life of man? Can all this preoccupation with self have any absorbing place in a right human life? Is it not in quite another fashion that the chosen spirits of the race have lived, with a fine unconsciousness which hungered and thirsted after righteousness itself, and not after any exquisite moments that righteousness might bring either now or in the future? And surely an absorption in some high and impersonal aim, the kindling of a man's whole soul and effort towards it, delivers him, as nothing else in the world can, from the fear of death, so that, as Lord Bacon says, when his end comes, he is like one smitten down "in hot blood," in the fervour of battle; he falls, yet feels no wound.

No, the Epicureanism which finds such calm and delicate exposition in the book can be no permanent dwelling-place of the human spirit. It may, indeed, afford a healthful corrective to many crude and unlovely tendencies of modern thought. In a mood of wise eclecticism we may receive much from it, may linger for a while in its charmed and golden, though enervating air; but if we would preserve our spiritual health we must press onwards, and breathe the more bracing atmosphere of sterner upland places.

As we should expect from the philosophy of the book, which is so constantly occupied with the concrete, the visible, the tangible, its descriptions of men, of landscape, are especially varied and beautiful. For instance of this we may turn to the chapter which describes the feast given in honour of Apuleius: a very Tadema in its perfection of finish, in its legitimate and artist-like use of archæological knowledge for the purposes of mere present beauty; a Tadema, too, in its delighted preoccupation with the lovely details of precious objects of still-life, with the "togas of altogether lost hue and texture," the "crystal cups darkened with old wine," and the "dusky fires of the rare twelve-petalled roses."

As an example of the pregnant brevity with which Mr. Pater can reproduce a landscape, we may take the following—a view from the house of Cecilia, the Christian widow of Rome:—

> "The orchard or meadow through which their path lay, was already grey in the dewy twilight, though the western sky, in which the greater stars were visible, was still afloat with ruddy splendour, seeming to repress by contrast the colouring of all earthly things, yet with the sense of a great richness lingering in their shadows."

And the landscape is always linked—as nature, to be intimate and touching, must ever be—with humanity. The passage continues:—

> "Just then the voices of the singers, a 'voice of joy and health,' concentrated themselves, with a solemn antistrophic movement, into an evening, or 'candle' hymn—the hymn of the kindling lamp. It was like the evening itself, its hopes and fears, and the stars shining in the midst of it, made audible."

Before closing a word should be said as to the style of the book—a style of perfectly-finished beauty, full of an exquisite restraint, and, after all, only the fitting and adequate expression of the exactest thinking. The author's style is like that of his own Fronto, in whose lectures, he says, "subtle unexpected meanings were brought out by familiar words." It is so easy and apparently unlaboured in its flow that it seems like mere spontaneous talk—only become strangely select as though ordered by some happy chance with uncommon sweetness. The wise labour that has been spent upon the book has effaced all marks of labour; but, undoubtedly, each sentence has been often touched by the file which, to use an expression that the author is fond of repeating, adds more than value for each particle of gold which it removes. As we read the pages characterised by such unfailing fitness of phrase, finished from their first to their final line with a flawless perfection which one demands in the brief lyric of a master, but hardly looks for in a prose work of extended length, we find far more than the justification of the author's long cessation from slighter literary efforts—a continued silence which has been felt, at least by some lovers of sweet and sifted English, as nothing less than a real personal loss.

I.

IN dreams great Kupris to my side did bring
The baby Love, who earthward bowed his head;
Her fair hand held the boy; the while she said:
"Dear shepherd, take and teach Love how to sing!"
She spoke, then vanished. Each poor pastoral thing,
Fond wretch, as though Love fain would learn, I taught;
How Pan the pipe, the flute Athena brought,
Hermes the harp, the lyre Apollo King.
These lessons I taught well. No heed he paid,
But sang me love-songs with his voice so fine,
Teaching the passions both of gods and men,
And all his mother's arts and deeds divine;
Till I forgot what I taught Love, but made
My own love-songs that Love taught me then.

II.

Though Love be wild, deem not the Muses fear him!
Nay, from their hearts they dote upon the boy,
Following after his winged feet with joy!
If one loves not, yet sings, they will not hear him,
Nor teach him any songs, nor venture near him:
But should a man, soul-tossed by love, employ
His hours with singing, they're no longer coy;
Nay, all the sisters run in haste to cheer him.
Take me as witness to the truth thereof!
Whene'er I sang of any other man,
Or of some other mid the gods above,
Stammered my tongue, I spake not as I can;
But when I sang of Lycidas and Love,
Then through my lips the song with rapture ran.

JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

Sonnet: Light and Love

(January 26, 1884.)

If light should strike through every darkened place,
How many a deed of darkness and of shame
Would cease, arrested by its gentle grace,
And striving virtue rise, unscathed by blame!
The prisoner in his cell new hopes would frame,
The miner catch the metal's lurking trace,
The sage would grasp the ills that harm our race,
And unknown heroes leap to sudden fame.
If love but one short hour had perfect sway,
How many a rankling sore its touch would heal,
How many a misconception pass away,
And hearts long hardened learn at last to feel;
What sympathies would wake, what feuds decay,
If perfect love might reign but one short day!

George Eliot's Poetry

By J. A. NOBLE.

(September 5, 1885.)

George Eliot's Poetry, and Other Studies. By ROSE CLEVELAND.

A VOLUME coming from the White House is, in the United States, sure to have the same kind of success which has been achieved in England by certain volumes issued from royal palaces. It is, of course, a factitious success, but it owes its existence to natural and universal human impulses, and only those people who are troubled with the superficial cynicism of youth will think it worth while to indulge in the cheap sneer which is too easy to be tempting. True criticism seldom indulges in sneers, cheap or otherwise; but then, on the other hand, it takes no heed of either White Houses or palaces, and judges work according to its quality, not according to its origin. An estimate of these essays, formed in this disinterested fashion, is hardly likely to be a very high one. Every page in this volume bears witness to the fact that the sister of President Cleveland is an intelligent, cultivated, and well-informed woman; but no page bears witness to anything more, and the book accordingly fails in the impressiveness which belongs either to striking thought or memorable expression. This failure, like most failures of the same kind, is owing to defects partly of matter, partly of manner. A critic who has not space for illustrative quotations shrinks from hard sayings which he cannot justify by evidence; but, in spite of his shrinking, he feels bound to tell what seems to him the truth, and what seems to me the truth concerning Miss Cleveland's matter is this—that it is, for the most part, either obvious or extravagant.

Take the first essay which gives a title to the book, and to which, therefore, one may fairly suppose the writer attaches special importance. It is devoted to a proof of the utterly sterile proposition that George Eliot as a poet ranks below Mrs. Browning—a proposition which it may safely be affirmed is doubted by no sane reader. It is, unfortunately, difficult to discover whether Miss Cleveland absolutely denies that George Eliot is a poet at all. Such a denial would reopen an interesting controversy concerning the differentia of poetry, in which I, for one, should join issue with the critic; but, as her depreciation is not positive, but comparative, there is really nothing to discuss. Nothing, that is, in her conclusions; the grounds on which those conclusions are arrived at are debateable enough, or rather they would be debateable did they not consist of unproved and really unproveable assertions. Poetry of the highest kind is produced without effort; George Eliot's poetry is characterised by continuous effort: therefore George Eliot's poetry is not of the highest kind. Such is the syllogism to the expansion of which the first part of Miss Cleveland's essay is devoted. Here we have a major and a minor premiss, both of which are in the highest degree disputable; and, as Miss Cleveland makes no real attempt to establish either of them, what becomes of her conclusion? I do not say that within certain limitations it may not be sound. Miss Cleveland is, as I have said, undoubtedly right in awarding supremacy to Mrs. Browning; but the question she raises has nothing to do with mere degrees of rank, but with the essential nature of poetry; and that the best poetry is effortless would be denied by every great poet who ever lived. It may seem effortless, but that is a very different thing, and Miss Cleveland constantly vitiates her argument by confounding seeming with being.

But the critic has more to say than this. Passing from form to substance, she goes on to declare that George Eliot could not be a great poet because she was an Agnostic thinker; for the essence of true poetry is what the writer chooses to call the "antipode of Agnosticism." Miss Cleveland writes very rhetorically, and I cannot always be quite certain that I catch her exact meaning; but what I understand her to say is this—that poetry may be the expression either of firm belief or unhesitating denial, but cannot be the expression of oscillation, dubiety, or suspense. If this were true, it could only affect the subjective poetry, which gives scope to affirmation or denial, and of such poetry George Eliot gives us comparatively little, so it is difficult to see the application of the proposition to the main body of her work. But is it true? That is the "previous question," which must be answered, and, if it be answered in the affirmative, the result will be the setting aside of some of the most widely accepted verdicts of the world. Competent judges, for example, have long ago decided that Arthur Clough is a true poet, that Mr. Matthew Arnold is a great poet, that Shakespeare is a supreme poet; but Clough is always a questioning spirit, many of Mr. Arnold's most characteristic poems are poems of doubt, and what is probably the most popular passage in Shakespeare, the "to be or not to be" soliloquy, is, like the character in whose mouth it is put, an embodiment of the most absolute scepticism. It will not do. I write without the smallest leaning towards the Agnostic position; but it is clear to me, as it is to most other people, that poetry is not conditioned by belief or disbelief or doubt, but by the possession of something which is independent of all three—imaginative vision and the power of rendering it.

(LITERATURE, September 3, 1898.)

HE began his career as a reporter—by the merest chance. On the train that carried him from the country to New York he met the editor of a New York paper, who good-naturedly offered him a place on the city staff. He was quick-witted and intelligent, and, after he learned to punctuate, he began to show ability.

One day he surprised the city editor by writing up a commonplace assignment in the form of a drama in three acts in which he burlesqued the foibles of several public men whom the paper habitually abused. The city editor happened to be one of those rare task-masters who believe that a man with originality is better than a machine; so he encouraged the youngster to do other articles in a similar vein. After a few months readers asked who did those very clever things, and the fame of the writer spread through "Newspaper Row." He began to think that newspapers weren't good enough for him and to long for the fame and the wealth won by successful writers of books. For years, however, he remained in newspaper work. Meanwhile, he married.

But marriage proved to be far more expensive than he had supposed. Several children came, his wife was sick half the time, and the horribly high rate of rent in New York and the cost of servants helped further to eat up his salary. He wished he had never married, and he looked back miserably to the days when he expected to have a literary carreer. Then the newspaper which had employed him for fifteen years changed ownership and the whole staff was discharged. He asked for a position on two other papers, and though his work was well known, he found that editors did not want it. Then he realised that his vein had been worked out. He went home, sick at the thought that he must tell his wife. When he did tell her, the sight of her eyes filling with tears and the consciousness of the resentment against him in her manner drove him out of the room. He locked himself in his study, and thought of shooting himself; but he quickly felt ashamed of this cowardice. After walking up and down the room for an hour, he decided that he would take three months to write a book and see whether he could do anything in literature. If he failed, he'd go back to hack work; he could sell enough stuff to the newspapers and periodicals to keep the family going.

When he told his wife of this scheme her face hardened and she put a few terribly practical questions to him. He replied that he was determined to carry the thing through, even if they did get deeper into debt. The next day he began work on the novel that he had had in mind for years; it made him feel as if he were trying to dig up his youth. For several days he wrote steadily; then his inspiration seemed to give out, and, though he sat at his desk for hours each day, he could not go on. His wife used to question him, and her manner was so hostile that he was driven to lying, to saying that the book was coming on finely. She had no respect for his work, and she would interrupt him and allow the children to interrupt him, so that at times he became almost frenzied. At last, when in a whole week he had written only a half-dozen pages, he decided to give up the task and to try shorter things. During the rest of the day he finished three sketches. They seemed so good that he had an impulse to read them to his wife; then he realised that this would betray to her that he had abandoned the novel. As the sketches were too good for a newspaper he sent them to the periodicals, and the next day he wrote others. They were easy work after that depressing and endless novel. When his wife referred to the book he had not courage enough to acknowledge his failure. After a time, however, he suspected that she knew he had given it up, just as she always knew when he had accomplished nothing at his desk. There was something about her intuition that terrified him; it seemed to accuse him of being a fraud. He saw that she was pleased at the abandonment of the novel, and this gave him a bitter feeling, as if she had been the cause of his failure, and, indeed, of all his troubles. It also made him resolve to finish the book if it killed him, but secretly, so that, in case it should prove hopeless, she should not know that he had been beaten again. In a short time several of his articles came back, but many were accepted. Those that were returned he succeeded in selling elsewhere, sometimes in better periodicals. After two months he had earned considerably more than he had received on the newspaper, and he said to himself that, though he'd probably be a hack all his life, he'd keep his neck out of the halter of desk work. Editors gave him commissions, and he frequently sold his articles before they were written.

He began to make the acquaintance of men who were doing work somewhat similar to his own, and he was amused by the seriousness with which they took themselves as "literary" men. So he was a literary man, too, but he felt too old and too tired to be puffed up by the discovery; such pleasure as it gave him was wholly cynical. Then he envied the others their self-esteem. If he had it he'd probably be able to go on with that novel of his. But he would go on if only to prove to his wife that she had underrated him, so, in the intervals of his hack work, he toiled at the novel, taking pains to keep the sheets locked in his desk. More than two years passed before he finished it. Then he had it typewritten, and he sent it to the editor of a weekly paper that often published his articles. It came back with a polite note of regret. As he read the letter, hardened and experienced though he was, tears came to his eyes. That very day he resolutely sent it to another publishing house, the first of seven publishing houses that refused it. By this time, of course, his wife, who received the mail and was an expert in postmarks and handwriting, knew all about it, and discussed the rejections in a loud voice before the children. When it was published, the few newspapers whose opinions were of value criticised it severely; the others gave it perfunctory praise. At the end of the year the author received twenty-seven dollars in royalties, his first and last payment.

He never inquired why he did not receive more, and he now devotes himself wholly to hack work, much to the satisfaction of his wife, who has frequently explained to him that she always knew he couldn't write a book.

"The Winter's Tale" at the Savoy Theatre

MR. GRANVILLE BARKER'S production, or, as one would say, reproduction, of "The Winter's Tale" is a perplexing matter to speak upon. There is so much in it that some of us have been working toward, and hoping for; and yet so much that cannot do other than crush out the very being of drama. It is not easy always to distinguish them. Certainly it would be fatally easy to lose sight of what was good in what seemed bad.

Let us put it in this way. Without hesitation we say that one of the most considerable evils that the dramatist has now to face is the intrusion of the artist in the theatre. A dramatist, in so far as he is a dramatist, does not write to make pictures: he writes to create beings whose opposition shall awake emotions of terror, of joy, of laughter, that the brain shall scarcely bear. And when the artist comes in and uses such great material as the basis for his pictures, the situation is scarcely tolerable. When, in addition to this, the artist has fallen on a day when he has forsworn creation from the central stuff of beauty for barbaric and fantastic decoration, as the case is now in pictorial art, the evil of the intrusion is aggravated. Is it conceivable, for example, that the great-souled Lear, or sensitive Hamlet, or tempestuous Othello, would be able to ring conviction from the supreme words that build them into being, in silver boots on a white floor? The eye all the while would be catching the decorative effect and the ear would be missing the splendid emotion. And indeed, to make his intrusion even less conceivable, the artist himself recognises the position: for, in the person of Mr. Gordon Craig, he has declared that in the end he will turn out the dramatist and reign supreme with his moving pictures.

If Lear would not abide the decorative treatment, why, then, should Leontes be asked to? Shakespeare did not mean him, or Hermione, or Camillo, or Florizel, or Perdita, or the Shepherd, or the Clown, as lay figures for decorative purposes. He meant them to be tremendous with Life. "The poet-dramatist," says Mr. Barker, "has the advantage of being able to clothe his characters in great verbal beauty." Is it not, then, somewhat of an impertinence to that great verbal beauty to encrust it so with decorative prettiness, or daintiness, that it shall be hidden away and lost?

On Saturday this was what happened. A beautiful play by our greatest of dramatists was given; and Mr. Granville Barker, as producer, undertook the simple courage of presenting it under conditions as approximate to those for which it was written as the Savoy Theatre would allow. We have contended more than once that for a certain type of play—and that by no manner of means the worst type of play—the proscenium should be carried out into the auditorium in the form of a fore-stage, and that scenic conditions should be abolished. And by scenic conditions we mean not only the vain attempt to give realistic scenery, but the whole question of cutting up the numerous movements of such a play into a number of separate scenes with long waits between them while the scenery was being shifted. Both these things were given us on Saturday, and given admirably. The fore-stage had entrances each side, and across the proscenium hung a heavy curtain dividing it from the inner stage. On the fore-stage Camillo and Archidamus came and spoke. No one bothered to ask the stupid question where they were supposed to be: there they were on the fore-stage. Then, when they had concluded, the curtain swung up, and Leontes, Hermione, and Polixenes entered to the inner stage. It was perfectly simple; it was perfectly natural—far more natural than the painted reproduction of a palace, or sunset, or what not—and proved that the Elizabethans knew their stage business exceeding well.

Naturally the fore-stage needed no background: the curtain across the proscenium was its background. Yet the inner stage needed some setting; and this was achieved by running a passage along the back of it, to which a tier of steps mounted, and surrounding it by a number of simple pillars that rose from stage to roof. A couple of couches or so, and a central ornament, completed the necessities. It was simple and effective; and with such conditions it would practically be possible to play the whole of the "Tale," cottage scene and all.

But then one comes to the artist, and everything is at once marred. For example, why should not the stage, out and inner, pillars and all, be coloured some neutral tint, or a combination of neutral tints? Would not that be a simpler and more sympathetic background for the characters to strike life against than a glaring white? It would indeed: but then Mr. Albert Rothenstein's fantastic costumes have to be thought of, and these clearly demand a white background. So the dramatist has to stand aside for the artist-decorator. It is another case of the auxiliary, and not the most necessary of auxiliaries, usurping the centre of the picture by reason of the invention of the new thing called the producer. The dramatist has to be the corpus vile for the artist to work his experiments upon, because the artist has lost the ability to work conviction on canvas.

In fact, Mr. Rothenstein condemned himself as an auxiliary by one fatal admission. There was one supremely effective costume in the play, and that was worn by Hermione during her mock trial. Unlike all the others, which were fantastic and baroque, it was perfectly simple and dignified. Obviously: because fantastic inventions on that figure of simple dignity standing forth in matronly appeal would have been too ridiculous for words. The dramatist for once claimed his own in the spite of the artist; which really is a kind of parable. The other characters, too, would have been more convincing and more dignified if they had been able to throw away the fantasticalities with which they were decked, and live out their urgent lives in simple earnestness. Leontes' jealousy, difficult at the best to understand, was bizarre and remote in his strange attire; the more so inasmuch as he was, in the person of Mr. Henry Ainley, forgivably conscious of it. We always thought we liked Antigonus until we saw him walking about with four huge hearse-plumes nodding disastrously on his head—although Mr. Guy Rathbone did his best to give the forthright and moving simplicity of the man. Mr. Stanley Drewitt as Camillo had a better opportunity, inasmuch as his attire was simpler, and he made the most of it.

Apart from the decoration, it might be possible to say the production was admirable, except that the decoration, with its self-conscious fantasticality, stultified the rest. No doubt, however, the average theatre-goer will be a great deal keener on the decoration than on the play; and so good audiences will be drawn. That is the irony the dramatist has to face.

One cannot say much upon the Morris and Country dances. Probably they will be better as time goes on; but on Saturday they were very bad. The tune went one way, and the dance went another, and to cover the misfit everybody made a great deal of noise. One would not think that a rough-and-tumble of that kind needed a great deal of teaching. Moreover, on its own merits, even supposing they were justly rendered, we do not think the best dances were chosen; and we are very sure that the Satyrs' dance was quite wrongly done. The Satyrs' masks should be fastened on to their faces, not held in their hands—it is impossible to render the rhythm of a dance with a hand held to the face—and they should not so much intersperse among the villagers as pass through them—which is quite a different thing, and one that accords with the origin of the dance.

Among the actors, Miss Esmé Beringer as Pauline seemed to us to be most in the spirit of Shakespearean characterisation, which should be the chief thing in a Shakespearean production. Lillah McCarthy as Hermione was a grave and dignified figure, and, although she did not quite get the rich music of them, spoke the lines in the trial scene with a sense of their simple majesty. Mr. Arthur Whitby was scarcely irresponsible enough for Autolycus; nevertheless, he filled him with humour. As Perdita, Miss Cathleen Nesbitt was not gracious and dignified enough: she was less the memory of a princess than a happy village girl. And Mr. Dennis Neilson-Terry was altogether too dandyish as Florizel, who is a brave and good fellow. Nevertheless, despite the fact that the hand of the artist made impertinent intrusions on the proper business of the dramatist, the production was an excellent one, and, in the courage of some of its departures, we venture to say that it will be a memorable one. DARRELL FIGGIS.

The Coliseum

THE principal attraction at the Coliseum this week, as well as that for last week and the next four weeks, is deservedly the appearance of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt in the various rôles in which she has made so great a name for herself. In the famous Borgia Poison Scene she shows that she still possesses those great powers of persuasion and cajolery that brought her fame in the past and retain for her the admiration of both English and French audiences. On this occasion she was well aided by M. Lou Tellegen, whose calm yet severe attitude as the Duke of Ferrara was all the more intensified by the slight lapses he allowed himself when Lucrèce Borgia appealed so beautifully and pathetically for the life of her son in the language whose variant tones no one knows better how to use than Mme. Sarah. The great enthusiasm of the audience and the eager crowd at the stage door as they wait to catch a glimpse of the favourite speak well for the continued success of the "turn" and of the good feeling between the two nations. In connection with this year's visit to the Coliseum, Mr. Oswald Stoll is producing a souvenir volume entitled "The Bernhardt Birthday Book," at the price of 2s. 6d. net. This volume contains a copy of the address which it is proposed to present to Mme. Bernhardt on the occasion of her birthday on October 23, together with a quotation for each day in the year taken from the chief plays of this actress's repertoire and other works. The proceeds of the sale are to be given to the French Hospital in Shaftesbury Avenue.

It is typical now of these large places of amusement that they do not rely solely upon one attraction, however great, for their evening's entertainment, and at the Coliseum on Monday evening there were many excellent items on the programme. The condensed version of Signor Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci" alone was worth hearing from its restful and satisfying music. Mention must also be made of an excellent little sketch entitled "The Broken Mirror," which is one of the best short plays we have seen for some time. There is also a comic little duologue between a suffragette and her long-suffering husband. This was received with enthusiastic good humour by everyone except one young man in the stalls, who looked very angry indeed, and was unkind—if not rude—enough to shout "Rot!"

British Government in East Africa

By MAJOR PIERS W. NORTH.

THE latest white man's country opened up by Great Britain, if white man's country it is to be, is an interesting study at the present time.

The protest of the white settlers against the appointment of Mr. Belfield as Governor of the British East Africa Protectorate, has received less attention at home than might have been expected; it points, however, to one of the problems that must be dealt with in the future, that problem being the almost universal feeling among the white settlers against Indian government methods, Indian emigrants, the Indian code of law, and anything and everything Indian. The protest was a protest against the appointment of what was considered to be an Indian official—although the distinguished Civil Servant in question came really from the Malay States—and not against Mr. Belfield personally.

The writer, who has only recently returned from a trip in British East Africa, where he mixed with all sorts and conditions of men, from the highest officials to the wildest savage hunters in the great forest, hopes that his impressions may be of interest to the wide circle of readers of THE ACADEMY.

Among the white settlers the criticism of the Government is exceptionally severe, even for white inhabitants of a Crown Colony; or, rather, their criticism of governmental methods prior to the appointment of Sir Percy Girouard, the retiring Governor, the praise of whom is as high as the abuse of all that preceded him is unqualified. The settlers usually added that they did not suppose that even his Excellency could do the good to the country he might otherwise, as he would be overruled by the home authorities.

The white settlers are mainly of British and Boer descent. The latter, of whom more presently, always have had a dislike to Colonial Office methods, especially with regard to protecting the natives. Although they are at present numerically less than the British settlers, it is to be remembered that their natural rate of increase is far more rapid. The average Briton is by nature rather a grumbler, but it seems strange that he does not in East Africa realise the great skill and success with which the native problem has been handled in the country. This is the more strange as amongst the settlers of British descent is a large proportion who have come from South Africa, and these should remember the long series of costly and unsatisfactory native wars of the last century in the various States of what is now the Union. Even across the border to the south the native difficulties of their German neighbours are an indirect testimony to the skilful native administration of the British Colony.

Why, then, is there such feeling amongst white settlers against the Government? Discontent undoubtedly does exist; for examples in the past one has only to remember the Nairobi flogging case, the incidents connected with the trial and deportation of Mr. Cole, and, further back still, the demonstration outside Government House under Colonel Hayes-Saddler's administration, when the leading white settlers, including a peer of the realm and member of the Council of Colony, assembled in front of the Governor's residence, with rifles in their hands, and shouted out "Resign, resign!"

It seems to the writer that the great British Empire requires administrators of two different kinds—those to govern black men and those to govern white ones; the very qualities which make a man successful in dealing with a black-man country may make him unsuccessful in dealing with a white-man country, and of all black men administrators the worst kind for dealing with a young white community is perhaps the Indian Civil Servant. An apt example comes to mind in the case of Sir Owen Lanyon's disastrous administration of the Transvaal prior to the first Boer War.

Comparing our East African Colonies with the German possessions in that part of Africa, one finds that the progress and development of the highlands compare as favourably with the corresponding district in our neighbour's country as our coast province compares unfavourably with theirs. Our policy in the past has clearly been to make a success of white-man's East Africa, by which term may be described the districts where European women and children can live and thrive, whilst rather neglecting the tropical districts, or at any rate those near the coast. A wise policy, too; but still, if the same method were followed in dealing with the coast province as was recently applied to Uganda—e.g., separating it from the rest of the Protectorate, and placing it under some expert ruler of tropical districts, with a free hand and some money to spend on it—the result, judging from the German plantations to the south, would be astonishing. There is no doubt that there are great possibilities in the coast province, and that it has been long neglected for the important up-country districts. The fact that so able a man as Mr. C. W. Hobley, C.M.G., the senior Provincial Commissioner of the whole Protectorate, has recently been moved from the headquarters at Nairobi to the coast province is perhaps a sign that some such change is contemplated.

To turn to the white population. A very considerable proportion of them come from South Africa. Whether of British or Boer origin, they have ingrained in them the idea of treating natives with severity, to say the least of it, and there is this to be said for their view, that the East African native's idea of the proper punishment for a fault is a beating. The flogging of a native by his employer is against the law. None the less it is a fact, though a sad one, that the white man who was thought by his native employees to be afraid to flog, if need be, would lose their respect.

The British South Africans usually say that they had to leave their former country when the Home Government "gave it to the Boers"; none the less, they remain British at heart. As to the Boers—the writer is an interpreter in their language, and was for several years the only one in the British Army—they are largely irreconcilables, who, after the war, trekked north into German East Africa rather than be under the British flag. There they wished to found an independent Republic of their own. The consequent trouble with the German authorities led to their making a further move to the north into British East Africa. Their experiences in the late South African War have given them a high opinion of their own military value, and there is no need to add what are their political views. Everything depends on the officials who have to deal with them; and they are easily dealt with, given the right man. These people have brought their women with them; the men marry young, and large families are the rule among them.

Last, but certainly not least, come the settlers from the Mother Country. Many of them are young men of good family, but, unfortunately for the country, not young married men with large families. Let us hope, however, that the future may see there, in the heart of Africa, on the healthy uplands opened up by British enterprise and British gold, another young nation of British race to be a further glory to the British Empire.

By W. H. KOEBEL.

THE caravan is now an accepted institution. You may meet with it—at fairly long intervals, it is true—pacing sedately along the high road, or brought to rest in some leafy land-harbour, its attendant steed champing at the grass of a field or at the turf of the roadside. It is a sedate progress, this of caravanning, placid, restful, and amazingly instructive in the ways of nature and of mankind in the less trodden haunts of the British Isles. It constitutes an inland voyage, as it were, and serves admirably in the breeding of an independence which bans such prosaic traders as butchers, bakers, and shoeblacks. Yet it seems to be that caravanning has not gone with the times. Perhaps, from the mere nature of the occupation, it was never meant to. Judged by the true ethics of the pastime, a motor caravan would partake of the nature of a horse-marine or of boiling ice. One could, in fact, as soon imagine Homer dodging a London General omnibus. But all this affords no reason why the motor-car should not be slept in. The vehicle certainly affords greater facilities for this purpose than the sheeted Thames punt, or the few cubic feet of shelter with which the owner of the smaller type of half-decked boat has to content himself.

Yet I know of no type of car in ordinary use which is designed for any such purposes. This may be due to ignorance alone; but if cars of this nature exist, I have never had the opportunity of setting eyes on one. Of course, men have slept in their automobiles many a time. But such occasions have, I think, always been special, notably in the case of lengthy pioneer journeys in comparatively strange lands. Certainly in the history of road vehicles none has ever before offered such opportunities in the way of a home on wheels. A moderate degree of ingenuity and a rather larger amount of imagination could easily bring into being something as terrestrially comprehensive and magnificent as is the houseboat on the waters—a creation before which Jules Verne's automatic iron travelling elephant would pale! Really and truly, the more it is considered, the more fascinating does the prospect become. An absolute command of Great Britain could be achieved at, comparatively speaking, a minimum cost. One could breakfast in London, and spend the night on the moors of Devon or Yorkshire. Actually on the moors, moreover: not in some hired furnished house that gave a distant view from one or two favoured windows. In the fashion of a squatter, one could beard the Scottish and Welsh mountains, or settle down for the night at just that distance from a burn at which the music of its waters would sound the most soothing. One might even come to anchor amid bracken, the perfume of which would drown the final reek of the petrol. It is impossible to give free rein to a subject such as this. It would lead for many miles—and pages. But surely it would be worth putting the thing to the test!

It is, perhaps, poetic justice that has now at such short notice flung back many hotel-keepers on to a pinnacle of power as lofty as their predecessors enjoyed in the days of the stage-coach. There is no need to dilate on the results to the buildings themselves; these are obvious to all in the porticos, balconies, and stucco erections which now shine out so brazenly in many a rural district. The cold beef and cheese remain, it is true, but only as an adjunct to a meal dignified and vouched for by a printed menu. And I fear that in many instances the landlord has grown proud. There are many places where, should one arrive at a crowded coffee-room, one may count on a reception similar to that meted out to the foolish virgins. Prosperity does not seem to have endowed the rural hotel-keeper with elasticity either of temperament or of method. This is one of the few remaining things which they undoubtedly do better in France. There the landlord of a full house is most notably free from any taint of superciliousness. His regrets for the unfortunate state of affairs are almost tearful in their intensity, and his suggestions for the visitors' comfort during the interval of hunger which must elapse before a specially prepared meal are feverish in their eloquence. After all, it is the Frenchman who is wise; for it is by means such as this that he doubles the numbers of his clientèle. The Englishman is either too easily satisfied or too honest, and neither of these attributes seems to be permanently profitable in this world!

This topic, of course, leads to hotels—if for no other reason than that the suggested mode of travelling does nothing of the kind. It is this very independence which constitutes the chief charm of an "outfit" which serves for the night as well as for the day. Independence, moreover, is a luxury which has during the past few years been too much on the side of the hotel-keeper. There are comparatively few adults who cannot remember the antemotorian days of the country inn and minor hotel. The tide of the stage-coach, long receded, had left these hostelries stranded on a peculiarly arid and stony beach. A few cyclists and commercial travellers would carve the cold beef and nibble at the cheese, which together made up the meal—a repast as inevitable and unalterable as a modern income-tax paper. Indeed, a rural hotel without its round of beef and block of Cheddar cheese would have been as incongruous as a sportsman who went out to wait for grouse with no cartridge in his gun. It is not to be wondered at that the host of half a generation ago was an unimaginative person. His côterie was strictly local, and addicted to very little beyond beer. The advent of a travelling stranger was thus somewhat of an event in his life, and he welcomed him none the less cordially for the knowledge that the visit was almost invariably due to necessity rather than choice.

DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU.

IN the September number, "Stephana Schwertner," by dint of a forced march, reaches the end of her first part, and will rest till January. Herr Richard Fester has an essay on Goethe's standpoint towards the French Revolution, and on those of his works that show its influence on his mind. Monsignor Count Vay von Vaya und zu Luskod contributes a most interesting description of Tripoli. Herr Max Zimmermann concludes his study of foreign painters in Italy in the times of Rubens; the present contribution is largely devoted to the influence of the Italian landscape on the visitors, especially Claude and Poussin. The correspondence of Gentz and Metternich is concluded. The former exhibits great shrewdness in foreseeing the fall of Napoleon, and in advocating a policy of masterly inactivity.

LE MERCURE DE FRANCE.

August 16.—M. Risal contributes a most interesting article on the Turkish people, who have been consistently sacrified to their rulers and neighbours. The various proposed solutions of the Turkish problem have awakened no echo in the national breast. The democratic solution means destruction by assimilation, and Panislamism is no cure for the particular disease. The "Yeni Hayat" is an interesting movement that seems to offer some chance of awakening a Turkish soul. M. Labitte concludes his study of "L'Intelligence chez les Insectes"; the present article is very good, and gives good reason for rejecting the conception of instinct. "On a toujours l'orgueil des vices que l'on vous prête," says Jean Lorrain, in M. Marc Brésil's article on him; certainly the speaker was in a position to judge of the truth of his pronouncement. M. Davray summarises, among other notices on Andrew Lang, Mr. Steele's appreciation in THE ACADEMY.

September 1.—M. René Descharmes discusses "Les Connaissances médicales de Flaubert," who, it appears, was never a doctor, but borrowed largely from the accounts of the wreck of the Medusa for his picture of human suffering, called "Le Défilé de la Hache" in "Salâmmbo." M. Paul Louis talks of diplomatic anarchy and the dangers of war; Europe is dislocated, conscience is dead, and every domestic brawl means a foreign or colonial adventure. "En d'autres temps, la Turquie jeune ou vieille n'eût pas été abandonnée à son sort." M. Jules de Gaultier, à propos the pictures of M. Poitelin, discusses the psychology of landscape painting; M. Henri Malo writes an appreciation of M. Pirenne as the national historian of Belgium, and the interminable debate on Casanova and "les Plombs" is continued by M. Adnesse.

LA REVUE.

August 15.—In the last number M. Gaston Riou expounded the "laïque" French ideal; here M. Julien de Narfon answers him from the Catholic point of view. Disowning Ultramontanism, M. de Narfon considers that Catholicism is fully compatible with all French aspirations—democracy, patriotism, science, and "le rêve français." Dr. de Neuville, under the heading of "Comment on découvre les Crimes," gives a series of true detective stories. Of "Marie de Sainte-Heureuse" M. Faguet says that it is "sous un petit volume une des grandes œuvres de ce temps." His reasons for admiring it are not so convincing; its originality seems to us at least questionable. M. de Banzemont gives a "Drame populaire au Japon" in skeleton, with extracts. M. Léon Charpentier tells of Chinese mythology, an accretion chiefly of Taoism. The history of the "dieu des charcutiers" is amusing and illuminating. "Brada" describes Hamburg before the war of 1870.

September 1.—M. Magne's "Ninon de Lenclos" quivers in the serpentine embrace of M. Faguet's irony. General Chérif Pacha denounces the "Committee of Union and Progress" in no measured terms; it continues, he says, the tyranny of Abdul Hamid. M. Chuquet is very interesting on Tchernychev, "l'éternel postillon," who carried messages between the Czar, Napoleon, and others. He saw the French Emperor in all his aspects, and heard him assert that "la question"—of maritime supremacy, as a corollary of Continental supremacy—"se décidera sur les chantiers d'Anvers." M. Tibal criticises German methods in regard to negroes; M. Mondain is amusing on the subject of Madagascar women, and Dr. Rodiet shows how a large measure of liberty, with opportunities for work and mutual supervision, solves the problem of the mentally deficient in two institutions in France.

Indian Journals

IN the six numbers of the Wednesday Review (Trichinopoly) from July 3 to August 7 there would be much to notice, if space permitted. The editor will do some good by his reprobation of the nautch as a method of entertainment. The sooner it becomes obsolete the better. It was never edifying or amusing, and is always fraught with unpleasant associations. The conditions accepted for the permanence of British rule in India are clearly stated, equal treatment of every part of the Empire, religious toleration—greatly appreciated by the Indians—and just administration; the treatment of British Indians in the South African colonies is not forgotten. The rise in prices in India is attributed to the substitution of non-food crops for food crops. The Trans-Persian railway scheme receives the editor's support; he also advocates the construction of cheap railway lines, though he can know nothing of the question of the cost of construction. But it is on this very ground, want of knowledge of India, that the appointment of Lord Islington to preside over the Public Services Commission is unfavourably criticised. The suggestion recently made for a Royal Viceroy of India, with an official Diwan, is not favourably entertained.

But the idea that English ministers should travel in India to gain information is warmly welcomed. The difficulty of the religious question in England is mentioned as calculated to convince those who are so eager to introduce religious instruction in Indian schools of the almost insuperable obstacles in their way. When an Indian editor comments on English politics, he must fail to satisfy English readers. His views can hardly be original, and may easily be worthless. A writer has been spending a month with the Gaekwar of Baroda, and describes his reforms and views on marriage. The latter must be edifying, presuming that he has studied the question by the light of experience.

The Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay, for 1911, is belated, but the delay is unimportant. "The cult of the bath" is an exhaustive study of the Oriental practice of ablution, in which, it is stated, a section of the Jain community does not share, with very disagreeable results. "Superstition about unlucky days and objects" is readable, but the whole subject of omens and superstitions has been rather overdone lately. The "list of papers read during the last 25 years" affords evidence of the literary energy of the members of this society.

The Collegian (Calcutta), for June and July, records the splendid donation of property worth seven lakhs by an Indian barrister to the Calcutta University for founding Chairs in Chemistry and Physics, and for the establishment of a University Laboratory: the Chairs are "always to be filled by Indians." Primary education in the advanced State, Mysore, is being extended, and compulsory education has been proposed. A Bengali professor suggests the study of Sańskrit "in the method in which we acquire our mother tongue." If Sanskrit were a living, spoken language, there would be something in the suggestion, but it is not. The find of a portrait statue of Kanishka, the great king, near Muttra, is worthy of record. In Bombay the Government has received very gracious promises of support towards the establishment of a Government College of Commerce. The Government of India have pressed upon Indian students the desirability of providing themselves, before leaving India, with certificates of identity, signed by district officers. The intention is good, but is incomplete. The students should be required, on returning to India, to produce certificates of good conduct in England, to render them eligible for any appointment in India. The Government of India have made handsome grants of money to the Universities of Bombay and Madras. The supporters of the Hindu University project are busy in collecting subscriptions, to amount to the stipulated minimum of 50 lakhs before legislation is undertaken. Year after year, students are flocking to the American Universities to prosecute their studies. The literary and scientific papers in this journal are varied and always worthy of perusal.

The Hindustan Review, for July, 1912, opens with a remarkable article on the difficulties of Indian Historiography by Dr. S. V. Ketkar, the author of two thoughtful volumes on Caste and Hinduism. He advocates the speaking of truth in history, not only as honourable, but also as expedient. He concurs with the action of Government in suppressing the book on "the Indian war of independence," attributed to Mr. Savarkar; a book written in highly inflammatory language, intended to make the Indian reader hate the English. Dr. Ketkar considers it necessary to write in English, so long as there is no Indian language universally accepted. English is likely to prevail. There is freshness in the paper on "the law regulating relations between Muslims and non-Muslims," by a Muhammadan judge of a High Court; the subject is judicially treated, and it would be an advantage if the conclusions were clearly formulated. An Indian writer describes "some peculiar jobs in America," some of which might easily be adopted in India, and provide openings for the industrious. Among the various forms of business are "bottled smoke," "cock-roach shooer," "saint maker," "second-hand tombstones," "professional mourner," "corporation psychologist." It is a revelation to find "Buddhist ideas in Shakespeare" discussed by an Italian; and a Parsee professor writing on "Aristotle on the origin of the State." The review of Sir Marc Stein's "Ruins of Desert Cathay," by Dr. Coomaraswamy, is one of the best we have seen: and the paper on Robert Browning, as the Man and the Poet, is a valuable study of his works. The article on "Hafiz; how he lived and thought," will appeal to Oriental scholars. The notices of books on Indian subjects are many, various, and good: they are, perhaps, too generally laudatory. The contents of this Review fully justify the flattering remarks set out on the outside cover.

General Nogi

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

IT is hard to believe that the man who twice captured Port Arthur and who turned the left wing of Kouropatkin's army at Mukden is no more. But now that I look back on the days that I spent with the General before Port Arthur, when I came to know him very intimately, his suicide does not altogether take me by surprise. In the first place, it was freely rumoured throughout the besieging army at the time, and the rumour seems to be confirmed by the final tragedy—if one can call it such—that after the failure of the second general assault on Port Arthur on October 30, 1904, Nogi wrote to the Emperor a personal letter requesting to be relieved of his command, and also asking the Imperial permission to take his own life. He felt very deeply his failure to capture Port Arthur by a coup de main as he had confidently expected; doubtless basing his confidence on his brilliant feat of arms which had enabled him to capture it from the Chinese in a single day's fighting ten years before. He knew that the services of his army were urgently needed in the north, and, had he succeeded in rushing the fortress in August, the presence of his victorious troops at Liao-yang would almost certainly have led to the surrounding and defeat of Kouropatkin's whole army, and have ended the war summarily. Thus, when his second assault failed, involving as it did a fearful loss of life, he felt that the whole responsibility for this misplaced confidence and for the failure rested on his shoulders.

But the Emperor and his advisers took a very different view. Instead of being recalled, superseded and disgraced, as so many commanders would have been by their Governments, the Emperor wrote him a personal letter, thanking him for his services and encouraging him to persevere with his terrible task. From the time of the receipt of that letter General Nogi banished all thoughts of resignation or suicide until his work was done. In the latter stages of the siege his character and demeanour underwent a complete change. He was no longer the smiling, cheerful man whom we had known early in August. He grew to look years older; his hair turned grey, and he went about more like the embodiment of some grim fate determined to fulfil a task, not heeding the cost. The strain on him must have been frightful, yet, except for these changes I have noted, he remained outwardly calm, and probably none, except those in his immediate entourage, knew how much he suffered.

The climax was reached at the end of the failure of the third general assault on the fortress on November 26, which caused a loss of over twenty thousand men killed and wounded. The position now seemed desperate. It was known that the Baltic Fleet was on its way to the Far East; no one knew for certain the state of the squadron shut up in Port Arthur, but the junction of the two fleets might spell disaster to Japan. Somehow or other that squadron in Port Arthur had to be destroyed. A single aeroplane or even a dirigible would have solved the whole complex problem, for the discovery would at once have been made that none of the warships were in a position ever to put to sea again, that the crews had been sent ashore, and that many of the guns had been placed in the forts. But in 1904 no aeroplane had flown, and but little was known of dirigibles, and the information could only be obtained by a further sacrifice of thousands of lives. It was at this stage that General Nogi showed the inflexibility of his character. In spite of the crushing nature of his defeat on November 26 and the general discouragement throughout his army, Nogi never lost heart or hesitated for a single instant. On the very next day, November 27, he rode eighteen miles to the extreme west of his line and gave orders for that series of desperate attacks on 203 Metre Hill which ended in its capture on December 5, after ten thousand Japanese soldiers had fallen on its bloodstained slopes. Thus he was able to retrieve his defeat in the east by his victory in the west. The capture of 203 Metre Hill laid bare the secrets of the inner harbour of Port Arthur, and from that hour the fire of the besiegers' batteries could be directed on to the Russian warships. Once they were sunk, the surrender of the fortress became of secondary importance.

During the operations which led to the capture of 203 Metre Hill, Nogi lost his second son, his only other son having fallen earlier in the war at Nanshan. I saw the General a very few days after this occurrence, and, although the blow was a crushing one, ending as it did the last of his line, he showed absolutely no trace of personal grief, and when we ventured to tender our sympathies he only replied: "One of my sons fell at Nanshan, the other at 203 Metre Hill, both in the service of their Emperor; I would not have it otherwise." The General did his duty nobly until the end of the war; his services to Japan cannot be overestimated; but all his hopes and happiness were shattered in that struggle. Afterwards a reaction must have set in. Not only had he to mourn the death of his two sons, but he felt deeply the loss of so many of his old comrades in arms who had marched to certain death at his orders. Like General Ichinohe, who openly expressed his desire to join his lost brigade in the great beyond, Nogi felt that his life no longer belonged to this world. His true friends and true interests lay beyond the mists of death. Yet as long as the Emperor, his old master, lived, he felt it his duty to serve him.

The last time I saw him was in the Hyde Park Hotel on the occasion of the Coronation of King George. He had just arrived, and his A.D.C. announced that he would see no visitors. I sent up my card, and the reply at once came back: "Tell him to come up, as it will be a great pleasure to see anyone who was with me all through the Siege of Port Arthur." I found the General sitting in an easy-chair, dressed in a frock-coat, looking quite lost in his unnatural surroundings, but otherwise not much changed. For nearly an hour I sat with him, and we discussed through an interpreter the chief events of the siege. He seemed delighted to dwell on the past and to go over the old ground. He told me in detail what all his leading generals had been doing since the war, and the positions they now occupied. He seemed to have regained all his old cheerfulness and good spirits, and I left under the impression that he had entirely recovered from his anxieties and personal loss. But I suppose that underneath this Oriental mask his sorrows still weighed heavily upon him. He certainly looked strangely out of place in European garb and in Western surroundings, and I am quite sure he was desperately anxious to get back to Japan and to his garden which he loved so well. Probably ever since the end of the war he had contemplated suicide, but as long as the Mikado lived he did not feel himself free to take his life. With the death of the Emperor his last link with old Japan snapped. His services would no longer be required; he had reached an age where only a lonely private life was left to him. He had no heir to train in the old Daimio spirit and to carry on his line and traditions. His thought moved towards his old comrades who had fallen in the war, towards his two sons who had given their lives for their country, and nothing probably appeared more natural to him than to follow his old master beyond the great divide. Could he but know, he would probably be amazed to learn the sensation his death has created throughout the whole world.

The character of General Nogi hardly belonged to this age. Simplicity and a sense of duty were its key-notes. He would have served equally faithfully in a great or humble capacity. Whether he was really a great general is open to question. His reckless assaults on Port Arthur showed a remarkable ignorance of the changed conditions of modern warfare, but his strength of character triumphed over all obstacles in the end. He handled his troops in the most masterly manner in the operations round Mukden, and almost succeeded in cutting off the retreat of the Russian army; it is difficult, however, to say how much of the credit was due to him and how much to the orders of Oyama and the General Staff. But he will surely occupy a high place in the Valhalla of fame. Amongst the Japanese he will stand as one of the greatest heroes of all time, and the example of his life may prove of inestimable value to future generations of his countrymen.

Mr. Horace A. Vachell's comedy, "Jelf's," which was one of the successes of the spring at Wyndham's Theatre, is now being published by Mr. Murray in book form.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins will publish during the next few days a novel entitled "Bachelors' Buttons: The Candid Confessions of a Shy Bachelor," by Edward Burke, about whose identity some mystery exists.

Professor Schäfer's address (abridged), with report of the discussion on "The Origin of Life," at the British Association meetings, and comments by Sir Oliver Lodge, Dr. A. R. Wallace, and Rev. R. J. Campbell, has been published as a penny pamphlet by the Christian Commonwealth, Salisbury Square.

We understand that the pseudonym L. V. H. Witley (whose work, "Love from Beyond the Veil," is announced for immediate publication by Messrs. L. N. Fowler and Co.), is made use of by a man, acting, however, as the mouthpiece of a woman. Mr. Witley traverses Miss Corelli's affirmation in "The Life Everlasting" that there is no possibility of communication with the spirits of the dead.

So great is the popularity of "Drake" at His Majesty's Theatre that it has been found necessary to arrange for extra matinees on Thursdays. The first of these special matinees will be on October 10 and the second on October 17. In this way it is hoped that it will be in some small degree possible to accommodate those who have been disappointed at being unable to secure seats for other performances.

The Era has taken the very practical step of getting all the actors and actresses in Great Britain to give their votes on the burning question of the Sunday closing of theatres and music-halls. The result is both decisive and significant, as is shown by the following figures:—For theatres and music-halls to be shut, 2,834; for picture palaces to be shut, 2,265; for theatres and music-halls to be open, 128; for picture palaces to be open, 678.

Amongst the earliest books to be published by Mr. Murray in October will be the extraordinary narrative of an interesting journey made across Mesopotamia and Southern Kurdistan by Mr. E. B. Soane. The author, whose disguise was so perfect as to deceive the natives, was able to penetrate to parts not hitherto visited, and in his book he throws new light on the character of the Kurds, whose reputation has hitherto hardly been flattering to them. The book is entitled "To Mesopotamia and Kurdistan in Disguise."

Among the contents of the third number of Bedrock (published October 1) will be "Recent Discoveries of Ancient Human Remains and their Bearing on the Antiquity of Man," by A. Keith, M.D., F.R.C.S.; "Mistaken Identity," by Clifford Sully; "Modern Vitalism," by Hugh Elliott, dealing largely with the Bergson school of thought; and "Uncommon Sense as a Substitute for Investigation," by Sir Oliver Lodge. The current research notes are contributed by Dr. Buckmaster, and this number will also contain notes on new apparatus and a critical review of the work achieved by the recent Eugenics Congress, contributed by the acting editor.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. publish this week "An Australian Native's Standpoint," by Mr. Will. J. Sowden, editor of the Register, Adelaide, a volume of addresses on a variety of subjects, and a new book by the Right Hon. James Bryce, entitled "South America: Observations and Reflections." The volume is the product of a journey made by the author through this region, and records his impressions regarding scenery, social and economic phenomena, the people, and the prospects for the development of industry and commerce in Panama, Peru, Bolivia, Chili, Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil. Mr. Bryce has also something to say about the relics of prehistoric civilisation, the native Indian population, and the conditions of political life in the Republics.

Mr. Heinemann publishes this week the first five volumes of "The Loeb Classical Library," a series of Greek and Latin texts, with English translations on the opposite page. The series will be edited by T. E. Page, M.A., and W. H. D. Rouse, Litt.D., and will include examples not only of the authors of the classical periods of Greek and Latin, but also the early writers and the later. In fact, the series will cover twenty-five centuries of Greek and Latin Literature, from the time of Homer to the fall of Constantinople. It is hoped to publish, in all, twenty volumes before the end of this year. Two authors prominent in the discussions of the British Association will publish books with Mr. Heinemann during next month—Dr. Chalmers Mitchell, who has written on "The Childhood of Animals," and Mr. P. Amaury Talbot, of Nigerian fame, whose book is called "In the Shadow of the Bush." Mr. Heinemann will also publish Mr. George Moore's second instalment of his Irish recollections early in October, under the title of "Salve."

By LANCELOT LAWTON.

GREAT BRITAIN AND RUSSIA.

THE mission of M. Sazonoff to England has a definite purpose—the amplification of the Anglo-Russian understanding. While affairs in all parts of the world are being discussed at the historic meeting between the Russian Foreign Secretary and Sir Edward Grey, it has rightly been surmised that the future of Persia will largely occupy the attention of the two statesmen. Not without significance is the circumstance that Lord Revelstoke, who represents the British financial interests in the Trans-Persian Railway project, accompanied M. Sazonoff to Balmoral. It is no secret that for long British policy in Persia has not been at all in harmony with that of Russia. That the existing understanding between the two countries has successfully withstood the strain thus imposed is evidence of the good sense that characterises their mutual relations no less than of the realisation, as strong in St. Petersburg as it is in London, that no selfish considerations must be allowed to interfere with the effectiveness of the Triple Entente as an instrument for maintaining the peace of Europe. It is thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of frankness animating Anglo-Russian co-operation that M. Sazonoff should visit England with the object of discussing exhaustively the differences that have arisen in regard to Persia, so that, once and for all, the two Powers who are responsible for the destiny of this afflicted land may bring their policies into line.

The condition of the country is to-day worse than ever it was. Two years have elapsed since Great Britain informed the Teheran Government that, unless the disorder in the Southern territory was speedily quelled, she would be compelled to intervene and herself undertake the task. Since then no semblance of an improvement has taken place. Brigandage of the worst kind, accompanied by murder and rapine, has been practised, with but few attempts at repression. Apart from the constant sacrifice of human life, trade has been paralysed. Our forbearance in face of these deplorable conditions has gone entirely unrewarded; indeed, it has spread to no small extent the belief that we are not sufficiently strong to enforce our warnings, and, as a consequence, our prestige is for the time being at a low ebb. In Northern Persia the circumstances are entirely different. Here it is not denied, even by the most captious critics of Russia's methods, that she has succeeded in establishing a certain measure of tranquillity. To accomplish her object she has, of course, been compelled to embark upon a limited military occupation of the territory, and has never hesitated, whenever occasion required, to suppress anarchy with a strong hand. Had she left the task of maintaining order to the Persian authorities, as we have done in the South, the general state of the country would doubtless have become so bad as to call for decisive action on the part of England and Russia long before now. As it is, the chaotic state of affairs in the capital, coupled with the reign of anarchy in the South, has not been without a seriously detrimental effect upon Russian interests.

Sentimental regard for the fate of Persia must not be allowed to obscure the plain and painful facts of the situation. The experiment of Constitutional Government has failed. To find the true reason for its failure may provide grounds for controversy. But that the Anglo-Russian understanding gave Persia any small chance she may have had to revive her fortunes cannot be gainsaid. It relieved the people of one form of tyranny: that of the ex-Shah and his Ministers. At the time no human being could foresee that another and perhaps, if anything, a worse form of tyranny would be substituted: that of anarchy thriving under a corrupt and incompetent administration wearing the cloak of Constitutional Government. At least, the Anglo-Russian understanding, with its guarantee that the integrity of Persia would be maintained, afforded her statesmen a breathing space in which to make an honest attempt to establish sound government. Had Russia been left to decide the problem alone, Persia would have long since vanished from the ranks of nations. After four years of anxious watchfulness there are signs that the patience of Russia with the British policy of restraint is exhausted. The subject, however, is one which, as I have already said, is being discussed frankly, and it will be found that the decision arrived at will tend to draw closer still the ties of amity that bind the two Powers.

CHINA'S NEW LOAN.

In regard to the new Chinese Loan we wrote last week that "too much importance cannot be attached to this attempt (on the part of China) to secure financial aid outside the powerful ring, the representatives of which are at present jealously watching the course of events in the Chinese capital; for it will constitute a test case by which all similar attempts will be judged and determined." Hitherto, by virtue of the diplomatic support accorded by the six Powers, the international group has enjoyed a potential monopoly in the State finance of the Republic, and the Peking Government have found themselves thwarted whenever they sought by indirect means to conclude arrangements with independent bankers who were willing to advance money on terms far less stringent than those demanded by the Consortium. It would seem, however, that at last the ring has been broken and a precedent established, whereby China is at liberty to come to the open markets of the West in order to obtain, on the adequate security which we feel sure she will be able to offer, much needed relief from her present financial embarrassments. For, during the past week, two important announcements have been made—the first, that when the Foreign Office was approached by the London group, although the latter were given to understand that a protest would be lodged in Peking, no intimation as to prohibition was made on behalf of the British Government; the second, that negotiations with the Six-Powers Group have been definitely terminated.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

At this stage it is not easy to foresee what action will be taken in regard to China's assertive policy of operating independently of the favoured Consortium; but if it is clearly shown that adequate security can be forthcoming for a loan which is the outcome of purely commercial enterprise, then it will be a difficult matter for Sir Edward Grey to justify anything in the nature of opposition to the completion of the transaction. From the beginning the position of the international group has been such as to warrant little in the way of admiration. To what extent its conduct as an aggregate has been shaped by the diplomatic pressure brought to bear upon certain of its components it is difficult to determine; but there can be slight doubt that, rightly or wrongly, it has earned for itself the reputation for harsh methods. Pampered by the Legations, the incumbents of which have been actuated by widely dissimilar motives, the Consortium unquestionably adopted an attitude which could not be otherwise than offensive to the Government and people of China. In other words, the terms demanded for any financial accommodation not only provided for the privilege of monopoly in the future, as far as the group was concerned, thus denying the nation those advantages of the open market so freely accorded Japan in the early days of the Restoration, but they imposed humiliating restrictions upon the expenditure of any monies advanced which, as we pointed out in THE ACADEMY months ago, could not fail to lead to a dangerous national reaction.

Then, when the Peking Government, rightly estimating the temper of the Provinces, refused to entertain these terms, and statements were made in the House of Commons to the effect that an unwilling China was having money forced upon her, the members of the Consortium piously protested their disinterestedness and proclaimed that it was China who was eager to borrow, not they to lend. Such lofty serenity, if it has been maintained, will enable them to bear with equanimity the events of the past week. We have never been able to understand how, when it came to the point, China could be coerced into dealing with the international group. Four, at least, of the six Powers concerned would refuse to adopt that extreme and only measure which could ensure compliance—the arbitrament of war.

MOTORING

MEMBERS of the A. A. and M. U. have received a letter from the Secretary informing them that for some time a special committee of the Association has had under consideration various proposals designed to secure for them a certain and cheap supply of petrol, and inviting them to fill up a postcard reading:

> In the event of the Association being in a position to secure a supply of petrol at a price not exceeding 1s. 2d. per gallon, including the present tax of 3d. per gallon, I am prepared to contract to purchase, through the Association, an average of ..... gallons annually for the next three years, irrespective of any competitive prices which may prevail.

It has not so far transpired how the Association proposes to secure the spirit at the price indicated; and in view of the frank declaration of one of the importing companies' delegates at the R. A. C. Conference, to the effect that no reduction whatever would be allowed to any association of private motorists no matter how large a contract might be offered, it is a matter of speculation as to what is in the minds of the committee. In any case there can be little doubt that the majority of the members of the Association will be quite willing to accept any chance of getting their petrol at 1s. 2d. per gallon, and to commit themselves to that price for the next three years. In the ordinary course of things there is no reason whatever to anticipate reductions in price during that time.

The last fortnight has been an eventful one for Sunbeams. On the 9th inst. one of the 30 h.p. six-cylinders beat the world's 50 miles' record. On the 17th inst. the four-cylinder 12.16 h.p. (15.9 R.A.C rating) Grand Prix model established fresh figures for 400 miles and four and five hours, and on Saturday last the same car, driven alternately by R. F. L. Crossman and Bario Resta, covered 910 miles 738 yards in 12 hours' consecutive running, thereby beating the previous world's record by 3 miles 203 yards. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that the record broken on Saturday by the 15.9 h.p. Sunbeam was previously held by the 30 h.p. six-cylinder model of the same make, which a short time ago deprived Mr. Edge of the honour secured by him on the 60 h.p. Napier as far back as 1907.

Within the next few days the R. A. C. will issue its certificate of performance in respect of a 2,000 miles' trial of the Stewart-Morris paraffin carburetter, which has just been carried out under official supervision, and in view of the existing position with regard to petrol the report will be perused with exceptional interest by motorists generally. Like all the R. A. C. trials, the test has been of a thorough nature, 1,000 miles having been run on the road under ordinary touring conditions, and the other 1,000 miles on the track at Brooklands at high speeds. At the conclusion of the trial the engine was dismantled in order to ascertain the amount of carbon deposit on the cylinder heads, and the condition of the mechanism generally. Until the appearance of the official certificate no authoritative statement can of course be made as to the all-round behaviour of the new carburetter, but private advices are to the effect that the test has been of a very satisfactory nature.

The fifteenth edition of that popular handbook, the "Motor Manual," has just made its appearance. It follows the same general lines as its predecessors, commencing with an elementary description of the fundamental principles governing the internal combustion engine, and subsequently dealing in separate chapters with every feature of the car and with every phase of motoring. The chapter headed "How to Choose a Car" contains in itself sufficient information to prove instructive to the prospective buyer, and the hints regarding the purchase of second-hand cars are particularly useful and practical. The price of the book, which contains 270 pages and about as many illustrations, is, as usual, 1s. 6d. net, or 1s. 9d. post free from the publishers, the Temple Press, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

The second official report of the tyre test has been issued this week. It states that up to the 21st inst. 5,006 miles had been covered since the test car started from Lipton's garage on July 22nd, the two tyres still running being the Dunlop and the Victor. By the time these lines appear the first section of the trial—that of the steel-studded non-skids—will doubtless have terminated, and probably the second section—that of the grooved-rubber type—will have commenced. As the Michelin firm does not market a grooved tyre, it will have to be represented by one with a plain tread. The third and last type will be the plain tyres of each make. R. B. H.

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

EVERYTHING hangs fire! There is one of those pauses in the City such as we have so often noticed before. Sometimes they foretell a break, sometimes they appear meaningless. I do not believe that the present pause portends a break, because there is no "bull" account. In Perus and Metropolitans some people may have over-bought, but in no other securities. Indeed, trade throughout England is so good that speculators of the more serious class are busy finding money for their own trades. They are not gambling in stocks and shares because they find that they can make money easily in their own business. The simple gamble in mines does not attract them; they seek an investment that will appreciate. That is all the fashion. The bargain-hunter is at large. He will get badly landed in a few instances, especially when he is unlucky enough to get in at the top, but in most cases he will not lose much. In any case he will, as in the case of rubber shares, obtain some interest on his money. No promoters have braved the City. Charles Birch Crisp has his Chinese Loan ready, but he has strong backing and will carry it through, even though the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank rage furiously, and the Foreign Office give the Angel Court financier the cold shoulder. I hear of very few big loans on the tapis. The underwriter has not yet digested the spring feast, and is disinclined to feed a second time. But Crisp is insatiable. He, like the rest, will overdo the business, but to-day he is keen to make money.

MONEY is definitely hard. There are rumours that the Berlin rate must go up. Herr Gwinner has been warning the bankers not to plunge too heavily. We shall see a money squeeze in Germany before the end of the year. But Paris has all she needs, and as long as she is cautious we need have no fear. Wall Street appears to have arranged her finance—at the expense of the Germans. I hope we shall not see any further rise in rates, but I am not by any means certain.

FOREIGNERS are upset at this Balkan trouble, which I Berlin rate must go up. Herr Gwinner has been warnrate my Paris friends show no anxiety, and Paris is the one place that can appraise Foreign politics with accuracy. The Quai d'Orsay works with the consortium of Great Banks, and the managers of those concerns are entirely in the confidence of the Foreign Office. Therefore I take heed only of what Paris thinks and does. She is calm. The gamble in Perus continues and queer stories are afloat. Punters have now a huge profit, and I should advise them to take it. They say that Farquhar is no longer on friendly terms with the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas. I wonder how this will affect his big Brazilian deals. But as long as he has Schroeder and Speyer at his back I don't think he will worry very much. Tintos look good and they are talked higher. Indeed, all copper shares must improve week by week, for the metal will not fall and profits to-day are huge in all the good mines.

HOME RAILS appear dullish. The Metropolitan gamble has not gone to the extreme limit promised us by those behind the scenes. The reaction is almost due. People cannot go on buying day after day unless they pay, and much of the buying was decidedly ragged. The returns of the Omnibus company mount up each week, and this means good business for the Underground Electric. The 6 per cent. Income Bonds seem sure to get their full dividend for the present half-year, and this will improve the position of the ordinary shares, which look like going to par within six months. As I told you all to buy them when they were 2¼, I feel quite satisfied. But I can see no money in the "A" shares, for I imagine that Underground Electric will be wound up long before they get any chance of any dividend. Clever people are buying Great Central, and they are wise, because the new coalfield and the new docks will improve traffics. There is still much annoyance in Scotland over the policy of the Scotch Railways. North British should acquire the Highland, but the chairman declined to make any sign of approval at the meeting. I think Scotch stocks should be bought.

YANKEES are steady. The crop will be good, but they say that cotton does not look so well. It is a late crop and may be hurt by frosts. If it falls away then the Southern and other lines that depend upon cotton will relapse. Southern Pacific are being talked up on good prospects, and St. Louis and San Francisco are also being picked up by those who believe that the line will benefit by the Panama Canal. All American Rails are safe to buy to-day, for Morgan is "bullish," and he rules Wall Street. In a manipulated market like Yankee Rails "tips" are the only things worth following, and the "tips" are Eries and Rocks.

RUBBER shares don't move. The Harrison and Crossfield report shows big profits, but the increase of the item investments which is up over £130,000 is ominous. It is impossible to go on piling up paper which cannot be sold without creating a dangerous position. The fact that the firm has departed from its policy of holding all the ordinary in its own hands and will now offer £150,000 to the public is also ominous. They say that the shares will be offered at 32s. I confess that it leads me to suppose Lampard wants money very badly—or wants to make a market in the ordinary shares in order to get out. Either position is disquieting.

OIL does not cut much figure in the Stock Exchange to-day. Tweedy will try and carry through that Maikop Trust amalgamation and reconstruction, but the whole thing is hopeless, and I advise those who hold the shares to cut their loss and refrain from throwing good money after bad. The Goldfields get out best, for they exchange a bad debt for debentures which they may be able to sell for something. But the new money will be wasted, for none of the companies to be reconstructed have any good land or, indeed, any assets of value. The Standard of Mexico has leased eight of its plots to people who will drill and give the company a royalty. This is good news. The well sunk by this company was maliciously damaged, and probably a new well will have to be sunk. Mexico is looking up, and they say that Lord Cowdray has joined hands with Standard Oil and means to fight Shell in China. Hence the Chinese Birch Crisp Loan. This sounds pretty, but is it true?

MINES are dead idle. The Goldfields are selling all their share holdings on the Rand and propose quitting Africa for good. They have never had any first-class properties except Simmer and Jack. I wonder what price Central Mining paid for the blocks of shares they have bought. The Kaffir magnates are not making much of the promised boom, and I hear that they don't like the continual offering of shares that follows any rise. However, there is plenty of time before Christmas. In Rhodesia nothing is being done. The land boom hangs fire and the magnates are afraid of the public.

TIN affairs do not rise, but they say a further effort will be made to put up Anglos. If so, I should advise my readers to get out. All the men who come back from Nigeria speak badly of the mining prospects. The tin is so mixed with iron and other metals that big mistakes have been made in values. Rayfield appears to be the best. Naraguta and Naraguta Extended are also decent shares. But I fear that Nigeria will prove a sad disappointment. Pahangs are said to be going much higher. They have had a good rise, but as long as tin keeps strong they will continue to move up.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are sleepy. I went down last week to see the Kent coalfield. I came away satisfied with the coal but not with the finance, which I could not understand. Those who wish to take a hand may buy Snowdown Prefs., however, as this colliery will be upon the measures by next January, and should pay a dividend of ten per cent in 1914. As for the rest of the companies, their finance is too complex. Those who hold Highland Distillery shares should not sell to-day as a move is on to put up the price of the spirit. This will improve the price of the ordinary shares. RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE GREATEST SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The greatest Service of the Empire—what is it? which is it? Many will reply, "The Royal Navy"; some will say, "The Diplomatic Corps"; others, "The Army"; a few will assert that the Cabinet and Parliament are the most important Services of the Empire. But, great as these are, there remains one greater, because upon it depends not only the power to maintain all these so-called National Services, but the sustenance of the people and their industries.

Few persons realise the national importance of the British Mercantile Marine, few remember the great part that Service played in the building of their Empire; yet it was the pioneer in all climes where the British flag now flies. Upon that Service, in these days of rivalry between nations, depends the inviolability of British power. The day that sees the decline of the Merchant Service sees, also, the decline and fall of the Empire. Therefore, it is the greatest of the National Services, although not national in the sense of being official. It carries no honour other than pecuniary reward for those owners who by their enterprise initiate new trades, open out new markets, and thus add to the wealth of the nation. Though there are orders of merit in all of the National Services, in this there are no distinctions for those shipping magnates who have done so much to maintain its supremacy on every sea of the world. True, we often hear of some great shipowner receiving the honour of knighthood or a title of nobility, but these are invariably political. Nor does this Service receive any help from the nation; rather is it made to pay many charges and dues which rightly should be met by the nation. While other nations help their Mercantile Marine, we seem to devise methods to penalise and place at a disadvantage, so far as regards foreign competition, the shipping industry, with all its dependent interests. Nor does the nation recognise the men and officers, although they are engaged in a service equally necessary as that of the Royal Navy or Army. Countless are the gallant deeds they perform, deeds which, if done by men of the Navy or Army, would meet with immediate honourable recognition. And great is the toll of lives the sea claims; but for those left widowed and orphaned there is no pension, no comfort, other than that provided by the many charitable societies whose work and efforts cannot adequately deal with every case. Yet these men die in their country's service just as much as the man in the Royal Navy or the soldier in the Army; and who can say that they have not performed deeds as heroic as those of any naval battle or military operation? Could the story of the deeds of our Mercantile Marine be told, it would ring down the ages as proving the courage and prestige of the Saxon race.

Surely a service such as this, from colliery to liner, from fishing boat to stately yacht, with owners, officers and men, is worthy of national recognition. All engaged therein should be made to know that the nation looks upon its merchant service as the means of its existence, and as having possibilities of honour and glory as great as any of the official National Services. Then will British men be found ready to man British ships, and owners will reap the reward their enterprise merits, not only monetary gain, but the honour of the nation which they justly deserve. I am, yours etc., T. McL.

INDIAN REVIEWS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—In your issue of August 3, 1912, under the item "Indian Reviews," while noticing the Collegian June number, you have remarked, "The report of Calcutta Imperial Library shows difficulties in its working. The experiment of having an Indian as librarian was a fatal measure. On his death he was found to have 'borrowed' between 200 and 300 books, many of which must be regarded as lost." We take objection to this. Please state in reply where you found the above, and why have you put that under the heading Collegian? The report did not appear in June number. It is deplorable that sweeping indictments like above still appear in the English Press about things which the Press appear to know very little. This sort of unwarranted and uninformed criticisms that seek to undervalue the Indians should not appear in a paper of your standing, THE ACADEMY.

We therefore request you to contradict the above remark, which appeared in your journal of the 3rd August issue, in the next number. We can assure you that (if your motive is impartial) you have been led by unreliable news or men to make such an assertion.

Thanking you in anticipation, we remain, yours truly,
N. N. D., Editor, Collegian.

Calcutta, August 29, 1912.

Sir,—My attention has been invited to the letter of August 29 from the editor of the Collegian (Calcutta) to your address. The words quoted by him were taken from the present librarian's official "Report of the Working of the Imperial Library for the period from January 1, 1911, to March 31, 1912," which was sent to me. The report contained the following passage:—"Considerable progress has been made in recovering the books borrowed by the late Mr. De. They numbered between two and three hundred. There are still some sixty or more to recover. I am afraid that many of them must be regarded as lost." The editor can doubtless obtain a copy of the report.

The words in the review were stated to have come from the report—not from the Collegian. As the Calcutta Imperial Library is a quasi-educational institution, the remarks found an appropriate place after comments on the Collegian (Calcutta), which deals with educational matters. The criticism was not based on unreliable news. The late librarian's acts, while in charge of the library, were well known to the reviewer. The criticism was not unwarranted or uninformed. It was directed as much against the authorities who appointed the late librarian as against the individual. It is inconceivable that an European librarian would have "borrowed" so many books, "many of which must be regarded as lost." Your reviewer made no "sweeping indictment" against natives of India. But if they are appointed experimentally to posts hitherto held by Europeans, the experiment fails if the Indians do not observe the ordinary canons of probity and proper conduct.—Yours faithfully,

YOUR REVIEWER.

NEED.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In order to be able to meet Mr. Martin's views, I beg to state that the expression, "I need not have troubled myself,"* relating to a past time, in Dean Alford's letter, is equivalent to I (did) not need to have troubled myself; and that, if I had to parse this sentence, I would use one of the following forms of parsing:—

(I need not, put for I did not need):—

(a) did—auxiliary verb to do, did, done; Indicative mood, imperfect tense, 1st person singular, agreeing in n. and p. with its n. case I.
need—regular-transitive verb to need, needed, needed; put in the Infinitive mood by the auxiliary did, and having the preposition to understood before it.

(b) did need—Regular-transitive verb to need, needed, needed; Indicative mood, imperfect tense, 1st person singular, agreeing in n. and p. with its n. case I.

(I need not, put for I needed not):—

(c) needed—Regular-transitive verb to need, needed, needed; Indicative mood, imperfect tense, 1st person singular, agreeing in n. and p. with its n. case I.

The following might help me to throw additional light on the question:—

Indicative mood, present tense:—

I need† not trouble myself. Je n'ai pas besoin de m'inquiéter.

* Je n'avais pas besoin de m'inquiéter.

† Or I (do) not need to trouble myself; in which case, do and need are to be parsed as in (a).

Parsing:—

need—Regular-transitive verb to need, needed, needed; Indicative mood, present tense, first person singular, agreeing in n. and p. with its n. case I.

Examples quoted from good authors:—

(a) You need not (= needed not or did not need to) have made any excuse to me for your solicitation. —The Earl of Chesterfield's letter to Dr. Swift, Dec. 15, 1730.	Vous n'aviez pas besoin de vous excuser auprès de moi pour votre sollicitation.
(b) I did not need your letter to satisfy me of your kindness. —Macaulay's letter, p. 341.	Je n'avais pas besoin de votre lettre pour me convaincre de votre amabilité (or de votre bienveillance, de votre bonté).
(c) . . . but the public approbation needed no prompter either then or thereafter. —Macaulay's letter, p. 426.	. . . mais l'approbation publique n'avait pas besoin de conseiller soit à ce moment, soit après.

Now I beg to repeat what I said on August 31 last:—The foregoing has led me to the conclusion that the elliptical form need not, and the expression needed not and did not need, are three of the legitimate forms of the Imperfect tense of the Indicative mood of the verb need, used negatively. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

ADOLPHE BERNON.

MR. WRIGHT AND A CRITIC.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Who said, "De gustibus non est disputandum"? To dispute—with good humour, of course—about matters of taste is what all of us are constantly doing, particularly in literary journals! Mr. Mackereth, therefore, must not expect that all will agree with him in his onslaught upon "Angels," Mr. John Payne's version from Heine. The poem struck at least one of your readers as a very graceful and charming lyric, and the charm and daintiness of it haunt him still. It is, of course, a trifle, a butterfly that should not be broken on the wheel. I gather that Mr. Mackereth censures the lines for "crude inversions" and "want of poetic subtlety and fitness." Now, occasional inversions are permissible, I should suppose, for the sake of emphasis, and Mr. Payne's appear to me to have been employed deliberately with that aim. As to Mr. Mackereth's other charges, he makes but does not attempt to substantiate them.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

H. C. MINCHIN.

Farnham, September 20, 1912.

AN ADMISSION!

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In his criticism of my novel, "The Marble Aphrodite," your reviewer states that "scenes, one of them a visit to a night-club, are interpolated quite unnecessarily," and that the repetition of a certain passage concerning the statue is due to "careless proof-reading." Will you permit me to say that the scenes in question are introduced not arbitrarily, but to provide the requisite contrast between the idyll and its setting; and that the passage referred to is repeated intentionally?

A POINT OF GRAMMAR.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Will you be kind enough to state in your next issue which of the two sentences quoted is grammatically correct:—(1) "I never knew such a coward as him." (2)

Notes of the Week

WE are delighted to see that a conference was held at Bradford, on Friday last, to form a National Society of Free Workers. We absolutely endorse the objects of the movement. Its main plank is:—to maintain the principle of personal liberty and personal responsibility; especially to protect by every means the rights of individual members to live and work in freedom so long as they do not interfere with the enjoyment of a like freedom by all others. For ourselves, we have long been engaged in discussions as to the manner in which this beneficent, just, and, in fact, indispensable departure could best be brought to fruition. Intimate touch with industrial workers in the Midlands and elsewhere long since led to the conviction that it is unjust to the worker to give him no protected alternative to work under a union. Many workers passionately detest a union and its methods, but all they have to offer is their labour, and the only quarter—as matters stand—in which they can offer it—with safety to life and limb—is the union. We do not depreciate the good work which unions have accomplished, and which we believe they are capable—within the law—of accomplishing in the future. When we say "within the law" we do not mean the law as altered to suit their varying views and aims. We mean the law which is no respecter of persons—which awards adequate punishment to offenders—trade unionists or otherwise. The case of the non-union labourer, because it is difficult, has been shirked until now. The Bradford conference inaugurates a system which will commend itself by its justice, and which will compel even a puppet Home Secretary to realise his duty of protecting labour, without the previous inquiry whether or not it is labour controlled by his political supporters. The proposal was mooted, and it is quite a good one, that legislation shall limit the number of pickets, and that they shall wear distinguishing badges; a provision such as this coupled with a strong magistracy and a non-interfering Home Secretary would prove very salutary. Other useful measures were outlined at Bradford, and we hope the movement so usefully begun will be powerfully supported and brought to a successful issue.

The temper of Mr. William Holloway, B.A., Oxon., according to a letter in the Press, does not seem to be ameliorated by the curative atmosphere of Westgate-on-Sea. What profession this gentleman follows when he is not holiday-making is unknown to us, but he appears to belong to the minority who are very much enamoured of the gentlemen who are commonly called Solicitors of the High Court. The President of the Incorporated Law Society has lately been repeating the well-worn platitude that the cost of litigation is largely referable to the exorbitant fees paid to certain members of the "higher branch" of the legal profession. Mr. Holloway's gorge rises, and he proceeds to get out of touch with facts. He says somewhat sententiously: "When a case reaches the Courts, one counsel is as good as another. No ingenuity can shake a legal principle." As regards the first sentence, it is a pity his clients—solicitors—are not at one with him, because, if they were, exorbitant fees to a few counsel would cease to be paid. As regards the second sentence, we strongly suspect that this gentleman possesses "Every Man his Own Lawyer," price 6s. 8d., and labours under the delusion that law is an exact science. It is well to remember that it is the silly season, and even a B.A., Oxon., must be allowed some latitude.

The "Letters of George Meredith" come to a conclusion in the current issue of Scribner's Magazine. They have once more proved—if proof were needed—the fine quality of the man, as considered apart from the writer; they are full of splendid humour, irony delicate but never cruel, modesty true and unaffected. "My work has hold of me, and a day lost is a dropping of blood," he wrote to Frederick Greenwood; and again, putting fellowship above all, "I thought it needless, when I sent the verses, to say that such tiny things were a gift, honoured by your acceptance. Do not, if you print me in future, pay me. We are not on the same sides in politics, but at heart we are one." The letters abound with happiness, which is only made the more clear by the few tiny stings of a resentment which hardly ever reaches bitterness at "the good English" who learned so late his real worth.

The Meeting of Parliament—and After

THE House of Commons, when it meets next week, will have the opportunity of showing whether it is capable, under present conditions, of responding in a befitting manner to national questions of vital consequence. We hope that it will rise to the occasion, and so vindicate its own authority, and at least palliate violent methods by which it has arrogated to itself almost unchecked power.

We notice in a Radical journal a panegyric of Sir John Simon, and the judicious observer has no difficulty in joining in the appreciation. If we were asked in what temper the grave questions which will come before the House of Commons should be approached and discussed, we should be content to reply—in the manner of Sir John Simon. That confession of course implies no expectation of concurrence with the views which that eminent member of Parliament will probably advocate, but it is an aspiration that the dignity of Parliament, involved in the decency of its procedure, may in circumstances of great stringency prove triumphant.

If, as we must, we look mainly to the question of the grant of Home Rule to Ireland, it is obvious at once that neither passion nor blind partisanship can lay claim to statesmanlike discussion of a policy which is a new departure in the history of the world. No parallel can be found for an Imperial nation deliberately and of its own free-will, without overmastering external pressure, declining to keep a loyal nation within the sphere of its government. Something better in the way of defence of the policy will, we hope, be advanced than the untrue and discredited doctrine that Ireland is a homogeneous nation—one and indivisible. That is the ground on which Home Rule for Scotland might in principle be defended, but it can never be truthfully predicated of Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone, who, at all events, in his later years, was a sentimentalist and impressionist, advanced as a favourite argument in support of Home Rule for Ireland that it would lead to an "union of hearts," meaning, of course, such an union between the people of Ireland and the people of Great Britain. Surely, however, the condition precedent to that consummation would be an union of hearts between the two nations which combined constitute Ireland. No such union can be brought about by inflaming the embers of racial and religious incompatibility which were inactive, if not gradually dying out, under an equal and impartial administration.

John Bright was the author of a phrase which is not universally true, and which perhaps he only intended to be understood in a limited connection. It was a phrase which he applied—in his horror of coercion—to a former crisis in Irish affairs: "Force is no remedy." In its widest acceptance such a tenet would sound the knell of all law and order, and lead directly to chaos. But accepting for the moment the dictum in a limited sense, there is evidence that Mr. Bright had persuaded himself that the "village ruffians" of the days of the Land League were in reality pure patriots whom no repression would ever induce to indulge in rest until their high ideals had been realised. Sir Edward Carson, who was in closer touch with the situation, no doubt entertains a different opinion.

Mr. Bright's position—whether it was right or wrong—about the clients whom he had immediately in view, is unanswerable when applied to loyal Ulster. There can be no doubt that Protestant and prosperous Ulster abhors the idea of joining in communion with a Catholic majority, whose record shows nothing to engender confidence. It is all very well for an English political party in difficulties to proclaim that they have sponged the slate, that traditional tendencies no longer exist, that the age of miracles is not past, and that by effacing patent facts they cease to be existent.

That is a very comfortable attitude for all save Ulster. Ulster may be very unreasonable. Sir John Simon thinks she is, and challenges her to produce persecuted fellow-believers from the South and West of Ireland. Sir John Simon forgets the sponge we have referred to, and he also forgets how the lion lay down in all fraternity with the lamb on the eve of St. Bartholomew.

Assume, however, that Ulster is pig-headed, and cannot realise a truth which is obvious to all else. The fact is there. She refuses to be comforted; she declines to be cajoled. What alternative remains? Force—which is no remedy.

We say deliberately that, even if the electors of Great Britain, after a "formal appeal" had been made to them, voted for the suppression of Ulster's attachment to the Union as the safeguard of her religion and her liberties, the crime and the shame would indeed be shared by larger numbers, but the deliberate act of treachery would be emphasised when it could not be explained as the aberration of a few, but as the deliberate self-condemnation of a nation.

It now appears to be admitted by the mentors of the present administration that the question of Home Rule for Ireland was not before the constituencies as a primary issue at the latest General Election. That admission is, at all events, fatal to the passage of any such measure, until the constituencies have pronounced on it.

The honest method of referring the question would be as a single issue by means of the referendum. A reference such as that will not be adopted; the issue will be obscured in a whirlwind of passion coupled with appeals to greed and class-hatred. If truth emerges, it will not be because every means has not been adopted to misdirect the popular jurors.

For the moment the House of Commons occupies the stage. The ungenerous would desire to see that House display itself as unequal to its destinies and unfitted for its functions. Disclaiming a vestige of affection for the House as it exists, we still hope that we shall be surprised by a responsibility and dignity which antecedents afford little ground for expecting.

CECIL COWPER.

A Viennese Spectacle

WHEN, on Sunday, September 15, the wonderful Procession of Princes which summed up the success of the Eucharistic Congress had disappeared into the inner courts of the Palace, the rain ceased to fall for a few hours. The next morning was fine and bright. This action on the part of the weather moved a graceless heretic to say that Catholicism had received a blow from which it would still be reeling when Macaulay's New Zealander should desert the broken arch of Westminster Bridge in order to moralise on the spot where once the magnificent city of Vienna stood. The heavens, he submitted, had unmistakably shown their displeasure at this twentieth-century attempt to proclaim the outward and visible splendour of the Church, and the memory of the failure could never be blotted out. We replied that he deserved burning at a slow fire for his impudence. With all the strength of our deepest conviction we affirm that in no sense was that historic procession a failure, for we consider the spectacular effect, which was, of course, considerably marred, as of no importance at all, when the true significance of the Procession is considered. Naturally we should have preferred fine weather, and the comfort and greater happiness of the hundred thousand poor villagers who had come to share in the wonders of the great day. But they seemed to bear their trials with uncomplaining fortitude. Had the clouds passed away that morning, their eyes would have been more dazzled, and they would have witnessed the awful sight of the Mass celebrated on the top of the Burg Thor. But what they did see was enough, if their hearts could feel it too; they saw the triumph of their Church, the State expending all its force of majesty and pomp to do it honour.

In England we have seen pageants of deep historic interest, Sovereigns, alive and dead, honoured by unprecedented glory of monarchical and civic respect. But we have not known any sight so extraordinary as the union of ecclesiastical with kingly splendour which Vienna now has seen—the Pope's Ambassador going forth from the Cathedral to the Palace, bearing the Sacred Host, amid an innumerable company of prelates and clergy and tens of thousands of the people, preceded by a train of Cardinals and followed by the Head of the House of Hapsburg—this was indeed a sight worth seeing. We confess that we forgot to think about the weather or the spectacle. It was the page of history unfolding before our eyes, with all that had led up to it and made it possible, that took us in its thrall. The Legate, what a dynasty did he not represent! And brave old Francis Joseph! We may have seen the Archbishop of Canterbury in a procession. He comes of an ancient line, too, but his name does not inevitably suggest the history of Europe for nineteen hundred years. And though we looked on the aged Queen Victoria with a veneration that was almost superstitious, we could not conjure up thoughts of the whirl of European history for sixty years, as the sight of Francis Joseph does. Let us put aside the religious side of the Vienna festival as one on which it does not behove us to intrude; the political aspect, also, shall be passed over. As an historic occasion only, we will declare that the Eucharistic Procession was the most moving pageant we have seen, or consider it likely we shall ever see.

Unless one can conceive such a festival taking place in the Place de la Concorde, or the Piazza di San Pietro, we know of no more splendid site for such a pageant than the great Outer Court of the Royal Burg of Vienna; it is on so spacious a scale, so proudly surrounded by great buildings which, though not antique, are of magnificent proportions. The crowd would, of course, have been greater had the weather been favourable, but from the first moment of our reaching our place our interest and admiration were caught by the groups of gaily costumed peasants, who defied the rain with immense umbrellas and never looked uncheerful. Scarce two groups were alike; but all the men had wondrous jackets of cunning and brilliant embroidery, and plumed or be-flowered hats. Some of the men's hats were larger than any decreed by the most extravagant feminine fashions. But most remarkable was the countless throng of Bishops, mitred Abbots, Monsignori, who, with their attendant priests carrying their pastoral staves, were formed up in a deep line at the sides of the central avenue through which the Procession was to pass. It was like the realisation of some ecclesiastical crowd in one of Gentile Bellini's pictures. The good prelates sheltered themselves as best they might under their faithful umbrellas. But after the first glance we did not see the umbrellas, for our eyes were taken up by the magnificence of the copes and the mitres, and our thoughts dwelt on the reason that had brought them there. Presently the Life Guards came into view, and, after them, an unending cavalcade of the Empire's noblest youth, the Court Chamberlains. A gallant troop, surely, as ever rode before its Sovereign—such men, such horses, such uniforms!

Now came the train of what Disraeli would have emphatically allowed to be the "Great Nobles," in their state coaches, many, very many of them wearing the chain of the Toison d'Or round their necks. The long defile was very stately. Only one magnate had put his servants into mackintoshes. The rest, especially the Hungarians, showed all the gorgeousness of their "turnout." Bearers of names made illustrious by the deeds of their ancestors, they swept along, the proudest aristocracy of Europe. And now they were followed by Princes who had not inherited and may not transmit their rank. In royal carriages and six came the Cardinals, and, when the last had entered, we saw the smoke of incense under the Burg Thor, and the spectators bending their knee. Eight horses drew the beautiful glass coach in which great Maria Theresa went to the Coronation. Now its occupants were the Legate and the Cardinal of Vienna, a monstrance containing the Sacred Host resting in front of them on a cushion of white velvet. Acolytes swinging their censers and priests bearing crosiers, surrounded the coach which came up the Avenue in a solemn stillness, the people kneeling as it passed. But the silence was soon broken by shouts of "Hoch"; hats were being waved at the Burg Thor, and the Emperor, no one with him except Francis Ferdinand, the heir to the throne, advanced, attended by a splendid body of gentlemen-at-arms, and followed by all the archdukes. This was the supreme moment; the Great Sovereign following the representative of the Pope who bore the Symbol of the Monarch of all.

The procession turned to go round the Platz, and again came up the Avenue; this time the Legate held the monstrance in his hand and blessed the people with it. Had the rain allowed, the Cardinals were to have ascended to the top of the Thor, where an altar had been raised under a canopy, and there Mass would have been celebrated, and the Legate would have given the Pontifical blessing to all Vienna. This was not to be,and the Emperor, the Princes of the Church, the vast train of archdukes, and the nobles, vanished from sight into the inner Court. A noticeable absence of music was perhaps to be regretted. Military instruments sounded the Emperor's march; at one moment the crowd raised the beautiful Hymn of Hadyn, and once voices in the distance were believed to be chanting the Te Deum. But it was not till all was over that one had time to remember that stately music had not entered into the scheme. Its absence, like the presence of the rain, were matters too insignificant to be thought of at such a time. Of all that went before during the memorable week, the reception of the Legate, the daily Mass in the Cathedral, the Royal Communion in the Hofburg Chapel, the meetings attended by ten thousand persons every evening, the Communion of 6,000 children, we must not speak. But it would not be right to omit to praise the marvellous order and reverence so strikingly displayed at all times by the enormous crowds that filled Vienna. The visitors no doubt came to enjoy a holiday as well as to support by their presence the leaders of their Church. They proved that they deserved a holiday, and knew how to enjoy what was also a Holy Day.

Major and Minor Poetry

WE talk very glibly of minor poetry; and though "major poetry" is a less frequent phrase it is implied by the other. Nevertheless, I doubt whether many of us have a very precise idea as to what constitutes the difference between the two. Precise definitions are a danger rather than an aid in criticism; and those who too confidently make them are apt to find themselves overwhelmed with the exceptions to their own rules. Still, in avoiding dogma, one should keep clear of the absolutely vague. It is as well to have some sort of meaning to attach to the terms one uses.

The difference between major poetry and minor (instinct tells us) is not merely the difference between good and bad. Many a poem, bad enough in the result, has been very major in its conception. Much verse which is plainly minor is, within its limits, very good indeed. Besides, bad poetry is not poetry at all, and is no concern of the critics. Nor is the difference one of length. A little poem of Shelley, six lines long, a rescued fragment of Sappho, is something more than minor. The long minor poem is rarer, and often fails of effect, but Gresset's "Vert-Vert" and "The Rape of the Lock" are examples thereof.

We have been gaily labelling specific pieces with our terms, when the meaning of those terms is still to be stated. But the literary critic must needs be an empiric. It is simply on the comparison of a number of pieces which I feel to be major, with others which I feel to be minor, that I hazard my definition. Major poetry is that which inspires; minor poetry that which delights. Here we have one of those spiritual distinctions which alone can be applied to so spiritual a matter as art. A cloud cannot be cut with a knife, but it may be pierced by a sunbeam.

For example, there is nothing more delightful than "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" or "The Night Piece to Julia":—

Her eyes the glow-worm lend thee,
The shooting stars attend thee;
And the elves also,
Whose little eyes glow
Like sparks of fire, befriend thee.

No Will-o'-th'-Wisp mislight thee;
Nor snake or slow-worm bite thee:
But on, on thy way,
Not making a stay,
Since ghost there's none to affright thee.

Let not the dark thee cumber;
What though the moon does slumber?
The stars of the night
Will lend thee their light,
Like tapers clear without number.

Then Julia let me woo thee,
Thus, thus to come unto me:
And when I shall meet
Thy silvery feet,
My soul I'll pour into thee.

This faëry charm is one of the peculiar glories of English poetry. Herrick's place among the immortals is as assured as Shakespeare's own. Nevertheless, he is a minor poet. He is not of the company of Shakespeare and Milton and Shelley, though, in his own limits, as perfect an artist as any of them. It is the limits which are significant. Herrick delights us: we love him. He does not inspire us; we do not stand in awe of him. He is no sacer vates. Compare the "Night Piece," not with such a tremendous utterance of the God-gifted organ voice as the sonnet on the Piedmont massacre, but with perhaps the most genial poem which Milton ever wrote:

Lawrence, of virtuous father virtuous son,
Now that the fields are dank and ways are mire,
Where shall we sometimes meet, and by the fire

Help waste a sullen day, what may be won
From the hard season gaining? Time will run
On smoother, till Favonius re-inspire
The frozen earth, and clothe in fresh attire
The lily and rose, that neither sowed nor spun.
What neat repast shall feast us, light and choice,
Of Attic taste, with wine, whence we may rise
To hear the lute well-touched, or artful voice
Warble immortal notes and Tuscan air?
He who of these delights can judge, and spare
To interpose them oft, is not unwise.

Here is no portentous message for humanity, but the thoughts of a scholarly gentleman who loved to "mix good wine with chat." Yet I believe that if he had never seen another line of Milton, a sensitive reader would feel the power in reserve, would know himself the partaker of a great man's hour of ease. Solemnity and seriousness are not the same thing in art. Shakespeare did not cease to be a serious artist when he wrote comedy. Milton had an attitude towards life clearer and more masterful than that of lesser men. He believed in his own point of view, and every line he wrote was a challenge to the world to accept it. That is the way with great writers. They are passionate men who wish to create the world anew. Because we read and forget, or are lured away by the different vision of some other of the godlike, they may be said to fail. But they have a momentary success; and this success is capable of eternal repetition. It is repeated as often as their work is contemplated by a mind capable of appreciating greatness. Therefore they do not fail, but are kings eternally recrowned. "Les grands artistes," wrote Maupassant, "sont ceux qui imposent à l'humanité leur illusion particulière." He spoke the truth. You cannot admire the form of a work of art while disapproving of its contents. The artist, of serious intent, who does not convince—the conviction need only be for an hour—is a bore and a failure indeed. Without being a Christian one can enjoy the great strains of a cathedral organ; but only because, for the listening time, one is a fervent convert. Not only the poets themselves, but their readers also, "become what they sing": stoic or voluptuary, devil or god.

With the minor poet it is different. He does not breathe his passion into us; for he has no passion. He has a fancy more alert than ours, a swifter apprehension of the lights and shades and humours of the world. Where we see a daisy he sees a fairy; what is to us a pot of rouge may be to him a mocking imp crying "Vive la bagatelle!" and "Memento mori" in a breath. He makes us see these things as he sees them; but as pleasant embellishments, not as fundamental alterations of the world. For that is how he regards them. He is not a prophet, does not wish to impose on us a new scheme of things. That is his charm, and why he is sometimes a relief from his more serious brother. We speak of Herrick and others of his time as "of the tribe of Ben." The phrase may be given a double meaning. For the minor poet is the younger son of the Muses, and perhaps their favourite.

William Morris

William Morris: A Critical Study. By JOHN DRINKWATER. (Martin Secker. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Life of William Morris. By J. W. MACKAIL. Two volumes. (Longmans, Green, and Co. 4s. net.)

IN his "Conclusion" to this excellent study of William Morris Mr. Drinkwater draws attention to the curious position that Morris has among English poets. As he elsewhere justly says, all poets work in an isolation that no literary derivation can adequately bridge; but in the case of Morris this isolation was peculiar. If it is possible to account for "The Earthly Paradise" by the fact that the "Canterbury Tales" had been written, and that Morris was a whole-hearted lover of Chaucer, whom he bravely hailed as his master, it is not so easy to account for "Sigurd the Volsung." It is a thing entirely by itself in our literature. Similarly, even as there is no satisfactory ancestry for Morris, he has left little, if any, trace in the work of his successors.

It is this, partly, that explains the undeniable fact that there are many who habitually omit to think of Morris as amongst the poets: this, and the thing behind it of which it stands as a symptom. There was only one other poet of his day who used the same large canvas; and that was Browning. After Mr. Drinkwater's protests against the contrast of poet with poet we feel diffident at contrasting the author of "The Ring and the Book" with the author of "The Earthly Paradise"; yet they illustrate an interesting difference of mental vision, the more so as each poet is now claiming his kingdom as never before. For even on his largest canvases Browning was ever intensive; whereas Morris was invariably extensive. In their varying degree and capacity other poets could be drunk on the wonderful wine that the gods might pour into a single superb line, or a single adventurous phrase; and the majority of those to whom poetry means the high sacrament of being are of the same inclination; but Morris turned aside from such wayside beauties—that are yet not by any means merely wayside—to work out a large workmanship that should be independent of the individual wonder of its parts. It was partly, we believe, owing to the speed at which he worked—partly, despite Mr. Drinkwater, a carelessness as to the inner spiritual significance of poetry; but the result was a poetry that looked on life rather from without than from within—that was spacious and mighty, but mighty rather in its ease than in its excitement, in the nobler meaning of both words.

Mr. Drinkwater himself sees this quite clearly. "Having no superficially subtle or complex statement to make," he says, "and keeping always before him the purpose to produce a memorable cumulative effect without striving at all for isolated felicities of phrasing, he is never forced to pause for the fitting word." It is one of the few sentences in which he permits himself to depart from the high standard he has set himself throughout his book. Subtle or complex statements need not necessarily be superficial; and a memorable cumulative effect need not be deterred by the fitting word or an isolated felicity of phrasing—indeed, it is not inconceivable that it might be furthered thereby. We seem to notice a similar confusion somewhat earlier in the book, when we read that "The close of 'The Ode to the West Wind' crystallises a mental attitude of which Morris was temperamentally incapable. But it is, of course, a mistake to suppose that the beauty of his poetry suffers in consequence." The "of course," we should have thought, was quite the other way. Morris's incapability to one manner of beauty might well have opened his mind to another manner of beauty; but the loss of the first beauty remains a loss nevertheless. A third aspect of the same thing, and the somewhat difficult position Mr. Drinkwater's otherwise sane championship leads him into, is seen when he says still later in the book that "Morris in his poetry simplified his aim by steadily eliminating two things—inquiry into the unknown, and all endeavour to 'set the crooked straight'"; and then adds on the following page that Morris "in his poetry presupposes a life where the natural impulses of men are unfettered by all save eternal circumstance." But what is this "eternal circumstance" save an inquiry into the unknown; and what is the presupposition but a manner of setting the crooked straight?

These things are more closely connected than might appear. For the glory of sudden lines, the attitude of mind revealed in the close of "The Ode to the West Wind," and an adventure to inquire into the unknown, are nearly inevitably found together; and their united absence from Morris's poetry is just the cause of that curious isolation and misunderstanding he as a poet has had to meet. Those who read Mr. Drinkwater's chapters on the "Narrative Poems" and "Sigurd the Volsung" will have another excellency finely because sympathetically, and justly, because enthusiastically, arrayed before them; but Morris will always have against him the fact that he told his matter straight forth rather than made it a ritual of beauty. It is the curious case of his simplicity being an obstruction where the complexities of other men are an aid.

We have disagreed with Mr. Drinkwater on these incidental points with a feeling of considerable diffidence. For, apart from the fact that Morris has clearly sung in the centre of his soul—which is enough to arm any man against all-comers—this is one of the sanest and wisest books of criticism we have read for many days. It is not only that it, simply and unostentatiously, lays emphasis on just that which is necessary, letting the rest take its importance by implication, so effecting the rather rare beauty of a well-poised whole. This is itself not a thing easy to find. But its outlook on all that poetry is concerned with is so sane, clean and healthy. It is a book that is good to read for the health of one's soul—and that is another virtue none too widely distributed. To those who may think we speak excessively we can but recommend a careful perusal of the opening and closing chapters of the book. It often happens that by dealing with some question that may seem to have no particular reference to a man's work we may expound and illuminate that work best. Scientists may work from the particular to the general; with the result that they never arrive at the general. Wise men work from the general to the particular; with the result that the particular becomes charged with vital and intense importance. It is this that Mr. Drinkwater does in these chapters, and in other pages of his book; thereby expounding best to us what Morris means to him. And it is in his attitude toward these things that lie behind Morris's art, and all art, that he shows himself wise in the highest sense of being right.

Mr. Mackail's "Life" is, of course, indispensable to the student of Morris; and its publication in Messrs. Longman's well-known Pocket Library should introduce it to a wider public. Except for the elimination of some of the plates, it is the same in text and substance as the Library Edition at eight times the cost. That is enough to bespeak the value of these handy little books. In a biography Mr. Mackail wisely eschews critical details, and takes the reader, with possibly some excess of circumstance, through the busy days of a man who accomplished a stupendous amount of work. It is for the critical examination that one turns to Mr. Drinkwater. To say that his is the best book on Morris's work and poetry is to say something neither here nor there. It is written by an earnest self-respecting artist; and he will therefore understand us when we say that his book will be its own best service—it will lead as nothing yet has done to the proper understanding and appreciation of Morris, and so back again to itself. For ourselves, we have begun to re-read "Sigurd the Volsung."

The Seminar and the Cemetery

Luke Shepherd. Ein Satirendichter der englischen Reformationszeit. By DR. FRIEDRICH GERMANN. (Lampart. Augsburg.)

Adelaide Anne Procter. Ihr Leben und Ihre Werke. By FERDINAND JANKU. (Braumüller. Vienna and Leipzig. 4 marks 50.)

Arthur Hugh Clough. By PAULA LUTONSKY. (Braumüller. Vienna and Leipzig.)

ENGLISH Literature is a vast cemetery, where critics, historians, and monographers, mostly of foreign speech, dig up the graves of forgotten reputations, for any chance treasure they may conceal; or, not infrequently, we suspect, for the sheer joy of the digging, and for the exercise of the craft to which they have been apprenticed. We doubt, for instance, whether Dr. Germann can feel any very deep satisfaction, except, of course, from the high "Art for Art" standpoint, at the results of his conscientious investigations into the case of Luke Shepherd, Protestant satirist. He has used the opportunity, it is true, to give us a very good little historical sketch of Reformation satire; he has collected together all there was to be collected about his principal subject, and he has shown a considerable talent for ingenious conjecture.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Dr. Germann has no great enthusiasm for his immediate subject: at many points in his work he admits Luke Shepherd's limitations, but nowhere does he more completely damp any possible ardour of interest on the part of his readers than when he says, "Mangel an poetischem Empfinden ist geradezu ein Hauptkennzeichen seiner Dichtungen." It is not that Shepherd has anything to offer us in compensation for this prime defect. He has no style to speak of, and his matter is directly traceable to various German sources, especially to Manuel and Hans Sachs. Yet he showed some dramatic power in his least characteristic satire, "John Bon and Mast Person"; and he merits some attention, for he was, according to Dr. Germann, the most popular satirist, after Shelton, of the age. He eschewed coarseness, and he had an extraordinary knowledge of Reformation literature. Of his life and personality almost nothing is known; he is identified with Lucas Opilio, and appears to have been a physician. Possibly his Christian name has something to do with this conjecture. Internal and external evidence, cleverly handled by his present biographer, points to the years 1547-48 as the period when most of the poems were composed. The appendix contains some unpublished satires.

Adelaide Anne Procter resembles Shepherd through the fact that, this time according to Coventry Patmore, she was, for a moment, only second in popularity to one poet—Tennyson. In another respect she is the pole of Shepherd—she stood for Roman Catholicism, to which she was a convert, against the rationalised Anglicanism of the early Nineteenth Century. Her fame has been largely eclipsed, and it is doubtful whether the most universally known of her lyrics, the "Lost Chord," will avail against oblivion. The "Legend of Provence" may be enjoying a temporary revival through its association with the recent performance of the "Miracle." The "Legend of Bregenz" is to be heard from the lips of reciters, and there are many persons to be found not much past the middle age to whom Miss Procter's works were once a "livre de chevet." Dr. Janku justly considers that she has the advantage over the Preraphaelites in the matter of saneness; on the other hand, she was behind them in ardour and impulsiveness. Her unfortunate love affair and her resulting conviction that life is sacrifice, supply, in the judgment of our author, the key to her life and writings. She was always on the side of the poor or oppressed, and believed that personal devotion must bear its fruit.

Arthur Hugh Clough was almost her contemporary, and his life presents many striking resemblances to hers. He also died young; he was touched by the same doubts and sympathies; and his happiness also nearly suffered shipwreck in an early love affair. He acted as one, finely observes his biographer, "der nicht den Mut zum Glücke hat." But he belongs in other respects to another generation from that of Miss Procter's. He was of the doubting generation, of those who walked without hope, or with a hope they dared not define. But there was a fund of youthfulness in him that preserved him from the deeper hopelessness that pervades Matthew Arnold's poetry. Frau Lutonsky well indicates Clough's debt to German sources—a debt that he shared with his friends, Carlyle and Emerson; but we are a little puzzled by her suggesting a comparison with Ibsen. She hardly insists enough on the part that Oxford had in the formation of his character, his point of view, and his style. The "Bothie" is, in more ways than one, among the greatest of essentially Oxford poems. With these reservations, which are, after all, open to controversy, we have nothing but praise for this biography. It goes directly to the point, contains, besides the essential, many valuable reflections and intuitions, and is probably the best study that we have met among the later volumes of this series.

Shall England Blossom like the Rose?

Colour in the Home. By E. J. DUVEEN. Illustrated. (George Allen and Co. 42s. net.)

"BLUE is discordant in juxtaposition to green, and in a less degree so with purple," says our author. Well, ask the Japanese. So Mr. Duveen plunges into the tangle of Art, as do most writers, without any basic concept of the intention of Art, and by consequence his large and sumptuous volume is one large confusion of Art and Craftsmanship. But let that pass. He opens with the common assertion that "it is impossible to attain to a national taste in art and colour such as has been long characteristic of Continental nations." Now it so happens that the British genius not only has a fine national taste in art and colour, but that the genius of Turner created all that is most significant and of the supreme rank in modern Continental art, whilst the genius of Beardsley created and inspired the whole modern Continental endeavour in line! That a book founded on so false a foundation should be worth five minutes' consideration sounds impossible, yet the book is worth perusal.

Setting aside the fact that the English furniture craftsmen and the English architects of the eighteenth century were the purest and greatest in their age, and that the reputation of Britain is therefore amongst the highest, we are unfortunately led by Mr. Duveen to no new developments in the decoration of the Home; at the same time, though it is scarcely new ground, the examples of a bygone time are sound enough, and the deductions are sound enough. But Mr. Duveen, in spite of careful reading, will find it an impossible task to educate Taste—a still more impossible task to teach colour. Taste is latent and born in the bone. And the moment that a man tries to lay down laws as to what Black or Red or Pink arouses in our senses, he essays a pathetically hopeless task, from which emerges only the narrowness of his own perceptions. It is a painter's lifelong career to make colour-harmonies arouse impressions in our senses. Unfortunately few painters have this power. And Mr. Duveen shares the mistake which kills Art in the academic, for he does not realise that old pictures are rarely to be seen in their original colour-vitality, but are seen by us embrowned and lowered, a ghost of their primal intentions. Therefore, to tune up a room to an old master is to sacrifice vitality of colour to the solemn and splendid pomp of death.

At the very moment that Mr. Duveen calls for taste in colour he means taste for dead colour. And as it is, for only too many of our municipal grocers and governors, the Union Jack ought to be chocolate and cream and mud-colour instead of the healthy and gorgeous red, white, and blue. Often, as I pass in the street, I see the house-painters priming a house-front with white, and the place becomes a revelation of fine colour and beauty of form—but I try to avoid the street thereafter, for I know that it will be made "cream-colour" or some more dingy shade. It is all left, presumably, to the family plumber—just in the same way a woman with a sallow skin prefers to wear sallow dresses! But none of this is inherent bad taste; it is "artiness"; and if your Britisher were only courageous enough not to give a tinker's trough for his neighbour's opinion, he would blossom forth like the rose. Mr. Duveen gives us elaborate scientific analysis of colours; but all such schooling, which is the A B C of an art-student's training, has never yet brought forth art, which is a subtle thing, and must be discovered by each one of us according to the degree in which the Great Designer has granted the revelation to us. The lines and forms of a past design help to inspire us; but if we would reach to a personal and national achievement of our own age, we must create our own design—and the icy hands of the dead masters grip us by the throat, and, for the most part, strangle us—as, I strongly suspect, they threaten to strangle the song in Mr. Duveen. The shadow of the National Gallery darkens more than Trafalgar Square.

HALDANE MACFALL.

Oxford Elegiacs

Charmides, and Other Poems, Chiefly Relating to Oxford. By GASCOIGNE MACKIE. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 2s. 6d. net.)

Oxford Poems. By H. W. GARROD. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

OXFORD, burdened with years, haunted by the lost youth of many generations, heavy with the sadness of learning, offers an attractive setting to the elegiac poet. A visionary with a sufficiently mournful imagination might picture it very romantically as a city of the dead, its ghostly towers rising forlornly—by moonlight, of course—over the deserted streets and silent, grass-grown quadrangles. Neither of these gentlemen, be it said, demands quite such a mise en scène, but it is certainly curious that two independent poets should come forward at once with "Oxford" verse which is throughout characterised by an elegiac quality.

There is, however, a considerable difference in the spirit of the two volumes. Mr. Mackie's elegiac is sweetly sad, a web of cherished memories, unspoiled, if tinged with melancholy, by the grievous rapine of the years. The greater part of the book is occupied by a revised re-issue of the title-poem, first published fourteen years ago. This presents a rather remarkable memorial to a schoolboy friendship, and one not unworthy in point of art. It is cast in a sequence of short poems, of the uniform length of sixteen unrhymed pentameter lines, which, in spite of the liberal irregularity, are practically sonnets, marked by scholarly workmanship, purity of feeling and felicitous expression. Mr. Mackie's verse has an even flow which yet is innocent of commonplaceness, a finish which betrays little artificiality, and a pleasing variety of rhythm. His description has much grace, and his lute does not shirk the elusive moods of thought and feeling. This of the poet's imprisoned ecstasy in the presence of Spring impressed us as particularly happy:—

> . . . . all my heart
> Unutterably throbs—a sunlit heaven
> Of hidden stars—waiting for night to come.

Of the additional poems the most striking is a double sonnet on the occasion of the Milton Tercentenary. There are more echoes of Oxford that have a pleasantly pensive ring, and much pretty miniature-work, such as this:—

> The redbreast, eyeing where the gardener digs,
> Wears not a mantle from so rich a loom
> As yonder shrub, when her thick leafless twigs
> Are clothed in clustering cusps of crimson bloom.

> Here will the flowering almond waste away
> Almost before the thrush has learnt to sing,
> Here will the mulberry grudge to fickle May
> The last and loveliest of the leaves of Spring.

Mr. Garrod is elegiac with a deeper sadness. His are the accents of Faust in his Gothic chamber, the minor cadences of one who has been strangely unfitted to battle with boisterous life—still less fitted, perhaps, to face it from the enervating confines of the study. His verse is disillusioned; its recurrent refrain, omnia vanitas. Sometimes it grates a little, as when he plays the part of the corpse at a "Bump Supper," or when he consoles a youth who has lost a boat race, with a philosophy of heavier despair. More wistfully, more manfully, but still with a deep sadness, he addresses another, "ὦ πεπον, ἐι μεν γὰρ . . ."

> But now, since still with truceless eyes
> The bitter ghosts of troubled thought
> Wage on our dearest privacies
> Unceasing war, unseen, unsought—
> Why, better then with strengthless arm
> To speed an unavailing spear
> Than wait upon a hidden harm
> And die before a formless fear.

Once again, in "ακιὰς ὄναρ," a more virile note is sounded, but he is haunted perpetually by the "hidden harms" and "formless fears," the phantom assailants of that unseen, unsought warfare. His familiar vision is of:

. . . . the fields without their dew
And the friends with altered eyes; and his lament is of perished ideals and the mortality of high enthusiasms—as when he confesses, by way of deterrent, to "One who Desired a Fellowship":—

Once—we were once as other men:
We moved the world, we felt it shake:
Grandly we gave to joy and pain
Hearts that were great enough to break.

. . . . . .

To-day some god with voice of gold,
Or angel with a flaming sword,
Might come and, speaking, leave us cold,
Or, doing something, find us bored.

Yet there is an indubitable distinction of merit in these poems; a straightforwardness, a nicety of expression, a cleanness of chiselling, that triumphs in a singular simplicity and sameness of metrical form. With very few exceptions—about eight or ten short pieces—the iambic tetrameter line is solely employed. It is set with many a memorable, many a mordant phrase. There is trenchant art, to glance back at the verse last quoted, in that wonderfully expressive, blasé "doing something" as the description of the angelic errand. There is, after all, a poetry of disillusionment, and Mr. Garrod can write it.

Bayreuth and Wagner

Bayreuth and the Wagner Theatre. By ANNA BAHR-MILDENBURG and HERMANN BAHR. Translated by T. W. MAKEPEACE. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE laws of copyright will have a great influence on Bayreuth by the end of 1913. What precisely the effect will be is a matter of doubt. Some say that when all the late works of Wagner are free Bayreuth will lose its magnetic power. Others argue that, on the contrary, the increase of Wagner performances elsewhere have but served to whet the appetite for Bayreuth. The most acute question is that of "Parsifal," which any manager with adequate resources will be able to produce after the 31st December, 1913. That this problem of resources limits the possible number of productions is not really to the point: it does not affect the question whether in principle it is right that the Bayreuth monopoly should be extended. It seems that, from the prosaic standpoint of the practical politician a German law for prolonged it is an impossibility; but none the less there are bold, chivalrous souls ready to fight for a "Lex-Parsifal," deaf alike to all arguments of the parliamentarian and to the suggestions from the plain man that Wagner in 1912 would probably not feel as he felt in 1882, when the prospects of an intelligent performance outside Bayreuth were remote. As it is, Paris and Vienna propose to play "Parsifal" in 1914, and it is not an exaggeration to say that we may expect in both places performances which will compare well with those of Bayreuth.

Among the protagonists of the "Parsifal" campaign the poet and playwright Hermann Bahr has a prominent place, and he has issued a confession of faith which makes good reading. Incidentally he gives away part of his case by confessing that there are shortcomings in Bayreuth and that it tends to do the very thing against which Wagner fought with his very life-blood—to suppress the individuality of the artist, to impose on him the laws of a rigid, unbending tradition—a tradition, moreover, which does not necessarily in all its details derive its sanction from the founder himself. On this point nothing is to be added to that which Weingartner said more than twenty years ago. None the less, that Bayreuth exercises an irresistible magic is true, and for this Herr Bahr pleads eloquently, with a real earnestness of conviction which cannot fail to attract, though we know that he is pleading a lost cause. His arguments are more effective than the unreasoning pæans of his wife, Frau Anna Bahr-von Mildenburg, the famous singer, who cannot see any human weakness in Frau Cosima or Siegfried, and asks us to bow the knee in worship at the wonderful spectacle of Siegfried eating a sandwich of bread made by human hands and beef and ham not heaven-born.

The translator of the book has not done his work badly, but shows a monumental carelessness in dealing with proper names. For instance, Frau Wagner's daughter is Isolde Beidler, not Beitler; there is no prima donna called Seffler-Burckhardt; her name is Leffler-Burckhardt. The famous régisseur is not Herr Kranicks, but Herr Kranich; and what fearful kind of wildfowl are "the Kräüse"? Moreover, to speak of "Bandmaster" Müller is surely very near to lèse majesté. Lastly, his habit of quoting German with its inflections is irritating, and usually wrong, as, for example: "There is never an empty spot, einen Leeren Flecken." Why an accusative case? The answer probably is, because in the German original we read, "Esgiebt Keinen leeren Flecken"; and, lastly, adjectives in German are not printed with capitals.

Massenet's Souvenirs

Mes Souvenirs, 1848-1912. By J. E. F. MASSENET. (Pierre Lafitte and Cie., Paris.)

THE death of Massenet is so recent that practically all that had to be said about him has been said. It was not generally known, however, that at the moment of his death he was correcting the last proofs of his Autobiography, which has just been published under the title of "Mes Souvenirs, 1848-1912," by MM. Pierre Lafitte and Cie. It has a very dithyrambic preface by his pupil Xavier Leroux, and by way of appendix a selection from his public orations. The volume is rather in the shape of an intimate causerie with his grandchildren than a systematic narrative, and will no doubt give a good deal of trouble to his official biographer, who has to pay strict attention to chronological accuracy. Its value is somewhat impaired by the fact that Massenet, always a diplomatist and a courtier, did not change his rôle in writing these memoirs. Foreseeing that a good deal of what he had put down would probably be read by those whom it concerned, he seems careful not to say anything except smooth things about all the people he had to deal with in the course of his long career. A reading of the book makes much the same impression as listening to some of his music, with its never-ending flow of not always very significant sweetness; in this way it has an interest as a sort of complement to his operas. At the very beginning, however, there is one striking piece of self-revelation. He says that all through his life he was oppressed by a doubt whether he had really been meant for a musical career, for his great affection had always been for the exact sciences.

His progress was singularly free from the troubles and anxieties which have beset most musicians, and there are not many exciting incidents. Among other things he relates that his first appearance behind the scenes was on the occasion when Berlioz conducted the first performance of "The Childhood of Christ," when another young friend of the same age smuggled him in among the chorus. His lodging happened to be near the Cirque Napoléon; from its windows he could hear the Pasdeloup Concerts, and it was in this way that he made his first acquaintance with the orchestral masterpieces. He relates that one of the few dramatic incidents of his life was when he conducted the first performance of his oratorio "Eve." Thinking that his mother had been present, he went to her house, to find that she had died suddenly in the course of the evening, and his mourning was interrupted by a friend who announced to him his nomination to the Legion of Honour. A curious coincidence attended the publication of his first song, "Chanson d'Avril," which had been refused by several publishers. He was just carrying the twice-rejected manuscript upstairs to his attic, when a young man introduced himself, saying that he knew who Massenet was and that he was just starting a publishing business, and would be glad to enter into negotiations with him. The song made the fortune of Massenet and of the young publisher, Hartmann.

The history of "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" is interesting. On one occasion after a journey he came back to Egremont to find a large accumulation of correspondence; among the packets was a libretto. At first he was inclined to throw it aside, but after looking at a few pages he was very much attracted by it, and read it through, only to find that it was anonymous. He inquired from the porter of his house in Paris what was the origin of the mysterious parcel, and was told that the bearer had left his name and address with the porter, but had made him promise on his oath not to reveal his name to M. Massenet until he had decided to set the text to music. When the score was finished, the composer discovered that the author was an old friend of his boyhood, Maurice Léna. It will surprise those who think that Massenet had no difficulties in his later life with any of his works to hear that it was a long time before any theatre could be found bold enough to undertake the production of a work without a heroine. Another detail which may interest the curious is that the score was written at a table which had once belonged to Diderot.

There are not many of the bon mots which derive their charm from their malice in the work; but one may quote the saying that the music of Hiller is "so like that of Gade that it might have been written by Mendelssohn"; also the saying of Auber when Massenet got his first Prix de Rome, that ".this young man will go far when he has less experience." One other story is rather characteristic, and also may be quoted. A young lady, afterwards the well-known artist, Mme. Julia Guirardon, was very proud of having been applauded by Massenet when she competed for a prize at the Conservatoire. An envious rival said to her, "Massenet always applauds people who sing his own music"—but the music sung happened to be an air from Halévy's "La Juive."

German Literature

Outlines of the History of German Literature. By J. G. ROBERTSON. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

WE have often wondered how "Outlines of the History of" a national literature is written. Can the author have read all the thousand works—"tedious and unreadable" some of them, containing "over 18,000 verses," and written, more often than not, in a crabbed and archaic dialect—to which he so glibly refers? Can he have glanced at all the modern authorities? Or has he only "just heard of them," like the cultured and adhesive Scot in "Brugglesmith"? We suppose that the truth lies somewhere between these two extremes, though the latitude thus obtained is so enormous that we do not appear much nearer to a solution. There are no doubt traditional lines well marked out for the historian's guidance. Some names and some works are indispensable; some others must stand because they always have stood; their reputation has gone, their merits are forgotten, but they have become an essential part of history. A reputation can never die eternally when once it has received the baptism of history. Other reputations have still to be launched or confirmed, and here the historian's more impressive functions begin. But one basic fact remains; no critic can be so impartial and omniscient as to speak with the authority of knowledge about every period and every region in the sphere of his cognisance.

We are conscious that we are a little missing the point of such a work as this of Professor Robertson's. It is an abridgment of his larger work on the same subject, and claims immunity from the more searching tests of criticism through the modesty of its pretensions. It is plainly intended for school use, and we may safely say that it is in every way adequate to its purpose. The one lacuna that we have found to regret is the absence of the little tags that stimulate the imagination of the student, and that have made of Mr. Stopford Brooke's little introduction to English Literature so valuable and suggestive a work. Two lines of "Faust" or "Die

Glocke" or "Wallenstein" leave more seed in the memory than pages of the soundest criticism.

It is possible that the number of names that occur in this volume is excessive, but the elementary student has the remedy in his own hands, and it helps to give value to the work as a book of reference. The chronological table, on the other hand, with its parallel incidents from English literary history, is an admirable feature. Professor Robertson has done well to insist on all the points of contact existing between the two literatures. The power of association finds its most certain outlet under this method.

The author rightly insists on the intimate connection between literary and political history. The old German Empire meant regionalism—if the word has come into English—Professor Robertson calls it "the spirit of place"; it was so at the beginning, and it was so on the eve of 1871. The modern German Empire means imperialism—that is the pursuit of formulæ that will cover many variations and discover an essential type. Every literary period corresponds to an historical period. Moreover, "absence of continuity is a distinguishing feature of Germany's literary as well as her political history." Revolution is, in her case, the elder sister of Evolution. And theory and practice do not always go hand in hand, as Professor Robertson, with admirable scepticism, points out in more than one place. The great Frederick, for instance, while trying to curse with the curse of Gallomania, could only bestow a most efficient blessing on a national German Literature. The Seventeenth Century is justly decried, but a compensation is implied in the golden age of the German hymn.

The thorny period of German Literature is undoubtedly the conflict between Classicism and Romanticism. Professor Robertson is as clear as anyone could hope to be on the subject, though we doubt if he would like to give concise definitions of the two movements in presence. But at least he has brought enthusiasm to the task, and, while he appears at times rather less than sympathetic towards the Classicism of the Great Period, he has said enough to justify the consistency of his bold pronouncement that "the supreme achievement of that century was neither England's material and political prosperity, nor France's great Revolution, but the humane classicism of Weimar." With the great men of that movement he has dealt generously; he even thinks —wrongly, we hold—an apology necessary for having given them so much space. It is still possible to believe with Carlyle that it is the great men that matter, or that the greater includes the less. With regard to Schiller, one of the poets who has been sometimes regarded, with some justice, as the prince of international bores, Professor Robertson sounds the right note. A great national poet is not always, and it is not always necessary that he should be, an international success. Your "article d'exportation" is to be mistrusted in literature. And Schiller was, and in a large sense still is, "pre-eminently the national poet of the German people."

The Poets of Ireland. By D. J. O'DONOGHUE. (Hodges, Figgis and Co., Dublin. 21. net.)
A Guide to Books on Ireland. By S. J. BROWN, S.J. (Hodges, Figgis and Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

IT is part of the awakening of Literature in Ireland that such books as these should be published. There was a need for them, however much, from the standpoint of the literary man in London, they may seem to be superfluous. Neither of these two books is more than a catalogue; yet catalogues may be, and should be, in the hands of the wise, guides to considerable riches. In order to be this, however, they need to be accurate and complete. Those who know Mr. O'Donoghue will not need to be assured of the accuracy of the work he takes in hand. We have checked this dictionary of "The Poets of Ireland" at all points, and in no case have we found him wanting. It even includes books published so lately as last year; and readers of THE ACADEMY will find several of its contributors, present as well as past, with the honour of mention within its pages. Moreover, Mr. O'Donoghue's research has placed to the credit of Ireland several names in English Literature, both among the Elizabethans and later writers. The difficulty of such a work, on lines where there was no previous book of any kind to help him, is obvious. There can be no question that in the future it will be of vast assistance in the study of a literature that seems as though it will develop to a position of commanding importance. It is, we note, the complete and definitive edition of a book that for some twenty years has issued in sheets from Mr. O'Donoghue's own residence.

The same accuracy and completeness cannot be claimed for "A Guide to Books on Ireland." For one thing, it is more unequally up to date. Some quite recent writers are included; others are omitted, and that always destroys one's feelings of trust in a book of reference. Moreover, the author does not seem to know very well who are and who are not Irish writers, once he gets outside what may be called the happy Dublin band. Then his comments on some of the books are distinctly parsonical. No compiler need hint to us that the Christian mysteries should not be treated as folk-lore. Yet we must not seem over-churlish, for we have already made constant and useful reference to its pages.

Masterpieces of Music. Edited by E. HATZFELD. THE new series of music books, just issued by Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack, are very commendable in every way, and will be greatly appreciated by those people who love music and are interested in the lives of the various composers. Six masters of music are separately dealt with in the first six volumes, and include the names at the head of this note. It is a very good idea on the part of the publishers to engage competent musical authorities such as Sir Frederic Cowen, Mr. Landon Ronald, and Mr. Fred Corder to write the introductions; and as each musician's life is treated, attention is strictly confined to that part of it, and to that part only, which concerns his work and helps to mould his art. The method of treatment is very similar to that of a most enjoyable lecture we heard at the London Institution in February last, when Mr. Josiah Booth gave an address on "The Songs and Ballads of Sir Arthur Sullivan." Each volume contains about thirty pages of music selected from some of the best movements of the composer, and care has been taken to print this part of the book on better paper than that used for the letterpress. This is good foresight, as those who have the handling of music pages well know the dilapidated state in which old favourites very often get if the paper is not of a good quality.

WE have now received the third dozen volumes of this deservedly popular series, each one of which will serve at least as an admirable introduction to a more profound study of the subject with which it deals. At the present day we are all more or less bound to take an interest in aviation, which in the near future bids fair to revolutionise the course of our daily existence. Therefore "Aviation, its Principles, its Present and Future," by Sidney F. Walker, R.N., is a welcome volume and an excellent primer for the student of aerial navigation. In addition to an historical chapter, there are others dealing with the balloon and the dirigible, the glider and the aeroplane, with many explanatory illustrations. "Syndicalism," by J. H. Harley, M.A., is another volume dealing with a subject which is occupying many men's minds at the moment. "The Evolution of Living Organisms," by E. S. Goodrich, M.A., F.R.S., with illustrations, may be read in conjunction with "Embryology, the Beginnings of Life," by Professor Gerald Leighton, M.D., F.R.S.E.; and "Dietetics," by Alexander Bryce, M.D., D.P.H., is another volume on a somewhat kindred subject. Star-gazers will take an interest in "Practical Astronomy with the Unaided Eye," by H. Macpherson, jun., F.R.A.S., which contains many figures in the text; while those inclined to the occult will welcome "Theosophy," by Mrs. Annie Besant, President of the Theosophical Society, whose portrait is given as a frontispiece. There is a capital biography of "Oliver Cromwell," with portrait showing the warts, by Hilda Johnstone, M.A., assistant lecturer in history at Manchester University; and another biography is "Thomas Carlyle," also with portrait, by the Rev. L. Maclean Watt, M.A., which includes a chapter on the Sage of Chelsea's "Cromwell." The remaining volumes are "Aristotle," by Professor A. E. Taylor, F.B.A.; "Rudolf Eucken: A Philosophy of Life," by A. J. Jones, M.A., both with portraits; and "Insurance as a Means of Investment," by W. A. Robertson, F.F.A. The series is altogether an admirable one, it caters for all tastes, the volumes are well produced, and remarkably cheap at the price charged.

The Love-Seeker: A Guide to Marriage. By MAUD CHURTON BRABY. (Herbert Jenkins. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE brightness and vivacity with which this book is written carry with them a certain amount of charm, although, if the authoress did not assure us that she pursued "a policy of splendid isolation," we should certainly have credited her with following in the wake of the "advanced" thinkers to whom the words honour and faith are anathema. There is very little that is fresh, and a great deal that is unconvincing—to say nothing of inconsistent—in Mrs. Braby's book. On page 80 we read: "The deepest of women's wrongs lies in these age-old traditions that men have decreed shall govern the different sexes, and which will never be altered"—the italics are ours—"by any political liberty nor honours of citizenship." On page 143 we have: "Some day the long-awaited feminist prophet will arise, bearing the golden gospel that is going to make a new heaven and a new earth." Not very reconcilable passages these. On page 43 she rejoices that men and women can now meet on equal grounds, while on page 112 a lament is raised because engaged couples have no opportunity except to act and sham all the way through the period immediately preceding their marriage. But we must cease to quote, for doubtless the book was written to amuse, and, if the authoress does not take herself seriously, why should we do so? Besides, it is really kind and good of her to approve of one "remark" in the Marriage Service. We would recommend that a chapter be read one week, another week taken to forget all about it, and the process repeated—in fact, the same way as we digest Enid's column in the Referee.

Pan's Garden. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

THE tender subtlety of Mr. Blackwood's work is now widely recognised. It has never been made more evident than in this curious and fragmentary collection which makes up the volume under review. Its pages are redolent of mystic woodland aisles and of the leaf-perfumed wind. But, although the author begins his volume with the characteristic study, "The Man Whom the Trees Loved," he has not confined himself to the breath of the forest alone. He has gone afield, and has brought in the sea and the snow as steeds to the mystic chariot of his art. Here, "The Sea-Fit" and "The Glamour of the Snows" represent in a sense companion pictures, and in its own fashion the one is as powerful as the other. For sheer lingering pathos, well shorn of its mawkish element, "The Attic" undoubtedly stands as one of the most notable achievements in the book.

Some readers might perhaps find fault with the predominance of a single note; but, admitted this, the failing detracts very little from the remarkable merit of the collection.

A Daughter of the Morning. By HUGH DE SELINCOURT. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

WAS it mere coincidence that, after reading Mr. de Sélincourt's latest book, a certain poem which begins, "By this he knew she wept with waking eyes," haunted us with its sad, solemn organ-tones? We find in "A Daughter of the Morning," despite its charm of writing, and its pages of thoughtful and amusing dialogue, little but sadness; one would imagine that, instead of being a practised author and a competent critic, Mr. de Sélincourt was one of the crowd, anxious to shock the sensibilities, keen on finding a fresh situation of the weariful "problem" description. He has undoubtedly found it here, but frankly it is unpleasant—a man's mistress welcomed by his invalid wife for the sake of the possible child; and no amount of draping with roses will make it less so. This is a pity, after the delightful promise of "A Fair House," and it is not the only shadow on the book. That a woman so strictly and innocently brought up as was Constance to the age of twenty-eight should suddenly undergo a smart volte-face and virtually —not virtuously—ask another woman's husband to visit her is quite incredible. He failed her at the last, having reserves of strength which she did not suspect; he was "a coward," and this constituted her trial; "the knowledge seared and burnt her." Somehow the sense of proportion is lacking from this novel; and we are doubly sorry, for there are memorable pages, and some perfectly delightful characters, and certain metaphors and sentences that mark Mr. de Sélincourt as of the tribe of Henry James. Perhaps in his next work he will hark back from "Modern Love" to "Love in the Valley," and recapture the magic spell.

ONCE in a way an obscure writer steals quietly into the halls of Fame, unheralded by the strident trumpetings that make assault on expectation, and almost unassisted by any wiles of the adroit publisher. There is little to proclaim a prodigy save the rare intuition of a chance critic, until one day we discover with a mild shock of surprise that this is a book everybody is reading. It is something after this fashion that "Michael Fairless" has won her way to what is now almost certainly a classic vogue. It is only about ten years since "The Roadmender" appeared by instalments in a short-lived publication called The Pilot, and not more than five since Mr. Blatchford, in a tardy review, claimed for it an affinity with the "Imitatio" and the "Urn Burial." To-day Messrs. Duckworth issue a "Roadmender Series" with books dedicated to the author and her chief creation, and multiply editions of the original work from pocket volumes to éditions de luxe.

This issue of "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius" is in the "uniform" half-crown series. It is a book of a different order from "The Roadmender"—a little mediæval romance, in fact, wherein a young novice learns "to hunger and to love" amid the terrors of the Black Death, returns with the awesome knowledge to his monastery to become at length its Prior, and, happy in that knowledge, yields up his life for his fellows. Yet it is similar—similar in its wistful beauty, in its easy charm of melodious prose, and in the scheme of life which it traverses. To quote the fitting phrases of the little prefatory note, "Through this little book runs the road of life, the common road of men, the white highway that Hilarius watched from the monastery gate and Brother Ambrose saw nearing its end in the Jerusalem of his heart." The many who know "The Roadmender" will need no further recommendation. The few who do not will not regret coming to know, through this tasteful re-issue, that same white highway along which, for her brief span, Marjorie Fairless Barber toiled and dreamed and suffered, and suffering found difficult leisure to tell her dreams.

WE have all of us long been acquainted with His Majesty the Baby, and now Mr. A. E. James introduces us to "Her Majesty the Flapper," in whom we cannot fail to recognise a very near relation to our young friend the Tomboy; for, if a trifle sedate compared to the latter, she is, on the other hand, far more mischievous. Mr. James's Flapper "is very pretty and just fifteen" when we make her acquaintance, and she wears her hair in one of those long plaits which you can pull over your shoulder, and which have a tendency to flap about in a most uncontrollable manner—hence the name Flapper. As time goes on, the plait becomes a door-knocker.

> Now, the Door-knocker is included under the category of Flaps, because it consists, I understand, of the original Flap turned up double underneath and secured with a bow. But it marks the end of Flapperhood and heralds the approach of Full-Fledgedom.

This breezily entertaining book is made up of a series of highly amusing episodes during the adolescence, or Flapperhood, of this truly precocious young person, who rejoices in the names of Patricia Veronica Muriel, and is a very sharp thorn in the sides of all who have to do with her. They are partly related by herself and partly by her Cousin Bobbie, some twenty years her senior, whose occupation in life appears to be to get her out of her innumerable scrapes, many of which he more or less unconsciously helps her into. Mr. James writes with a light touch, and his volume will provoke many a hearty laugh; but, as there is a slight sameness between several of the episodes, they will prove more enjoyable if read at intervals.

The Holiday Round. By A. A. MILNE. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

VERY many of our readers probably have turned each week to the particular page of Punch where Mr. Milne's humorous dialogues and fantasies are to be found; they will be glad to see these gathered into a second volume, companion to the "Day's Play," which appeared some time ago. The conversations and mishaps of a holiday, the making of a Christmas story, the expositions of various "Successful Lives," and many other themes provide Mr. Milne with opportunities for laughter, and for the inducement of laughter in others, of which he takes full avail. He disdains the ordinary "knock-about" fun of the farcical writer; his quips and jokes are delicate, requiring the dainty palate for their finest appreciation. More than this we need hardly say, save that, when in need of that laughter which is better than a doctor's bill, we shall take down the "Day's Play" and the "Holiday Round," settle cosily in our chair, and proceed to enjoy them once again.

The Naked Soul: Three Years in a Woman's Life. By LOUISE HEILGERS. (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.)

IT is not fair to suggest that "The Naked Soul" is an imitation of Karin Michaelis's "Dangerous Age," but, with the exception that the former book is less morbid than the one Marcel Prévost sent on its way with such a fine piece of writing for introduction, there is a similarity in their style. Both are written in the form of a diary, and profess to reveal the inner workings of a woman's mind. There is nothing helpful, hopeful, or happy in these outpourings, and it seems to us a pity that anyone who can handle a pen as well as Miss Heilgers can handle one does not put her talents to a better and more healthful use. She has good powers of description, and might very well write a book dealing with mankind in all aspects instead of limiting herself to portray the warped and bilious outlook of a selfish and disappointed woman.

My Lord the Felon. By HEADON HILL. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THERE are, of course, no psychological subtleties about this story; we do not expect them. When the long-lost heir to an earldom steps into the first chapter in order to burgle the safe in his father's library, psychology steps back. When, to continue the metaphor, that heir is reinstated by his father, and murders that father without any particularly pressing cause or inducement, psychology takes to its heels, for the aforesaid heir is neither a lunatic nor a consistent criminal of the type that Lombroso loved—he is simply an unreal, inconsistent absurdity. The other characters are not innocent of that tendency to exaggerated attribute beloved of melodrama writers, and the hero is kept too much in the shade to enable us to give him our sympathy to any great extent, while the love interest in the book is—to descend to paradox—uninteresting.

Mr. Headon Hill has overdone his mystery to an extent that renders it irritating; if he found it convenient to split an infinitive in order to express himself, he split the unoffending thing, presumably with an axe. The story, as a whole, is a slight variant on a very old theme, and its effect on the reader is that of playing both sides in a game of draughts—all the trouble of the game is there, and very little of the excitement. We may add that, although French maids and country policemen, revolvers and amateur detectives, and felonious actions on the part of two or three people are plentiful enough—as is proper to a story of this kind—there is not a solitary convicted felon in the book to justify its title. It is frank, unblushing melodrama, minus the saving grace of realism.

The Brothers Karamasov. A Novel in Four Parts and an Epilogue by FYODOR DOSTOEVSKY. Translated from the Russian by CONSTANCE GARNETT. (Wm. Heinemann. 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS volume is a wonderful production at the price. The story has been very ably translated by Constance Garnett, who has done much good work in rendering Tolstoy and other Russian novelists familiar to English readers. The author of this very long novel writes with an intimate acquaintance of Russian life and gives striking pictures of many of its phases. Aloysha, one of the chief characters, is a monk, and shows a very Christian disposition. His two brothers are wild characters brimming over with good impulses one minute and barbaric the next, almost like children in their want of control of their emotions. In fact, the general impression the book gives is that of thunderstorm and sunshine rapidly following each other.

The evolution of Russia and its peoples is shown in the conversations, some of great length, and the Russian judicial procedure in all its stages is exemplified by a trial for murder. The want of control produces in some of the characters something nearly approaching insanity, but on this account the book, although so long, is quite interesting and gives us real life and men and women with primitive passions on which they act, and not dolls. The translator has omitted nothing, and consequently in places the language is rather vulgar, but at the same time natural. As in all countries in which the religion is a superstitious one, the rebound carries the thinkers too far in the opposite direction, but in any case the people are thinking, and that is better than remaining in deadly ignorance. The preface should be carefully read, as it explains much.

Shorter Notices

In "The Sign" (Macmillan and Co. 6s.) a Breton menhir, whether by accident or design on the part of Mrs. Romilly Fledden we know not, stands out and survives thought of all the other characters—except, perhaps, the Beggars—who play their parts for our benefit. So far as the book is concerned, the menhir is greater than the cross, whose sufferings Monih sought in vain to bear, that she might expiate the sins of her people. Poor Monih! In spite of her purity, she was too human, too nearly akin to the menhir people, to accomplish her aim. It is impossible to give an idea of the plot of such a book as this, for what plot there is is entirely secondary to atmosphere. We are made to feel the presence of the world and the flesh—and of God; we are led to a sense of the pity that is akin to love for human frailty; we are impressed by the faint suggestions of Breton folk-lore strewn throughout the work, and, granted some slight knowledge of other lands outside England, are able to feel the slight yet compelling influence of these landes of Brittany, and to recognise that life there, by reason of this influence, is different from other life. We are conscious of these things while we read, and only in the pause for thought which comes at the end of a moving book are we conscious of the art which has effaced itself and left only such fine results—we realise, then, the skill with which minor characters, like a Greek choros, have played to us and on us to such purpose. The book is almost Greek in conception, quite Greek in execution. Save by the one chance in a thousand—which we sincerely wish may be its lot—it is too fine a work to appeal to the big public, but those whose tastes incline to literature rather than popular fiction will read, remember, and keep.

Mrs. Stanley Wrench is very unkind to her characters in "Pillars of Smoke" (John Long. 6s.). The scene is laid on an Oxfordshire farm, and rural, lower middle class life is realistically depicted. Jess, the heroine, is made to undergo trial upon trial, and finally renounces all idea of the marriage upon which she had set her heart, for the sake of keeping her brother sober—a rather unconvincing sacrifice. The book contains quite a number of other characters which are well but rather monotonously drawn, and a quantity of other incidents. The authoress has specialised in local colour to some purpose, and has given us an excellent reproduction of rural Oxfordshire. She has given us, also, an interesting story—but it is no more than that. Apparently she aimed at writing a big tragedy; if that is so, she has failed.

The plot of "The Trespasser" (Duckworth and Co. 6s.) is tawdry and commonplace; the treatment, on the other hand, is excellent, but it does not quite redeem the story. We are not asked to sympathise with the characters, but to stand and watch their dissection: thus we demand, perhaps unreasonably, that the operation shall be accomplished without the drawing down of the operator to the level of his material. We grant that Mr. D. H. Lawrence has given us a fine study of a somewhat abnormal woman in Helena, and just as good a study of a fairly normal man in his presentment of Siegmund, but we resent and dislike them both. We perceive from this book that the author has the power to fill a larger canvas with a much finer picture, for here a finished craftsman has devoted time and care to material unworthy of his skill.

In spite of rather uneven writing and a forbidding title, Mr. Alec Holmes, in "The Emporium" (George Allen and Co. 6s.), has written an excellent story. Mr. Philip Du Cane, who conceives the idea of the "emporium," interests us from the start, and convinces us of his reality in all things but that of his love for Cicely. There is the merit of the book; its characters live for us. From these same materials another writer might have fashioned an old-style melodrama, for in the wastrel Sir Guy, in Judith, and in the theatrical Vaurennan, financier, is ample scope for melodrama. This story, however, is marked throughout by restraint and delicately conveyed suggestions which have more force than assertions; if at times the style is a little too epigrammatic, it never falls short of being interesting.

Since Anthony Hope gave us stories of Zenda and young Rupert, those little imaginary kingdoms of the Near East have had much to answer for, and "Crowns," by Miss Winifred M. MacNab (Lynwood and Co. 6s.), is yet another Ruritanian romance, though this time it is "Winseigna" to which we are introduced. Equally with its setting, the plot argues imitative rather than creative talent. In spite of its threadbare subject, however, this book compels interest by reason of its minor characters. Father Benoit is an admirable study, and the North Country sea-captain is almost equal with the little priest in the matter of fine drawing. In the portrait of Gerald Morne, the hero, we are faced with a character who compels our sympathy, and from this one study we feel convinced that the authoress will yet accomplish work of an enduring kind, if she will leave Ruritanian history alone and come back to life.

In "Amor Vincit" (Duckworth and Co. 6s.) Mrs. R. S. Garnett works out a very simple plot: Richard Hollinscough, knowing, yet not believing, that Lizzie Lomas is in love with Big Jack Beresford, worries her into marriage, only to see her die of consumption. The ensuing feud between brooding, embittered Hollinscough and Beresford occupies the greater part of the book, until at the end, after Beresford's death, his half-sister steps in and—amor vincit! Such, in brief, is the plot, but it is worked out with unusual care and depth of insight. We are made to realise the strong weakness of Jack Beresford and the weak strength of his enemy—who won the fight. We feel the force of old Hannah's lifelong hatred for her master's enemy and her own; we realise the shallow nature of Lizzie Lomas even in the moments when she almost wins more than our pity; and, turning from the people to their surroundings, we see the stern, rugged country which produces characters like these. Even in its most sordid scenes there is redeeming strength in the work, which, as a whole, is worthy of a very high place in modern fiction.

By W. H. KOEBEL.

IT is a rather curious coincidence that, since the time when I described the voyage of a dinghy from London to the Black Sea, a couple of weeks ago, I have received details of an expedition of a widely different order, which intends to follow the same route. But this expedition does not mean to conclude its business at the shores of the Black Sea. It aspires to proceed directly over it, but without touching its waters, on its way to India. From this it will already have become evident that the proposed excursion is one by aeroplane. Those responsible for the idea consider that the journey, effected from England to India in this way, should occupy about twelve days. This estimate, in the case of an aeroplane, seems an essentially reasonable one. In a venture of this sort, however, there is no doubt that the time occupied in the mere flying constitutes one of the quite minor considerations. The questions affecting the various halts and the obtaining of the necessary supplies throughout the route are far more important. For this reason, even should no hitch attend the flight, it is clear that the allowance of twelve days is not so unduly liberal as it might appear on paper at the first glimpse. It has already been proved that the element of uncertainty enters more fully into flight than into any other method of progress.

The arrangements for this particular flight are, I believe, not yet finally completed; but it is to be hoped that nothing will be allowed to stand in the way of the attempt. As a test of the capabilities of the modern aeroplane—if the adjective be permissible—it will be supreme. As to the picturesque elements of this unique excursion, they are, of course, boundless. For, after leaving Europe by way of Constantinople, the route includes such stopping-places as Konieh, Aleppo, Bagdad, Bushire, and a winging to the north of the Persian Gulf. It is true that the Arabs of the Tripoli coast have become accustomed to the sight of the hostile Italian air vessels, and have even a captured one in their possession. But this is very different from a friendly flight through the heart of a country whose Sultans and Kadis have furnished romance for all the world. In a sense, of course, the thing is desecration. What right has an aeroplane—a creation of the very latest West—to fly over the soil where the camel caravans plod and the almond-eyed damsels lurk behind their veils in precisely the same fashion which they have done since the race first wandered into the country to take up its abode? Doubtless the question will be answered soon enough. When this happens, the stupefaction along the old caravan routes will alone be worth the journey—could one be there to witness it.

According to the majority of captains, pursers, and officers of liners, the average passenger is a being who occupies his time on board by asking endless questions and by suggesting innumerable impossibilities. In the frank opinion of many of these, he is a necessary evil—necessary, since he is profitable; evil, since he is brainless, helpless, and discontented. The condemnation is a little sweeping. There may be some cause for it; but, after all, the passenger is human, and grumbling, when all is said and done, is the natural recreation of those who are idle against their will. Hence, perhaps, this pessimism on the part of the mercantile marine officials. Certainly some complaints which a number of travellers are emitting just now would seem extraordinarily unreasonable. They concern the boat deck, which on many liners constitutes one of the most pleasant places in the entire vessel. Owing to the new life-saving precautions which entail the carriage of a largely increased number of boats, the amount of free space on these upper decks has become much diminished. There is no doubt that not a few of the more implacable travellers take this as a personal grievance. They fail to realise that the additional means of safety must necessarily be acquired at the cost of some of the coveted promenade space. I have on several recent occasions heard the theory vigorously expounded that the "company should sling the boats somewhere down below," in sublime disregard of the fact that storms still rage and the waters are still apt to sweep away the lesser craft injudiciously exposed to their force.

As a matter of fact, it seems to me that almost too much stress is being laid on deliverance by means of boats in the modern circumstances of shipping. In a matter such as this it is difficult to judge at what point complete safety is reached. Granted that sufficient accommodation is provided for every soul on board, there is still the possibility of an accident leaving the vessel with a list sufficiently acute to allow the lowering of the boats on only one side of the ship. In a case such as this, it follows that the accommodation is halved. Indeed, I cannot help thinking that the time will come when less reliance will be placed on boats for the purpose of saving an entire ship's company—so far, at all events, as the passenger liners are concerned. In these days of the Marconi apparatus, the long and perilous journeys in small craft towards the nearest land are no longer necessary. In time of trouble the wireless messages will turn the bows of a dozen ocean greyhounds to the spot of the calamity. Thus it is merely a question of waiting until assistance arrives. Surely for this purpose structures in the shape of rafts would be safer and more practical than the boats which in the best of circumstances have to perform such a giddy journey down the tall ship's side. Providing that no headway were necessary, as is now the case, it should be possible to construct rafts of a roomy type which would afford almost the same security as the deck of a steamship. This, I believe, is the method which will find favour in the future.

"A Young Man's Fancy" at the Criterion Theatre

MR. H. V. ESMOND has written many plays in diverse manners; from the severe "Grierson's Way" even unto the charming and sentimental "One Summer's Day"; all have been clever, many successful. Thus we had high hopes for "A Young Man's Fancy," more especially as the cast contained many capable artists. But really they had nothing much to do. The play is a nice little old-fashioned one with a graceful trimming of geniality, a few slight, bright sketches of character, a dash of wit, and a great deal of stilted language, make-believe and artificiality. It may be liked, for there is no hint in it of things as they are, no bothering realities, no flesh and blood or psychic pain or victory, nor any uncomfortable affairs of that kind. It is merely a fairly well-contrived theatrical play, which helps no one, hurts no one, and interests but moderately.

It is one more case of clever players trying to galvanise a moribund piece of work into life, succeeding in parts, and failing as a whole. The "Hon. Gerald Porth" (Mr. Charles Maude) is the young man of family whose fancy slightly turns to thoughts of an American heiress—the "Ella Grant" of Miss Enid Bell; but for no better reason than because she is suggested as a suitable wife by his family he turns away from the path of millions and woos "Cora" (Miss Dora Barton), the daughter of the owner of a very smart flower shop. But "Cora" has managed to marry a peer who dresses in the 1830 manner with small whiskers, "Lord Pierton" (Mr. Roland Pertwee). Thus all soon comes right, and Gerald and his Ella are to be happy ever after.

This little story would hardly have held the audience in their seats but for the fact that Mr. C. M. Lowne was "Lord Porth," the father of Gerald, and Miss Lottie Venne was Gerald's aunt—the self-important and amusing "Lady Julia Ventermere." The acting of this last character makes the play. Lady Julia—like so many small ladies in modern plays—is always arranging everybody's business and managing things generally. Fortunately in this piece she is always on the wrong track, and her absurd desire to set right the affairs of others turns to laughter, in which she is quite unable to join. Although Miss Venne has been seen in a good number of parts she has never played one quite in this manner, and her delightful sense of character and comedy makes her rather impossible rôle a refreshment and delight. Without her, "A Young Man's Fancy" would prove one of the most pointless comedies of later days; but, with her as "Lady Julia," there is always a chance that the audience will be amused and interested. Another part, of small importance unfortunately, but equally admirable, is that of Lord Porth's valet, "Worgan." This is played by Mr. Thomas Weguelin with an amount of discreet truth which makes us regret his early retirement from the play. But, on the other hand, the quality of his method might have made the conventions of the others a little too obvious, and thus robbed us of the mild amusement that Mr. Esmond provides. As an essay in genial comedy, the piece is of interest, but the author still keeps us waiting for a complete and accomplished work on such agreeable lines.

"The Little Cafe" at the Playhouse

WHATEVER Mr. Cyril Maude does is very pleasant. If only the many other characters in "The Little Café" were as bright and jolly as that of Albert Loriflan, the waiter who inherits £32,000 and is almost cheated out of 200,000 francs, all would be well. As it is, the new farce by M. Tristan Bernard presents the always welcome Mr. Maude, who matters a great deal, and some fifty other people, who really do not seem to count in the very least. There are people who run cafés, motor-car agents, jewellers, colonels, extraordinary ladies, such as the Bianca Poggiapartico of Miss Maidie Hope and the Bérengère D'Acquitane of Miss Madeline Seymour, and the daughter of the Little Café, Yvonne, Miss Vera Coburn, and dozens of others in beautiful dresses; but there is a lack of objectivity in their actions and words which is unforgivable even in the lightest farce. The entertainment has been successful in Paris, and I hope there are thousands of people who will like it here. It would be a happiness to feel that the general public is so light-hearted and can be so easily amused. The three acts are taken at break-neck speed, and yet the emptiness and vagueness of the whole thing is not hidden for a moment. But this brings one back to the art of Mr. Cyril Maude, which enables the audience to appreciate the play as a whole.

Of course, he is not the least like an ordinary French waiter. Albert Loriflan is really Mr. Maude, looking younger and more lively than ever, with a gay little moustache, and a charming smile and a little note of sincerity and almost tears in regard to his love for the café lady, Yvonne. This young person, by the way, appears absolutely uninteresting and uninterested in Albert. But his money makes her mind go round, and in the end, after some of the wildest fooling ever seen, even on the English stage, they love and propose to be happy. The waiter at the "Little Café" is never anything like the character he represents, but he is something much more agreeable. He seems to the onlooker to be a clever, lively young gentleman—shall we say in the Guards?—who is awfully good at amateur theatricals, and is going to play the part of the French waiter for all it is worth—at the same time not drop his pleasant voice, his distinguished air, his rather crude sense of fun, and all that sort of thing. The result at the Playhouse is quite curious and attractive. It is new in a way, and, like all successes in art, unintentional, the unexpected gift of the gods. We do not mind that Miss Seymour, who looks most beautiful, sings an ineffective song; we do not care that the characters are mere pantomime figures, and we hardly notice how splendidly the piece is put on the stage, and how gay and successful are the fancy costumes of Mr. Tom Heslewood. All we know, or care to know, is that Mr. Maude is at his gayest, and that there are three acts of animated, disconnected, far-fetched fun.

The Empire

THE charm of Mlle. Lydia Kyasht lends its meaning to the dance episode, "First Love," which delighted the audience the other night. At this theatre the interest of the public appears particularly difficult to hold. One noted that Mr. Barnold's dogs and monkeys could not make much headway. Mr. Johnson Clark, the ventriloquist, found it very hard work to make his slight jokes effective. He even tried the old-world comedian's trick of saying he would wait for his audience to laugh, or that they would see his joke by-and-by. It might be pointed out to all the old-fashioned music-hall performers who use this form of insult that it is not the audience who do not perceive their attempts at humour, but the feebleness of its quality which induces silence.

"First Love," which Mlle. Kyasht has invented, and for which music has been selected from the work of Glinka, for which, also, Mr. Cuthbert Clarke has written a gavotte, is a delightful relief after some of the turns of an older day. There is not quite the glamour of the Russians at Covent Garden, not quite the mystery and attraction of scene or the devilry of the dancing; but there are grace and charm, brightness and clearly expressed intention. Mlle. Kyasht translates the idea of first love into dancing steps, and she, with M. Alex Volinin, carry through their little scene of poetry and passion with delicious smoothness and skill. There is always perfection of grace, delicacy of movement, and the tip-toe convention of the tenderness and the exquisite pirouettes of ballet love-affairs. The whole effect is charming, and the crowds which come and go help the dancers by the beauty of their dresses and the soft cadence of their leisured movements. As Mlle. Kyasht and M. Volinin present "First Love," it seems a very easy and graceful affair. The successes are so effectively accomplished, the mistakes and worries do not last. It is all very pleasant; there is nothing half so cheap in life as love's young dream. There is only one point. Mlle. Kyasht and M. Volinin are very young, of course, yet they seem just a little accomplished and sophisticated for "First Love"; it has arrived, but it has come a little late.

The lively revue, "Everybody's Doing It," is even more amusing now than when first produced. Mr. Farren Soutar's "Sir Herbert Tree as Mr. George Grossmith" is one of the cleverest things in an entertainment which only needs cutting a little to be the most laughable satire in town.

Foreign Reviews

LA REVUE BLEUE.

August 17.—M. Faguet contributes an amusing "Eloge de la Haine"—a historical and philosophical disquisition, in which the various aspects of this sentiment are shown to be "la personnalité qui se défend." He concludes wittily, "S'il faut absolument avoir une haine, me dit mon ami, je choisis la haine de la haine." Letters of Georges Halphen, a young officer of Faidherbe, are published; his mother, to whom many of the letters are addressed, must have been a "mother of the Gracchi"; we should have liked to see her replies. M. Louis Batcave writes of the theatricals of Auteuil in the eighteenth century. M. Alphonse Roux tells the Wertheresque love-story of Sergent the Conventionnel. M. Paul Mimande records the early days of Vichy, basing himself largely on the memoirs of Fléchier. A précis is given of a recent article in THE ACADEMY on Mr. Patterson's "Zola Dictionary."

August 24.—The Souvenirs of Amédée de Pastoret are concluded with the evacuation of Witebsk. M. Paul Louis passes on to another Socialism—the Italian, which appears to be in a critical state. M. Menant, by way of prelude to the story of Gérald Aungier, describes the transfer of Bombay to the English in 1665; interesting is the fulfilled prophecy of the Portuguese Viceroy, Mello de Castro. M. L. Villat writes of Mme. de Saint-Amour, an early faith-healer. M. Guérinot is excellent on the Hindu Nirvana.

August 31.—M. Menant, after a short account of President Oxenden, in the course of which he takes Anderson to task for belittling the pioneers of English domination in India, passes on to Gérald Aungier, one of the greatest of early administrators, the real founder of Bombay, and a crowning example of the folly of Louis XIV's religious policy. M. Lucien Maury has been taking a holiday, to some purpose, in Stockholm. M. Albalat finds new beauties in Molière, and sets us wondering when he remarks in parenthesis, "Molière n'a pas d'esprit." "Emile l'intarissable"—né Faguet—talks admirably of Charles Lamb. "Il n'y a pas de raison" he admits "d'en parler aujourd'hui plutôt qu'un autre jour. J'en parle aujourd'hui parce que je viens de le relire." Still Lamb is rather a favourite literary dish over the water.

L'ACTION NATIONALE.

In the August number General Lebas compares the situation of France with that of Germany with regard to the command of their respective armies in war. His analysis, which is to be continued, is unfavourable to the present French arrangement. M. Marius Richard pleads for more numerous and efficient canals. M. from the old-fashioned Liberal point of view. M. Paix-Séailles reviews M. Lémonon's work on British foreign policy, which he seems to agree with the author in judging cynical and opportunist.

La Revue des Etudes Napoleoniennes.

In the September number M. Driault, continuing his "Souvenirs du Centenaire," brings the Grande Armée to Moscow and out again. The whole episode is admirably narrated; perhaps the most significant incident is the belated attempt of Napoleon to learn, at Moscow, something of the history and institutions of Russia. M. Albert Cassagne analyses the uneasy relations of Napoleon and Chateaubriand. M. Marcel Dunon, à propos of recent books, gives the history of Switzerland during the Napoleonic hegemony; the Swiss never quite made up their minds about Napoleon; their representative probably voiced their dominant thought to him when he spoke of "le voeu de rester dans notre petitesse." A feature of the present number is seventeen pages of "Bibliographie Napoléonienne de l'Année 1911."

La Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Litterature.

August 17.—M. Bloch has warm praise for Mr. Grierson's "Manual of the Kashmiri Language," and also approves of Mr. Endle's book on the Kacharis. The new Tübingen "Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte" is praised for its successful attempt at impartiality. M. Pfister analyses M. Gaston May's "La Lutte pour le Français en Lorraine avant 1870," in which the modern rôles are shown reversed. M. Bourciez criticises M. Dauzat's "Philosophie de Langage," disapproving the author's "égalitarien" ideas in philology.

August 24.—M. Maspero speaks of various Anglo-American books on Egyptology, including Mr. Wallis Budge's "Coptic Biblical Texts"; he also deals with M. Naville's "Papyrus Funéraires de la XXI^e^ Dynastie," and propounds a new theory for the transition from hieroglyphic to hieratic writing. M. Loisy also is well represented; his most interesting task is in connection with Herr Fiebig's works on the parables and miracles of Christ, viewed from the standpoint of rabbinical teaching.

August 31.—Another Maspero number. Among the books reviewed by the eminent Egyptologist are M. H. Gauthier's "Livre des Rois d'Egypte," Professor Petrie's annual account of the researches of the British School, and Herr Borchardt's monograph on the supposed portrait of Queen Tîyi, in the possession of Dr. James Simon, "l'œuvre capitale de la sculpture égyptienne sur bois," or "à peu près." M. Hauvette discusses Mr. R. T. Holbrook's work on the portraits of Dante. A number of official documents relating to the Revolution are noticed.

Varia.

In the May-June number of the Journal de Psychologie Normale et Pathologique M. Paul Verrier gives a shorter exposé of his theory, which he has developed at greater length elsewhere, and of which we may speak later, on "l'isochronisme en musique et en poésie." Deutsche Lieder is a bijou little publication, containing short poems, tiny reproductions of pictures, and amusing little "faits divers" connected with literature and art. The publisher is Hermann Kiehne of Nordhausen. M. Marinetti has launched one more manifesto, with a specimen page of literature for futurists: we must quote a few words—"savates mitrailleuses = galets + ressac + grenouilles cliquetis sacs fusils canons ferraille atmosphère = plomb + lave + 300 puanteurs + 50 parfums pavé matelas détritus crottin charognes flic-flac entassement chameaux bourricots tohubohu cloaque."

British Government in East Africa

By Major P. W. North.

IN a former article the writer dealt with the British East Africa Protectorate from the point of view of the white settler. Let us now look at the community as a whole.

There are many different races. On the coast the Swahili, a people of mixed Arab and Bantu blood, whose language has spread all over the country, and is to the various savage tribes of the interior what "Pidgin English" is to the Chinese from different parts of China—a means of communicating with those whose language they do not understand. A Cantonese, for instance, and a man from one of the northern provinces of China cannot understand each other's spoken language. Further north are many different tribes of savages, and everywhere along the railway, and everywhere where trade is to be done, is the native of India. As was pointed out in the previous article, the white settlers have a strong prejudice against anything and everything Indian. None the less, the Indian immigrant is an absolute necessity to the country. Without him, the trade of the country would almost come to a standstill, and, if he does cut out the white trader in many cases, he also opens up trade with natives in places where no white man would have a chance. In dealing with the Indian population, moreover, the administration have to consider the effect upon opinion in India itself. The indignation there at the treatment of Indians in South Africa will be fresh in the minds of our readers. How, then, are the different interests of white colonists, British Indians, and natives to be dealt with?

As was pointed out in The Academy of September 28, the British Empire seems to require two different kinds of administrators—those to govern white men and those to govern black ones—whilst the worst kind, perhaps, for dealing with a young white community is the Indian Civil Servant. But this is a country which requires a combination of both; where are men with the necessary qualifications to be found?

The Indian civilians rule our great Indian Empire. The great Dominions govern themselves. We have, however, besides Indian Civil Servants, and Civil Servants of the great Dominions, officials of various Colonies where there are important communities of both white, brown, and yellow, as well as black races, to be dealt with. In such countries, for instance, as Ceylon and the Malay Peninsula, especially the latter, we have problems to deal with somewhat similar to those of the different races in East Africa.

The late Governor of the British East Africa Protectorate had a wide knowledge of the great self-governing dominions, and had also been ruler of a black West African Colony. His successor has had a distinguished career in ruling over a mixed population in a country where the interests of British planters and merchants, Chinese bankers, merchants, and others, down to the poorest classes, natives of India, Malay potentates and their subjects, have harmonised well, and where material prosperity has increased of recent years by leaps and bounds. He has, moreover, the great advantage for a ruler of British East Africa of being a Colonial, and not an Indian official.

The Child, the new medico-educational monthly journal, edited by Dr. T. N. Kelynack and published by Messrs. Bale, Sons, and Danielsson, Ltd., begins with the October issue its third volume. The journal is devoted to all interests relating to child welfare, and has the influential support of leading doctors and educationists.

The International Council for the Study of the Sea, now assembled at Copenhagen, has cabled congratulations to Sir John Murray on the publication of his work, "The Depths of the Ocean," a book of great importance to the science of oceanography. The Council has succeeded, in co-operation with the United States, in extending its scheme of investigation to the American waters.

The inaugural meeting of the eighteenth session of the Library Assistants' Association will be held in the hall of the Worshipful Company of Stationers, Stationers' Hall Court, Ludgate Hill, E.C., on Wednesday, October 16, at 7.30 p.m. The inaugural address will be delivered by the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's, and the Worshipful Master of the Company. G. E. Briscoe Eyre, Esq., will preside.

During the lifetime of Queen Victoria, Lady Lyttelton, who had been Superintendent of the Roya Children, printed for private circulation a volume of her letters and memoirs during the days that she was attached to the Court. It attracted very deep interest amongst those who saw it, and there were many urgent requests that it should be published. As the difficulties which then lay in the way of publication have now been removed, Lady Lyttelton's family have consented to the appearance of the privately printed memoirs and the earlier letters of Lady Lyttelton which are of great interest. This volume will be published by Mr. Murray next week.

The Department of Engraving, Illustration, and Design of the Victoria and Albert Museum has recently acquired a large number of original studies by the late Frederick Shields for his illustrations to Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." They have been mounted with the wood engravings to which each group relates, and a selection of about ninety is now exhibited in Room 70. The same room also contains two original pen-drawings by the late E. A. Abbey, R.A., for "She Stoops to Conquer" (1885) and "The Quiet Life" (1889), given to the Museum by Mrs. Abbey; Mr. Stanhope Forbes, R.A., has given eleven etchings by the late Mrs. Stanhope Forbes, and there are many other interesting additions.

Forthcoming lectures at the London School of Economics, Clare Market, include "The Relations between Law and Political Science," by Professor Morgan, on Monday next, at 5.15, Sir Frederick Pollock in the chair; at 8.30, "Railway Progress in the United States," by Mr. Ivy Lee, Sir Charles Owens in the chair; on Tuesday, at 8.0, "State Promotion of Foreign Commerce," by Mr. Percy Ashley; on Wednesday, at 8, "Some Aspects of Medieval Economic and Social History," by Mr. Hall; on Thursday, "The Origin of Scenery," by Professor Garwood, at 5.30—the first of a course of six lectures; and on Monday, October 14, at 4.30, "Faith and Science: Their Related Values," by Dr. Lionel Tayler.

THE BALKAN PERIL.

AT the moment of writing the issue of peace or war hangs in the balance. Pessimism in regard to the situation is universal; the newspapers inform us that five armies are preparing for conflict, and the Bourses throughout Europe are stricken with panic. Amid the general confusion it is no easy task to weigh calmly and judicially the various factors that have produced a crisis so grave as to threaten the peace of Europe. The rattle of the Balkan sword is no unfamiliar sound to our ears. Nevertheless, all well-informed people, while hoping against hope that the evil day would long be postponed, have not been blind to the inevitability of an upheaval in this region.

The question uppermost at present is whether or not the time has arrived when a settlement of outstanding problems by an appeal to arms cannot possibly be averted. As Count Berchtold has rightly observed, between the mobilisation of armies and the declaration of war a very serious decision has to be taken. We cannot forget, however, that it was Count Berchtold who first drew the attention of Europe to the extreme gravity of the situation in the Balkans. That this situation contains factors far more serious than any which produced Balkan crises in the past cannot be denied. For example, the grave significance of the circumstance that Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro, and Greece have concluded what virtually amounts to an offensive alliance against Turkey is apparent on the surface; the simultaneous mobilisation of the armies of these four States is in itself convincing evidence of the nature of the compact that exists between them. We are informed that the Tsar of Bulgaria is sincere in his efforts to avert war, but that, unless he surrenders to the frantic clamour of the populace, he may conceivably be compelled to yield his throne. Similar assurances of a desire to maintain peace are forthcoming from his allies. No ray of true hope can be extracted from these and all such expressions of pious aim. The language of diplomacy is not infrequently that of hypocrisy. The facts of the situation speak plainly enough for themselves. The union of the Balkan States, with the exception of Rumania, and the simultaneous mobilisation of four armies, leave no room for doubt that Tsar Ferdinand and his allies have made up their minds that the moment is opportune for a settlement of accounts with Turkey. That they would like to achieve this end without resorting to war is natural, but that they are fully prepared in certain eventualities to draw the sword is transparent from the very nature of their bellicose actions.

The urgent peril of the situation lies in the danger that both Turkey and her enemies will doubtless rely, right up to the last moment, on the strong intervention of the great Powers, and that, with the object of compelling this measure in order to save their dignity, they will place themselves in such a position for war that nothing remains to precipitate it, save the shot of a rifle. When we learn that the great Powers are divided in the crisis, we may realise that not only the peace of the Balkans but the peace of Europe is trembling in the balance. Only the common action of Austria and Russia, supported by friendly Governments, could have prevented the menace of war. But the relations of these two Powers have never recovered from the shock of the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The recent proposals of Count Berchtold were received with not a little distrust in St. Petersburg. Russia, not, as in the past, anxious to be caught helpless, is carrying out a convenient test mobilisation, and there are reports that Austria is about to take important military measures.

Yet, amid these warlike preparations, one may detect certain factors that are making for peace. The time is rapidly approaching when the Balkan heights will be covered with snow; both Bulgaria and Servia have failed in their attempt to secure loans in Paris; and Turkey, in spite of the repeated declarations that a war would rally and rejuvenate the nation after the humiliations in Tripoli, is in desperate straits. Finally, the great Powers, however much they may be divided on principles of policy in the Balkans, are not as yet ready to face the consequences of the threatened war. In all the circumstances, the reaffirmation of Anglo-Russian concord could not have been more timely. It is devoutly to be hoped that, in face of the imminent peril that threatens Europe, the Powers will not permit petty jealousies to stifle prompt and vigorous initiative. To talk peace at the eleventh hour is futile; to command peace will alone save the situation. It is for Russia and Austria to lead the way.

THE CHINESE LOAN.

The friends of Republican China will naturally regret that the recent issue of five millions sterling did not meet with a more spontaneous reception from the investing public of this country. And yet, considering the odds against which Mr. Crisp had gone forth to battle, the response cannot in a general sense be said to reflect adversely upon the State credit of China. For it must be remembered that the ramifications of the Consortium are widespread, and that its influence extends to groups and houses not officially represented in Peking. Therefore, during the brief period over which the lists remained open, a subtle force was at work in opposition to the London promoters, a force that quite conceivably acted as a deterrent in the case of thousands of clients who otherwise would have subscribed to the loan.

In spite of the announcement recorded in these columns last week, that negotiations between the Peking Government and the Six-Powers Group had been definitely broken off, we reluctantly hold the opinion that China has by no means thrown off the shackles which for so long have held her in financial bondage. Simultaneously with the expression of pious hopes that in the expenditure of the London loan her statesmen will vindicate their reputation for sagacity and integrity, we read that certain Powers are already formulating demands which, if insisted upon, will swallow up the major portion of the money that is required by China for the purpose of carrying out administrative reforms. The outlook is, therefore, by no means promising. It is clear that independent operation in Paris and Berlin is out of the question, for the French and German Governments have it in their power to prevent the quotation of foreign bonds on the national bourses. The financial ring in the United States is so tightly drawn that China can hope for no relief in that direction without being once more precipitated into the arms of the very group which owes allegiance to the Consortium. There remains, then, only the chance of dealing direct with British financiers. The reception accorded to the new loan by the Press of this country was in the main remarkably sympathetic, and leading newspapers have not hesitated, not only to condemn the Six-Powers Group as a whole, but also to criticise severely the so-called British representation in that group. We confess that we would like to see this attitude develop into a vigorous campaign—a campaign that would put the case of China fairly before the British public, and so stimulate a general feeling of confidence in a country which, in spite of all that pessimists have to say on the contrary, is quite able to meet its obligations if helped over a temporary period of tribulation.

MOTORING

THE recent meeting of the representatives of some twenty of the most important British motor manufacturing firms to consider what steps should be taken to stem the flowing tide of the American "invasion" furnished abundant evidence of the fact that the "invasion"—so long regarded with flippant incredulity—is now taken very seriously indeed. In truth, it is difficult to understand how it can be taken otherwise than seriously. On all the main roads of the country are to be seen—in extraordinary numbers, considering how short a time it is since the American car was a quite negligible quantity—the lightly built, narrow-tyred, and speedy runabouts which show all the characteristic indications of their Transatlantic origin. It is beyond question that these American cars are fulfilling a want, and that Europe, including this country, is at present utterly unable to compete with them in the particular market for which they are intended. The demand of the great bulk of potential car buyers, both in this country and on the Continent, is for the low-priced vehicle with plenty of power for hill-climbing on the higher speeds, and this demand the Americans alone seem to be able to satisfy. Whereas they are able to sell for £200 or under a fast and quite presentable vehicle of 20 h.p., fully equipped with all essential accessories, the average British and Continental maker requires approximately twice the price for a car of similar power and specification.

There is no mystery as to the methods which enable the Americans, in spite of the considerably higher prices they have to pay for labour, to produce cars and sell them so much cheaper than we can over here. The manufacturing of the principal component parts of the car in separate factories, and on an enormous scale, combined with the perfect organisation for which American industries are deservedly noted, constitutes a sufficient explanation. The question is—how is the British industry to protect itself? The idea of forming a £5,000,000 "combine," which has been mooted in certain quarters, is laughed at by the Americans, to whom such figures are ludicrously trifling, in view of the value of the market to be secured. They are threatening, no doubt in all seriousness, to organise an "invasion" for 1913, compared with which their operations up to date are mere child's play. To the ordinary outsider, who simply reasons from established facts, the only solution of the position seems to lie in the imposition of a protective tariff, and this also is the view of many of the leaders of the British industry. It does really seem absurd that we should allow the Americans to dump their surplus productions over here at prices with which our own manufacturers cannot possibly compete, when a simple tariff, similar to that that they themselves impose on our own cars, would effectively put a stop to the "invasion" and secure the British market for the British maker.

Messrs. S. F. Edge, Ltd., send us particulars of their programme for the 1913 season. The Napier models for delivery from now onwards will consist of four types of the 15-h.p. four-cylinder—the ordinary touring, the Colonial, the extra strong Colonial, and the model de luxe—at chassis prices ranging from £365 to £395, the 30-h.p. six-cylinder at £595, the 45-h.p. six-cylinder at £850, and the 59.9-h.p. six-cylinder at £1,095. For 1913 all the models, with the single exception of the 15-h.p. "ordinary" at £365, will include Rudge-Whitworth detachable wire wheels and a spare wheel in the inclusive price of the chassis. Hitherto these wheels have been charged extra, and only supplied where ordered; but Mr. Edge, who first used them in his 24 hours' world's record drive in 1907, is so thoroughly convinced of their utility and tyre-saving qualities that he has now decided to fit them as a standard feature of the Napier models. Another important departure is with regard to the body-building. Up to the present there have been difficulties in securing absolute uniformity of quality with regard to the bodies, and to remedy this for the future Messrs. Edge have guaranteed to the Cunard Carriage Company a large amount of business per annum on the condition that the coachwork shall be of the very latest design and of the highest possible class, consistently up to the Napier standard. Apart from these innovations, there are no drastic departures from the usual Napier policy, which for several years has been one of continuous improvement in detail, whilst adhering to the main lines of design and construction which have established the reputation of the Napier car all over the world.

The latest news of the tyre test is to the effect that the Victor succumbed at 5,010 miles—an extraordinarily good mileage for a steel-studded non-skid in any circumstances, but more particularly considering the weight and age of the test car and the condition of the roads upon which it has been running. At the moment the position is that the Dunlop is the only one of the four competitors still left in the first round of the test, the Michelin, Continental, and Victor having gone in the order named. But the Dunlop has still 800 miles to go to equal the performance of the Victor, and, should it fail to do this, the last-named will have beaten all its competitors in this section of the trial. Interest is now attaching to the forthcoming test of the respective grooved rubber types, which will commence under similar conditions immediately at the conclusion of the steel-studded test.

There was a very pretty display of illuminated aeroplanes at Hendon on Thursday evening, the 26th ult. The weather was calm, and a full moon added greatly to the enchantment of the scene. Crowds of spectators watched the ascent of the lighted machines as they flew round and over the course, while a searchlight of great power on Mr. Richard Gate's biplane flashed a message to Captain Playfair, who received it on terra firma.

The Stones of Waterloo Bridge.

THE town-going geologist, who daily crosses Waterloo Bridge on his way to business, has recently been in danger of losing one of the minor joys of life. Of what the pleasure consists may at once be stated. It is merely the character of the patterns on two or three of the numerous slabs of granite with which the footpath on the west side of the bridge is paved. And the ever-constant fear has been that the stones of this side-walk might be replaced by artificial material. This change has already been made on the opposite footway, but so far the treasured paving-stones on the west have been spared, except where small blocks of manufactured rock have been neatly let into the hollows worn by passing feet or fretted by the weather.

On damp mornings especially the eyes of the scientist are unconsciously directed twice or thrice towards the granite slabs, glistening under the film of moisture. To be more precise, the granite contains large crystals of creamy-white felspar, each extending an inch or more in length, and in a few spots these crystals are seen to have a somewhat definite "set" or orientation. One of the slabs thus distinguished may be noted about a third of the river's breadth from the Waterloo bank of the stream. Here the crystals lie north-west and south-east, the bridge itself heading about north-north-west. Some two score yards nearer Wellington Street is another block in which the crystals are oriented from north-east to south-west, the stone evidently lying reversed, as compared with the preceding specimen.

Now the geologist is not, like the man with the muck-rake, for ever attracted earthward. Like other lovers of beauty, he may pause to admire St. Paul's Cathedral from what is generally considered the finest viewpoint. Occasionally, too, he gives a moment's remembrance, not only to John Rennie, the designer of this noble bridge, but also to the builder, Sir Edward Banks, who, a century ago, worked as a common labourer on the old Merstham tramway, and who lies at rest in Chipstead churchyard, close by. Nevertheless, the felspar crystals often recur to the mind, and set the observer thinking.

Whence did these huge granite prisms come? The answer is a little uncertain. We know that the soot-begrimed balustrades came from the oldest of the Aberdeen granite quarries, nearly a hundred years back, and it may be that the original pavement was hewn in the same district. But the "flags" must have been renewed more than once, and the particular stones on which we now look probably came from Devon or Cornwall. Most of the granite of which London Bridge, for example, is composed came from Heytor, on Dartmoor, while Cornish grey granite was used in the construction of the bridges at Blackfriars and Westminster. Let us suppose, then, that our Waterloo pavement once formed part of one of those granite tors which rise to heights of 1,000 or 2,000 feet in the old kingdom of Damnonia in the West.

The story which geology tells of these huge bosses of rock is a strange one, for it is as nearly certain as sound deduction from clear facts can approach certainty that the granite tors were once molten and were cooled and solidified at great depths beneath the earth's crust. Nothing physically resembling granite can be found in the lava streams of active volcanoes, either before or after cooling. All the features indicate that granite is a deep-seated product. The fused material at first lay in a kind of subterranean reservoir, and though the upward forces drove the liquid into the surrounding and overlying strata in such a manner as to form veins and "sills," yet the contents of the cauldron did not reach the surface. As soon as the molten mixture began to cool, the component particles of the fiery fluid, still retaining freedom to move onward and to rotate, were attracted, like to like, by virtue of the mysterious laws of crystallisation.

Ruskin speaks rather poetically of the "caprice of crystals," yet it must not be supposed that the phenomena of crystallisation occur at haphazard. Granite, as most folk know, is an aggregate composed of three different minerals, quartz, felspar, and mica. These three minerals represent, as it were, the plums and other ingredients which make up the granite pudding. A little inspection of a splinter of granite shows that the minerals, individually considered, are imperfectly developed. We see abundant crystalline faces, but no complete crystals. There is the quartz, irregular, rough and glassy; there is the felspar, white or pinkish in colour, and pearly or dull in its lustre; while the mica is seen as tiny flakes, which may be either white or black. The separate mineral constituents lie side by side, or partially enclose one another, or they are confusedly scattered throughout the matrix. The incompleteness of the crystals is due to the great pressure under which the mass cooled.

It is a striking feature of these molten mixtures that the various minerals crystallise in due order, which, in general, is dependent on the temperature and the nature of the composition. In the special case of the granite of Waterloo Bridge it would seem that the felspar was the first mineral to consolidate. There must have been a gentle streaming movement in the material, and thus the axes of the crystals were able, in places, to assume a remarkable symmetry of position. Moreover, the crystallisation of the felspar determined the limits of the other minerals.

In due course the molten granite became solid, and gradually became covered by a great thickness of sediment. Ages afterwards a warping of the earth's crust upheaved the rocks of the district, and the denuding forces of Nature began to strip away the strata which concealed the "plutonic rock," and at last the granite showed bare at the earth's surface. Rain and frost and wind next attacked the granite, and carved it into the stacks and pillars of the moorland tor.

Of the three constituent minerals of the granite, felspar is the traitor that weakens the bonds. The silicates of soda and potash which it contains are acted upon by the carbonic acid contained in rain water, and gradually the rock, even on the Devonian heights, crumbles away, leaving behind the substance which is washed away to form the beds of China clay or kaolin. But on Waterloo Bridge it is the attrition caused by the feet of the ever-hurrying throng which does the greatest mischief and which produces those cavities that the road-menders skilfully re-fill. And, alas! this constant abrasion must lead in the end to the removal of the natural curiosities which have been described.

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE City has had a shock, and as I write these lines on Tuesday night everything looks black. The telephones to Paris have been in the hands of the Government all day long, and even telegraphing has been hard. This has made the foreign markets uneasy and nervous; "bulls" have been getting rid of their shares in all markets. Actually no one knows whether peace in the Balkans will be kept. The Great Powers do not want a war, that is clear. But can they restrain the wild creatures that infest the Balkans? They are a race apart.

The Chinese loan did not go well. Sixty per cent. is a large amount for underwriters to have to take. Birch Crisp was too quick and too confident. The various banks who backed him should have been compelled to take their portion firm, then any of the public that came in would have got out the other underwriters. The Balkan trouble has made a good many sell out, and the discount of 1¼ looks bad. If peace is secured, we shall see a reaction. The group means to put the price to 97½, and then bring out the second portion of their loan. That is the policy, but whether it will be carried out depends not upon the group, but upon the position on the Continent.

The Rio Loan looks good, but it has not gone, for there are various other loans which appear to clash.

The Canadian Northern want another big slice of our money, and they offer Convertible Income Bonds. I cannot see that these Bonds are a strong security, for the Railway needs a great deal more money and it may have to borrow on 1st Mortgage Bonds, which will injure the Income Bonds. They are not protected as far as interest is concerned, for the present income only just suffices to pay the expected interest. Things in Canada are not good financially, and any severe slump will affect Canadian Northern seriously.

The Porco mine need not take up much space. I need only remark that Aramayo Francke know Bolivia inside out, and they would hardly let any good mine pass them.

The Stephen Smith preference shares are a good industrial security and they will be readily subscribed by the present shareholders. The Bonds of the Philadelphia Co. do not look cheap, and those who desire an investment in this company had better subscribe for the preference shares at 88.

MONEY is plentiful, but no one quite knows how long it will be cheap. If these Balkan States begin to fight we shall see a Five per Cent. rate very soon. In any case, we must not expect any cheaper rates this side of the New Year.

FOREIGNERS look very sick indeed. We have grown so accustomed to peace that the very mention of war makes us shiver. Greeks and Bulgarians and Turks are very dull. The Greek market has been kept hard for many months past, and a slump here will hurt some people severely. The Bulgarian loans are dealt in on the Paris Bourse, and here few people have invested. But a good many investors have been attracted by the high yield in Hungarian Rentes and the really sound security of the Austrian Empire. If they fall much lower they will be worth picking up. A big "bull" account must have been built up in Tintos, for they fell heavily. Yet the copper position is splendid, and even with a war on hand copper should not be seriously affected, for a war eats up copper as nothing else in the world does.

HOME RAILS are not fashionable, but in the Southern lines there is a big "bull" account which must be shaken out. Why people should buy Little Chats and Dover A I cannot say. The talk of Kent Coal is mere moonshine. The traffics could not benefit even if all the collieries began to mine coal next week, and there is no chance of any coal being carried on the railways for at least twelve months, and it will be two years before any coal in quantity is sent over the lines. The gamble will soon die out. Traffics are good all over the country, and those who want an investment cannot do better than buy Great Western, North-Eastern, and London and North-Western.

YANKEES are good. But the market does not like the Chicago Great Western refusal to pay interest on the Bonds of its subsidiary companies. There is a strong feeling on the Stock Exchange and an agitation is on foot to ask the Committee to strike Chicago Great Western off the Official List. The Railway is doing badly. But the big lines are making money hand over fist, for the crops are good, and if the companies could only raise their rates they would make fortunes. Unions, Southern Pacifics and Southerns look well and may be bought. Lehigh Valley are also talked up. Eries should also rise. The gamblers buy Eries and Rocks, but sober-minded people put their money into Union Convertible Bonds and show their wisdom. On the whole I like the look of the Yankee market better than that of any other market in the Stock Exchange.

RUBBER shares are stupidly dull. The Straits Bertam report was a damper, and Sir West Ridgway had hard work to get the shareholders to pass the report. I have always warned my readers against this company, and I hope that they have kept out. British Rubber Estates of Java have paid 5 per cent by the simple expedient of charging all expense possible to capital. How easy to pay dividends like this, and how hard to go on doing it. No one should hold shares in this company. Rubber keeps low in price, much to the annoyance of the "bulls," and somewhat to the astonishment of insiders, who did not expect any drop this year.

OIL shares look weak, but not even the inside tip to buy Shells has had any effect on the market, and all the choice special shares have been let down. I see no future in the oil market, even Mexican Eagles are dull, and they say that this company has made an agreement to sell its oil to the Standard. If so, they are not dear: the company has plenty of oil, but not a good market. British Maikop is now doing well and has a good production, but no one wants oil shares to-day. Premiers are dull, and even Roumanian Consolidated do not respond to the efforts of the Barnett group to put them up.

MINES are particularly rotten, and it is openly said that the big houses are at sixes and sevens again. It seems almost an impossible task to get these people to agree. They now say that Barnatos stand out. If so, we may give up any idea of a rise in Kaffirs, for they are the only house with any money. Rhodesians look equally sick, and the promised land boom is now postponed till after Christmas. If the rich men will not put their hands in their pockets to find the money to make a market we shall see a slump to the old prices. Zaaiplaats tin continue to be sold by the insiders and puffed by the Press.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are dull. The Cement Report was bad, and clearly, unless profits improve, this year the preference dividend will be jeopardised. British Portland Cement appears to be the best thing to buy. Maroonis are very flat and look like going lower. Forestal Land will take over a big Hamburg competitor, and the news has made the shares hard. West India and Panama Telegraphs are low and look worth buying at present prices.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.
THE PSALMS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It is a fact that can neither be disputed nor explained away that in the Bible of 1611, which is known as the Authorised Version, and which was undoubtedly Englished in its present form by Francis Bacon, the 46th Psalm is so arranged that the forty-sixth word from the commencement is "Shake" and the forty-sixth word from the end is "Speare." This purposeful arrangement was always well known to those in possession of Bacon's secrets. Mr. Irving called attention to the matter in 1910, not knowing its value as confirmatory evidence of the real authorship both of Shakespeare and of the 1611 Version of the Bible.

He, as it were, stole our clothes and decked himself up as a "motley," thinking in this way to dispose of the truth by ridicule. But the actual result proved to be the exact opposite, because people are continually saying, "It is very curious!" "Can it be by accident?" "Perhaps it is after all a revelation of Bacon's authorship!"

I remember a year or more ago at a banquet at which Sir Sidney Lee and other leading Stratfordians were present, much laughter was evoked by one of the speakers saying that, when he was last at Stratford, he asked the people there whether Shakespeare had written anything else, and they replied, "Oh, yes! He also wrote the Bible." The laughter was, however, really against the unlucky believers in the Stratford Clown, as those will perceive who are aware that the English language embodied in the Bible and in Shakespeare was the product of the labour of one man whose name was Francis Bacon.

The evidence supplied below proves that the purposeful arrangement of the words in the Authorised Version could not have been the result of an accident.

In the 1535 Coverdale Bible the Psalm is the 45th, and the 56th word down is "Shook," and the 47th word up is "Speare." In the 1539 Great Bible, in the 46th Psalm, the 46th word down is "Shake," and the 48th word up is "Speare."

In the 1560 Geneva Bible, in the 46th Psalm, the 47th word down is "Shake," and the 44th word up is "Speare."

In the 1568 Bishop's Bible, in the 46th Psalm, the 47th word down is "Shake," and the 48th word up is "Speare."

In the 1611 Authorised Version of the Bible, in the 46th Psalm, the 46th word down is "Shake," and the 46th word up is "Speare."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Perhaps I should have mentioned that although the forty-eight King James' translators used the Bishop's Bible, no copy of that version has been discovered containing any notes made by them. "Selah," which occurs seventy-seven times in the Bible, is not part of the text. It is an instruction to the singer or reader.

In the 1611 Authorised Version of the Bible, page D1 is ornamented with the "B A cornuto" (the horned sheep) ornament which is so frequently employed to show Bacon's authorship of books which do not bear his name. The explanation of this ornament, with which Chapter XI in my book, "Bacon is Shakespeare," is headed, will be found in that chapter. The number "33" spells Bacon's name (B^2 A^1 C^3 O^{14} N^{13}), and is repeatedly used to indicate "Bacon" in the most unexpected places, as I shall show presently. Upon the page 136 in the great folio (1623) of the plays—where is found the long word "Honorificabilitudinitatibus," which proves with mathematical certainty that the plays were the children of Francis Bacon—we find upon line 33: "What is A B backwards with a horn added?" The real answer is obviously "B A Corn u fool." The uninitiated are of course falsely taught that the B A Cornuto ornament signifies "the golden fleece."

In my copy of the second issue "the SHE Bible," the "B A Cornuto ornament" is rosicrucianly rubricated to call special attention to the Baconian emblem.

Again, in the 1611 Version, page "A" is headed with the "Shake a lance at ignorance" symbol, similar to that in the folio (1623) of the Shakespeare plays, excepting that the peacocks have only three feathers in their tails, the five-feather tails being generally reserved for poetical works. But the real evidence of the authorship of Bacon of the English of the Authorised Version is to be found in the marvellous rhythm of its language and in its extraordinary variety of expression, a question which is discussed at considerable length in the preface (evidently written by Bacon), and is a remarkable fact which should be compared with Max Müller's statement that "Shakespeare probably displays a greater variety of expression than any writer in any language." We also read near to the close of the marvellous preface "Wee might be charged . . . . with some unequal dealing toward a great number of good English words . . . . if we should say, as it were, unto certaine words, stand up higher, have a place in the Bible alwaies, and to others of like quality, Get ye hence, be banished for ever."

The Septuagint—the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, which was made about B.C. 150 or earlier—translates Selah by "Diapsalma," which signifies a rest or pause in singing. I myself think that there is considerable evidence that Selah indicated a pause while a trumpet was sounded. Anyway, it is only through want of knowledge that Selah is ever read aloud in our churches or in our homes. No one reads aloud such modern instructions as sotto voce, con amore, with emphasis, in a whisper, forte, piano, etc. Nothing but the profoundest ignorance could possibly induce anyone to claim that Selah formed part of the text and that it should be counted as a word.

The first edition of the 1611 Bible is known as the "HE" Bible, because in Ruth iii. 15 we read: "He measured five measures of barley and laide it on her: and he went into the citie." The second issue of the 1611 Bible, which almost immediately followed the first, is known as the "SHE" Bible, because the above error is corrected, and we read "And she went into the citie."

Your readers will perceive what great pains were taken to insert as large a number of words as possible into the Bible. J. A. Weisse computes these at 15,000; and Max Müller computes that among the two million words in Shakespeare's plays about 15,000 are different words. This is a very much under-estimated number. The real number is about 22,000 different words, of which about 7,000 are new words (invented by Bacon), as the Oxford English Dictionary informs us. The great master of English who was chiefly responsible for the English used in the Authorised Version was the great master of English who, under the assumed name of William Shakespeare, wrote plays, and his name was Francis Bacon.

Yes; the Shakespeare myth is practically dead. The Freemasons who were admitted to the highest degree, "The Thirty-third" (thirty-three, as I said before, spells Bacon), have always been entrusted with Bacon's secrets. Up to 1910 the number of Masons admitted to the thirty-third degree was always strictly limited to nine; but since that year, which is 287 years after the 1623 folio of the Shakespeare plays, the number of Masons admitted to the thirty-third degree has been permanently increased from nine to thirty-three. I am at the present time endeavouring—I trust not unsuccessfully—to force these to reveal Bacon's secrets, at least so far as concerns the authorship of the plays hitherto known under the name of the illiterate clown of Stratford, William Shakespeare, who was never able to write so much as a single letter of his own name. Yours,

EDWIN DURNING LAWRENCE.

THE BRITISH BOYS' TRAINING CORPS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—We shall be obliged by your kindly permitting us to draw attention to a scheme for providing a systematic course of combined military and industrial training for lads from the age of fourteen years upwards.

The object of the British Boys' Training Corps, on behalf of which we write, is the moral, physical and industrial advancement of the cadets enrolled in it, to train them in the duties of citizenship and to fit them for a life of industry. Military organisation and exercises will be used as a means for developing their morale and physique, and promoting among them habits of discipline, application, adaptability and resourcefulness, which are indispensable to proficiency in the workshop or the factory.

The Corps will not compete with the Boy Scouts, the Church Lads' Brigade or any similar movement; rather it will strengthen them by stimulating the growth of those principles of modern education on which they depend for success. In fact, the Corps owes its inception to the excellence of their work, and the consequent desirability of adopting their methods on a more extended and comprehensive scale. Their activities are mainly concerned with boys in employment, whose opportunities for training are necessarily intermittent. The British Boys' Training Corps will in effect be a military and industrial boarding school, and is designed to train and instruct a boy for a period of three or four years continuously from the time he leaves the elementary school.

Alike upon social, economic and industrial grounds we confidently commend the scheme to the public. The annual loss to the nation of promising material presents a grave problem. Far too many boys on leaving school are engaged in "blind-alley" occupations; when they have outgrown these, they find themselves adrift without either the skill or the knowledge to qualify them for permanent employment; they swell the ranks of casual labour, and the prison or the workhouse is the ultimate destiny of an increasing number of them. To mitigate these evils, in some measure at least, is our aim. Those boys, moreover, who may afterwards join the Army will, on discharge, be in a much better position to obtain remunerative employment than they would otherwise be, owing to the technical trade instruction which they have previously received, while their prospects in the Army itself would be considerably in advance of those of the usual recruit, irrespective of their enhanced value as soldiers.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The direction and control of the Corps will be undertaken by Lieutenant-Colonel Alsager Pollock, who organised and conducted the "Spectator" Experimental Company with such conspicuous success in 1906. The experience gained upon that occasion conclusively demonstrated the beneficial effects of military training for even a few months.

Upon its industrial side, the Corps will be modelled on the admirable schools of the Christian Brothers at Artane and elsewhere in Ireland.

It is estimated that the cost of establishing and maintaining the Corps at first will be £15,000. No appeal for funds has yet been made, but two members of the Council have generously promised to guarantee £1,000 and £500 respectively towards the expenses on condition that the total amount guaranteed or subscribed is not less than £15,000; and various unsolicited donations, including an anonymous one of £50, have already been placed to the credit of the Corps at the Bank of England.

In issuing this appeal for financial support, we would emphasise the fact that the movement is in no way connected with any political party. The Council includes members of all parties, and distinguished representatives of almost every aspect of national life. The realisation of the project will fill a distinct gap in English education, for the existing facilities for efficient practical training during the years of adolescence are deplorably inadequate, and it will, we trust, lead to the establishment of similar Corps in other parts of the country.

Subscribers will have the privilege of nominating boys to the Corps according to a fixed scale.

Guarantees, donations or subscriptions may be sent to the account of the Corps at the Bank of England (Western Branch), Burlington Gardens, W.; to Colonel Pollock, Wingfield, Godalming; or to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. J. C. Medd, 37, Russell Square, W.C., from whom particulars of the scheme can be obtained. Your obedient Servants,

ALEXANDER OF TECK (President),

PORTLAND,
REAY,
THOS. BOOR CROSBY (Lord Mayor),
CHARLES WARREN.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—In his letter, in your issue of the 21st inst., Mr. T. G. Martin explains that certain people begin by learning grammar out of a book, and end in too many cases in becoming Christian Scientists. I am not sure that I know what Mr. Martin means. I feel rather as bewildered as the gentleman who wrote of a somewhat similar cryptic utterance, "which I am sure was very clever, but I did not understand." Perhaps this is because I was brought up in a public school, and only learnt Latin and Greek grammar. I became a Christian Scientist, however, very much, I imagine, as others do, and if Mr. Martin will excuse my explaining, and you will permit it, it was in this way.

I was brought face to face with a great deal of Christian Science healing, not merely of sickness, but of other descriptions. Now I have always believed Huxley was talking uncommonly good sense when he said, that if he met a centaur in Piccadilly, he would not scream "miracle," but realise that his views on anatomy demanded drastic revision. When, therefore, I saw the healing I have alluded to I made an effort to find out how it was accomplished. I spent two years in endeavouring to demonstrate the truth of Mrs. Eddy's teaching for myself, and at the end of that time came to the conclusion, which I do not think I had intended when I began, that the evidence was irrefragable. Perhaps it was the "Public School Latin Primer," perhaps it was the "Græcæ Grammaticæ Rudimenta," I do not know. I think, like the blind man, I was rather prepared to say, "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see." Yours faithfully,

FREDERICK DIXON.

THE SIMPLIFICATION OF ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In reply to Mr. Martin, how many Englishmen think of "ought" as the past tense of "owe"? It is now almost universally regarded as a present, and I can therefore see little objection to adding the suffix -ed and saying of a past obligation, "I oughted." As a parallel case of double inflection, take the case of "children." Here we have the plural form "childer" repluralised into "childer-en," "children." So again the double possessive in "this heart of mine."

I agree with Mr. Martin that a language must grow; but I cannot see why useless irregularities should not be judiciously pruned away. Having made careful and prolonged experiments with English, I can say with confidence that the genius of the language is unaffected by such a process, and I would undertake to turn even the Authorised Version of the Bible into Simplified English without unduly spoiling its magnificent dignity and sonorousness. As to German, it would, to a foreigner at any rate, gain immensely by simplification, and might prove a formidable rival even to English at its best. At present its genders, cases, and irregular verbs make it (I had almost said) impossible. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

IMMO S. ALLEN.

London Institution.

MR. HOWARD'S CONSTITUENCY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—It has just been stated in the Press that the Hon. Geoffrey Howard is the Liberal member for the Eskdale Division of Cumberland. That is, however, entirely erroneous. Mr. Howard certainly represented this constituency for a period of about five years (from January, 1906, to December, 1910), but was defeated at the last General Election by Mr. Claude Lowther, Conservative, by a majority of 370, and has meanwhile been elected Liberal member for the Westbury Division of Wiltshire, which he now represents.—Yours very obediently, ALGERNON ASHTON.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Since conjunctions connect nouns and pronouns in the same case, and since a noun or pronoun placed in apposition must be in the same case as the noun or pronoun to which it is opposed, the rule is violated in, "I never knew such a coward as he." The correct sentence is, "I never knew such a coward (obj.) as him (obj.)." "I never knew such a coward as he [is]" is unpardonable.

The following are correct and typical examples:—

"She is not even as big as I."

"We could kill every soul of them in half an hour, and they know that as well as I."

"In this state F. C. had found her, her trembling, them loud and insolent."

"I wish that little M. would find them closeted together, him softened by her tears, and her receiving his devotions with effusion."

I think that the above sentences will illustrate the grammatical point in question.

J. MCLAUGHLIN.

Notes of the Week

WE should like the Post Office authorities to explain why that which is permissible for the Nation newspaper has been forbidden in the case of THE ACADEMY. We have been prohibited from issuing a modest four-page supplement unless it is attached by wire or otherwise to the weekly issue. Last week the Nation issued a ponderous supplement of 20 pages, skewered together, and unattached to the weekly issue. The Post Office delivered the issue and supplement quite happily for one-halfpenny. Can the explanation be that the Nation is a Government organ, whilst we find much to criticise in the actions of one or other of the sections who are the Postmaster-General's clients?

We have condemned the domestic policy of the Government as an organised hypocrisy on the ground that, whilst making a show of benefiting labour, it has in reality involved a conspiracy against employment. All ill-considered imposts on enterprise and industry limit the range of employment and wages. The latest confirmation of our view comes from the docks, where work, since the blessing of insurance cards has been decreed, is increasingly difficult to obtain. Casual employment, often provided from motives of kindness, is getting scarce, owing to a compulsory incident which is alien to the British temperament. True policy is to foster trade and enterprise, and so provide employment and wages. The mawkish and maudlin policy of putting men in positions for which they are quite unfitted only leads to destitution and the workhouse. We saw a holding in Kent, the other day, which, in the hands of a considerable landowner, produced ninety to one hundred tons of strawberries yearly, which were not produced and sent to market without providing employment and wages. The land is now in the possession of a small holder. The strawberry plants are choked with weeds, no fruit was sent to market this year, no employment or wages were forthcoming. The owner of the neighbouring shooting does not complain. The rank growth of weeds makes excellent covert for partridges!

It is with great regret and a sense of personal loss that we have to record the death during the past week of Professor Walter W. Skeat. For many years his name was familiar as a contributor to THE ACADEMY, and there was perhaps no greater authority on Chaucer, Early English text, and the literature of the Middle Ages; his "Etymological English Dictionary," the most important of all his published works, ranks as one of the standard books of the period. There was a side of his nature, however, which hardly any papers have mentioned, quite unsuspected by the ordinary man, to whom such studies as formed his life-work might easily seem "dry" and profitable only to the specialist; unknown, too, we dare hazard, to many students of his books. We allude to the poetic feeling which was innate in him, and which found an outlet often in verses which appeared in the columns of THE ACADEMY; verses not startling, nor perhaps of extraordinary value from a critical standpoint, but enshrining some idea which more often than not was of a deeply religious tone; sometimes, however, straying into the field of a delicate humour. Whether we agree or not with his championship of a revised method of English orthography, we feel that his death is a loss, not only to literature, but to the nation.

Nature is sometimes very unkind, and an instance of her callousness has just occurred. The instruments of the scientists have recorded an earthquake at a distance of 8,000 miles, on the Pacific coast—therefore presumably in Chili. By all the rules of the game we ought now to be harrowed by lurid reports of damage in that narrow and peculiarly named country; but no—Chili goes on with her business much as usual, simply telegraphing, in reply to affectionate inquiries after her health, that "no shock has been felt"; or, as it were, "Earthquake not yet to hand—try elsewhere." The annoyed seismologist naturally protests at this barefaced discourtesy; there is the tremor clearly announced on his delicate mechanism as having occurred in Chili; how dare Chili not have an earthquake? As we said before, it is most inconsiderate of nature not to back up the scientists. But perhaps they have exposed her secrets too freely, and she is resentful.

Leaders Galore

LAST week we dealt in a serious vein with the onerous tasks to which Parliament is committed, and gave expression to an aspiration that the House of Commons would respond with dignity and responsibility to a situation eminently demanding the display of those qualities. Such is still our hope.

During the past week nothing has occurred which tends to diminish confidence that debate in Parliament will be worthy of the occasion.

The general political situation, however, has not during the recess strengthened the belief that great issues are viewed with the circumspection, or will be handled with the unity and singleness of purpose which can alone conduce to the lasting interests of the Commonwealth. Levity will not solve the problem of Ulster; melodrama will not evolve measures for dealing with the problems of the land in the interests of the community. Both of these questions are fundamental questions, and no haphazard or empiric measures tending to striking tableaux will do anything to produce lasting consent or to promote national advantage.

The Government, it is true, cannot complain if the bonds of discipline in its heterogeneous phalanx are relaxed almost to breaking point. The course of the Government has been throughout at once destructive of established authority and subservient to insurrectionary methods. Sacrifices of declared policy have been shamelessly made in deference to the Whip's calculations of support in the Lobby; violence has been unchecked, and even condoned, where a compact body of Parliamentary supporters have demanded that course. Neither stability nor fortitude, neither principle nor self-respect, has set a hall-mark on material which has survived no threat and faced no risks.

It is true the Master of Elibank, either because of a pawky sense of humour, or a deficiency in that estimable quality, produced a situation which has been and still is very embarrassing for a facing-both-ways administration. He fought Labour at Hanley, and supported it at Mid-Lothian—in both cases with disastrous results to his erstwhile party. No doubt he meant well on both occasions, but he put the Trimmers in a terrible quandary. Every Minister who exhibits any backbone is anathema to present administration. Even Mr. Churchill, after a long course of nullity at the Home Office, was quickly shuffled to the Admiralty, when with the incalculable fluctuations of his distinguished family he ceased to pose for the photographer, and decreed the employment of the military arm to suppress flagrant and murderous violence by mobs, whom he had encouraged by a belief in impunity.

Other less distinguished victims of spasmodic administrative cussedness—as it is viewed by the Cabinet—will occur to those who follow political events. Only Mr. Birrell is exempt, because he coerces those who by no conceivable possibility would give a vote for the administration of which he is the distinguished literary dilettante.

It would be idle to recall occurrences which do nothing to enhance the estimation in which this country is held either amongst our kinsfolk in the Colonies, or amongst our friends and competitors abroad. It is a melancholy rôle to indicate that the rulers of a great nation are unequal to their functions, and a detriment to the traditional estimation in which it has been held. If, however, no protest is entered, if the mirror is never held up to nature, the process of deterioration becomes septic, and gangrene may invade the body politic.

To turn to the lighter side of a picture which it is not desirable to colour too darkly, Mr. Asquith at once emerges as affording a major portion of the comic element. The Prime Minister enjoys an almost childish delight in proclaiming on every conceivable occasion that he is the leader of the party—the head of the Government. He remarks significantly that he ought to know—if anyone does—what is the policy of the Government. He is not dismayed at the attitude of Ulster, and the single tax will assuredly not be found embodied in a Government scheme of land legislation. Mr. Scott, otherwise the "Manchester Guardian," and Mr. Massingham, otherwise the "Nation," etc., openly flout him on the question of Ulster; Mr. Outhwaite and Mr. Hemmerde are in no way dismayed by his declaration as to land legislation. We do not remember that either Mr. Disraeli or the late Lord Salisbury were constantly informing meetings of their followers that they in their turn were the leaders of their party. Certainly Mr. Gladstone never did so, because it was entirely alien to his habit of mind to picture anyone else but himself as occupying that position. It is true that Mr. Balfour was latterly fond of insisting on his position as leader of his party—he did so at Sheffield, he did so at Leeds, and emphatically at the Albert Hall. Mr. F. E. Smith smiled covertly, much as the Treasury bench now conceals a smile behind a yawn.

Mr. Churchill made a bid for the leadership at Belfast, and "lived to fight another day." At Dundee he made apparently a most determined attempt to upset his colleagues' Irish policy and therefore the tenure of office of his party. As he and Mr. Lloyd George can never meet without being convulsed with laughter, like the conspirators in the "Ingoldsby Legends," we are in hope that the electors of Dundee will join in the merriment after a month or so of reflection.

Mr. Lloyd George is loyalty itself in the Post-Impressionist style. Mr. Outhwaite and Mr. Hemmerde will cry hosannahs so long as Mr. Asquith accepts their policy. Mr. Massingham and Mr. Scott, when they have educated Mr. Asquith, will proclaim him as the greatest party leader of modern times.

The coalition may be largely futile, but at least it can boast of a considerable array of men who count themselves as "men of light and leading," and who are quite willing to relieve their revered leader of the trammels of office if they weigh too heavily upon him.

CECIL COWPER.

Autumn Books

IF every copy of every book published in the autumn season were sold—and paid for—the publisher would be the happiest, and probably one of the wealthiest, men in the country; and if every copy were read, marked, and inwardly digested, the ordinary work of the ordinary man would not be done at all. Fortunately, perhaps, a fair number of volumes at this period of the year fall into the category of presents; we begin to think of Christmas, to speak of its approach in terms of weeks instead of months. The hardest days of the reviewer's life are upon him, and books of all descriptions fall in showers—not always refreshing—on editorial heads.

The press of matter this autumn is greater than ever, and one point to note specially is the prevalence of the reprint. A complete edition of the novels of Sir Walter Scott, in 24 volumes, comes from the Oxford University Press, each one with from 14 to 74 illustrations. Obviously it is of no use to say, with the sneer of the ultra-modern, that "Scott is old-fashioned and not read nowadays," since these neat little books are not issued, presumably, without certain knowledge of a demand. They may be purchased separately, and we note that three forms are obtainable; the cheapest (an excellent and handy get-up) at 1s. 6d., others at half-a-crown and 3s. 6d. A splendid selection of many other works may be made from the list of the same firm; among them we may mention Professor Gilbert Murray's "Four Stages of Greek Religion," Professor Skeat's "Science of Etymology," Sir Arthur Quiller Couch's "Oxford Book of Victorian Verse," and various treatises on theology, archæology, law, and philosophy.

Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons, with forty new issues of "Everyman's Library"—which now numbers 640 volumes—invite more than ordinary attention. Pure literature is represented in this well-known series by Carlyle's "Past and Present," Lowell's "Among my Books," Thackeray's "English Humorists," and another selection from De Quincey's writings. Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," Mrs. Gaskell's stories, Tolstoi's "Anna Karenina," and Kingsley's "Yeast" are among the fiction, and we are especially pleased to see a new revised issue of Roget's "Thesaurus"—one of those books of reference which, if not indispensable, are extremely useful to the author, since the best of us is at times at a loss for the exact word or the most expressive metaphor. Theology and philosophy, biography and travel, are subjects not neglected, and under the heading of history comes Hallam's "Constitutional History" in three volumes, with an introduction by Professor J. H. Morgan. Volume II. of Tennyson's Poems, Bjornson's Plays, and "Restoration Plays" from Dryden to Farquhar, with an introduction by Edmund Gosse, should attract many readers. A fresh departure is being made by Messrs. Dent in "Everyman," a weekly paper devoted to literature and ethics, the first number of which will be ready on October 18, price one penny; the list of writers should ensure its success.

Several new medical and educational books are announced by Messrs. J. Nisbet and Co., but of more interest to the general reader will be Dr. Wilfred Grenfell's "Adventure of Life," at 3s. 6d. net, and a "Nature Book" by Frank St. Mars, entitled "On Nature's Trail," dealing with the wild life of this country in an original way. Dr. L. M. Watt's "Scottish Life and Poetry" is due this month; no other volume yet accessible covers the same ground. Of special interest to younger readers is the new edition of R. M. Ballantyne's works at 2s. 6d., illustrated, and some capital stories for boys and girls at 3s. 6d., or 4s. with gilt edges.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins has made his bow as a publisher during the last week or two with a novel, "Windyridge," by Mr. W. Riley—written, it is said, merely to amuse a friend who was in trouble, without thought of print—and a volume called "The Love-Seeker," by Mrs. Maud Churton Braby, author of "Modern Marriage and How to Bear It." Her latest essay is somewhat on the same lines, we understand, being a "Guide to Marriage," and a vade-mecum for all who fall in love. Probably nobody will take advice from a book as to procedure in a grande passion, but most lovers will be curious to see what Mrs. Braby has to say on the subject. "Caravanning and Camping Out," by J. Harris Stone, with many diagrams and illustrations (15s. net), and a volume on Madame Récamier and her salon, "A Great Coquette" (12s. 6d. net), by Joseph Turquan, are two more notable books issued by Mr. Jenkins.

In addition to a good list of illustrated fare for juveniles, and a strong instalment of fiction, Messrs. D. Appleton and Co. are producing much that is worthy of consideration on more serious lines. "The Founding of Modern Psychology," by G. Stanley Hall, and "Sociology in its Psychological Aspects," by C. A. Elwood, Ph.D., should appeal to students of human nature; several commercial books, technical text-books, and a volume of folk-lore also appear from the same firm; and the eighth and last section of Mr. J. B. Macmaster's "History of the People of the United States" (10s. 6d. net per volume) completes an important work. The final five volumes of the "Swanston" edition of Robert Louis Stevenson's works will appear next month from the house of Chatto and Windus. Twenty volumes have already been published, and, as they are only obtainable in sets, those who wish to possess this valuable addition to their library should not delay in deciding to order. This firm has in preparation a history of the Moslems in Spain, "Spanish Islam," translated from Reinhart Dozy's original by Francis G. Stokes; the price will be 21s. net; and "The Charm of London," an anthology edited by A. H. Hyatt, to be ready on October 10, illustrated in colour by Yoshio Markino: this will be issued at two prices, 5s. and 7s. 6d. Several new novels have appeared from the same house during the last month, among them "Faustula," by Mr. John Ayscough, "A Daughter of the Morning," by Mr. Hugh de Sélincourt, and "Three Women," by Miss Netta Syrett.

Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. announce many new novels, among whose authors we notice the names of Maud Stepney Rawson and Arabella Kenealy, and a book by Mr. W. H. Koebel, whose work is familiar to readers of THE ACADEMY, entitled "In Jesuit Land." Mr. Koebel in this fascinating study traces the story of the Jesuit Missions in South America from their early days down to the final expulsion of the Jesuits by Bucareli in the middle of the eighteenth century. Many other volumes recently issued by this firm have been reviewed in these columns, and need not be included here. The S.P.C.K. publish this month "The Latest Light on Bible Lands," by Mr. P. S. Handcock, of the British Museum, which collates the results of recent research, and several theological works of general interest. Messrs. George Allen and Co. have issued within the last week or two Mr. Keble Chatterton's new book on "King's Cutters and Smugglers" (10s. 6d.); "Brabazon and his Art," by Mr. Lewis Hind, a beautiful volume with full-page illustrations in colour finely reproduced; "A History of Psychology," by Dr. G. S. Brett (12s. 6d. net); "Colour in the Home," by Edward Duveen, illustrated, 2 guineas net; and other works of importance in different departments.

Some exceptional books arrive this autumn from Messrs. Methuen and Co. "The Armourer and his Craft," by Charles Ffoulkes, at 2 guineas net, should prove a standard work on its theme; it is limited to an edition of 350 copies for Great Britain. A new volume of the "Connoisseur's Library" comes from the pen of Mr. Alfred W. Pollard, entitled "Fine Books: A Record of Books Valued for their Printing, Decoration, or Illustration." Mr. Pollard is well known as an authority on this subject, and his work will be informative to the collector of rarities. "A Book of Famous Wits," by Walter Jerrold, records the development of wit and the decline of the pun in a chatty fashion, and among the reprints we notice the handy pocket edition of Charles Lamb's essays and miscellaneous prose.

Among art books, a new work on "Greuze and his Models" is due from Messrs. Hutchinson and Co. The author, Mr. John Rivers—another ACADEMY contributor—has avoided the usual style of the technical monograph designed for the use of the student, and treats his theme from an altogether more human and popular point of view; his book, issued at 10s. 6d. net, with 39 full-page plates, should command a wide circle of readers. We note that this month Messrs. Hutchinson publish the first fortnightly part of a series entitled "The Customs of the World," to be complete within a year; many coloured plates and fine pictures will be included, and the price, 7d., is moderate. Two more colour-volumes will be "The Book of Psalms," illustrations by Frank Pape, and Goethe's "Faust," illustrations by Willy Pogany (a new cheap edition), at 10s. 6d. and 6s. respectively. Two new anthologies are also announced; "Parodies and Imitations Old and New," edited by J. S. Adam and Bernard White, with a foreword by Sir Arthur Quiller Couch, and an "Anthology of Babyhood," by Muriel D'Auvergne, both 3s. 6d. net. From the same firm comes a new novel by the indefatigable Mr. W. B. Maxwell, entitled "General Mallock's Shadow," and another story from the pen of Baroness Orczy, "Meadowsweet."

The official record of the Durbar of December last is just ready, and Messrs. Macmillan and Co. may be depended upon to produce it in excellent style; the Hon. John Fortescue sums up the account of their Majesties' Indian tour by attempting to answer the question as to whether the results of the visit will be lasting and for the good of the Indian Empire. "South America," by the Right Hon. James Bryce, is another notable book which we shall shortly review in these columns. "Further Reminiscences," by Mr. H. M. Hyndham, continue the interest of his previous volume from the year 1889; Messrs. Macmillan are also publishing the biography of G. F. Watts, by Mrs. Watts, in three volumes, and the "Life of Francis Paget, D.D.," by Dr. Stephen Paget and the Rev. J. C. Crum. The Wessex Edition of the works of Thomas Hardy is, of course, now well on the way, and will be reinforced immediately by "The Well Beloved" and "A Group of Noble Dames"; next month will see "Desperate Remedies" and "The Hand of Ethelberta" in circulation. Several fine books are nearing completion, and fuller particulars are promised for next month. To mention Messrs. Macmillan's other contributions to the season would take up a whole column, but we may just allude to some valuable works on philosophy, natural history, and the classics.

Mr. Edward Arnold's autumn list includes "Campaigns of a War Correspondent," by the late Mr. Melton Prior (15s. net); these reminiscences cover a period of over thirty years, ranging from the Ashanti War down to the Russo-Japanese conflict, and the author's own sketches will illustrate the book freely. A travel book with sad associations is the diary of Boyd Alexander on his last journey, with a memoir by his brother. "Memories of Victorian London," by Mrs. L. B. Walford, is rendered peculiarly interesting by its sketches of "Pam" and "Dizzy," although, of course, reminiscences of many literary people of the Wilkie Collins period form the principal characteristic of the book. This week Mr. Arnold has issued Prof. O. Elton's "Survey of English Literature, 1780-1830." Musical readers will note that Mr. Arnold publishes the full libretto of Lord Howard de Walden's opera, "The Children of Don," with a frontispiece by Mr. S. H. Sime. Scientific works and other travel volumes which we have no space to mention in detail complete a very scholarly catalogue.

The most topical book from the firm of Hurst and Blackett is "The Mormons," by Winifred Graham, a reasoned discussion of the question of Mormonism, emphasising the need for a drastic campaign, and tracing the history of the sect; this is priced at 6s. net. "Intimacies of Court and Society" (10s. 6d. net), by the widow of a diplomat, presents some pictures of an aspect of the life of various European Courts new to the public; and "Cities Seen in East and West," by Mrs. W. Tibbits (16s. net), is a volume that, besides being a fascinating account of travels in both Occident and Orient, might be given as a handsome present. In colour books Messrs. A. and C. Black introduce this autumn some fine specimens of the work for which they have become noted: "Germany," with pictures by E. T. and E. H. Compton, and "South America," painted by A. S. Forrest and described by W. H. Koebel, are two beautiful volumes at 20s. each net; among others at 7s. 6d. are "Moscow," "Ayrshire Idylls," and "La Côte d'Emeraude." Several old favourites in a new guise will be welcomed, such as "Æsop's Fables" and the Fairy Tales of Andersen, and in more educational vein we notice that Messrs. Black have in preparation a text-book for students on diseases of the nervous system, by Dr. E. Bramwell, M.B., F.R.C.P., and one by Dr. W. G. Sym, M.D., F.R.C.S.E., on diseases and injuries of the eye.

Messrs. Lynwood and Co. announce three novels: "The Recipe for Rubber," a Fijian romance by Ralph Stock; "The Struggle for the Crown," by E. Yolland; and "A Madonna of the Poor," by Clive Holland. Among Messrs. James Maclehose's books we notice "Lawyers' Merriments," by David Murray, M.A., LL.D., at 7s. 6d. net; "Wild Life in the West Highlands," by C. H. Alston, 6s. net; "Mediæval Glasgow," by Rev J. Primrose, 7s. 6d. net, and several other interesting works. From Mr. John Murray is due another work of adventure, "In Northern Labrador," by Mr. W. B. Cabot, and a study of "Criminal Responsibility and Social Restraint," by Dr. R. M. McConnell.

Specialising on modern plays, Messrs. Duckworth and Co. have issued "Morituri," and "Roses," by Sudermann (seven plays in the two books), and two plays by Strindberg are also added to their list. Mr. Galsworthy's new play, "The Eldest Son," and several other volumes which need not be detailed will be published by the same enterprising firm. Many children's books, some good novels and items in belles lettres, and a reissue of "The Story of my Heart" in a luxurious edition, illustrated from oil paintings by Edward Waite, are other notable features.

The forty-eight pages of Mr. John Lane's autumn list contain many good things. "Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life," by Mrs. Alec Tweedie (16s. net) was published a fortnight ago, and should prove a romance more fascinating than most novels; Mrs. Tweedie has met men and women of note in every sphere, and her vivacious style of writing is well known. An interesting volume by Mr. Lewis Melville, "The Life and Letters of William Cobbett," based mainly on unpublished correspondence, is priced at 32s. net, and, as the first exhaustive biography of the politician "born at the plough-tail," should become a standard work. The life of "Fanny Burney at the Court of Queen Charlotte," by Constance Hill, also contains much fresh material; and in a different vein we may mention Weedon Grossmith's "From Studio to Stage" (16s. net), and a novel, "The Bountiful Hour," by Marion Fox. Many books in this long list have already been noticed.

The excellence of the Riccardi Press issues is becoming proverbial, and a new volume for this autumn in "Number I. fount" is Kingsley's "Heroes," with twelve plates in colour after water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint. This will appear at £2 12s. 6d., 3 guineas, and 15 guineas. Of the ten volumes of "Vasari's Lives of the Most Eminent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects," Vol. II is just issued; the third is promised for next month, and the fourth early next year. This edition, the translation for which is being made by Gaston de Vere, is likely to remain for many years the standard one of the great Italian critic. Many other treasures come from the Riccardi Press of Mr. Philip Lee Warner—too many to reproduce here in detail; we are glad to note, however, that in the spring a "Child's Guide to the National Gallery," by Gertrude K. Peers, is to be issued.

Messrs. S. W. Partridge and Co. are fortunate in publishing Mr. F. T. Jane's new book, "The British Battle Fleet," which traces the growth of our Navy from its beginnings. With its 25 illustrations in colour by Mr. W. L. Wylie, R.A., it is capital value at a guinea. Many good novels and books for boys and girls come from the same firm.

Perhaps the most interesting volume from Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons this autumn is "Fleet Street in Seven Centuries," by Walter G. Bell, with many illustrations by well-known artists, and a "Foreword" by Sir William Treloar. This volume, packed with information, is priced at 15s. net, and should be valuable, apart from its fascinating theme, as a work of reference. In general literature this house is issuing some capital books; "Famous Speeches" (second series), edited by Herbert Paul, 7s. 6d. net; "The Inner Life of George Eliot," by Charles Gardner, M.A., 5s. net; "Wanderings on the Italian Riviera," by Frederic Lees, 7s. 6d. net, are three of the most notable. The business and commercial books issued by Messrs. Pitman occupy a large portion of their catalogue, and we notice that there are several additions to their famous "All-Red" series.

The "Letters of George Meredith," collected and edited by his son, form, of course, the most important item in Messrs. Constable and Co.'s announcements. This is a book which no student of Meredith can afford to neglect; its contents cover the whole period of his career. Four photogravure plates are included, and the price is fixed at 21s. net. In fiction and poetry Messrs. Constable have a strong page or two, and a book which ought to delight many readers is "When I was a Child," by Yoshio Markino, illustrated by the author.

Mr. Andrew Melrose has secured a book in a new vein with "Peeresses of the Stage," by Gordon Meggy (10s. 6d. net), from which much entertainment may be anticipated. "Old Paris," by Henry C. Shelley; "Germany and the German Emperor," by G. H. Perris (12s. 6d. net each); "Following the Drum," by Horace Wyndham; "Trails, Trappers, and Tenderfeet," by Stanley Washburn (10s. 6d. net each); and, in a different sphere, "Applied Socialism," by John Spargo (6s. net) are other notable volumes from Mr. Melrose.

Readers of travel-books will be pleased with "Soldiering and Sport in Uganda," by Capt. E. Lardner, F.R.G.S.; issued by the Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd., at 10s. net. This is an illuminative record of service and adventure in the form of personal narrative, and is illustrated with a great variety of original photographs. "Only a Pitman," by Helen Hudson, at the low price of 1s., is a descriptive story of the life of Northern colliers half a century ago, and with this we might bracket "Original Tales and Ballads in the Yorkshire Dialect," by J. Malham-Dembleby, at 4s. 6d. net. Many books suitable for presents come from the same firm.

Many fine volumes are in the press with Mr. W. Heinemann; among them Mr. Joseph Pennell's "Pictures of the Panama Canal" and a description by Caspar Whitney of a journey up the River Amazon, entitled "The Flowing Road," take precedence as travel-books. Mr. Heinemann issues this month Dr. Chalmers Mitchell's illustrated book on "The Childhood of Animals," which should make an attractive Christmas present; Mr. Amaury Talbot's work on Nigeria; a volume of nature-stories, "Wild Life and the Camera," by Mr. R. Dugmore, illustrated with many photographs, and a book by Mr. F. A. Talbot on "The Steamship Conquest of the World." Mr. John Galsworthy's new story, "The Inn of Tranquillity," was published by Mr. Heinemann on October 3, and is considered to be a companion volume to "A Motley," which appeared about two years ago.

Some Early Arrivals

UNTIL September had passed, we had hoped that each day would herald, at any rate, a short spell of the long-delayed summer; we refused to look at warm clothing, we walked bravely along the front at the seaside in the teeth of an east wind, we trudged miles through country lanes in the drizzling rain, and we gazed many times shiveringly at the Japanese screen in the grate when we would much sooner have warmed our chilled fingers at a glowing fire. So that it came as something of a shock when in the early part of last month we untied a parcel and found it to contain what are usually called "books suitable for presents." If the publishers will insist upon being a little earlier each year, we suppose that the time will soon come when there will be no alternative than to take away a box of Christmas books to review during the summer holidays.

Some welcome favourites appear in new editions of "Æsop's Fables," illustrated by Mr. Charles Folkard, and "Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales," illustrated by A. Duncan Carse (A. and C. Black, 6s. each). The same firm also issue a volume of "Russian Wonder Tales" (6s.), collected by Dr. Post Wheeler and illustrated by Mr. Bilibin. Those who are familiar with the Russian people know what a large hold folk-lore has upon the inhabitants, many of whom are still very superstitious.

In a foreword Dr. Wheeler gives a short history of the folk-tales distributed throughout the pages of Slavonic literature, and collected together by him for this book. We would recommend it as containing many stories probably quite unfamiliar to English readers. "The English Fairy Book," by Ernest Rhys (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.), consists of a collection of dear old friends, including "Jack the Giant-Killer," "Tom Thumb," and "Jack and the Beanstalk"—stories always welcomed by the little folk. "Magic Dominions," by Arthur F. Wallis, with illustrations by Claud Shepperson, and "Oddle and Iddle," by Lily Collier, illustrated by Joyce Crawshay Williams (Smith, Elder, and Co., 3s. 6d. each), are two smaller but equally pleasing volumes.

"Bill the Minder" (Constable and Co., 10s. 6d. net) is written and illustrated by W. Heath Robinson. The colours of some of the pictures are very beautiful, while the artist's name is sufficient to warrant that they are not lacking in humour.

The school story is never likely to lose its interest for the young person, and in "Black Evans," by R. S. Warren Bell (A. and C. Black, 3s. 6d.) we have a very cheap and good book. At the same price, and issued by the same firm, are "The Sea Monarch," by Percy F. Westerman, dealing with the fascinating subject of aeroplanes, and "The Right Sort," by Tom Peddie, a story for boys. "Queer Cousin Claude," by Brenda Girvin (George Allen and Co., 3s. 6d.), and "Two Troubadours" (Smith, Elder, and Co., 3s. 6d.), by Esmè Stuart, are two acceptable volumes of the gift-book series.

Mr. Aflalo, in "A Book of the Wilderness and Jungle" (S. W. Partridge and Co., 6s. net), has provided a want that must have made itself felt, but which has hitherto not been catered for. It is an interesting study of adventures with wild animals, written not only with a view to entertain—although there is not a possible doubt that this is accomplished—but also to be of real use to the youth who contemplates emigrating in a few years' time. The author gives accounts of the animals he is likely to encounter, and also the best method of attack. The book should be instructive, useful, and interesting to all English boys, whether at home or abroad.

Always anxious to provide some instruction together with amusement, Messrs. A. and C. Black are issuing their "Peeps" series. We have before us three of these books, dealing with Java, Newfoundland, and Ancient Egypt. This is an excellent series, and well produced at the price of 1s. 6d. each.

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co.'s "Wonder Book" is also to hand, and for the price of 3s. 6d. provides ample amusement for the younger children, as will also "Mind Your Own Buzziness" (Siegle, Hill, and Co., 2s. 6d. net). In addition to verses and illustrations, this latter volume supplies music to a short refrain.

"The Book of the Kingdom" (Longmans, Green, and Co., 3s. 6d. net) is the illustrated Scriptural story from the birth of Samuel to the death of David. There are many sets of verses, and the pictures and illustrations are clear and appropriate.

REVIEWS

Romances of the French Theatre

Romances of the French Theatre. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. Illustrated. (Chapman and Hall. 15s. net.)

Of all the biographical writers who supply the circulating libraries with profusely illustrated volumes descriptive of frail but beautiful ladies, Mr. Francis Gribble must be given first place. He writes with a practised hand. He knows precisely how much to quote and how much to leave unquoted from French memoirs. The public will continue to read his work just so long as he will supply it with racy stories seasoned with a little scandal. Many a critic has discerned in Mr. Gribble a writer of considerable distinction, and his careful research and love of picturesque detail, combined with a most pleasing style, have made us wish that for once in a way he would not rake up unsavoury affairs for the sake of tickling the palate of those readers who delight to pore over the weaknesses, and especially the amatory passions, of celebrated or notorious people. There is always the red rag of scandal in his books; always the littérateur playing down to a rather sordid and perverse taste. A biographical subject is not worth Mr. Gribble's attention unless it contains plenty of the love element—a love that is fickle and has little or nothing in common with morality. Byron, Shelley, Rachel, Rousseau, and many others, have been exploited with the same object in view. Mr. Gribble would gain a more worthy type of public if he were to send the sex question flying to a preface or an appendix. Some of us are getting heartily sick of old scandals strutting about in the guise of valuable biography.

The opening chapters of the present volume deal with the French attitude towards the romance of the theatre, the rise of drama in France, and the foundation of the Comédie Française, excellent chapters that reveal Mr. Gribble as an expert. Then follow intimate studies in the lives of celebrated French actresses. Mlle. Gautier is portrayed gripping hands with Maurice de Saxe "to see which of them could bend back the other's wrist." Mlle. Gautier became disgusted with stage life. She sought a confessor, and poured forth her wickedness to him for over three hours. The confessor was so impressed, or worn out, by the actress's lengthy but sincere lament "that he postponed his exhortations until he had time to consider his judgment." Mlle. Gautier decided to quit the stage and to enter the sisterhood of Sainte-Perpétue, where she wrote her Confessions. We are next given the thrilling and pathetic story of a very different type of woman, Adrienne Lecouvreur, described by Carlyle as "a foolish French actress." During the eventful life of Adrienne the Duchess de Bouillon attempted to poison her. Mr. Gribble is of the opinion that Mme. de Bouillon "must be acquitted of the crime, but not of the intention to procure it." Adrienne died while playing in Voltaire's "Œdipe," and the author suggests that the cause of death was possibly appendicitis. The Church had no mercy for the actress who showed no sign of repentance for the scandals of her profession. Adrienne was given no Christian burial, and her earthly remains were not even buried in the unconsecrated corner of a cemetery.

> Her body, without even a coffin, was bundled into a carriage, driven to a piece of waste land near the Seine, and buried in a grave hastily dug there, and filled up with quicklime—an indignity without precedent in the annals of the theatre.

It is not Mr. Gribble's way to permit his readers to weep profusely over a mournful scene, or allow them to ponder upon a possible moral. His most racy chapters are devoted to the amazing career of Mlle. George. At the outset this beautiful and alluring actress is portrayed as the ingénue. She is presented as a paragon of the virtues: one who revelled in platonic friendships and was surprised by the adulation she received. She came in contact with Prince Sapieha—a veritable Prince Charming—who supplied her wardrobe and presented her with costly jewels "merely as a tribute to an artist from a patron of the arts." When Prince Charming gave the actress a luxurious apartment, "rented at 2,400 francs, with coach-house and stables," Mlle. George carried on the following conversation with her aunt:—

> "My dear aunt, how perfectly lovely! But there is no furniture; there are no horses."
> "Never mind, my child. I am commissioned to buy whatever is necessary."
> "By whom?"
> "By Prince Sapieha."
> "Prince Sapieha! But I don't particularly care for him. I can hardly accept——."
> "He knows all about that, my dear, and it makes no difference to him; he only wants to see you lodged as you deserve to be."
> "He wants nothing but that! Oh! auntie!"

Mlle. George was blessed with many guardian angels. One of these good platonic souls heard her cough, and sent her a cough mixture—"the mixture was found to consist of several cases of choice liqueurs." For curl papers he presented her with twenty bank-notes, "and all that he sought in return for this delicate gift of £400 was permission to kiss the artiste's hand." Alas! Mlle. George was not destined to remain the ingénue for ever. We read of her liaison with Napoleon, and her connection with Harel—lover, stage-manager, press-agent, and devout admirer of his pet pig. Dumas describes Mlle. George robed in velvets or furs in winter, or in summer arrayed "in a clinging deshabille of lace or muslin." "So, reclining," he writes, "in a pose of careless, easy grace, she received her callers, sometimes with the dignity of a Roman matron, sometimes with the smile of a Greek courtesan." In old age, however, the public neglected her. She cries: "They do not care to hear you—they have forgotten you. Is your heart broken? Is your pride humbled? No matter. That does not concern the public—you must go away. . . . Ah! the abominable trade!" What pathos there is in a description of her acting at the age of sixty:—

> The wrinkles, the white hairs, the monstrous corpulence, the croaking utterance, the tottering walk, the broken voice, the hiccoughs of the poor actress utterly amazed her audience. Their disgust was mingled with pity. They fled from the spectacle; and the curtain was lowered in silence upon an empty hall.

The volume concludes with a pathetic study of Marceline Desbordes-Valmore, whose poetry was inspired, and even corrected, by her unfaithful lover, Latouche, and an interesting sketch of the Garrick of the French stage, Talma.

China's Revolution and After

China's Revolution, 1911-1912. A Historical and Political Record of the Civil War. By Edwin J. Dingle. With Maps and Illustrations. (T. Fisher Unwin. 15s. net.)

Mr. Edwin J. Dingle has written a popular history of the Chinese Revolution that broke out at Wuchang Hankow, and Hanyang in October, 1911. The volume is frankly journalistic in style, and makes no pretence to be literary. There are occasions, however, when we could have wished that the author had had an opportunity of correcting the proofs, and that the demand for topical books was compatible with a reasonable amount of time spent in preparing them. Mr. Dingle's book has appeared at a most opportune moment; but no matter how rapidly it may have been prepared and passed through the press, much has already transpired in China since it was written. After many years of stagnation in the Celestial Kingdom history has crowded a canvas with innumerable incidents, epoch-making events which the civilised world has watched with profound interest. Japan's change from a hermit nation into that of a great world Power was less rapid and less marvellous than the sweeping away of China's monarchy and the establishment of a Republic within a few short months.

Mr. Dingle is strongly in favour of the Republican party, and it is to the members of this party that he dedicates the present volume. Many will be prepared to admit that the Manchu rule was ignoble, despotic, and tyrannous—a rule that was strongly opposed to any form of advance. "It had long survived its day," writes Mr. Dingle. "Its servants, like the servants of Solomon in the Koran, had propped up a corpse and summoned kings and princes to do it homage. They bowed before it, says the story, so long as it stood upright. But at last the worms gnawed away the staff on which it rested, it lay prone in the dust, and the world fell into confusion." Few will deny that it was imperative to crush and cast out the effete Manchu dynasty. It was an ancient Chinese custom to examine the efficiency or otherwise of the reigning Emperor, and to depose him in the event of the ruler proving unsatisfactory. To-day it is the Chinese people, and not a select number of officials, who have taken upon themselves not only to dethrone the child-Emperor, but to sweep aside the monarchy and to establish a republic. Whether China can win a place among the great world Powers on the dangerous basis of the recent Revolution, or whether, like Japan, she could attain and maintain her object more easily and more satisfactorily under a constitutional form of government, it is impossible to say. The Chinese crisis presents the most complex situation imaginable, and at the time of writing, bearing in mind the Chinese Loan, her position is extremely critical.

Mr. Dingle knows how to make use of his valuable material. He has witnessed every phase of the Revolution, and mingled with the leaders of both parties. He presents the horror of those awful months of civil war with extraordinary vividness. But he does something more than describe the origin of the Revolution, the battle of Kilometre Ten, the burning of Hankow, the state of affairs in Wuchang, and the fall of Hanyang. He sums up and analyses the whole situation with striking lucidity—no small accomplishment when we consider its complexity. In addition, we are given most excellent character studies of Li Yuan Hung, Yuan-Shih-K'ai, and Sun Yat-sen. Particularly interesting is his study of the astute Yuan-Shih-K'ai, who played so deep a game that it is impossible for Occidentals to follow all his subtle moves.

Mr. Dingle writes: "The problems that loom across the threshold of the future of this newly-emancipated race, however, surpass in magnitude any that civilisation has hitherto had to encounter. There are clear indications of progress, but they are not yet clear enough. China has to be re-made, and those engaged in the project may blunder because of the varied and widely-varying patterns they have in stock to choose from." But Mr. Dingle writes optimistically concerning China's future, and asserts that a day will come when the Chinese "will be taken up as equals into social relations of the white races." With China, however, unless we happen to be enthusiasts, we must adopt the hackneyed but safe policy of "wait and see." Japan wants Manchuria, Russia is eager to obtain Mongolia, and the attempt to check the Chinese Loan is nothing less than an intrigue against the independence of China.

The Humour of Sport

The Brain Side of Games, Sports, and Pastimes. By H. C. DONOVAN. (Jarrold and Sons. 1s. net.)

THE correct position of sport in the life of the nation is a seasonable topic. While the rival camps—those who demand the athletic prowess of England and specialisation, and those whose watchword is "Sport for sport's sake"—fight over that prostrate figure of Britannia which returned from the Olympiad at Stockholm, Mr. Donovan has written a book which professes to explain the brain side of our games and sports so that their educational and recreational characteristics may be properly appreciated. That such a work may prove interesting there can be no doubt, but the utility and necessity thereof is a point which is very debatable. We do not choose our games as we do our professions; nor shall we after reading Mr. Donovan's book. We play cricket because we love it, because we realise the importance of partaking in healthy exercise, and because we have the necessary financial requirements—but not because "there is more brain-work entailed in its play than in any other recreative game-sport that is within our knowledge." It seems to follow that the greatest exponents of our English game must be possessed of exceptionally brilliant brain power. Will the eugenist make a careful note of this? Perchance the professional cricketer of to-day will be scientifically developed into the Prime Minister of to-morrow! Or perchance a change of government could be decided by a cricket match between the "ins" and the "outs"! We should much like to see Mr. John Burns as a lob-bowler upon a sticky wicket—but this apotheosis is not for our time. Mr. Chesterton might be persuaded in this Utopia to renounce literature and become a wicket-keeper.

The reader must not imagine that we are treating Mr. Donovan's book in a flippant manner. We recently reviewed the same author's phrenological treatise, "The Brain Book," to which the present work is an obvious sequel. We regret the sequel except for its unconscious humour. Petty prejudices, technical errors, misuse of scientific terms, bad phrasing and unconventional grammar are all very serious handicaps. The reader shall judge from the article on "Mounted Hockey or Polo":—

> The game came to us from the East; probably from Persia, the land of slavery; and it is only those whose mind is imbued with the bygone notions of slavery who are able to appreciate its pleasures. When men come to truly appreciate all the enjoyments of perfect freedom, this game will no doubt return to the place from whence it came. Now that we have all forms of motor-cars, perhaps these polo players, these half-and-half sportsmen, will endeavour to play this game from motor-cars with blindfolded chauffeurs. The player could then direct the course of the car by word of mouth to him who drives. No doubt there is a sport in polo, but it can be as well played from a bath-chair impelled by a blindfolded hired attendant as from a horse.

Mr. Donovan ought to be commissioned to write another "Innocents Abroad." To "prevent the caddie lending his intellect to his employer," Mr. Donovan considers the golfer should adopt a new form of contest to be called a "Strict Brain Game."

> In such a case, there should be no attendant caddie; the number of clubs, etc., to be limited by mutual agreement, and each player to transport his own implements, and the time limit for a lost ball to be fixed and strictly adhered to.

In that day this reviewer will renounce golf and take to hopscotch. And what would Mr. Donovan say about rowing? We leave the book to the curious reader, while we wonder how Juvenal would need to modify "Mens sana in corpore sano."

Mrs. Alec Tweedie

Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life. By Mrs. ALEC TWEEDIE. Illustrated. (John Lane. 16s. net.)

THIRTEEN is usually regarded by superstitious people as an unlucky number, but no one reading Mrs. Alec Tweedie's thirteenth volume is likely to entertain such a notion. Those who are acquainted with this writer's previous work—her travel books, her history and romance of Hyde Park and "Behind the Footlights," not to mention her countless articles for the Press—have learnt to expect from her able pen a well-told, humorous story and a forcible character-sketch of many a celebrity with the same economy of line that distinguished the work of Phil May. In telling the story of her literary life, Mrs. Tweedie has certainly added to her laurels. It has all the racy, human charm of her earlier work. It is naïve without being gushing, discreet where others are concerned without suggesting aloofness. Mrs. Tweedie has written a fascinating autobiography, a volume of permanent value because it reflects a very live and lovable personality, and we rejoice to hear that a second edition is already in the press.

Before Mrs. Tweedie lost her husband she used to write "just for the fun of the thing." When, however, the crisis came she realised that she must either live a stuffy, suburban life and give her children a stuffy, suburban education, or take up the pen in deadly earnest. Politely refusing very substantial aid, she decided on the more energetic course. She went through the journalistic mill with splendid fortitude and determination in a way that would have gratified the author of "Self-Help." She travelled for the purpose of getting copy, and turned that copy into books that have deservedly enjoyed a wide circulation. She became, after continual effort and not a little disappointment, an up-to-date journalist—a journalist who wrote on all manner of subjects with ever-growing ease and accomplishment. Mrs. Tweedie explains her method, but in the end it all amounts to sheer hard work. Introductions she does not believe in, and regards the knowing of editors personally as rather a drawback than otherwise; nor is she one of those mistaken writers who frequently climb editorial stairs and bombard weary editors with numerous schemes; she is much too wise and tactful to indulge in that kind of thing, except at very long intervals. She climbed the literary ladder in the best possible way, viz., on the rungs of her own work. She has for thirteen years played the game off her own bat and scored heavily. Her days of concerted effort—those fighting days—as well as her hour of triumph are a source of inspiration to struggling writers and a joy to her many admirers. Hard work and the seizing of opportunity, combined with a vigorous personality, form the basis of her success, and this entertaining volume not only reveals an author in the making, but also a very charming and heroic woman in the making, too.

Mrs. Tweedie describes Walter Besant as "quaint, old-fashioned, and prim." She extols his goodness of heart, his zest in helping literary aspirants. "Sir Walter Besant," she writes, "was the very embodiment of this spirit of helpfulness, not only to me personally, but also to the literary world at large, and it was he who conceived the idea of bringing this same friendliness into a common centre by establishing the Incorporated Society of Authors." Mrs. Lynn Linton surely has no rival in extending a helping hand to inexperienced writers. When Mrs. Tweedie called upon her on one occasion the novelist was surrounded with manuscripts, and her visitor imagined that she had sufficient material for two or three new books. "Not one page is my own," observed Mrs. Lynn Linton. "Bundles of manuscripts like these have haunted my later life. I receive large packets from men and women I have never seen and know nothing whatever about." Mrs. Lynn Linton dealt with all these effusions, with the exception of one scroll which was indecipherable. We may not care about this novelist's use of "thereanent" and "enthusiates," but she deserves all honour for the good service she rendered to others.

Many amusing incidents are recorded in this volume. The story of Lord Li, who called upon a lady by mistake, chatted to her, and took his departure without explaining the situation, portrays the courteous Chinaman in his inimitable rôle of delicate humour and tact. In conclusion, we cannot refrain from quoting the following:—

> Old Lady (beaming across table): "I do love your writing."
> Grey-bearded Gentleman (bowing): "Thank you very much."
> Old Lady: "One sees the whole scene so vividly before one."
> The grey-bearded gentleman bowed again.
> Old Lady (bending a little nearer): "They live and move. The characters almost dance before one."
> Grey-bearded Gentleman (evidently rather pleased): "It's good of you to say so. So few people read my sort of stuff as a rule."
> Old Lady: "They are works of inspiration! By the by, how does inspiration come to you?"
> Grey-bearded Gentleman: "Well, it's rather difficult to say. Anywhere, I think. An idea often flashes through my mind in a crowd, or even when someone is talking to me."
> Old Lady (flapping her wings with delight, and evidently hoping she was an inspiration): "Would you be so very kind as to sign my autograph book?"
> "With pleasure," was the reply. And thereupon she produced a tiny almanac from her pocket and a stylographic pen, and with a beaming smile remarked:
> "Under your name, please write 'Man and Superman!'"

He turned to her with a puzzled look, and then this is what ensued:

"That is my favourite play."

"Is it?"

"Don't you love it the best?"

"Never read it in my life."

"What! never read your own masterpiece!"

"No, madam. I am afraid you have made a mistake."

"What! You do not mean to say that you are not Bernard Shaw?"

"No. I'm Lewis Morris, the poet."

Poor Lewis Morris! It was a great pity that he had written his "Epic of Hades" before meeting this terrible old lady!

Why We do Things

Instinct and Experience. By PROFESSOR C. LLOYD MORGAN. (Methuen and Co. 5s. net.)

THE author of this fascinating piece of special pleading for his attitude towards the dual problems of mind and matter, with one science for both, would be the first to admit that, although the book is not precisely a sequel to any of his earlier works, its fullest enjoyment and understanding must be for such readers as are already familiar with the writings of Professor Bergson and others with whom he joins issue. Few recent workers in the metaphysical borderland of science have roused such animated opposition in their contemporaries as the author of "Laughter," "Matter and Memory," "Time and Free Will," and other works, in which he either deals with intensity of consciousness, or affirms and co-ordinates the reality of spirit and of matter on the basis of memory. Professor Bergson has a redoubtable antagonist in the author of the present volume, and even those who lack first-hand acquaintance with the works from which ample extracts are given in the text should be able to enjoy a brilliant effort of clear logic that is controversial without being contentious.

To the lay mind, in its honest endeavour to follow these leaders, there is continual difficulty from the vague use of such a word as "experience," as signifying (like its German equivalent Erfahrung) either actual consciousness as a process taking place in time, or the phenomenon experienced. Our everyday conception of "impulse" (Trieb) as a motor tendency contrasting with deliberation is complicated by the fuller definition insisted on by Professor Morgan, who enunciates it as "a specific mode of experience which arises when bodily and mental processes are running their course." These and other influences, either conjointly or in conflict, govern all our actions, and Professor Morgan elaborates —with masterly control of the available evidence—the part played by instinct and experience in the ultimate result. The importance of inherited impulse is illustrated at the outset by an anecdote that has served his purpose before, that of a nine-weeks-old moorhen, reared in an incubator—and therefore isolated from parental education—diving, in correct moorhen fashion, at sight of a dog on the bank. We can give the author another example, which is perhaps new to him. A young African cheetah that had been hand-reared from its first week, and was therefore wholly unacquainted with the conditions of the wilderness, was suddenly brought up to the bars of a paddock in a Paris menagerie in which were two young wildebeestes that had been born in captivity in a European park. Yet what happened? From the moment when the beasts on either side of the railings became mutually conscious of what lay beyond, the little cheetah crouched instinctively for the spring—knowing that these were antelopes, which it was its business to kill—and the antelopes, though seeing such danger for the first time, showed evident dread of the intruder. Experience is significant only so far as the meaning which it conveys. This is why the burnt child dreads the fire, or why the dog "begs" at sound of the word "biscuits." Every living creature has, in fact, what the French adequately call, in one of those desirable words for which the English language lacks equivalent, its own naturel, made up of the aggregate of its inherited mental characters. Man—and woman—alone endeavours to suppress his naturel to suit the circumstances of the occasion. Other creatures are just their natural selves. Why they are so, and how they come to be so, is virtually the problem which Professor Morgan has set himself to solve in these pages.

A History of the British Army. Vol. VII, 1809-1810. By the HON. J. W. FORTESCUE. With Maps. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

THE seventh volume of this admirable history covers the period 1809-1810. In those years this country had armies in North America, the West Indies, the Peninsula, Sicily, the East Indies, Mauritius, and Java, whilst in the former year took place the ill-fated expedition to the Scheldt. The strain upon the country's military and financial resources was enormous, and the mortality upon most of the campaigns undertaken appalling. Those campaigns customarily resolved themselves into a grim and mortal combat against the forces, not of the enemy, but of hunger and disease. On the Walcheren Expedition one hundred of all ranks were killed in action. Those who perished of disease numbered four thousand. The success of the British in feats of arms during these years was great and memorable. A history such as this affords us the opportunity not only of seeing our empire-builders at work, but of realising the honour due to their glorious memory. If anyone would read of almost miraculous daring, let him learn the story of Colonel Rollo Gillespie at the lines of Cornelis. Who knows aught nowadays of Auchmuty? Yet the author is undoubtedly right in saying that, if Napoleon had conducted the campaign of Java exactly as did Auchmuty, whole libraries would have been written in laudation of it.

We have seldom found better delineation of character or sounder appreciation of causes than in these pages. Under the heading "The Real Napoleon" we recently had occasion to show in the pages of THE ACADEMY some of the causes which led to the downfall of that monarch. The history of the years 1809-10 displays the inherent weakness of the Napoleonic system with even greater clearness. Napoleon thought it possible to control the affairs of his armies in the Peninsula from Paris. The result, as might have been foreseen, was disaster to the French arms. But in addition the author exposes mercilessly yet irrefragably the viciousness of an administration which inevitably set the superior commands at variance with each other. The authority of the nominal commander-in-chief, Joseph, the Emperor's brother, was nullified by the constant orders issued over his head to the generals by the Emperor direct. Wellington lost no opportunity for profiting by this insane division of control. The miraculous success of the British at the Battle of Talavera was due to the fatuous attempts of Victor to achieve something brilliant before the main body arrived on the battlefield. Such folly was rendered possible only by that of his master. In the case of Crauford upon our own side there was no such excuse, and it needed all the tact and strength of purpose of Wellington to prevent that impetuous general from bringing disaster upon the heads of the British. We have referred to the delineation of character as one of the notable features of the history. That of Wellington is portrayed in a masterly manner, censure not being spared in cases where it is deserved. It took even Wellington some time to learn that "Spanish" and "worthless" were synonymous terms. But the lesson, once learnt, was never forgotten.

Behind the shifting scenes of war we see glimpses ever and anon of the political background. The author is ruthless in his criticisms of Canning, but is equally determined in his appreciation of statesmen so often misunderstood and undervalued as Castlereagh and Perceval, and he deserves the thanks of politicians for upholding the Cabinet against the aspersions of Wellington.

In a history of any campaign, however recent, there is invariably much difficulty in rendering a true account of the part played by the various components of an army. The views of officers of different arms as to the relative importance of those arms upon any particular occasion are not seldom divergent. The author of the "History of the British Army" will doubtless be accused of exaggerating or belittling exploits, but any such accusation, even if deserved, is met by the indisputable impartiality with which the author pronounces judgment, and the minuteness with which he has analysed the information available as a basis for such judgment.

The value of such a history as this is obviously great, rent at first sight. It is as affording a basis for what but tne respect in which it is greatest may not be apparent Thucydides called the "supreme value of rational foresight" that such a work chiefly deserves our attention. Behind all improvements of arms, ammunition, communication, and supply remain the same elemental problems to-day as then. By studying the mistakes of our great-grandfathers let us endeavour to secure the welfare of our great-grandchildren.

The Plutus of Aristophanes. Translated into English verse, with an Introduction and Notes, by SIR WILLIAM RANN KENNEDY, Lord Justice of Appeal. (John Murray. 5s. net.)

THE Plutus exhibits Aristophanes at his best, and also not quite at his best. The play is full of quaint ideas, quaintly expressed. Satire and irony are very little veiled, and coarseness is not absent. The blessings flowing from the diffusion of wealth are effectively traced, and the case for poverty as distinguished from abject destitution is put cleverly and not unconvincingly.

Sir William Kennedy's version deserves all praise. Anyone unacquainted with the Greek text—all the subtleties of which cannot be rendered in an English translation—will be entirely satisfied with the play as presented in a thoroughly readable and entertaining manner. Those to whom the original text is familiar will recognise in Sir William Kennedy's version a scholarly and skilful rendering of a comedy which was written over 2,000 years ago. As is generally noticeable in Aristophanes' plays, there is a remarkable modern application in many of the speeches, which might almost be termed every-day aphorisms. Thus is the space of thousands of years bridged over by literary remains. So poverty exclaims:—

> Look at the politicians; while my restraint they feel
> The people and the State in them may safely put their trust,
> But once enriched from public funds they show themselves unjust,
> And plot against the masses and oppose the people's will.

O ye legislators at Westminster, look to it that ye do not earn similar condemnation!

It is needless to say that Mr. Murray has produced the work with appropriate taste and discretion.

Antiques and Curios in Our Homes. By GRACE M. VALLOIS. With 61 Illustrations. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

THIS is a tastefully got-up volume quite suitable for the drawing-room table. The illustrations, with adequate explanatory text, of rare old furniture, are very interesting. There are examples of Jacobean, Restoration, Queen Anne, Chippendale, Heppelwhite, and Sheraton chairs, the work-table of Marie Antoinette, and Mrs.

Fitzherbert's workbox. There are also examples of the most famous pottery and porcelain, with glances at old pewter, and old Sheffield plate. We have tested the accuracy of the letterpress as to facts and dates, and find that it is carefully compiled and reliable. A volume of a little over 300 pages is, of course, not comprehensive, but it is entertaining, and to the amateur will prove more attractive than larger works.

The Romance of Submarine Engineering. By T. W. CORBIN. (Seeley, Service and Co. 5s.)

IT might not occur to everybody that there was much romance connected with "submarine" engineering, but the sceptic need only read a few chapters of this fascinating book to discover that, from the days of the primitive diving-bell to those of the modern "Nautilus" that can go through complicated evolutions partially or wholly submerged with its human crew, romance is inseparable from the subject. Mr. Corbin has done much to make engineering matters popular, and has the happy knack of writing about mechanical and apparently abstruse appliances in a clear, simple, yet thoroughly explanatory manner—his description of the gyroscope and its principle, for example, in the present work is admirable. The book is very comprehensive; the term "submarine engineering," of course, includes a great deal more than at first sight appears; tunnelling under rivers, the laying of cables, the construction of floating docks, the action of the tides—all these things are dealt with. All boys interested in machinery should have this book; and we may add that if boys of a larger growth once start reading it most of them will continue until the last page is reached.

Printing Papers: A Handbook for the Use of Publishers and Printers. (Spalding and Hodge, Ltd.)

TO those whose only knowledge of paper comes from their daily news-sheet or the "cream-laid note" which they may use for correspondence this collection of sample qualities from Messrs. Spalding and Hodge would be something of a revelation. It contains, in a handy volume form for reference, specimens of all varieties of paper, from the familiar cartridge to the most exquisite hand-made, plain and coloured, rough or smooth. A very useful adjunct is the series of tables of equivalent weights, information as to the size of books and quantity of paper required to produce 1,000 copies, and other details.

is of the latest edition of the more expensive work, with the Author Index omitted. On the other hand, the additions which were hitherto embodied in a supplement are now incorporated in the text, and while the various quotations are arranged alphabetically, according to the word with which each quotation usually begins, there is also a Subject Index of nearly two hundred pages which should greatly facilitate reference. Although the little volume contains over five hundred pages, it can easily be carried in the pocket. The second instalment of the "Dictionary of Dates" is quite equal to the first, which we noticed some time back. The third and final volume is announced for publication this month. The series, besides being handy in form, is clearly printed on good paper and strongly and neatly bound in cloth boards, and is certainly most cheap at the price charged.

Mrs. Lancelot. By MAURICE HEWLETT. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

MR. MAURICE HEWLETT is developing a new style. The mediæval romanticism of the "Forest Lovers" is being displaced by an ironic comedy. The spirit of Meredith succeeds to the spirit of Malory. There can be little doubt that, at the moment, Meredith is Mr. Hewlett's master. The change began with "The Stooping Lady," a book which no other living author could have written, but a book which showed unmistakable Meredithian influences. Those influences have since then gathered a considerable impetus. They have culminated in "Mrs. Lancelot," which is the most Meredithian book that has appeared since Meredith died.

For ourselves, we are not entirely prepared to welcome the change. Meredith's treatment of sexual relationships was broad and wholesome, but Mr. Hewlett introduces the passionate eroticism of his earlier novels into his studies of comparatively modern life. One gathers, as a result, an impression of unpleasing incongruity. The exceedingly frank love-making of the forest lovers is in keeping with the half-Pagan, half-mediæval character of the story. To adopt a convenient colloquialism it is "in the picture." But to condone the adulteries of a modern lady of society it is necessary that the reader should be not only an admirer of Mr. Hewlett—that, it may be hoped, we all are—but a devotee of "advanced thought." Mr. Hewlett, in short, expects too much from us.

He deals, too, a daring blow at our hero worship. For one of the principal characters in this novel is the Duke of Wellington—thinly disguised as the Duke of Devizes. And the Iron Duke, with his victories behind him, and with nothing more serious to occupy his mind than the frivolities of politics, figures as a rather senile old lover. He has a way with women, this Duke of Devizes, and we see him laying a sedulous and only partially successful siege to his secretary's wife. It seems probable that the fair enemy might have finally capitulated—despite her protestations—but for the timely arrival of a certain poet. The husband, poor fellow, is more to be pitied than blamed. He loves his wife well enough in his way, but he has a soul of starch. Mrs. Lancelot, on the other hand, with all the desire in the world to remain a dutiful wife, is tinder to the fire of passion. Of course, the inevitable happens. The poet has his way, and the book closes with a picture of love in a cottage somewhere in Italy. Like Lord Ormont in Meredith's novel, the disgruntled husband accepts the situation, and listens patiently to a long lecture from his supplanter. The situation is romantically conceived, but, somehow, it fails to carry conviction.

The minor characters are sketched with that unerring fidelity to truth which is not the least of Mr. Hewlett's accomplishments as a novel writer. In the background of the narrative flits the figure of Tom Moore—a lovable little fellow whose personality we cherish while we are content to forget his poetry. The book is one that no admirer of Mr. Hewlett can afford to leave unread. It marks an interesting stage in the development of its author's genius. But we prefer the Hewlett of "The Forest Lovers" and the "Fool Errant," and we find such a character as Captain Brazenhead—that Titan in an age of giants—more to our liking than the amorous poets and statesmen of "Mrs Lancelot."

The Price She Paid. By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS. (D. Appleton and Co. 6s.)

IN the gradual unfolding of the character of Mildred Gower, Mr. Graham Phillips has achieved a very fine piece of work. We see her first for a very short time as the pampered daughter of a presumably rich American lawyer, whose sudden death leaves his wife and daughter with next to nothing to live on, compared with the princely income they had hitherto enjoyed. On her mother's second marriage to an unmannerly fortune-hunter, the girl's life is made so unbearable that she accepts the palaces and hand of a disgustingly vulgar but extremely rich miner and stockbroker. After a few weeks of tyranny she leaves his house, thinking that, as she has a passable voice, she may earn her living on the stage. She has not the slightest idea of money or economy, and difficulties immediately beset her path. Always with good intentions, she finds her luxurious upbringing again and again too much for her. She slips so naturally into the sphere of life to which she has been accustomed, and finds it impossible to make the great effort and escape once and for ever from the feeling that she must depend upon someone; hence the career of a great singer is not possible until she has burst her bonds and learned to stand alone. It is all the more difficult as she unconsciously inspires friendship and love wherever she goes, and she does not yet understand that people help her more on account of her personality than her talent. It is proved that her husband committed bigamy when he made her his wife, so that she is free to marry whom she chooses. Love, however, does not appeal to her in all its force; she turns to men as friends, and is startled when they require more than friendship from her. She stumbles on, sometimes brave and hopeful, at others depressed and weary, until the many vicissitudes she has endured, added to the almost brutal truth from a man who cared for her, as to what she must endure to make her a success, force her rigidly to observe all restraint and self-denial necessary for her task. In what manner she succeeds must be left to the reader to find out. There is not a phrase or paragraph in the book that is superfluous, and, although there are other characters equally well drawn, Mildred stands out so prominently from them all that it is on her that the greatest interest centres.

A Star of the East: A Romance of Delhi. By CHARLES E. PEARCE. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

MR. PEARCE has evidently taken pains to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the India of the closing years of John Company and the Mutiny. In two of his previous novels—"Love Besieged" and "Red Revenge"—he depicts with a master hand many of the leading events of the latter sanguinary period relieved with a thread of love and romance which helps to mitigate the horrors described. The present story opens in the spring of 1851, in a Rajah's palace in the neighbourhood of Simla, and closes with the outbreak of the Mutiny and the massacre at Delhi in 1857. Mr. Pearce's Star of the East is Nara, an Eurasian nautch-girl whose father was an English officer killed at Moodkee and her mother a native woman descended from the famous Shah Jahan. The mother had drowned herself on hearing of her lover's death, and the orphan Nara falls into the hands of mercenary relatives and others who desire to devote her to the usual life of shame of the Indian dancing-girl of those days and reap a rich reward from her great beauty.

Horsford, the hero of the story, whose life had been saved by Nara's father, recognises the child at the Rajah's, and determines to rescue her from the clutches of the harpies who are seeking to exploit her innocence and virtue. How he succeeds, after many hair-raising adventures, is told in the author's usual dashing style; but the tale by no means ends here, for the scene is then transferred to England, only to be brought back to Calcutta and Delhi, some five or six years later, for the climax. The latter comes somewhat as a shock; but on reflection it will be seen that it is the only possible artistic ending to a powerfully dramatic story.

Mr. Pearce shows himself equally at home in describing the Anglo-Indian life of those far-off days—as a character portrait, Clara Meldrum, the dissatisfied wife, would be hard to beat—and life in London in the mid-Victorian era. He has, however, allowed one or two errors to creep into his narrative. On page 56 he describes Zeenut Mehal as the mother of Jewan Bukht, while on page 192 he makes him her grandson. The old King of Delhi is called indifferently Bahadur Shah and Bahadah Shah, and one would gather from the early part of the book that he was then dead, and his eldest son, Mirza Moghul, reigning in his stead, whereas he crops up again at the close of the story. Yet these are only slight blemishes in an absorbingly interesting novel.

Apart from a number of clichés which mar the construction, "Grit Lawless" (John Lane, 6s.) is an excellent story. The actual plot concerns the recovery of certain letters, by the aid of which the villain makes a blackmailing livelihood. There is a murder; there is a case of personation so well carried out that, when the facts of the case are revealed, we feel rather limp and breathless. Had Miss Mills-Young been less conversant with the art of story-telling, these things would have appeared rather melodramatic and improbable; as it is, they are worked into the texture in such a manner as to render them equally convincing with the rest. We appreciate the way in which restraint is exercised: nothing obtrudes unnecessarily; all is told quietly and simply, and therefore forcibly, and we believe in these people as much as if they had really lived. Notwithstanding the clichés referred to above, "Grit Lawless" is a powerful and exceptionally fine novel.

The story of the "Inheritance" (John Ouseley, 6s.), in spite of certain small defects of style, is praiseworthily terse, forceful, and dramatic; but the book embodies a big social problem as well. The cruelty of the cotton mill is brought home to us by Mr. Stuart Martin: the vile "half-time" system, which stunts young workers physically and debases them morally, is shown up, and the crass stupidity of the workers themselves, in demanding the continuance of this system that youngsters may become wage-earners when they ought to be fitting themselves for maturity, is exposed. It is pointed out that the unions, designed in the first instance to protect the worker, strain at the gnat of non-union labour and swallow the camel of a degenerate race arising through the forcing of "half-timers" and pregnant women to work in the mills—the workers are their own enemies in that they not only permit but uphold these evils. In spite of the force with which these terrible truths are told, the power of the story as a story is not interfered with; seldom is it that the social problem can be introduced in a novel without extracting from its value as a romance, but here is one of the exceptions that prove the rule.

The characters in "The Great Postponement" (John Ouseley, 6s.) stand shadowy and far-off, not through lack of descriptive matter, but perhaps because Mr. J. G. Sieveking, engrossed with the working out of a problem or the portrayal of an emotion, has overlooked the fact that his characters, as workers in his problem or vehicles for his emotion, ought to stand first in his own mind. The plot, though complex, is admirably true to life. We fear, at one point, that the author is inclined to sacrifice truth for the sake of a happy ending, but the fear proves groundless, and the story moves on as inevitably and relentlessly as life. And, curiously enough, we are interested in the plot, understand that the author had a word to say that is worth hearing. Yet we do not get close enough to any one character to feel its reality—they are shadows all, vehicles for the expression of the author's thoughts rather than live people who express themselves. It is a perplexing and rather irritating, albeit an interesting, book.

"Pension Kraus" (Herbert and Daniel, 6s.) is in Eisenbach, and there Judith, widow, went to stay for an indefinite period, as much for the purpose of getting away from her "in-laws" as for any other reason. There, however, she acted the part of a fairy godmother to a certain extent, and finally, somewhat against her will, fell in love with a fat German doctor, strongly reminiscent of Miss Alcott's Professor Bhaer. Miss Agnes Blundell has given us sufficient small adventures to make the story of average length, but books of this type are fairly common, not to say monotonous, and, except, for certain flashes of humour, which evoke about one smile per chapter, there is little in this to mark it out as apart from the general run of such stories. We are rather interested in Judith, and, though to a less degree, in her German doctor. We are not at all interested in the side-lights on German life, for they have a slight flavour of guide-book about them. It is a pretty little story, concerning the surface aspect of rather commonplace lives.

There are certain lines of limitation in dealing with sexual matters which ought not to be passed save by masters of fiction—not necessarily acknowledged masters, but writers who at least can rise above sensational writing, pure and simple. When, in a book such as "The Virgin Royal" (Frank Palmer, 6s.), one comes across the phrase, "the oldest profession in the world," and finds that profession described at some length, one knows that the limitations alluded to above have been overstepped. Unless a book accomplishes some definite purpose, or teaches some big moral lesson, it is worse than useless—it is harmful. "The Virgin Royal" is not one to recommend; it fails to grip, it has no particular literary style, and in attempting to deal with a very delicate problem Mrs. Donald Shaw has achieved a failure.

"Treasure of Thule," by B. D. Steward (Sidgwick and Jackson, 6s.) is a breezy story concerning a cruise undertaken by one Edward Nichol, a schoolmaster, in company with an old boy of his school and one other. Indeed, at times, the breeziness becomes rather wearisome, and strikes the reader as being a trifle overdone. Robin, the old boy from Maltby, has a way of using slang and adapting quotations to fit various circumstances which grow a little stale now and again. On the whole, however, it is a fresh, interesting story, with a carefully subordinated love interest. The characters are pleasing superficially, and we are not permitted to see very far beneath the surface. He who looks for psychological subtleties or the suggestion of a problem in "Treasure of Thule" will find himself disappointed. The book is rather a pleasant means of relaxation; a cheery companion for an hour or two, clean and wholesome enough for readers of all classes—schoolboys especially—and, this with no disrespect to its author, an excellent antidote for brain-fag.

"The Turning-Point" at the St. James's Theatre

IT must be admitted that, if Mr. Peter le Marchant has translated "La Flambée" accurately, and has come closely to the spirit of the original, the methods of M. Kistemaeckers, the author, verge upon the old-fashioned in the disclosure of his plot. Narrative—the snare of the dramatist—is employed to a surprising extent; the story is "told" to the audience less by dramatic dialogue than by often lengthy talk between two of the characters. We are given the history of Monique Felt's estrangement from her husband in a long interview between her and Monseigneur Jussey: Lieut.-Colonel Felt relates to his wife the story of Glogau, banker and spy; and other instances will strike the critical listener as the play progresses. To fit in with the legitimate drama, some of the speeches in "The Turning-Point" need cutting down, and the continual switching of interest from theme to theme in the first act—which is a kind of prologue—needs regulating to avoid the inevitable jerky effect which it produces.

Considered apart from these flaws, which have to do with construction and not with presentation, the play has its finely conceived scenes and its really great moments; and in spite of the fact that its emotional climax comes in the second act—a method which not many present-day writers would dare to adopt—the third act is both necessary and illuminating. Felt is in the grip of Glogau, the banker; he is also temporarily at cross-purposes with his wife, who has rashly encouraged a lover, in despair at his seeming indifference and preoccupation. Felt, in a sudden passion of patriotism and horror, strangles Glogau on learning that he is a spy; and the confession of this to his wife acts as a wind upon her smouldering love for him and brings about a reconciliation. This confession and its tempest of emotion—almost nullified by the tapping of her lover at the door and the consequent temporary revulsion of feeling on the part of Felt—constitutes the whole of the second act. Obviously, here we have material ripe for the fiercest form of melodrama. Sentence after sentence suggests it: "I do understand," says Monique, drawing herself up—"I am a soldier's daughter!" "I killed him!" breathes Felt hoarsely. "You did right!" cries Monique. "Don't lie to me again," shouts Felt, suspecting the tapping at the door, "or I shall kill you!" "Kill me!" retorts Monique, defiantly facing him. So the tremendous scene goes on; and only the superb art of Sir George Alexander and Miss Ethel Irving in these principal parts saved it from being hysterical and crude. As played by them, it kept within the bounds of art; what it might become in the hands of less experienced exponents we hardly know, so certain is it that at a touch from clumsy performers the highest tragedy topples into comedy.

With this over, there was still some excellent material left for the final act. Beaucourt, the lover, moved to become a friend by love of country, exchanges a silent and effective handshake with his enemy; Mr. Godfrey Tearle bore himself well in this trying part. As Mgr. Jussey, the good priest, who reasons with the rebellious Monique, Mr. J. D. Beveridge was as impressive as ever, and it is a pleasure indeed to see him thus excellently confuting certain rumours we had heard to the effect that illness would deprive the stage of his fine presence and memorable voice. Humour entered in the characters of Thérése and de Mauret, well taken by dainty Miss Lettice Fairfax and Mr. Athol Stewart in his most irresponsible vein. Few opportunities came for Mr. Rupert Lister as the host, Stettin; but in the rather glum and thankless part of Glogau Mr. Vivian Reynolds achieved the gentlemanly villain—especially good was he as the spider in whose web Felt was visibly struggling.

In conclusion, it may be taken as proof of the skill of Sir George Alexander and Miss Ethel Irving that we hardly know whether we like them best in tragedy or comedy, having seen them in both. In "The Turning-Point" we miss very much that whimsical, inimitable smile of Sir George Alexander—the smile that sets us so beautifully in tune with him; we miss, too, the extraordinary skill of Miss Irving when exchanging badinage or flying into serio-comic rages. We have them here, however, in one of their most strenuous exhibitions of the histrionic milieu, and in its way it is a triumph for them both.

"Doormats" at Wyndham's

THIS is a comedy at once delicate, enthralling, finely composed. A novelist who writes very agreeably made one of the characters in her latest book say that life cannot be arranged like a drama and end happily with the last act. But Mr. Davies, although so sophisticated and subtle a writer, can make his play finish very much in the same unsatisfactory way as things really do, and still give us a charming, fresh, and engrossing comedy. Noel Gale, Mr. du Maurier, and his wife Leila, Miss Löhr, are young and happy, but they become disgusted and disadjusted because Noel ceases for a moment to wish to be the particular sort of doormat person on which Leila can stamp at pleasure. This distaste is to some extent brought about by Uncle Rufus, Mr. Alfred Bishop, and Aunt Josephine, Miss Nina Boucicault, who are also boot and doormat respectively, and who have some influence on the affairs of the younger people. Noel goes to America; Leila carries a good deal further a pretty lively flirtation, already well started, with Captain Harding, Mr. Dawson Millward. Jealousy and suggested divorce and all sorts of squabbles follow on Noel's return. But Mr. Davies, with the lightest hand, the most admirable skill, patches matters up for the young people, eliminates the somewhat serious factor, Captain Harding, and we are left to suppose, if we like, that Leila and Noel will be happy—only one knows better, of course.

Each of the five parts in this comedy is delightfully played. But Miss Boucicault, as ever, shows the most absolute charm and that touch of genius which has always enabled her to play upon the feelings of her audience with a fine certitude and a personal note of appeal which would be almost too poignant were it not restrained by her complete and delicate sense of art. Although Aunt Josephine is by no means the most important part in the play, while she is on the stage she holds the attention and touches the secret emotions of the heart by her every movement and every tone of her tired voice. All playgoers know that Miss Boucicault is one of the few English actresses gifted with the sacred fire, that she can endow both comedy and pathos with equal charm and thrill us at will, and yet her gentle, elderly, wise Aunt Josephine is a revelation in grace, a surprise of sympathetic and quiet beauty.

Lucky Mr. Davies to have his character so wonderfully portrayed! But, then, the author is fortunate in every way. Miss Löhr is more attractive than before. Her art is more felt, she is more entirely within the character she plays than hitherto. And she also looks more delightful and wears her beautiful dresses with a touch of Parisian taste.

As the amusing and peculiar type of stamping boot, Uncle Rufus, Mr. Alfred Bishop is as good as ever, as simple, as real, as direct and convincing as in any part he has ever played. There is no greater praise. Mr. Millward plays his adventurous soldier with skill; he is well in the picture. Mr. du Maurier may strain his immense popularity a little, but he, as Mr. Stephen Phillips said the other day, in a different connection, is quite good enough for the dramatic critics—or, as we should say, the critics of the drama. No one will be bored at Wyndham's. Farce and the serious affairs of the world are blended in "Doormats" much as they are in life—except that everyday existence leaves out the cleverness and delicacy of Mr. Davies's method and the old rose, yester-year charm of Miss Boucicault's Aunt Josephine.

The Horse and War

By R. J. TURNER.

THE importance of the above question has been forcibly brought to the front by a consideration of the recent manœuvres in the Eastern counties. The possibility of a mechanical substitute for the horse in warfare must be terrible to contemplate by those belonging to the first and second arms of the Service, reared as they have been in its splendid traditions, and naturally warmly attached to the magnificent artillery batteries and cavalry regiments of to-day. It must almost seem to them sacrilege that the splendidly-trained animals so long associated with British victories should be replaced by the insignificant if not undignified bicycle or motor-cycle, or even by the more imposing motor-car. But, "other times other manners."

It cannot be concealed that of recent years motor traction has entered more and more into the practical work of the Army. Beginning with cars for the general officers commanding and their staff, the commissariat has gradually availed itself of the new power, and now that the motor-cycle has been adopted for scouting and despatches with whole battalions of cyclists, is it not only a question of time before the whole system, especially in the light of the advent of the aeroplane, must be reconsidered? For what, after all, is the real desideratum in modern warfare? Is it not speed, whereby a commander in the field may effect a rapid change in his forces to checkmate the enemy who by means of his air scouts has been fully advised of his position? For this purpose the limits of the horse are circumscribed and clearly defined. It was in evidence over and over again in the recent war game that the cavalry after a march of thirty miles arrived in no condition to attack. The movements of the guns are also limited by the endurance of their teams. The infantry after a thirty-mile tramp, in spite of indefatigable energy, cannot be expected to be at their best either in shooting or in point of resistance. On the other hand, we find in the manœuvres referred to that the bodies of cyclists, mostly Territorials, arrived fresh on the scene in time to save the position, and their condition and celerity called forth the encomiums of the umpires. Does not this point to increased motor facilities for all arms? Of course, there are difficulties. Can a motor be constructed to drag a field gun with its ammunition over rough, hilly country? Given sufficient power and a strong make of car, with solid tyres, I see no reason to doubt that the manufacturer would be equal to the occasion and could guarantee a motor that would haul a gun wherever horses could go.

The same difficulty would have to be overcome in regard to the cavalry. Doubtless the mounted man unencumbered by a gun can get over country almost impossible to the artillery, but a strong, powerful make of motor cycle would take some beating, even on broken ground. After all, the chief use of cavalry is to act as a screen for operations. As a rule, they stick to the roads, where the cycle would score. Even if cavalry were tempted to make a short cut across country to take up a special position, the chances are that the speedy cycle on the more circuitous road would arrive before them.

But it is not only a question of a new mount for the horse soldier. Everything points to a speedy mode of transit for the infantry as well. We have seen a gradual increase in mounted infantry as a means of quick locomotion. It would only mean an extension of this principle. While granting obvious disadvantages, look at the advantages of an entire army on wheels. With the motor cycle distance is no object. An army would be practically independent of the troop-train. For the horse soldier the serious and troublesome question of forage disappears. A reserve of petrol could easily be carried on the machine, while depots and reserve tanks would continue the supply. Relieved of his weight of accoutrements, accentuated by long marches, the soldier arrives at his objective strong and fit. His machine would enable him to carry a large supply of ammunition, and extra rations if desired, thus making him largely independent of the slower motor wagons. His mobility and radius of action would be enormously increased, and there is no reason to suppose that casualties en route from tyre troubles would exceed those from lameness and fatigue under present conditions.

From the artillery and cavalry point of view the motor would prove a much smaller and more difficult mark for the enemy. The mortality among battery teams as compared with injury to a motor is purely a matter of conjecture, but it is not too much to claim that the chances of a gun with motor attachment being put out of action is not greater than the destruction of six horses. In the case of cavalry the margin of safety must surely be admitted to be on the side of the motor cycle, which has the further advantage of being able to be discarded or concealed when required without depleting a certain proportion of the fighting strength for looking after the horses. From the humanitarian point of view, the gain would be enormous. When one considers the mortality and fearful suffering of the horse in action even the strongest advocate of the friend of man for war purposes ought to be glad to see the mechanical substitute.

As regards cost, initially there would not be much to choose, so far as the mounted arm is concerned, between the horse and the motor cycle; but there ought to be a great saving in upkeep in favour of the latter. The horse has to be fed every day, whether on duty or not; the cycle is only a consumer when in use. Of course, if the infantry had to be provided with machines the cost would add considerably to the Army Estimates, whether a motor or an ordinary cycle were introduced. On the other hand, the saving in footgear would go towards the cost of petrol. The noise of the motor cycle is a factor which would have to be eliminated if success is to attend scouting and secret movements, but what has been overcome in the case of the motor-car and motor-omnibus may surely be accomplished with the cycle.

It is quite true that the cycle would be at a disadvantage as compared with the horse when hedges or brooks had to be negotiated, but, after all, in practice are not such obstacles more than often circumvented, and, while it might be necessary to trundle a motor cycle over a freshly-ploughed field if the furrows ran the wrong way, the soldier and his machine would be quite as fit at the other end as the horse. It is no longer considered useful, in this country at any rate, to employ cavalry in shock tactics, and we saw that in East Anglia the splendid cavalry brigades hardly ever took the offensive, but even in this capacity I question if, given suitable ground, a charge of 400 motor cycles rushing at 40 miles per hour would not be more effective than a regiment of lancers with their greater weight but slower speed. The practical soldier will doubtless find many objections to such a change, but the position must be reviewed in the light of modern tactics. Speaking generally, is it not the rifle and the gun which decide the battle? Are not the sword and lance too often mere spectators? Is it not the commander who can bring up his supports quickest or who can outflank before the enemy can extend his position who wins? For such purposes is not the cycle a better medium than the horse and speedier than the foot soldier? That is the question in a nutshell. Whether the day will ever come when the British Army will move entirely on wheels remains to be seen. I do not venture to dogmatise on the subject, but I do submit that, faced with the gradual disappearance of the horse for all kinds of traction, we cannot afford to ignore the advance of mechanical traction in respect of our fighting force. And while one would deprecate any action which would dim the splendid traditions of the Army, we have also to consider whether increased efficiency would not be attained by a more general adoption of the mechanical mount.

By W. H. KOEBEL.

THE average Londoner—by which I mean that representative of the middle classes who attends to a daily business and who has settled himself down into the necessary groove for its pursuit—has only a faint conception of the magnetic power which his own capital exercises on foreigners. Yet during August and September the really imposing number of the tourists, red guide-book in hand, fails to appear remarkable merely on account of the crowds of local humanity among which they find themselves, notwithstanding the fact that London is in many quarters held to be "empty" at that time of the year. A point of greater interest, however, than that of mere numbers is the growing cosmopolitanism of these summer visitors. We have long been accustomed to the varied and variegated influx of British subjects from all quarters of the globe. The very street arabs have become blasé in such matters as turbans and pigtails. The great increase, however, in the number of the tourists from the newer countries of the world has been far less noticeable, for the simple reason that the personalities of these are far less salient and exotic. Side by side with the American who has now for so long constituted a standing dish, there is now the traveller from Central and South America, and from various of those other lands whose newly-found riches permit travel not only in comfort but in luxury of a kind to which the majority of European travellers are quite unaccustomed. Not a few of the London hotels have cause to welcome the advent of these with rejoicing; for the average South American, coming as he does from a land of dear living, is remarkably free with his money when on pleasure bent.

This new phase of South American travel has now attained to a quite important point. Although many other Republics are responsible for the sending of a number of representatives, it is from Argentina that at the present moment the great majority come. The cosmopolitanism of these latter is now very marked. Indeed, you may count with some certainty on seeing the same faces in many parts of the world year after year. In three hotels which I have in mind this is more especially the case. The three in question are the Plaza, in Buenos Aires; the Piccadilly, in London; and the Chatham, in Paris. It is true that for residential purposes the latter is not quite so sought by Argentines as the Majestic; but it has specialised in the afternoon teas which are now so dear to these visitors. It is the afternoon-tea function which supplies the chief link between the three hotels. Not only will you see many a face in each with which you have become familiarised in the other two, but you will find a curious similarity in the waiters, cakes, musicians, and tunes of all three. Now this is cosmopolitanism in its widest sense, and there is no doubt that the world is growing very small. It is something to have even a joint rendezvous in London and Paris; but when Buenos Aires is thrown in some very serious and conscientious travelling is implied. It is even more remarkable when it is remembered that about a dozen years ago Buenos Aires was popularly held to be little beyond a haunt of Indians and jaguars!

I have just received some enthusiastic accounts of wanderings in Finland on the part of two distinct persons who have recently returned from exploring the land of forests, lakes, rivers, and islands. Both versions are equally eulogistic, and the praise of both scenery and inhabitants justly unstinted. At the present moment there is no doubt that the traveller who penetrates well into the interior of Finland, and thence passes northwards to somewhere within reasonable distance of the Arctic circle returns to his home circle wearing something of the air of a pioneer. This pose is in a sense a luxury, since in the majority of the Finnish districts the accommodation is good, and the steamers which ply along the rivers are roomy and excellent. The fact remains, however, that Finland, so far as the average British travelling public is concerned, remains a strangely unknown land, and he who returns from a summer visit to that pleasant country rejoices in certain advantages over his fellow-travellers who have confined themselves to the better-beaten tracks which it would be a loss of opportunity to forgo. Whether this state of affairs will last for long is doubtful. The recently-instituted visits of the tourist steamers to the northern capitals have had the effect of breaking a considerable amount of new ground, and as a result inland tours in northern Europe bid fair soon to become popular.

Another portion of Europe which during the past two or three years has opened its gates—not very widely—to the casual traveller is the land of the Balkans. Here, of course, the circumstances are very different; for the countries of the Near East are very little concerned with the civilisation of Finland. The tourist who attempts the Balkans may indeed count upon some experiences which do not fall to the lot of the ordinary person who indulges in a summer holiday. He may take it as an axiom that both accommodation and local humanity in these regions are frequently attended by an unpleasant degree of the unexpected. It is not in my province here to "puff" books—least of all those by authors with whom I am personally unacquainted!—but a country which is responsible for so fascinating a work as that of Mr. Roy Trevor's "My Balkan Tour" has an astonishing amount to be said in its favour. This applies perhaps to its landscape rather than to its human elements. Nevertheless, in the present circumstances, it looks very much as though these wild mountains were to be closed again altogether, and that it would be some time ere the inhabitants may be startled by the horn of a motor—for it was in one of these cars that Mr. Trevor succeeded in penetrating to the fastnesses where Christian and Mussulman wage a very uneasy life side by side. Still, one never knows. There may be a future Switzerland in the Near East.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

NOT so long ago, if anyone wanted a cheap advertisement, all he had to do the night before a Session opened was to be outside the door of the House about 10 p.m. It meant a dreary wait for two hours in the dark, enlivened by the appearance from time to time of other furtive conspirators, who were disappointed at finding that they had been forestalled. An aged janitor kept careful note of the order in which these early, or rather late, birds arrived, and when Big Ben had finished striking 12 they were admitted, solemnly took their seats, and went home to bed. The journalists called a little later, collected the names for publication, and the following morning Mr. Jones saw with pride that he had been there first, while his constituents, not quite understanding how it was done, said: "How keen our member is! Did you notice he was there first?" This easy but effective advertisement has been abolished by the simple expedient of not opening the door until 8 a.m. on the day the House assembles, so now Mr. Jones has to be there at 6 or 7 to be sure of pride of place, and the competition has fallen off. People do not like early rising, even in a noble cause.

On this occasion young Alan Burgoyne achieved the honour, but the majority of us did not appear until 2.30. Genial Inspector Scantlebury, to the regret of many, was not there to shout in his well-known stentorian tones, "Hats off, strangers!" as the Speaker's procession passed through the Lobby at 2.45, but was very well imitated by his successor, Inspector Rogers. It struck me that the cheers for the various leaders seemed somewhat perfunctory. Asquith was not there, "owing to a slight indisposition," and Bonar Law modestly slipped in almost unobserved. There were only a dozen questions on the paper, but these were supplemented by far more of which "private notice had been given." Edward Grey, in his best sphinx-like manner, gave a colourless account of the position in the Balkans: Turkey was ready to give reforms, if the bayonets were removed from her throat, while the bayonet holders declare that, if once they remove the bayonets, they very much doubt if she will perform her promise. It looks like a deadlock which may lead to an explosion any minute.

A persistent Irish member kept on reading out and repeating long questions about the embargo on Irish cattle, while Joynson-Hicks was curious to know whether the Prime Minister approved of Winston's idea of a Heptarchy. Lloyd George, who was in charge in the absence of the Prime Minister, declared that the First Lord had expressly stated that he was "only speaking his own thoughts," and declined to be drawn as to whether the Cabinet or he personally agreed with his views.

The new members were next ushered in. The Rev. Towyn Jones (a spell-binder) is a weird-looking individual, with more long, lank black hair over his eyes than even Masterman. Everybody was glad to see Randles back, but a mighty cheer went up when Hope, from Midlothian, appeared. It was the first sign of animation that the House had shown. Leslie Scott then opened his brief on behalf of the shipowners on the Titanic report. From the copiousness of his notes it was clear that he was not going to be brief; so everybody filed out to exchange greetings in the Lobby and discuss the prospects of the Government. There was a curious latent stillness in the political air; you can never mistake it. The stillness that portends the storm, which is expected to break on Thursday next when the allotment for time for the Home Rule Bill is discussed.

The outrageous time-table was issued later in the evening, but I will not stay to comment on it now. On Tuesday, when the newspaper boys were bawling out that war had been declared, Sir Edward Grey stated that he had no official information, after which strange admission Percy Illingworth, the new Radical Chief Whip, opened with a bad break, and it required all the ingenuity of the Speaker and Mr. Lloyd George to rescue him. He tried to take a short cut by putting down an omnibus motion that the Government should have precedence of all other business for Wednesday and Friday and also to suspend the 11 o'clock rule. Bob Cecil, ever alert, asked if this were in order. The Speaker answered the question, and cleverly evaded it by cutting the motion in two. The first part was then divided on, and Lloyd George accepted Banbury's amendment to "restrict" the motion until "to-morrow only," on the principle that "sufficient for the day," etc. After this a thin House of devoted Scotsmen settled down to the report stage of the Scottish Temperance Bill, which most of us, I fear, have forgotten all about.

McKinnon Wood, McKinnon Wood,
If only but McKinnon could assume the Parliamentary manner, sigh his friends. He is awkward and blustering, and "acts as if he were still leading the Progressives on the L.C.C.," observed a Radical, when he took charge of the Bill. The debate, which did not end until a quarter to one, was illumined by some flashes of Scotch humour, but on the whole the two opening days have been dull. This is thoroughly characteristic of the House of Commons on the eve of a big battle.

Art and Life—I

By HALDANE MACFALL.

AS I was writing the following lines there appeared in these columns a couple of essays on "Art and Imitation" which prove the necessity for the writing. Mr. John Rivers comes closer to the significance of Art than is usual; but he is so impeded by several fallacies as regards the basic significance of art, and the relation of life to art, his sincere mind is so led astray by these fallacies, so deep rooted in the writings of philosophers, that he cannot shake free from his tyrants; and he who would understand the prodigious importance of art to human life must go through the fire of fearless truth and rid himself of centuries of philosophic dross.

It happens to lie within the compass of what I was about to write to prove that Art has nothing to do with Imitation, or, to put it more explicitly perhaps, that Imitation is no condition of Art—therefore the "problem" of Imitation does not exist; far less does it present "insuperable difficulties." We may, and often do, "receive impressions" from art "hitherto unknown to us." The arts do not "draw their materials from nature"; they use the forms of nature whereby to utter their emotional significance; and the confusion of means and end ensues. If any modern had said what Aristotle said in his 29th problem he would have been rightly accounted a fool; for it is absolutely false that "sound and sound alone of sensuous perceptions has moral character"; nor has music "smell nor taste" any more than colour has smell or taste, and he who would try to force sound to utter the sensations of smell or taste which are outside the realm of hearing would be debauching music at its source; and music, so far from having a monopoly in uttering "character," is by no means the most powerful of the arts in such faculty. Why this eternal awestruck attitude of reverence before Aristotle? Mr. Rivers forthwith seeks for definitions of emotions in the philosophers; but emotion is too wide to be counted and docketed. Everything that is felt is emotion; but to avoid all mistake, and to prove the prodigious realm of art, let us make a verb "to sense," and speak of "sensing" instead of emotion, which has come to have lost a good deal of its meaning by belittlement.

To show how narrowed the word has become in meaning Mr. Rivers sets up the untenable doctrine that all "emotion has only two phases," which are "joy and sadness in varying proportions." This fallacy has more to do with the misunderstanding and belittling of art than all the many fallacies put together. But if we use "sensing" we rid ourselves of a serious danger from the start. Mr. Rivers hunts this tattered slipper of "joy and sadness," and, as all must who suffer from the fallacy, wastes breath on trying to compromise by seeking "pleasant sadness"—it is the veriest logic-chopping: but as all this has no concern with art whatsoever, as the other old fallacy of Beauty has no concern with art whatsoever, we need not here pursue it very much further. Art has no essential concern with creating pleasure, far less with creating "pleasurable pain," therefore to hunt for pleasure in the acts of sympathy or of sadness is futile.

Another most dangerous phrase, however, employed by Mr. Rivers is the philosophic fallacy that has grown about the words "sensual pleasures"—into which he himself falls. The function of art is not to be "sensual" any more than it is to give "pleasure"—its function is far vaster, far closer to life, it is to "sense"—the which is a far different thing. "Sensual" has come to have a base meaning, or, let us say, a narrowed meaning; and it is to avoid confusion with "emotionalism" and with "sensuality" that I use the word "sensing." And how can he maintain for a moment, in face of overwhelming proofs to the contrary, that "the pleasures of Art" have a reverse effect to the "coarsening effect upon the soul of sensual pleasure"? Surely this is to narrow Art to a mere parochial concern! The power of Art to debase is as deep as the foulest senses of man can sink, otherwise the power of Art to reach the loftiest senses of man would be lowered. The height to which a man may rise can only be measured by the depths to which he can fall. Ruskin's theory that no great artist can be a bad man is in keeping with his sentimental, shallow concept of art. Some men of genius have been foul rogues. Perhaps the most difficult of all the fallacies which we have to shed in coming to grips with the basic significance of art is that which Mr. Rivers asserts concerning the Greeks, for the high achievement of the Greeks has cast its spell upon us for ever. To "take pleasure in the contemplation of pain" is a foul act, and an act that has no essence in Art. It is the province of Art to show pain to be pain, and to make us feel pain in the contemplation of it. The Art that essays to show pain to be anything else than pain utters a lie: and vital art cannot lie. The achievement of the Greeks in the Arts was an intense and perfect achievement, but it was narrow. Its whole significance is that it uttered the genius of the Greeks and the age of Greece. The Greeks lacked certain great human qualities—they markedly lacked pity—and their art expresses that fact. It is to the undying credit of Greece that she uttered herself. But whilst the professors tell us much about the great qualities of Greek art, they are mute about its manifold imitations. Far greater artists have created their art than any that Greece bred. And it is one of the pitiful drawbacks of a great achievement like that of Greece and Florence that their very mastery casts a blight of mimicry upon the future endeavour. But we are coming to that.

Before we can get even an elementary concept of the basic significance of art it is necessary to get some rough idea of what we mean by Life.

THE WAR IN THE BALKANS.

October 9, 1912.

THE Montenegrin declaration of war upon Turkey at a moment when the Powers were about to intervene came as a shock to Europe. Until then there seemed to be a fair prospect that, after all, peace in the Balkans would be maintained, and, although the pronouncements of diplomatists on the situation were naturally very guarded, it was evident that the restoration of the European Concert had appreciably improved the outlook. As yet the exact significance to be attached to the belligerent attitude of Montenegro is not by any means clear. In most quarters there is a disposition to regard it as the opening move which is to involve the Confederated Balkan States in a war against the Ottoman Empire. Any hour may bring forth hostilities in other directions.

In the meantime it is pointed out that the effect of Montenegro's action will cause some confusion in the Turkish organisation, and may conceivably lead to the withdrawal of troops from other parts, thus, when the proper time comes, facilitating an advance of Bulgarian and Servian armies along the road to Constantinople. Viewed, however, from a serious military standpoint, it cannot be pretended that the action of Montenegro will radically alter any plans the Turks may have devised.

No doubt the latter will wisely restrict their activities to defensive measures along the frontier. To attempt an invasion, even were they in a position to do so, would require a large army, and in any circumstances would be a risky undertaking. For every man in Montenegro is a mountaineer and a sharpshooter, while a large proportion of the women know how to handle the rifle. Should Turkey, as Europe now considers inevitable, become embroiled with other Balkan States, then Montenegro will indeed have proved a very painful thorn in her stricken side. But, as I have already pointed out, in spite of the gravity of the general situation, seemingly hopeless on the surface, the real motives that lay at the root of Montenegro's action remain obscure. Apart altogether from the community of interests which bind her to neighbouring States, she has always had her own quarrels with the Porte, as, for example, the perennial frontier disputes and troubles in connection with the Albanian tribes.

If we are to believe the correspondent of the Times at Sofia, usually a well-informed authority, then Montenegro is not bound by definite obligations as far as other Balkan States are concerned. It may prove to be the case that she is attempting to force the hands of her neighbours—in other words, to compel them to make war upon her hated enemy, the Turk. Again, there may be some grounds for the theory advanced that, dissatisfied with the lukewarm proposals of the Powers, the so-called League has deputed Montenegro, the most favourably placed of its members for such a task, to take steps of a nature calculated to convince Turkey and Europe that they are in deadly earnest.

In that event the means may well defeat the end. For when the guns speak it is difficult for the comparatively feeble voice of diplomacy to make itself heard. Moreover, the amour propre of Turkey would resent, and rightly so, surrender at the bidding of Montenegro rifles. Altogether, it is evident that the action of King Nicholas and his Government has added gravity to a situation already critical. While European diplomacy was congratulating itself that the Concert of Powers had been resurrected in time to intervene at the eleventh hour in the interests of peace, the clock struck twelve and the guns went off.

What the next twenty-four hours will bring forth no man can predict. Armies are mobilised and are rapidly assembling in strategical centres. There is a wide chasm between the compromise offered by the Turks and the minimum requirements of the Balkan States, and at the moment the resources of diplomacy are completely, and it would seem irreparably, bankrupt. In the sudden move of Montenegro is to be found the only obscure feature of the situation. For the rest, the causes that have produced the present grave crisis are plain. And in any consideration of these causes the great Powers cannot escape a measure of criticism. After much deliberation and not a little waste of time, they found themselves in "complete agreement."

As this delightful unanimity was brought about at the expense of the only policy calculated to ensure peace, it is difficult to account for the feeling of optimism which it prompted. Russia and Austria, who, it should not be forgotten, suspect each other, were deputed on behalf of Europe to lecture the Balkan States. That the Balkan States had a just grievance against Turkey was nowhere denied. They were told, however, in language the very vagueness of which gave rise to immediate distrust, that the Powers would "take in hand" the realisation of reforms. At the same time a warning was given that nothing would be done likely to threaten the sovereignty of the Sultan or the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. Moreover, the Powers reserved the liberty for a further collective consideration of reforms. That these representations were received with scepticism was not to be wondered at. That it could ever have been imagined that they would avert the danger of the crisis is beyond comprehension. It is because in the past similar promises have been made to the Balkan States, and have not, in one single instance, been kept, that the crisis exists.

No diplomatic intervention that ignored the all-important question of the provision of guarantees that Turkey would be held to her word could hope to accomplish success. The "League," bearing in mind the jealousies that are responsible for the insipid character of the Powers' proposals, can afford to pay little heed to the threat that no modification of the status quo of Turkey in Europe will be allowed, even in the event of Turkey's defeat. The lessons of history tell them that, should they be victorious, they will not lack friends. In their struggle against the tyranny of Ottoman rule, they certainly cannot fail to command the sympathy of all individuals who are friends of liberty and upholders of justice. Such a circumstance in itself must contribute not a little to the confident spirit with which they will embark upon the crusade.

MOTORING

THE Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders is apparently to be allowed no longer to enjoy undisturbed its position as the absolute dictator to the motor industry in the matter of exhibitions. A scheme is on foot for the holding of a separate show at the White City, simultaneously with the one at Olympia, and even at this late stage it does not seem impossible that the rival exhibition will materialise. Its promoters state that the proprietors of the White City have agreed to lease the Uxbridge entrance halls for the purpose, and that many firms have signified their willingness to exhibit, provided that a sufficient number of applications for space are received to ensure an attractive exhibition.

The R.A.C. has been particularly busy with its certified trials during the last few weeks. Perhaps the most interesting of those which have either been completed recently or are now in progress are a 2,000 miles test of a Stewart-Morris paraffin carburetter, a top-gear and petrol-consumption trial of a 59.9 R.A.C.-rating six-cylinder Napier from London to Edinburgh and back, and a 5,000 miles trial of a new tyre, called the Stelastic, the last mentioned of which is still in progress.

Official certificates of performance have just been issued by the Royal Automobile Club in respect to the Stewart-Morris and Napier trials, and the latter will be analysed with special interest by motorists in view of the great attention now being given to paraffin as a possible substitute for petrol. Taken altogether, the paraffin trial seems to have been but moderately satisfactory. Out of 27 attempts to start the engine on paraffin alone, 23 were successful, and out of 21 times when it was started upon petrol, it stopped when the change to paraffin was made, but was subsequently restarted on the latter fuel. It would appear from this that the problem of reliable starting on paraffin has not yet been finally solved, and also that the system of starting on petrol and changing to the heavier fuel is still imperfect. It should be mentioned that the car used in the trial was the 27.3-h.p. (R.A.C. rating) Pathfinder, and that in the road portion of the trial (1,000 miles) the paraffin consumption was 20.91 miles per gallon, plus about a gallon of petrol for starting. On the Brooklands track, where the other 1,000 miles was run, the average speed was 35 miles an hour, and the paraffin consumption 21.59 miles per gallon, supplemented by about three-quarters of a gallon of petrol. It is rather curious that the fuel consumption should have been less on the track, where the speed was 35 m.p.h., than on the road, where it was, of course, kept within the legal limit. In any case the trial cannot be said to have definitely established the claims of paraffin to equal petrol either in efficiency or economy, and the advocates of the former will have to show a decidedly better performance before the ordinary motorist will even consider it as a serious rival to his present fuel.

With regard to the trial of the Napier, it may be said that, according to the official certificate, it was successful in every way. Throughout the run from London to Edinburgh and back the car was both started and driven on top gear entirely. No work or adjustment of any kind was done to it, apart from the daily oiling and greasing. The fuel consumption averaged 27.65 m.p.g., or 67.55 ton miles per gallon, and in the subsequent trial over the flying half-mile at Brooklands the speed attained was 75.69 miles per hour. The best performance of an American car over a somewhat similar route was 21.84 m.p.g., or only 29 ton miles to the gallon, and a speed of 55.92 miles per hour at Brooklands, which compared very indifferently with the Napier performance.

The Stelastic tyre referred to above appears to be the latest attempt of the inventor to combine in the motor tyre the qualities of durability, non-skidding, puncture resistance, and resiliency. Its unique feature is in the tread, which consists of numerous springs of piano wire standing on end and woven into a fabric, into which rubber is hydraulically forced at high pressure. It is said that there are 90,000 springs in an 880 by 120 mm. tyre, thus ensuring the compression of a large number simultaneously at the point of contact with the ground. The amount of wear experienced in ordinary running on the road is said to be very slight—about a sixteenth of an inch in 1,000 miles. This claim, as well as the others made on behalf of the new tyre, will be thoroughly tested in the course of the trial (5,000 miles) now proceeding, and the certificate of performance will be awaited with interest by motorists generally.

IT seems useless to discuss Stock Exchange affairs in face of the fact that Montenegro has declared war against Turkey for, as Sir Roper Parkington has hinted, that little State is only one of the pawns used by Russia in her diplomacy. If the war can be localised then Great Britain need not heed. She only wants Crete. That she will get if a general upheaval takes place. In any case, she will allow no one else to secure the finest harbour in the Mediterranean. But though the nation may not be dragged into war, it will require a firm hand at the tiller to steer her through the troubled waters ahead. This the gambler knows, and he will desert the Stock Exchange if he is wise. No one will care either to punt or invest with a war going on in the Balkans. At any rate, only fools will behave in such a rash manner. I remember some years ago, when war was in the air, the wisest man in the House said to me: "There is only one thing that is worth anything in days of trouble, and that is cash." He spoke truly. Paper is of no value when you cannot sell it. We live in an age of credit, and to us paper is the same as gold. But war destroys credit and we may find our paper promises to pay—which is all our scrip is—dishonoured. For when one person becomes poor he makes all those dependent upon him poor also. I do not wish to pose as a pessimist, but we do not quite realise what war means and what may result from the Balkan struggle.

A few bold, or desperate, people have asked for money. Perhaps Harrisons and Crossfield got theirs. But the Canadian Northern could hardly have expected much response to their offer of Income Bonds, for on the face of it the interest was not secure. The Sao Paulo Electric issue was an astounding piece of impudence. Yes, that is the only word to use. Remember that Sir William Mackenzie and his friends sold the Sao Paulo Electric to the Brazilian Traction Combine for 5,000,000 dollars. They told no one what they were selling. No details of assets were disclosed; no certificate of profits. Both here and in Canada the amalgamation was received with wrath. But holders of Rio Trams and Sao Paulo Trams were impotent. Also they were inflamed with greed, and many forgot that their own stocks were being watered. Thus the deal was consummated, and at once the truth is disclosed; the Sao Paulo Electric is hard up. It needs £2,000,000 to repay the Mackenzie crowd. And Brazilian Traction, not satisfied with having paid away five million dollars, binds itself to go on paying until Sao Paulo Electric cries "enough." The whole thing is colossal. The idea could only have been born in the brain of a Canadian drunk with excessive wealth acquired in a few years.

MONEY is at the moment plentiful. Germany got through her end of the quarter settlement without any trouble, and Paris is full of cash. Here we are also plentifully supplied. But a few weeks' war will soon alter that. Rates must rise, and if the fighting goes on we must expect a five per cent. rate before Christmas. War eats up money, and with trade booming in Great Britain and the United States we cannot expect cheap money this year.

FOREIGNERS at the moment are steady, but we must not expect them to remain so. Indeed, we must get a very serious fall in the near future. I advise my readers to unload all their Peruvians. They have had a big rise and there is a large "bull" account. It does not seem wise to hold any Foreign Stocks at this hour. All countries will be in the market for loans. Russia may keep herself out of the struggle, but she will be clever if she does. And Austria is in like plight. Hungarians looked cheap a week ago. They appear over-valued with a war going on near her frontier. The Tinto dividend was good, but no one will care to speculate, even though copper itself remains high, and I see little chance of any fall. For the strike in the big mines has now extended to Nevada Consolidated, and the production of the United States will fall away until the great porphyry mines in the Bingham Camp get to work again. The Mexican revolution has also hung up the big mines like Greene and Miami. Thus I think Copper will go up.

HOME RAILS should do well if we can keep the peace, for our trade is booming and traffics are growing day by day. The public will one day realise that a railway at our own doors paying us five per cent. on our money is a good deal better than some wild-cat scheme at the other end of nowhere which promises six or seven per cent. We are quite blind to the good things that are to be picked up all day long. Great Central traffics grow rapidly and the railway will soon make up the big loss it sustained last half-year. Therefore, I say, buy the Junior Preference shares in view of the opening up of the Doncaster coalfields and the new trade that will come through the big docks at Immingham.

YANKEES are firm. The United States is on the eve of one of those outbursts of speculation and booming trade that occur once in each decade and make the fortunes of half of the country and end in the ruin of all except the very rich and the very cautious. Unions will assuredly go to 200 because the traffics are growing and the line prospering. Besides, everybody is thinking of the big melon that may be cut some day when the ordinary shareholders can buy out the preference shareholders. Chesapeake profits are also on the up grade, and even the Chicago Milwaukee, which the Yankees have sold so heavily, are now doing well. Southerns are also worth buying, and the latest tip is Atchison. This great railway will have a big year, and the price will go up 10 or 15 dollars. Eries are talked up, and Rocks are one of the tips. Indeed, one can hardly go wrong in the American market to-day. How long the boom will last I don't know, but I can see that one is coming.

RUBBER does not look happy. Evidently the Brazilians have been unloading some of their stock, and this has affected the price of plantation. The East has stopped buying shares and London does not want any more rubber at all. The reports of the various companies as they come out are not startling and there is nothing to excite the punter. The Mendaris report will hardly please the Lampard crowd, or induce new people to take the shares off the hands of the Rubber Trust.

OIL.—The latest news is that the Deep Drillers have struck oil at depth at Maikop. It may mean much or it may mean little. It is, at any rate, good news, and should go far to restore confidence in the Maikop district. British Maikop has some plots near the new strike at Nephtianaya. But the oil market is very sick indeed, and I see little chance of any boom. The promoter is busy putting new shares on the market, and getting puffs in all the papers. One must be careful with those puffed shares.

Mines are steady, simply because the whole Stock Exchange has sold short and thus made the market hard. The magnates refuse to combine and are now devoting the whole of their energies to the discovery of labour-saving appliances in order to reduce the labour bill. The managers have strict instructions to crush no poor ore, which means that returns for the next few months will be good. But the public is disgusted with the tactics of the crowd and decline to average their huge holdings. In the Rhodesian section the Globe and Phœnix shareholders are agitating for a new board and a new engineer. The Falcon report is good, but has not yet been published. No one will look at mines, and I don't blame them.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Marconi gamble hangs upon the debate, and no one knows which way the House will take the contract. If it is not confirmed, which I myself think most improbable, then we shall see a big slump. The A. B. C. people have got a move on and all kinds of tales are going round. But on merits the shares are under-priced.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

GRAMMAR AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—I am sorry, though not surprised, that Mr. Dixon does not understand what I mean. His letter shows clearly enough why he does not understand. A man goes through the process which we are agreed to call recovering from a disease. The change in his condition is, in ordinary language, a fact: something which can be proved in accordance with the only laws of evidence we know of. What that change has been caused by is surely not a question of fact at all. He may not have had anything the matter with him to begin with. Assuming that he had, his recovery may have been the result of prayer, of his own will power, or of somebody else's, of medical treatment, of the vis medicatrix naturæ, or of some cause which we so far know nothing about. It is open to anybody to believe that the recovery was due to anyone, or to any combination of these possible causes; but it is surely evident that any explanation of why he recovered must necessarily be a hypothesis, and cannot under any circumstances be logically put forward as a statement of fact. The most fervent devotee of medical science, however convinced he may be that the recovery was due to medical treatment, would hardly deny the possibility of its being due to some non-medical cause. What differentiates the Christian Scientist from ordinary people is that in his eyes the reason why the man recovered is just as much a question of fact as his recovery is. In this respect, the world at large is, in my opinion, making considerable progress towards the light of reason. Christian Scientists are, in my opinion, moving in exactly the opposite direction. Mr. Dixon says: "I became a Christian Scientist very much, I imagine, as others do." What percentage of Christian Scientists does he imagine have become Christian Scientists as a result of such a process of examination of evidence as he describes? Mr. Immo Allen, too, seems to put forward, as of equal validity, two propositions differing, not in degree, but in kind. That the simplification of English—if it were possible—would be a good thing, may, I suppose, be looked on as belonging to the realm of fact. The idea that the thing is possible is surely a hypothesis in support of which no evidence has ever been put forward.

What possible advantage would there be in being able to say "I oughted"? "Ought" having, like other imperfect subjunctives, taken a present meaning. "I ought to have done" is strictly analogous to "I may have done," "I might have done," "I need not have done." What more do we want?

I wish Mr. McLaughlin would explain some of the extraordinary things he says. I am not referring to the obvious printer's error in his letter. "Conjunctions connect nouns and pronouns in the same case." Does he mean that they never do anything else? "I never knew such a coward as him" is correct! Of what verb is "him" the object? "I never knew such as coward as he (is)" is unpardonable! If Mr. McLaughlin means that the omission of the "is" is unpardonable, I am rather inclined to agree with him. "I never saw anybody so frightened as he was." Is that unpardonable too? And, if so, why? My hypothesis, as distinguished from Mr. McLaughlin's, is that in these sentences "as" connects, not nouns or pronouns, but clauses; and in that case the question is, what is the second clause more likely to be—"he is" or "I knew (know) him to be"? This is quite apart from the question of whether abbreviation, entailing, as it necessarily does, uncertainty of meaning, is to be recommended in either case. What grammatical point Mr. McLaughlin's four "correct and typical" sentences are supposed to illustrate is to me a mystery. Would it be pardonable to add "am" or "was" or "shall be" to the first, and "do" to the second? If not, why not? And if so, what becomes of the idea about conjunctions connecting nouns and pronouns? The third and fourth do not seem to me to have any bearing on any thing, and I do not think the third would pass muster anywhere out of Bengal. I am, Sir, etc., T. G. MARTIN.

Bradford, October 7, 1912.

"THAN" AND "AS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—I discussed Mr. Newman Smith's little difficulty in my pamphet on "Simplified English." The conclusion I arrived at in the case of "than" was that it would be better to use the objective case after it unless the verb were expressed, thus:—"I am taller than him," or "I am taller than he is"; while we must distinguish between "I know her better than [I know] him" and "I know her better than he does."

The case of "as" to which your correspondent refers is a little more difficult. It seems to me that both "I never knew such a coward as him" and "I never knew such a coward as he" may be regarded as correct, "is" being supplied in the second case, as remarked in your editorial note.

"I am as tall as he" represents a similar ellipsis. But in colloquial language this is often incorrectly rendered "I am as tall as him"—incorrectly, that is, unless we make "as" a preposition like "than."—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

IMMO S. ALLEN.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE?

THE PSALMS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—There is still no proof that Bacon ever assumed the name of Shakespeare. Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence hits upon two common words, "shake" and "spear" in the 46th Psalm, asserts that Francis Bacon was responsible for the English used in the authorised version, implies that those two words were purposely introduced there by Bacon, although they occur in the 46th Psalm in the 1539 Great Bible—twenty-one years before Bacon was born. However, Sir Edwin's point is that in the 46th Psalm in the A.V. of 1611, "shake" is the 46th word down, and "spear" the 46th word up, and that that arrangement settles the authorship Sir Edwin particularly states that the number "33" spells Bacon's name ($B^2A^1C^3O^{14}N^{13}$), then what is the signification of the number "46"?

In 1625 Bacon published a translation of certain Psalms into English verse. The following extracts are taken from his 104th Psalm:—

The Springs doe feed the Rivers all the way,
And so the Tribute to the Sea repay:
Running along through many a pleasant field,
Much fruitfulnesse with the Earth they yield;
That Know the Beasts and Cattell feeding by,
Which for to slake the Thirst doe thither hie.

. . . . . .

The Asses wilde that hide in Wildernesse,
Doe thither come, their Thirst for to refresh.

. . . . . .

And Bread that is all Viands Fermament,
And gives a firme and solid Nourishment,
And Wine man's Spirits for to recreate,
And Oyle his Face for to exhilarate.

. . . . . .

The holy Storkes that are the Travellers,
Choose for to dwell and build among the Firs.

The above is not the style of versification to be found in the poems or plays at any period.

London, E.C. TOM JONES.

THE RIGHT TO WORK.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—To those who have been watching the progress of events in the labour world it has been evident during the past two years that non-Union workers have become aroused to the importance of maintaining their independence. The remarkable evidence given by the non-Union witnesses before the Railway Commission last year was followed by a report in which Trade Union officials joined in expressing the opinion that men should "not be permitted to incite or coerce by threats or any form of intimidation men who desire to give their labour." Then we have the happy ending of the London Dock Strike, in which the Unions have failed to make it a condition of labour that all workers shall become Unionists.

If the ground that has been gained is to be maintained, the non-Unionists must organise in self-defence, for the Trade Union Congress has now declared itself in favour of Trade Unionists refusing to work with non-Unionists.

The Committee for Promoting the Formation of Societies of Free Workers has been working to this end, and already a number of societies have been established. They are to hold their first national conference at Bradford on Friday next, when it is intended to form a national society of free workers to maintain the principles of personal liberty and personal responsibility; especially to protect by every means in its power the rights of individual members to live and work in freedom, so long as they do nothing to interfere with the enjoyment of a like freedom by all others.

We appeal to your readers to give their support to the committee in the useful work they have undertaken. Contributions may be sent to the chairman, Mr. Mark H. Judge, 7, Pall Mall. The committee is not to be a permanent one, it will retire after the new organisation to be founded on Friday has been firmly established. We are, yours faithfully,

AVEBURY (Orpington),
DYSART (Grantham),
GEORGE H. DARWIN (Cambridge),
O. F. RYDER (Leeds),
ERNEST E. WILLIAMS (Inner Temple).

THE YULE-TIDE ASSOCIATION.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—May I place before your generous readers the claims of the Poor Children's Yule-Tide Association, which aims at providing Christmas gifts for the poorest children of our slums?

Last year 200 Christmas trees and 61,780 toys went to gladden the hearts of these poor little gutter urchins, many of whom hardly know what Christmas means.

It is the earnest wish of the Association, which is now a branch of the Ragged School Union, materially to increase the gifts this year. May I ask your lady readers if they would be so good as to start a Working Party, to help in making the toys for the children?

It has been found in past years that knockabout toys, made from sheets into dolls and animals, form a welcome gift to a poor child.

All who are willing to help need not be deterred from doing so by the expense; as the money expended in buying the designed material for making the toys will, if necessary, be provided by the Association.

The work is easy, and most interesting. Full particulars will be gladly given by the Hon. Secretary, 32, John Street, Theobald's Road, London, W.C. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, EVELYN DEVONSHIRE.

Notes of the Week

IT seems to be a qualification of Presidents of the National Liberal Federation as justifying their selection that they should become didactic bores. Dr. Watson, the author of the Newcastle Programme, which smashed the Liberal Party of his day, took himself in many columns quite seriously. Sir John Brunner, who has the fortune or misfortune to fill the same office at present, regardless of his foreign origin and his record in Parliament during the South African War, has issued a document which the Daily News dignifies as a manifesto on English foreign policy. As would be expected of the former member for the Northwich Division of Cheshire, the manifesto, expanded into a column, exhibits Sir John's ardent desire to hold the candle to everybody in order that war may be avoided. War is such a nasty thing, not because lives are sacrificed and homes are desolated, but because the alkaline trade does not get along nearly as well as in ordinary times. Sir John likes France, but he wishes to carry on a scarcely decorous flirtation with Germany. "Armaments and war spell poverty and ruin." A most excellent copy-book line. We endorse the sentiment absolutely. If everyone in the world agreed with Sir John Brunner and ourselves, the millennium would not be far off. As matters stand, most people think the Armageddon is nearer than the millennium. If that view is correct, Sir John's platitudes will be less useful than armaments to conserve his interests at Northwich.

The details of the attempt on Mr. Roosevelt's life, which come to hand as we go to press, seem to prove once more that the ex-President has the energy of ten ordinary human beings. To suffer a four-inch bullet-wound in the chest, to joke about it, and forthwith to speak for an hour and three-quarters at a big meeting argues considerable powers of physical resistance, to say nothing of the determination of mind behind it. What proportion of Mr. Roosevelt's exposure of his chest to the crowd and his declaration that "it takes more than that to kill the Bull Moose"—we can imagine the ecstatic cheers—is due to enthusiasm and to his fine sense of dramatic effect, and how much of it is due to what might be termed "swank," we are unable to say; at any rate, he is a brave man, and we can well believe that this incident which might have meant tragedy will lift him higher than ever in the opinion of his supporters. He is now forbidden to talk for about ten days; with no disrespect to Mr. Roosevelt, may we suggest that this, for him, unique period of silence and seclusion will be the most terrible aspect of the affair?

It had seemed to us that nothing orthographical could affect us with a more delicate mixture of interest and amusement than the publications of the "Simplified Speling Soesieti," but from the happy township of Marietta, Ohio, U.S.A., comes the first number of a tiny monthly sheet, modestly called World-Speech. The editor of Marietta's oracle works on an entirely new system. Taking the vowels, all pronouns will begin with a, all verbs with e, prepositions with i, conjunctions with o and u; and it is comforting to note that "these lists can, of course, be extended as needed, or by mutual agreement," the editor apparently being able to supply extra vowels if required. When we come to consonants, things begin to get lively—in Marietta; thus, "when the e of the initial syllable denotes the adjectiv or participle, an i in the second syllable denotes the activ or transitiv participle, and an o the passiv participle." It will be noticed that there is a hectic flush of "Nu Speling" on the editor's cheek. An example of the awful results of "World-Speech" may interest our readers. "Ac el wi?"—How are you? "Ec retic id ab."—Speak to me. "Ab em revib id ac."—I will write to you. "Bo" means "person," and "ha" means "relationship," and "ax" means "each other." Evidently a harmless "ha-ha" might lead to complications; and nothing shall induce us to address any person as "bo"—it is so undignified. Thrice fortunate Marietta, abounding in ideals, with the eyes of the world upon her!

A quite delightful article in this week's issue of Public Opinion, entitled "The Importance of Being Narrow-Minded," is by Professor T. M. Kettle, of University College, Dublin, whose contribution to the series of articles in THE ACADEMY on the National Insurance Bill will be remembered. In praising the art of looking at affairs sanely, of keeping cool even though we can merely "dip a liqueur-glass from the ocean" of life, Professor Kettle writes with a healthy common-sense and a fund of humour which rarely run so pleasantly in harness together.

Love in the Hills

OUT of Loubaix to Charleroi
The way is through the wood;
The wind blows through the yellow corn,
A clean hill-wind and good.

Out of Loubaix to Charleroi
The railroads wind and wind
Between the pine-woods and the rocks,
And Barrin bright behind.

The scarlet of the corn-poppies
Splashes the yellow field;
The broad white sunshine of the South
Shines on the glowing weald.

The old stone castles on the hills
Look out with blinded eyes,
They have no more besiegers now
Save the white butterflies.

A green land, a grey land,
A golden land and sweet,
Where Love sits by the wayside pools
Dabbling his naked feet.

ETHEL TALBOT SCHEFFAUER.

Earth Dreams

NOW creeps from out the Orient's cloistral halls
The stealthy dusk, and Hesper, argus-eyed,
Preludes his nightly vigil, while the tide
Of darkling silence floods the unguarded walls
Where the swart hill in sleepy languor sprawls;
And the hush'd woods their piléd gloom divide
There where the runlet's glimmering waters glide,
As from on high the splendid Hunter calls.

Then from her weary shoulders shakes the Earth
Their weight of sordid years, and dreams again
Her golden youth: the glades with ghostly hymns
Of long-dead Pan reëcho, and the mirth
Of sportive dryads, till her heart is fain
To see Títhonia stretch her rosy limbs.

PHIL. J. FISHER.

Antoninus

"THE reign of Antoninus is marked by the rare advantage of furnishing very few materials for history, which is indeed little more than the register of the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of mankind." So Gibbon.

Since 1878—the Congress of Berlin—the petty potentates of South-Eastern Europe have been able to enjoy life as usual, notwithstanding the grievous oppression of their brethren in Macedonia. Suddenly that "little spark of celestial fire—conscience" got well alight, and the hose of the Great Powers, directed by some of them in an irrelevant quarter, was quite inadequate to quell their heroic ardour.

Fired by the spectacle of Italian prowess in Tripoli, they burned to emulate Homeric exploits, and various kinds of weapons were brandished in their native fastnesses. All went merry as a marriage bell, until the sinister rumour was noised abroad that Italy and Turkey were about to conclude peace. This was not all right. Here were they gesticulating on behalf of oppressed Christendom, and a Christian nation goes out of its way to render matters comparatively easy for the Turks by closing a diversion and leaving the wicked Mohammedan a free hand to defend his birthright. Clearly gesticulation should now be limited. After all, the voice of the Powers was not devoid of sense and reason. Perhaps "no ultimatum will be necessary."

Montenegro—the enfant terrible of the doughty confederation—however, must needs break away, andwith more courage than discretion attack the formidable antagonist, whose misdeeds were just beginning to be more indulgently viewed by their more prudent neighbours. The Wagnerian Concert of Europe as always produced all sorts of weird sounds, and began to fear that their own precious skins might be in danger, also that their plans for filching something—without risk—from the unbeliever might disastrously fall through. They might conceivably have to cut each other's throats instead of enjoying the absorbing spectacle of that operation performed on others from the auditorium, and, when the time was ripe, wresting the spoils from the lacerated and exhausted combatants.

Is it impossible to enter a plea for tolerance? Are the fires of Smithfield again to burn, but if it can be so arranged to burn Mohammedans instead of Christians, who not infrequently loathe each other in a superior degree? Is not the Mohammedan a man and a brother? Is he not far more devout than many who in a religious census would be classed as Christians? His methods of Government may, as is the case in many other parts of the world, leave much to be desired. But surely he has progressed, and by so doing has proved that he is not outside the pale.

Why at this stage—the Cross against the Crescent? Those who are acquainted with Gibbon's bitter satire in his chapters on the Crusades, will not have much sympathy with the modern Crusaders, who suffer no privations, who are not animated by enthusiasm, but who, as a Stock Exchange gamble, try to rig the market in their own interest. It is a horrible and sickening reflection that such deeds are done under the cloak of religion combined with a Pecksniffian desire that the local methods of Camberwell should reign supreme in the historic remains of the Byzantine Empire.

These views we know will be abhorrent in the lobby of the House of Commons and in Whitefield's Tabernacle, which has a monopoly of righteousness. We know we are the only organ in the press which disdains to speak "with bated breath and whispering 'umbleness," and which stands up for the right, whether the cause be Mussulman or Christian. On Lucidity in Prose

By H. Belloc.

Lucidity is the chief character of prose. Men write when they cannot speak. Men speak to be understood.

Because lucidity is the chief character of prose its perfection also is the hardest thing for a writer in prose to achieve. This is true of every art—though its object be clear, the direct path to that object is exceedingly difficult of achievement. But in the case of prose it always sounds something of a paradox to say that its perfection is hard to achieve. If lucidity is the main character of prose what difficulty can there be in attaining lucidity? The reason people think lucidity easy to attain is that we all conceive direct speech as native to man. Everybody can say what he wants to say.

Now this is true of things in which we are in an exact relation with our audience. Thus, if a man, all his life a breeder of pigs, went to the pig market where he had sold pigs all his life and said, "Here I have a pig to sell," no one would misunderstand him. But men are wanderers into many markets, and the man with a pig to sell is sometimes among those who have never heard of pigs. It so happens that every man in his heart thinks of his audience as a part of himself. He cannot but believe that they have that in common with him which will make any expression of his quite clear to them so long as it is clear to himself. Every man thinks of himself as a well-known seller in his own market. Upon this illusion men build the misconception that lucidity in prose is an easy thing.

A German once said, very wisely—though a little picturesquely—that by a sort of gravity our thoughts fell easily on to the paper and, against that gravity, rose with difficulty from the paper to the minds of our readers. To put it in a simpler and less German way, we can easily tell ourselves things that we understand, but it is less easy to tell our readers those things in terms which they shall understand. All prose is made up of a sort of tiny translations from mind to mind, and only when the translations are very good have you lucidity.

Now the first requisite of this lucidity which is the test of prose is that the writer should intend to be clear. If for any reason he does not intend to be clear there is an end of it. Something may be said for the determination to be obscure, or the letting in to one's prose, however reluctantly, of obscurity—with this I shall deal in a moment—but, anyhow, no one can be lucid unless he wants to be lucid, though millions can be obscure without wishing to be obscure.

To be lucid in prose a man must have a sort of passion for those to whom he addresses what he writes, otherwise, without knowing it, he will write for himself alone. He must have a sort of violence when he pictures his audience in the vividness of his picture; and to be able to conjure that picture up is a very rare gift. Men who have been really lucid in their prose have either known some one audience so well that they had no effort in talking to it, or had so acute a human sympathy that they could pierce into the vital part of any audience which they attacked. Do you not see now how difficult it is to be lucid in prose? In speech you see your audience with the eye—but for prose you must have a vision.

Some people will say that because prose should be lucid it will not admit of ornament. They are altogether wrong. Ornament is essentially necessary to lucidity where that which has to be lucidly conveyed is lovely. A man describing for a general audience something which has given him particular pleasure through the eye or through any other sense, will not achieve his object without ornament. Fools talk as though the restriction of language were not an ornament. It is an ornament like any other. When you read in the Gospels those words, "He answered him never a word," the restriction there displayed is an ornament. Had the translator written, "Nothing appears to have been said in reply to the questions addressed to the prisoner by the magistrate," a very different truth would have been told. In other words, ornament is as much a part of lucidity as is gesture a part of personality. But ornament when it is used to confuse the reader is vile, like a grotesque gesture used to confound or merely to amuse an onlooker. Prose should never be a play-actor; but it has a perfect right to be, or, rather, it is under a necessity to be, in turns a soldier, a merchant, a plain dealer, a surgeon, or a friend. It should always help.

Now then, if lucidity is the just character of prose, does this mean that we must condemn all writing—not verse—which we find to be obscure?

By no means. A man's writing may be obscure in two ways, undesigned or designed.

A man's writing may be undesignedly obscure in two ways again: either he is writing of something which cannot be put quite clearly to men, but only sketched or suggested to them; or, though possessed of much to say, he is not possessed of the medium through which to say it.

A man explaining to the blind what colour was would be an obscure writer of prose. Yet his effort would be laudable. His prose was worth writing, and would be so judged both by those who desired instruction for the blind—however difficult—and by such of the blind as had the sense to know he was a prophet. Only of this sort of obscurity in prose it ought to be very clearly laid down that the author should at least try to be as clear as he possibly can. The great victims of this kind of obscurity are the prophet, the mystic, the visionary, and so forth. It is not true that their only vehicle is poetry; they have something to say, and it must be said. They cannot in the nature of things say it clearly; but the fundamentals of what they have to say should be said as clearly as is possible.

The second way in which a man will be undesignedly obscure consists in this: that, having much to say, he has an imperfect control of his instrument.

Some tell us that if a man has only an imperfect control of the instrument of expression he should not try to express himself at all. But this is nonsense. Man after man has discovered something of use to his fellow-men without any good knowledge of how to put forward that discovery. Are we to lose the gold because the man carries an awkward bag, or even a leaky one? Are we to go without bread because the wagons of a harvest are cumbersome, or even spill some of the wheat?

What is indeed important with both these undesigned kinds of obscurity is that the obscurity itself should not be confounded with the good stuff which is brought us by the obscure writer.

We must not imagine that, because some subject is too cloudy to be dealt with directly, therefore the obscurity of the style has some virtue in it; nor must we consider that, because a man does not quite know how to convey some valuable discovery of his, the value lies in his inability to talk. It lies really, of course, in his ability to discover.

Now as to designed obscurity: upon this a very clear and immediate verdict can be rendered. All deliberate obscurity is inimical to prose.

Does this mean that we should never have in any kind of writing deliberate obscurity? I think not.

There is a condition under which obscurity is permitted to writers even though they be not writers of formal verse. When the object of a writer is ritual, a deliberate fencing off of the profane, the establishment of barriers and of a pass-word, as it were, he may be obscure; just as a religion may use a dead language. But let him not imagine that he is writing prose. What he is writing is a form not of prose, but of rhetoric. He is appealing to human emotions of appetite and not of decision. He is engaged in a sort of singing, not in speaking. And let him take all the care in the world that what he does, being useless except in the service of some just exaltation, is entirely directed to the excitement of emotion and does not pretend to conceal any information.

Thus a good schoolmaster of mine used to quote as distinguishing certain sectaries this text: "They shall file and flee into the valley of Beth-Ramon, where the lion roareth and the flap-doodle mourneth the loss of her first-born." This is not prose, but rhetoric, leading worshippers on as though to the sound of a sacred dance. It is not reasonable: it is not lucid: and it is not prose.

A Gaelic Play

"THEY do be saying the horses in these parts are wanting the whip rising and falling on them all times." So an old man philosophically had informed me when I had asked him the way, and complained of the lack of energy in the mare I rode. Probably it was that my arm had not acquired the necessary automatic action, but also, I am convinced, of a certain great age in the mare that my unfamiliar eye had not perceived, but my ride among the great hills at the fall of evening became more of a patient amble and less of a stirring canter than I had hoped for. Yet, as it fell about, this, too, had its value in the occasion.

The news had come to me that at a monastery in the upper part of the island that night a play was to be acted by the Gaelic League in Irish; and I had, happily for myself, determined that I should arrive full early for it. So as the mare could not be induced to more than its determined amble, and as there was no fear of my overshooting the hour fixed for the play, in the unlikely chance of its being punctual, I turned about to notice the hills and bogs between which the road wound itself like a pale ribbon in the slow dusk of a summer's evening. I had long passed the angle from which the Menawn Cliffs could be seen, and the hills that swelled above or behind them rose and fell on my right. Sleive More, like a giant Druid brooding over the island, receded into a more remote majesty behind me on my left. Up through the long valley in which the road lay could be seen, one above another, standing in a mighty conclave for the coming night's communion, the far hills of Mayo.

The dusk was slow, very slow, in falling. It could not have been much dimmer when I arrived than when I began; so the change could not have come from without. But the hills seemed gradually wrapped in a stranger darkness, and the voice, as I left it behind me, seemed like the remembered echo of some dream moving through the mind. The wandering, detached voice, the swell and surge of the hills near and far, the blue mystery of the falling heavens, the unaltering iteration of the mare's steady amble over the stony road, all seemed part of one eternal rhythm that drew all things into itself.

So that when a young lad led away the mare, and I saw a brother in Franciscan orders advancing to greet me, it seemed no stranger than that there should be a Myself for him to meet. The room for the play was already filling, he told me, but it was not likely that the play itself would begin at the present time. Illuminated by two lamps that had not yet begun to burn well, it seemed full of shadows, where dark figures and white faces moved. At the far end of the room two blankets, as they seemed, were hung from the roof, and pinned together, so roughly that it was not at all difficult to peer through and discover the preparations for the coming play. In the meantime I began a careless distant conversation with the man beside me. It was little likely my scraps of Irish would lend me much help during the course of the play, and I determined to call upon his frequent assistance.

When at last the blankets were drawn aside and draped, each of them, about a prompter, the scene they framed lacked nothing in simplicity. On a canvas at the back a cottage hearth was sketched in charcoal; while the canvases on each side stood for walls, in one of which a window appeared and in the other a door. A chair, a table and a bottle of poteen completed the requirements; and on these the actors soon set the action afloat. Two men, discussing volubly, entered. Their voluble discussion included two women who were already there; and when they passed out again their volubility could be heard without abatement behind the door.

While the women took up the discussion my prompter informed me that the two men were adjusting the marriage bargain for the younger of the two women, one of them being her father and the other the father of the prospective husband. So that when a young man lifted the canvas flap and put his head through the window it was not difficult to divine who he was, and how complications were to arise in the hard bargain that the old man was driving behind the door. All swung upon the mother, however, and it was to her the lovers turned for assistance.

"She's won; she'll surely be helping them now," whispered my instructor to me, thawed out of his reserve by the excitement of the moment. And when the men returned, their bargain driven, there was a subtle and delicate moment as the mother approached them to discover what the terms were that had been made. Peadar O'Giorbalain, the father of the decreed groom, Peadar Og, it appeared now, was a poteen maker; and with great glee I was informed that the mother was suggesting he should add his old still to the bargain. This her husband, keen for advantage, endorses; and it falls to her to stir the rumbling storm into a tempest, until at length Peadar Sean, in an exciting moment of the play, is dismissed the house, and Diarmuid—still at the window—is assured of his love.

There clearly wanted something at this juncture to avoid a merely trite conclusion; and I looked to see from which quarter this should come, if at all, when in there rushed a boy—a lad from the monastery school, indeed—who, rocking wonderfully with laughter meanwhile, announced that the constabulary had just seized Peadar O'Giorbalain's still, and were busy seeking its owner. It was a complete set-off to the course of the action: the completer for its vivid rendering by the lad Seaghainin MacThomas, whose abandon, seeing he was watched by all the school of which he was a member, was superb.

Despite all the crudeness, even the grotesqueness, of the stage property, the company in their name, "Na Geabhai Fiadhaine" (The Wild Geese) did much to clear the reputation of a much-maligned bird. Inasmuch as the audience helped the action at critical moments by happy advice to the characters, they realised the old lively principle of drama, and became identified with the action—considerably to its interest and excitement.

Then as I went out into the night the stars were clear in heaven, and the great communion of the mountains rose up in heavy masses against the glimmer of the sky. A pale road stretched before me; but was soon lost in the darkness of the bog. The quiet whisper of old Earth, that may only be heard when her querulous children are at rest from their turmoil, floated over the hills and bog in gentle undulating waves, deadening the clatter of the mare's hoofs as she sprang into unaccustomed speed, knowing home ahead. Peace had sunk on the face of the earth, and Being was awake in power and majesty, while Love and the giving of marriage, stage-plays and scenery, fell back as interruptions of a ceaseless and eternal rhythm. A Great Master of Art

Hercules Brabazon Brabazon. By C. LEWIS HIND. Illustrated. (George Allen and Co. 21s. net.)

THIS handsome volume is the noblest service rendered to the genius of one of the greatest of colourists whom the art of painting has bred; and Mr. Hind deserves the gratitude of all art-lovers for the service, as do the publishers for the rich array of masterpieces in colour reproduced therein. That Mr. Hind has built and set up for us in immortal fashion the man and his entity as artist, it would be impossible to affirm; but his portrait is as near a picture as we are likely to get. The biographer has had to rely on letters and on the witness of relatives and intimates who were little likely to gossip of the weaknesses and secrets of the artist, even if he had had any; the British habit is to be cautious in opinion of a dead friend, even if he be a saint—and Brabazon came as near to the sweet and gentle character of a saint as it is well-nigh possible for a human being to be. He was also a poet. His song is of the glory of the world; and he sang it as the birds sing, from sheer joy in the singing.

Yet, one wonders whether even Mr. Hind fully sensed the wide range of this man's exquisite genius! There are times when Mr. Hind rids himself of book-read opinions so completely as to reveal himself alone; and it is at such times that he displays a capacity for the utterance of an exquisite mind. I know no man so innately uncritical at heart as Hind—he is essentially an artist. He has, 'tis true, "wobbled" in his definitions of art so ruthlessly that one sees him now defining art as love in this volume without surprise. But I would ask Mr. Hind, as I would ask criticism at large, why not try to grasp first the basic intention of art, and be glad to think of its majesty and its immensity instead of binding it to a lesser thing? Why try even to narrow down art as being love when he must surely have realised by this time that it is also hate and passionate resentment and every other human emotion besides? Art has flung tyrants from their thrones, rogues into the gutters, hypocrites on to the dunghill of men's contempt, and these are not acts of love—or Daumier and the great satirists laboured in vain as artists!

Now Mr. Hind must know all this. All that is of the slightest value in his writing on the art of Brabazon is that he shall transfer to us the impression aroused in his senses by the wizardry of Brabazon's art. Why, then, quote and accept without examination the opinions of such as Mr. MacColl and Sir Frederick Wedmore? That Mr. MacColl wrote smartly and made the art of Brabazon the peg for sneers at lesser men proves no deep sensing by the critic of Brabazon's genius; and I look in vain in his criticism for any deep appreciation of Brabazon's art, whilst I find him the slave to innumerable fallacies as to the significance of art. But of all the strange paradoxes and confusions surely the approval of Brabazon by Ruskin, who could not sense the art of Whistler, is the most amazing! As a matter of fact, in the case of Brabazon, as in the case of Turner, he probably approved their art by happy good fortune, and for literary reasons wholly removed from their real significance!

To begin with, Turner and Brabazon were both concerned with landscape—and landscape as a rule is in the realm of beauty. The beauty-fallacy, therefore, happens to cover the achievement of both men. Again Brabazon, though lacking the vast range and eagle flight and, therefore, the wide achievement of Turner, was an astounding craftsman; and criticism, which always confounds craftsmanship with art, again found in Brabazon a genius that it could admit into its parochial concept. So, by chance, we find criticism, for absolutely fallacious reasons, crowning heroes that were worthy of the bays! Just as he who shies often enough at the cocoanut brings down the nut.

And, of a truth, if any man could justify the fallacy that art is love, Brabazon would justify it. If any man could justify the falsity that art is beauty, Brabazon would justify it. Aristocrat, leisured, protected from all those sordid struggles for means of livelihood that afflict many men of genius and make of their wayfaring one long tragedy of endurance, he lived a sheltered, sumptuous career. His joyous, simple nature, sunning itself in the genial atmosphere of wealth and rank and fashion, free from all household cares and bickerings, was nourished by the love and affection of all about him. Rid of all need for effort to gain social recognition, he was untroubled by those constant little skirmishes for place that often afflict the man who is gifted above his fellows. Though a younger son, he came early to large estate. He evaded the onerous duties that go with such fortune, and seized the freedom that fortune brings with it. He handed the duties and cares of his estate to the charge of his brother-in-law, who served him with the devotion that Brabazon ever won from all his kin; and gave his whole life to the pursuit of the arts. Other artists have done the same; but the fact that they left the business of their inns or other possessions to their wives or kin seems to have been too vulgar an affair to induce the critics to call them amateurs—whatever they may mean by amateur! Mr. MacColl even gives us the fatuous definition that art is "a form of sport"! If Brabazon were an "amateur," then it is difficult to discover what is an "artist." A man is an artist or he is not. Brabazon went through as severe a training to his craft as it were well possible to imagine. The flatulent talk about his being an amateur seems to rest on some such idea as that he had not to sell his work in order to live! If an artist be an amateur in the measure of his giving, then Turner was immeasurably the greater amateur of the twain. Artists have created masterpieces mightier than the works of Brabazon who have had to sell them for the means to live. Hals and Rembrandt and Millet had to go empty that they might utter their genius; but are they the lesser or greater thereby?

Turner revealed to the world a vast increase in the vision of man, created also a vaster instrument of craftsmanship whereby to utter that vision. Setting up as standards for his own achievement the Great Dead, he essayed to rival each master in his own field—and mastered each. Then, his training done, he embarked on the uncharted sea of colour-orchestration, and essayed to utter the vast moods of nature in impressions wrought in terms of colour that should arouse those impressions in our senses by sheer music of colour harmonies. Each mood—from dawn to night, from mountain to sea, from summer to winter—Turner essayed to express in colour harmonies. Mere craftsmanship as an aim in itself, mere photographic reproduction of nature, he flung to the groundlings, and walked instead in the splendid realm of the imagination. No painter before him had dreamed of such a conquest. Yet that revelation and the achievement that resulted from it are dubbed the Decline of Turner by the critics! It so happened that the academic reaction of the Pre-Raphaelites failed in the intention of its initiator, and succeeded, oddly enough, in its instinctive rightness of vision in essaying to utter sunlight with broken colour. Meantime the forward impetus to art given by Turner crossed the Channel to France and brought forth Monet and the so-called Impressionist School of the 'seventies —in a France prepared for Turner by the genius of Cônstable. In England the revelation looked like passing, but in Brabazon it was destined to be carried on. Brabazon, 'tis true, had not the vast range of Turner, but his realm was a mighty one; and by hard and dogged effort he came to fulfil the conquest of it in a series of colour lyrics which are amongst the masterpieces of the age. Snatching the mood from Nature that tripped by, he so schooled his hand's skill that he set it down with quick certainty; and having uttered it so far as it was complete, he touched it no more, nor added one needless stroke to it. To push the impression further than Brabazon and Turner thrust it is futile. The mere labouring of a mood avails it nothing. Both men by instinct realised that they were concerned with the mood of the thing seen, not with its mere reconstitution.

Beautiful as are the reproductions in this handsome volume they give but a hint of Brabazon's range, either of vision or craftsmanship. But at least they do give a hint of the necessity for the nation to acquire two or three hundred of the masterpieces whilst these are still unscattered. It is thoroughly discreditable to us as a people that the Tate possesses but some half-dozen or so of such works, in which we cannot be too rich. The art of Brabazon is one of the chiefest glories of our age. It is a beacon-light to youth in its artistic schooling. Its splendour and its hymning of the glory of life cannot be under-rated. No price could be too high to secure a large share of it for the nation.

The Appreciation of Poetry

The Making of Poetry: A Critical Study of Its Nature and Value. By Arthur H. R. Fairchild, Ph.D., Assistant Professor of English, University of Missouri. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.)

There is no secret about the delight of poetry. It is not a mystery revealed to the erudite, or a prize for fine judgment. It is not like buried treasure, or the Ark of the Covenant. The Spirit of Delight is the Spirit of Poetry. Delight is the very first thing poetry offers us. It comes to the ordinary reader of decent mental and spiritual stature, as naturally as light and heat come from the sun. Darwin in his old age lost his taste for poetry, and he deplored it, as a man deplores the loss of his eyesight. Perhaps it is better to lose one's eyesight than one's love of poetry.

The question arises, what if a nation lose its taste? A rigorous course of the Simple Life would seem to be the only remedy; or, to put it in another way, what Nietzsche calls "the transvaluation of all values," so that men shall regain their comparative sense of values, and not for ever esteem husks above pearls, or Gadarene swine above the souls of men. We do not mean to insinuate, nor do we believe, that the American nation has lost its sense of values; it is slowly and painfully acquiring that sense. But there are times when we are tempted to think that the professors of English at American universities believe conversely and consider it their duty to do something for poetry, much as the bishops derided by Matthew Arnold considered it their duty to do something for the Trinity. "Who would divine that their dust came from corn, and from the yellow delight of the summer fields?"

Here is Professor Fairchild offering to "unfold the secret of its delight"; and, with all the goodwill in the world, we cannot believe that any unsophisticated reader will find his own ideas of the way in which poetry comes to be written much clarified.

At the outset the author sets himself four questions to answer: "(1) What is the material of which poetry is really made? (2) What are the chief processes, or kinds of activity, involved in the making of it? (3) What, from this point of view, is the real nature of poetry? (4) What is the need, and what is the value of poetry?" We ventured to guess the answers before going further. Our answers were: (1) Life. (2) Imagination. (3) "An image of life expressed in its eternal truth." (4) To enable us to see life in its true proportion. Professor Fairchild is more elaborate. His answers may be summarised thus: "(1) The mental image. (2) Personalising, combining of images and versifying. (3) A pleasurable and unified form of self-realisation. (4) A biological necessity. A feeling of unity attained and of continuity of experience emphasised." From this it may be seen that he does not attempt to give an exposition of his subject from the standpoint of the creative artist, but purely from that of the anatomical critic. Poetry, or rather the poet, is stretched upon the table and gradually dismembered. The operation may be beneficial to the scientific type of mind, but even so we are very far from agreeing with all the surgeon's conclusions.

Rhythm is to poetry what the circulation of the blood is to the body. It is not, as is suggested, merely an aid to the grouping of mental images. Again, all true poetry is the expression of some dominant emotion, or some vital conviction, and it is that animating idea, and not "the fringe or clothes, the secondary or associated images, that are of chief value in the making of a poem." That is the idea of the trifler who thinks that poetry can be made by letting his thought wander aimlessly about, catching fancies with less purpose than a child catches butterflies.

Professor Fairchild is on surer ground when he comes to speak of the need and value of poetry, and much that he says is true and salutary; but here we feel that he lays disproportionate stress upon the power of poetry to body forth ideal conceptions. All that the poet feels to be in harmony with life is his subject, and it matters little or nothing whether he feel that harmony with the past, present, or future. The fact that Wordsworth's "Solitary Reaper" is of a reminiscent type does not prevent it from being a poem of the very highest worth.

Finally, we do not appreciate the standpoint which regards poetry as a sort of ideal consolation for the disappointment of actual life. It may be for the type of mind to which "trees, however beautiful, are for lumber and fuel; meadows for cultivation and the fruits of commerce; waterfalls, however magnificent, for power and light"; but, frankly, we doubt if such a mind exists. Timber merchants there are: farmers we know: engineers we recognise, but we do not believe in the existence of the person who could look everywhere and see absolutely nothing in its own glory.

The Playground of Central Europe

The Building of the Alps. By Professor T. G. Bonney. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

If, as Ruskin says somewhere in "Modern Painters," mountains are the muscles and tendons of the earth's anatomy, then Professor Bonney has very skilfully dissected them, laying bare their structure and expounding the manner of their evolution. Although, after half a century of Alpine climbing, he yields to none in his enthusiasm for this wonderful range, those who are informed with what may best be described, perhaps, as religious horror at sight of the snow-clad peaks will find something a little cold-blooded in his merciless analysis of the schist, hornblend, gneisses, and other material of which such scenery is fashioned; and, indeed, this differentiation between the slaty crystallines of the Chamonix Aiguilles and such coherents as the Col d'Anterne is occupation rather for the geologist. Nevertheless, the author contrives to impart even to this grim aspect of his subject a lively interest that will recall to some the pleasure with which, many years since, they read Tyndall's observations on the Mer de Glace, or some of the less technical contributions to the Alpine

Journal. Professor Bonney lacks, in this volume at any rate, the infectious fervour of Tyndall, or the grandiose conception of Ruskin; but he writes of the peaks and valley-slopes, of the genesis and movements of glaciers, or of the fusion of moraines, with the easy knowledge of long intimacy, and it is evident that the elucidation of such problems daunts him as little as the mastery of the peaks themselves.

More than half of this interesting book is taken up with these and kindred matters, and the student of Alpine geology will find in the first nine chapters of the book a detailed and adequately illustrated account of how this magnificent and historic range came into being, and of what it consists in our day. There is, however, much more in the book than this academic discourse on an aspect of the Alps which makes only a qualified appeal to the athletic climber and less serious tourist. In the latter chapters the author, with a lighter style more suitable to his change of standpoint, touches on the weather, natural history, and human interest of the region which, with some little latitude of definition, is popularly known as "the Alps." Storms on the Lake of Geneva, the vagaries of lightning in the high tops, and the remarkable clearness of the atmosphere are matters of close interest to the traveller, and of each Professor Bonney has something to say by way of description and explanation. Then he turns to the rare profusion of Alpine flowers, to which Ruskin paid such touching tribute, and he dispels the widespread illusion that edelweiss can be gathered only at personal risk, an error which, while lending fictitious value to that modest flower, has been the cause of more than one fatality. Of characteristic animals, like the bouquetin and chamois, there are many interesting anecdotes, as well as of encounters between poachers and keepers, and one story of how an English lady effectually smuggled a pair of ibex horns over the Italian frontier by having them strapped under her mule's belly and concealing them with her riding habit, deserves a place of honour in the annals of contraband.

The author overlooks one amusing fact about the bears which at present occupy the famous pit at Berne. These are not, as he implies, natives of the country, but were imported from Russia, or so, at least, a Government official in that city recently informed the present reviewer.

The part which the Alps have played in European travel and warfare is the subject of an entertaining discussion on their relation to man, and in the concluding chapter, in which the Professor summarises some changes of the last fifty years, a frank acknowledgment of improvements is tempered by regret for the less sophisticated conditions of the past. In this view, the author, who is no immoderate laudator temporis acti, will command the adherence of all who deprecate the apparently inevitable, and certainly undeniable, vulgarisation of the Alps. The only people interested in the matter at all who lack this æsthetic remorse are the Swiss themselves, to whom, more especially since the latest development of winter sports with a "season" which practically lasts all the year round, their noble mountains and smiling valleys are alternately a source of wealth. This is why, in critical eyes, the modern Swiss lack the virtues of the apocryphal Tell and appear rather as a nation boutiquière.

Professor Bonney regards agriculture as the staple industry of the land, but its importance dwindles to insignificance beside another, on which the more commercial element of this composite nation has bestowed the appropriate title of Fremden-Industrie. We can appreciate the sorrow with which, contemplating the more gentle atmosphere of his long and honourable retrospect as an Alpine pioneer, Professor Bonney views a Switzerland in which the American eagle has usurped the places once sacred to the lammergeier. We share his emotion, but we see no remedy.

Hans Sachs and Goethe: A Study in Metre. By MARY CACY BURCHINAL, Ph.D. (Vandenhoed and Ruprecht, Göttingen. 1 mark 80.)

DARK days seem to be in store for poetry: her history contains many revolutions and not a few dictatorships, but hitherto she has not known that tyrannical and immeasurable force that has begun to dominate all human arrangements under the name of "scientific government." From Crecy and Caxton down to Arkwright and Stephenson the fate of mankind has been largely bound up with the development of mechanics; the conquest of the air will no doubt modify society in the manner least expected by the prophets. Literature has always been peculiarly susceptible to mechanical influences; we need only remember the invention of the printing-press and of the telegraph to be at once convinced of this fact. It is not only the material, but also the method of literature that has been thus modified. But the change that seems likely to result from the present activity of poetical anatomists will be unique. In most other revolutions there was more question of the matter than of the manner of literature: even the dictatorship of Boileau was no exception to this. The revolution in contemplation has nothing to do with matter—it is wholly concerned with manner. The headquarters of this, as of many other modern revolutions, is to be found in a laboratory, and its mind in the skull of a public analyst. The fact that we had set ourselves to convey, and have at last arrived at asserting, is that the future of poetry is being forged by the methods and apparatus of the Abbé Rousselot, the king of experimental phoneticians, at least of such of them as are monarchically inclined.

M. Verrier, who has also written on English metres, is a firm believer in Rousselot methods. He is, however, by no means the first-comer in these fields. His predecessors include M. Robert de Souza, whose brochure, "Du Rythme en Français," has recently been noticed in THE ACADEMY, and M. Landry. Most of the investigators are more or less dispassionate scientists, though M. de Souza exhibits some of the qualities of a fanatic in his defence of the "vers libre." M. Verrier is concerned with a theme that somehow manages to be far more abstract and impersonal. Not that he need be dull for any moderately serious reader, though the musical sections are hardly addressed to the complete layman. "Isochronism" has an extraordinary neutral sound; it seems to express a truism, or, at best, to establish a formula; and yet it leads to a spirited and interesting controversy. Most disputes about the nature of established metres give rather an impression of hair-splitting, but M. Landry, after establishing the existence of isochronism in music, denies it in poetry, while M. Verrier holds that it is the whole principle on which verse is based. A rather special feature of this controversy, and one that makes it more promising of results than most literary or political debates, is that M. Verrier uses M. Landry's experiments and figures to demonstrate his own thesis. At first there is complete agreement between the two adversaries—they are at one notably in their definition of the rhythmical foot. But M. Landry appears to have occasionally confounded accent and stress, and this tells against isochronism. Isochronism is the only principle of versification that will bear examination: "C'est sur le retour du temps marqué à intervalles égaux que repose le rythme." Isochronism is an ideal to which, though, like the straight line, it has no real existence, all rhythm tends to conform. The impression is the important thing; rhythm is subjective—it is "le rythme de notre attention." The instruments having done their recording work, and measured all the sounds and silences of a number of heterogeneous verses in hundredths of a second, it is found that the recurrence of certain symmetrical forms is almost uniform, and that, moreover, the ear will not perceive a difference of 10 per cent.

Mrs. Burchinal's essay on Hans Sachs and Goethe belongs to a different category of works on metre. Her subject keeps her away from the pitfalls of French verse, which has difficulties unknown to the English, German, and Italian lyres, whose unequivocal stresses make many things plain. Again we have the feeling that there is little to be explained. Again we find a host of theories explaining what seems the obvious in a multitude of ways. Hans Sachs, praised by Goethe as a master of harmonies, has since been attacked as ignorant and uncouth, and has had to be rehabilitated. Mrs. Burchinal gives the history of the "Knittelvers"—practically the metre of "l'Allegro"—and analyses specimens of Sachs' work and Goethe's imitations of Sachs.

Poetry, we have said already, and probably more relevantly than now, has dark days before her. No longer shall it be said of her, "Vera incessu patuit dea." She will have to hurry past, to escape the anxious crowd of phonetical professors eager to measure her every step. No longer must she be as the water-beetle, notwithstanding the "ease, celerity, and grace" of his movements, for

Historical Sketches of Glamorgan. A Series of Papers read before the Glamorgan Society, London, by REV. D. BRYANT, M.A., D.C.L., REV. J. LEOLINE PHILLIPS, B.A., and MR. HOWELL PROSSER, Vol. II. (Western Mail: London and Cardiff. 1s. 9d.)

EVERY year sees an increase in the number of county societies established in London, and this increase will probably continue until every county is represented. For the most part, they are of a social and perhaps also of a philanthropic character, but it is seldom that their activities wander outside of these two provinces. To the general rule, however, that of Glamorgan is an exception which it would be well if the others would make the rule. The second of its objects is "to foster interest in the history and the traditions of the county and principality generally." In furtherance of this, periodical meetings are held, at which papers dealing with the history and traditions of Glamorganshire are read. A selection of these papers is afterwards published by the Society, and the volume at present under review consists of four papers, headed respectively, "The Marcher Lordship of Glamorgan," "Glamorgan in the Times of the Civil Wars," "A Glamorgan Worthy of the Eighteenth Century" (Dr. Richard Price, Llangeinor), and "Sir Henry Morgan, Buccaneer." The first-mentioned paper consists of a remarkably interesting historical sketch of the greater Glamorgan when it was a Marcher Lordship, from the period of the conquest of the district in the reign of William Rufus until its incorporation into the Kingdom of England in the time of Henry VIII. In "Glamorgan in the Times of the Civil Wars" Mr. Leoline Phillips sketches the struggle between the King and Parliament as it proceeded in South Wales, and throws a clear light on the criminal folly which alienated from the King that which had hitherto been among the most loyal of his dominions. The fourth of the series—also by Mr. Phillips—sketches interestingly the picturesque career of Morgan, pirate and colonial governor.

Through Holland in the "Vivette." By E. KEBLE CHATTERTON. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service, and Co. 6s. net.)

MR. KEBLE CHATTERTON is the complete yachtsman. Those who have read the story of his former adventures with the Vivette will recall the zest with which he writes about his boat. He overhauls her for the benefit of the reader, describes her squaresail, her fore-sails, her head-sails, her fore-halyard, her rigging. Even the non-nautical reader—the lubberly landsman—can scarcely fail to be infected by such unrestrained enthusiasm, while those who go down to the sea in ships and make their business in great waters will find in Mr. Chatterton a kindred spirit.

In this latest book he takes us to Holland, and—when there—discourses learnedly of the manners and customs of the people. Of certain of their manners and customs, that is, for, in truth, Mr. Chatterton has eyes for little save seamanship. But it was the Dutch who introduced the yacht into England, so it is not surprising that the owner of the Vivette cherishes a special fondness for these people. The amateur yachtsman will find in these pages a veritable mine of information. There are sailing directions for foreign ports, ranging from Calais to Amsterdam, and there are many amusing sidelights on life in the Dutch cities.

The author, too, has a keen sense of character, and one is glad to be introduced to such a magnificent fellow as Dick. Dick is an old sailor, who has kicked about the earth for a number of years. Mr. Chatterton and his friends were indebted to him for some pleasant moments:—

> Dick told us of his own marriage, which had taken place as recently as the beginning of the century, and it happened that the vicar who had performed the ceremony was the father of a former mate of the Vivette. According to Dick, this wedding was the first to take place in 1901, so the vicar returned him the marriage fees. That didn't suit Dick, however, who handed them back with a remark that he preferred to pay his own "harbour dues," and a desire that they might be distributed "among the churchwardens and crew."

That is quite one of the best things in the book. It is worthy of Captain Cuttle.

Johnsonian Gleanings: Part II.—Francis Barber, The Doctor's Negro Servant. By ALEYN LYELL READE. With Portrait Frontispiece. (Privately Printed for the Author at the Arden Press.)

Vestigia nulla retrorsum may be considered Mr. Reade's motto in his unwearying research into the by-paths of the life and times of Dr. Johnson. He has now written three works supplementary to the famous biography—"The Reades of Blackwood Hill and Dr. Johnson's Ancestry"; "Gleanings," Part I; "Notes on Dr. Johnson's Ancestors and Connexions, and Illustrative of his Early Life"—and this volume, which is an exhaustive account of the Doctor's negro servant and his descendants.

In the will of Mr. Richard Bathurst, dated April 24, 1754, occurs this clause: "Also I give to Francis Barber, a negro whom I brought from Jamaica aforesaid into England, his freedom and twelve pounds in money." Francis had probably entered Dr. Johnson's service about two years before this date; according to Boswell, a fortnight after Mrs. Johnson's death. Four years later he ran away, and became apprentice to an apothecary in Cheapside. He returned to Johnson, but his next flit was to sea, and his name is to be found in the Admiralty muster-books on the roll of the crew of H.M.S. Stag, December, 1758. Being discharged in 1760, he once more returned to Johnson, this time permanently, though he was sent for some five years to school at Bishops Stortford. This was the period of the supposed portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds, in the possession of Mr. Wilson Crewdson, F.S.A., of St. Leonards-on-Sea. There seems, however, a stronger presumption in favour of the negro portrait which was bought by Sir George Beaumont in 1796. In the matter of the large legacy left by Dr. Johnson to Barber, Mr. Reade is a strong apologist, and controverts the view of Sir John Hawkins and others that the negro was eventually ruined by the misplaced munificence, though he admits that the form of the bequest was possibly unwise. The best service rendered by Barber to posterity was the preservation of certain MSS. which would have been burnt if Johnson's dying instructions had been carried out, notably the "Annals," published in 1805.

Recently we looked through Boswell's Life in order to discover Dr. Johnson's views on swearing. A complete answer is given by Mr. Reade, who records that Barber alleged that he never heard his master swear—"the worst words he ever uttered when in a passion was 'you dunghill dog!'"

In this elaborate monograph Mr. Reade has rescued from oblivion every possible detail of the life of one who was for thirty-five years Dr. Johnson's humble servant—for all who feel a "generous curiosity" in such matters.

Dans l'Atlantique. By HENRI DEHERAIN. (Hachette and Co., Paris. 3fr. 50c.)

THE contents of this volume might be described as "Essays in 'Exotism'"—we will apologise for the superimposition of inverted commas upon inverted commas, but the French have a word and we have not. M. Dehérain has given us nothing but history and crude facts, but he has succeeded in conveying to us a strange, almost creepy, feeling. Humanity, not in an undeveloped stage, but ordinary European humanity, is here seen reduced to its lowest terms. Perhaps the account of Tristan da Cunha is the most moving thing in the book. A tiny population, at no time much in excess of five score, is seen battling with privation, lacking the barest comforts, the pleasures of society, and even the news of the greater world to which it has once belonged. "Il manque toujours quelque chose," writes a devoted missionary; "tout individu vivant ici doit s'attendre à la privation comme à une chose naturelle, comme l'on s'attend au vent et à la pluie." The inhabitants have been cut off for the most part from the consolations of religion; it is only at long intervals that a missionary has taken up his abode among them; the brother of Lewis Carrol was one of these good Samaritans, and his campaign against the rats is an important incident in island history. There is no government—an arrangement that has worked well; no "méchant homme" having yet appeared to disturb the harmony. Twice the inhabitants have been invited to emigrate in a body to the Cape; once a third of them were destroyed in a storm at sea; frequently they have been in danger of annihilation from bad weather and harvests or the protracted neglect of the outer world. It is a curious and a potentially instructive story.

St. Helena was the reason for Tristan. Strange as it may seem, the latter island was occupied as an outpost in the cordon that was to guard the illustrious prisoner of 1815. M. Dehérain tells the story of St. Helena from its first beginnings. The island was a pawn in the game of colonial development between England and Holland. For long its value was ignored, and England had eventually to thank her luck rather than her judgment for her possession of it. The Dutch had it again for a moment, and the French, under Des Augiers, made a successful descent in 1706, when it was under the rule of another Frenchman, the expatriated Huguenot, Etienne Poirier. Fruitless attempts were made to develop it economically, and it remains what it was intended to be, a useful depôt in the high seas The chapter on slavery in the island is very moving. The other essays are mainly concerned with French enterprises, including the history of the Jacobin naturalist, Auguste Broussounet. Some excellent maps accompany the text.

The Gospel of Freedom. By Henry D. A. Major, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

It seems that an increasing number of Anglican clergy —as the author of this book—are prepared to accept frankly the most advanced criticism of the so-called Modernists. We are told that the present conflict is between traditional Christianity—whether Anglo-Catholic or Evangelical—and modern Christianity; and the difference is thus defined:—

Traditional Christianity is alleged to consist of "certain traditional forms and institutions, intellectual conceptions, and disputable historical occurrences. Modern refuses to identify Christianity with aught else except the spiritual and moral ideas of the Saviour." Now "disputable historical occurrences" mean simply the evangelical miracles and the events summarised in the creeds of Catholic Christendom. Hence the miracle-myths are easily explained by comparative mythology, and the historical setting of the life of Christ is more or less mythical, so that acceptance of the creed is limited virtually to the first clause—simple Deism. The remaining "dogmas of the creed are to be used by the clergy only for the moral and spiritual lessons that can be drawn from them." It is a strange and equivocal position to employ for moral and spiritual teaching, dogmas which are rejected as myths, or at least "disputable."

If we reject the Virgin-birth, and if Christ were born and died as ordinary men, what was there supreme in His manifestation above that in other great moral teachers, say Plato or St. Paul? Then how can the Resurrection be accepted, which is the very essence of the Gospel? Of what value becomes the historic faith of the Christian if reduced to the level of comparative mythology? In his treatment of modern destructive negative criticism the author displays a remarkable conscious assurance of infallibility. He seems to forget that dogmas of absolute negation are just as difficult to prove, historically or philosophically, as any positive or categorical dogmas. The serious side of a book like this lies in the fact that it represents lectures given at an Anglican Theological College. To invite young men to join the ministry and then explain away the creeds to which they are bound to assent suggests a curious idea of the teacher's responsibility.

Malta and the Mediterranean Race. By R. N. Bradley. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)

Out of the dark shadows left behind by the countless centuries that have elapsed since beings that could be called human began to inhabit the earth, rays of light are beginning to emerge. Many among us can still remember the sensation and opposition caused by Boucher de Perthe's statements that certain chipped flints found in the gravels of the Somme valley were human handiwork. We have travelled far since then, and not only is an age of stone now fully recognised, but it has been separated into several epochs, each of which is the object of careful and detailed study. One of these epochs, the neolithic, is the subject of Mr. Bradley's book; but the author deals more especially with one of the races that used polished stone implements, and that has been named the Mediterranean Race, because the seat of the comparatively high civilisation to which the race attained lies mainly in the basin of the Mediterranean. How a nation that knew no metal could produce buildings equal in size and superior in durability to our own is well described and illustrated by Mr. Bradley. The original researches made by the author at Hagiar Kim and other sites in Malta have lifted a corner of the veil that hid from us the mysterious civilisation which preceded that of Greece. The Greeks, indeed, have left on record some vague allusions to their predecessors; but the whole of classical literature does not contain so much information about this vanished people as the book before us. Mr. Bradley, however, it is fair to state, considers that the Mediterranean Race is with us still, and that its individuals may be identified by cranial and other peculiarities. We do not attach so much importance as the author to language, folk-lore, and customs as proofs of the origin of a people; but the chapters on these subjects will be read with interest by those who have not made a special study of anthropology.

Le Poème Anglo-Saxon de Beowulf. By Hubert Pierquin. (Picard, Paris. 15 fr.)

It is difficult to appraise M. Pierquin's edition of "Beowulf." It is a learned and, in some respects, a very complete work, and contains the text and French translation, not only of "Beowulf," but also of the "Traveller's Song" and the "Fight at Finnesburh"; and it is stocked with two bibliographies, an Anglo-Saxon glossary and grammar, a discussion on metre, and various indexes. The problems of time, authorship, etc., are dismissed in the most summary fashion; on the other hand, we have a very complete study of English constitutional origins down to the Conquest. It is a very good essay, but, in this prolix form, a little irrelevant. And M. Pierquin ignores such problems as that of the relation between Gregory's mission and pre-Augustinian Christianity in Britain. In the matter of rhythm we are sometimes only half convinced, as when he gives as an isolated example "Hwaet! we G*árd*éna in *gē*ar*d*águm" for the pronouncement that "dans une forme particulière d'allitération, le composé peut même renfermer l'un des sons allitérés."

With one more piece of rather carping criticism we will close our remarks on a work that should certainly supply a great need for many: the possession of "Beowulf" is not "fièrement" claimed by modern Englishmen. At least it can never mean as much to them as the "Chanson de Roland" means to modern Frenchmen. "Beowulf" has little to recommend it but its age, its length, and some fine passages. It is a song of despair. It was the work, says approximately "Q.," of some obscure scribe, "whose blue eyes probably watered with the effort."

A History of European Nations, from the Earliest Records to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century. By ANGELO S. RAPPOPORT. (Greening and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

WE are seriously inclined to question the utility of bare chronicles of events covering so long a period as that which is indicated by the sub-title of this work. The defence customarily advanced in favour of these historical vade mecums is that the general reader has not leisure sufficient for a detailed study of special treatises and requires a comprehensive view of what has happened during past centuries. If such be the case, it is surely better to impart such information as will give the reader a grasp of periods and events as a whole than to attempt to acquaint him with details which in themselves possess no significance. It is not to be supposed that we seek any quarrel with Mr. Rappoport's book in particular, for of its own kind it is admirable, but we must confess that knowledge circumscribed by such limits as are necessarily imposed upon an author who ranges over so wide a field as Mr. Rappoport is precisely of that kind against the danger of which the proverb warns us. Were the histories of European nations closely interconnected, and were that interconnection clearly shown, there might be a valid reason for including such a mass of material in so small a space. As it is, this work is no more than an extremely condensed précis of a number of independent national histories. Such a précis may be of value as a labour-saving device to a student of history faced by the near prospect of an examination, but, so far as the general reader is concerned, mole ruit sua.

Die syrische Barbara-Legende. Mit einem Anhang: Die syrische Kosmas- und Damian-Legende in deutscher Uebersetzung. By DR. WILHELM WEYH. (Gust Fock, Leipzig. 1 mark 50.)

DR. WEYH gives in translation the Syrian version of the legend of St. Barbara, with that of St. Juliana, and he also gives the more authorised version of the same legend, without the accretion, whose source he explains satisfactorily. He then proceeds to cite the chief texts for the Greek version, and to consider the modern editions that have appeared. He concludes definitely against the priority of the Syrian legend, basing himself largely on its faulty local colour. Nor does he see any ground for supposing that the legend of St. Barbara owed anything to that of Bassus. We are somewhat surprised to find among the traits enumerated as belonging to a common legendary stock—such as the princess in the tower and the vow of celibacy—"Das Erbauen eines Bades," which, it appears, "ist ein weitverbreitetes Sagenmotiv." It may be so, but there is little about bath-building as such that would seem very distinctive. The incident marking the conversion of St. Barbara—her insistence on having three windows made on the south side of the bath instead of two—is granted originality, but is regarded with suspicion by the critic. Dr. Weyh concludes with a literal translation from the Syrian of the legend of St. Cosmo and St. Damien.

Fiction

The New Humpty-Dumpty. By DANIEL CHAUCER. (John Lane. 6s.)

MR. DANIEL CHAUCER'S work has the quality of a really good champagne. It exhilarates, and the general effect is that of a slight, but quite pleasant, intoxication. No novelist eludes classification so successfully. Other writers are grave and gay in turns, but Mr. Chaucer is grave and gay at the same time. He is at once a keen observer of contemporary movements, a social satirist, an explorer into the strange realms of phantasy, and a purveyor of honest entertainment. His style is marked by a distinction that lifts it to a very high level, and his dialogue is a feast of delights.

One may perhaps take Mr. Chaucer half-seriously. For it seems to us that it would be as great a mistake to see too little in his story as to see too much. He chronicles, with a certain eager avidity, the lives of well-bred people of dissolute habits. For the crank—considered purely as a type—he has a special fondness, and the study of Mr. Pett, the theoretic Socialist, is inimitably perfect. The story is concerned with a counter-revolution in the Kingdom of Galizia. The King is living in exile. A republic has been established. The King—a mere boy—has acquired, a little unfairly, a reputation for a certain not very reprehensible licentiousness. He is believed to be fond of actresses. But he has friends, and these—for various reasons—are anxious to see him re-established on the throne of his ancestors.

The financial aid of an American syndicate is invoked, and thus the quite perfect Mr. Dexter, with his tuft-hunting daughter, are introduced for the delight of the reader. But the dominating figure of the narrative is Sergius Mihailovitch Macdonald, round whom the other characters revolve like stars in the planetary system. Macdonald is, indeed, Mr. Chaucer's supreme achievement in portraiture, and the curious passion of the Count for Lady Aldington provides a love interest which is less absorbing than the various ramifications of that "dark forest"—to adopt Mr. Chaucer's beloved metaphor—the heart of Macdonald himself. The conclusion of the story is as artistically satisfactory as it is, somehow, unexpected. All readers of "The New Humpty-Dumpty" will await, not without impatience, Mr. Chaucer's next novel. We wonder, by the way, who Mr. Chaucer is.

Spring Days. By George Moore. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)

Re-publishing this book after an interval of twenty-five years, the author explains how it happened that it was excluded from the list of his collected works, and mentions "an insolent article" in The Academy when the book was first published. The Academy of to-day is, of course, very different from The Academy of that time, and the present reviewer has not read the article which caused the trouble. Having read the book, however, he is inclined to think that Mr. George Moore had been better advised to except it from re-publication of his works for the benefit of posterity.

The story is, as the preface tells us, that of an old gentleman who lived in a suburb, and whose daughters were a great source of trouble to him. It is also the story of his son Willie and Frank Escott, whose affections vacillate between the aforesaid troublesome daughters and a Gaiety barmaid. In the end, the Gaiety barmaid wins, and, having said farewell to the other characters, we take leave of Frank at the point when he is about to set out to re-join this lady. In this last chapter, we recognise the work of the great Irishman who has not been afraid to make mistakes, but the rest of the book is not up to the level of his better-known work. There is, of course, the limpid descriptiveness which makes it always a delight to read George Moore, the quality which stamps all his work. In this book, however, he has permitted this quality to extend to the utterances of his characters, and thus, though individuality is retained to a certain extent, each character reflects too much of the author; the result of this is that we never lose sight of him sufficiently to get vitally interested in his puppets. The mannerisms of old Brookes are delightful, but he is too clearly descriptive at times to convince us altogether that it is old Brookes himself who is speaking; Willie's egotism and preciseness are marred in the same way—and, in fact, every character bears too distinct a resemblance to Mr. George Moore, in spite of his or her own personal idiosyncrasies, to allow us to rank this book with "Esther Waters" or even "Celibates." Although a good study in shallow egotism, it is not worthy of its author.

The Triuneverse: A Scientific Romance. By the Author of "Space and Spirit." (Charles Knight and Co. 5s. net.)

The anonymous author of this very interesting work has limited his chances of obtaining a large circle of readers by mixing up fiction with a fascinating account of certain scientific possibilities. It takes a novelist—like Wells, for instance—to write scientific fiction, and, whatever the writer of this book may be, he is not a novelist, but rather a thinker along scientific lines, though it must be conceded he is possessed of great imaginative power. The book outlines a theory by which life, as humanity knows it, is more or less proved to exist in as small a compass as that of the electron—even in a smaller subdivision of matter which the author terms the infraton—and in as large a division of matter as a planetary system. For each of these systems of life, time varies in value, so that the life of the electron may spend centuries in a minute of time on the ordinary human scale, while the centuries of human time do not amount to a second in the animate life of a planetary system.

This, of course, sounds rather complex and absurd on the face of it, but a perusal of the scientific side of this book will go far to convince the reader that the views expressed therein are both reasonable and possible. The author has seen fit, however, to weave in among his fascinating scientific conjectures a poor little romance based on human love and emotions, and the little romance does not fit in with the rest of his scheme—does not even command sympathy. The main purpose of the book is not that of fiction, and it was therefore a mistake to introduce a purely fictional interest where sufficient interest already existed. In spite of this, it should win a large measure of attention from all those to whom the origin and purpose of life appeal as subjects for study.

Mary Pechell. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Mrs. Belloc Lowndes has given us a very pleasant little story in "Mary Pechell," but it has not the force of some of her other works, and, although a woman's name gives the title to the book, it is Mary's two lovers to whom the greatest and most detailed descriptions are given. Neither of them appeals to us in a very particular sense, but doubtless out of the two she chose the better man. The glimpses we have of Miss Alice and Miss Rose, the two maiden aunts, are by far the best passages in the story. The contrast between them, together with their little weaknesses and peculiarities, make most entertaining reading. Mary we do not seem to know very well. She is a nice girl, who spends her time in paying long visits to her aunts and as secretary to a home workers' society in London, but she does not stand out as Jane Oglander stood out in the book of that name, or as Sylvia Bailey stood out in "The Chink in the Armour." Perhaps it is only fair that for once the men should have the greater share of attention, and we would not for a moment suggest that Mrs. Belloc Lowndes does not describe them well, but, for all that, we certainly prefer her books in which she gives the first place to her own sex.

Windyridge. By W. RILEY. (Herbert Jenkins. 6s.)

GRACE HOLDEN, professional photographer, went from London to Windyridge, in Yorkshire, to escape the devil and all his works, and breathe clean air among simple folk. This book tells how she found that the devil had work to do even in Windyridge, and that the scent of the heather is not enough to prevent country people from doing just as townsfolk do.

One shade less of naturalness, of sincerity, and the book had been a failure; as it is, it must be reckoned an artistic success. The writer who relies for effect on sentiment must write carefully, for nothing is worse than sentiment overdone—and it is only to those who are still young enough to feel the force of sentiment and emotion that "Windyridge" will appeal. Grace Holden is thirty-six, but she is a veritable schoolgirl in her feelings and affections, and we love her none the less for that.

They are good people among whom she falls, for the most part, not only religious on Sundays, but in their everyday lives. Yet they are not namby-pamby folk, but rather strong personalities, and this applies even to the "Cynic," to whom Grace surrenders herself in the end—as we knew she would very early in the story. The chief merits of the book lie in its sub-plots, gracefully told little comedies and tragedies, and in its atmosphere, which is fresh and sweet and heartening as the heather-land in which its scenes are laid. "Windyridge" is an arresting, fascinating book, one to read and read again.

Shorter Notices

THE secondary interest in "WHITE ASHES" (Macmillan and Co., 6s.) is insurance, as that branch of commerce is practised in America, where, we are informed, it means fire insurance, unless otherwise specified. The principal character of the story is a certain Smith, who, after some tribulation, makes things "hum" at the Guardian office, and in the end, of course, gets his heart's desire, having previously obtained that of his head. Although written by two Americans, Mr. S. R. Kennedy and Mr. A. C. Noble, the story is free of obtrusively Yankee expressions—wherein lies a lesson for English writers on American subjects. We recognise the twang of the New Yorker and the more cultured accents of the Bostonian, and we appreciate the fact that these things are not overdone. They are American as it is spoken, and no more. Considering the book as a whole, it makes excellent reading; its main characters are well defined and interesting people, and the authors have a keen sense of the humorous side of life, although we might have welcomed a little more humanity and a little less insurance.

The human boy—"FROM THE ANGLE OF SEVENTEEN" (John Murray, 3s. 6d. net)—is hardly as interesting as he was in his early years. Having passed through that stage of budding adolescence, we are able nearly to foretell what his thoughts and emotions will be in certain situations. When he surpasses our expectations, we recognise, not the human boy in the insurance office, but Mr. Eden Phillpotts. There are paragraphs of this book that do not ring true; they are too big and thoughtful; they do not give life as one views it from the angle of seventeen, but bespeak experience such as only comes with maturity. For the rest, the boy is very human and commonplace, as we judge his creator intended him to be. Even the grandiloquent style affected by him in describing certain landmarks of London, and people with whom he is brought in contact, causes a modified form of amusement, delightful though it is, for we can all remember the time when we did likewise. Ideals were more than realities then, and there were hosts of illusions which no longer exist for us. By stirring up thoughts like these, Mr. Phillpotts has inclined decidedly more to pathos than to humour. This, however, is a matter of reading between the lines. By reading on them, and missing that which is not written, we see a rather humorous book, not quite worthy of Mr. Phillpotts at his best, and one which leads to a suspicion that, in attempting to re-introduce the human boy at the very last stage of boyhood, his author has imitated himself rather than worked along new lines.

"AN AMERICAN GIRL AT THE DURBAR" (John Lane, 6s.) views the Durbar with an eye almost as free from prejudice as that of an English spectator, and has a whole-hearted admiration for British soldiers, whom she designates "Tommies," evidently in complete ignorance of the fact that that title for a soldier is extremely out-of-date. She has a very keen sense of humour; it is also developed in one Berengaria, a friend of hers, as well as in a certain Miss Lamb, a violent and militant suffragist theoretically, but in practice a common-sense and enterprising lady. Although the greater part of the book consists of descriptions of real things and people, Miss Shelland Bradley tells it in the form of a story, and thus, while hardly deserving a place among travel-books, it puts forward an equally doubtful claim to be regarded as fiction.

Perusal of a list of "works by the same author" on one of the preliminary pages of this volume assists us in ascertaining that "THE QUEST OF THE GOLDEN ROSE" (Methuen and Co., 6s.) is the twenty-eighth novel Mr. Oxenham has penned and had published. If we say that it is quite up to his usual standard, his numerous readers may find it better, and quarrel with us; on the other hand, we would not knowingly incur the odium attaching to those guilty of overpraise. Suffice it to say that it is among his minor characters that the author does his best, and in this, his twenty-eighth novel, Mr. Oxenham has produced an exceedingly interesting story.

Miss Rachel C. Schauffler in "THE GOODLY FELLOWSHIP" (Macmillan and Co., 6s.) has given us missionary life with Persia as a background, but it must be confessed that the background is rather hazy: we are not brought into intimate contact with Persia and things Persian, but rather with a settlement of American missionaries who might be almost anywhere, except in America, since they betray traces of home-sickness at times. The heroine is an American society girl, who gets stranded in the missionary station for a period of months; the hero is of the silent, strong type that Merriman delighted in, and the story of these two is of more than passing interest. The chief appeal of the book, however, lies in things spiritual, rather than in things material. Here and there one comes across a little passage telling of the way in which these isolated missionaries "live Christ," as the author puts it, and, although that "living" is only told by means of a few lines at infrequent intervals, one feels the reality of their life and work. It is possible that the restraint of the writing makes them forceful; in any case, the force is there, and the book is a good lesson in practical Christianity. It is a live, strong story of very human people whom we accept as realities, and in whom we are vitally interested from the first page to the last. For the sake of such people we find it possible easily to forgive the absence of local colour, which is the book's one weak point.

"Through the Ivory Gate" (Frank Palmer, 6s.) deals with the career of an educated gentleman, who, because he is refused by two ladies in succession, Atalanta and Althea, sinks to the depths of degradation by indulgence in drink and association with undesirable characters, and finally ends his career by taking a dose of laudanum. Had the man been compelled to work for his living, the end would not have been what it was. It may be necessary to write the life-story of some degenerates, but no such necessity arises in this particular case, and why Mr. Reginald Farrer should leave his rock garden and its simple pleasures to wander into the highways to collect materials for this story, especially the degrading parts of it, we are at a loss to understand.

A Literary Inquest

THE imagination of the novelist is a brilliant and flexible instrument, but it has some curious limitations. One of these is indicated by the inability of the novelist to conduct his business with the measure of skill displayed by the ordinary tradesman. I do not refer to the shyness and delicacy which tell against him in arranging agreements with publishers. The trouble lies in his lack of imaginative power to follow the course of his work after the publisher takes it in hand. At the very first step the book changes from an artistic production to a mere factor in a commercial transaction which involves a printer, a bookbinder, a distributor, libraries, booksellers, and that vague conglomerate of appetites and pockets known as the public. Throughout its passage from one link to another of this chain the book remains to its author a work of art, in some actual as well as spiritual sense superior to the laws of commerce. It has no kinship with soap, or clothes, or even with newspapers. Disillusionment comes with the first account for royalties—disillusionment, and seldom anything much more substantial. But this contact with reality is forgotten as soon as a new book is born; hope obliterates it, and gives those royalties "at 25 per cent. after the first three thousand" an air of already taking shape in minted gold. The last thing which a novelist thinks of doing is dissecting and criticising the conditions of his trade as he would the far more complex characters and situations which he himself creates.

On two recent occasions, however, this "last thing" has been attempted. In the National Review of September a "Minor Novelist" presented a balance-sheet which should fill the eyes of the Muses with tears; and in the current issue of the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Herbert Flowerdew writes an article which should make these tears overflow. His subject is "The Lost Industry of Novel-writing." It forms an appendix, like an auditor's report, to the balance-sheet of the Minor Novelist. That writer showed how, by dint of hard labour and skilful exploitation, he had achieved the income of a draper's assistant, with the result that he has now decided to become a taxi-cab driver. He seems relieved that he did not starve, and his figures show that he depended to a large extent on the sale of serial rights. One of the merits of Mr. Flowerdew's article is that it draws a thick line between the novel and the serial story in novel form. Rarely do we find a story equally at home on both sides of the line. There is much the same difference between the novel and the serial as between a picture and a Christmas supplement. Every genuine novelist knows that the temptation of the serial is the greatest to which his love of art is exposed. Mr. Flowerdew himself began his literary career with a novel—"A Celibate's Wife"—which showed that he was a literary craftsman with something of a real gift; but this experiment in the Lost Industry apparently taught him to accept cheerfully the damnation of the serial. He does not, however, mention his personal experiences. He treats the subject on broad lines, declaring boldly that under present market conditions the business of novel-writing proper is a corpse.

There are facts which seem to disprove this contention at once. The constant stream of six-shilling fiction appears to sweep away Mr. Flowerdew and his alleged corpse at the same time. But Mr. Flowerdew points out that the majority of these "novels" are really serials which are enjoying a second life in a form to which they have no artistic title. Again, there is a certain group of popular novelists whose work survives the conditions which are fatal to the average work of merit. Further, there is an ever-recruited group of writers who produce novels in the charming hope that by-and-bye the great reward will come. His analysis of the situation shows that the business of novel-writing and novel-publishing is not only a sheer speculation, but a bad one. It would be difficult, I believe, for publishers to deny that the usual circulation of a novel, however sound as a literary production and however well received by the critics, is about five hundred copies. Under more favourable conditions of authorship and subject the output rises to about one thousand. In a country with millions of readers, all athirst for fiction, this result is positively ludicrous. It means, in effect, that the novelist who aims at something higher than the serial cannot, save in rare instances, approach the mass of the reading public. He will not reach as many readers as the author of a book on forestry, or steel manufacture, or any other subject in which only a minority of the public is interested.

Mr. Flowerdew attributes this extraordinary situation to the mistake of fixing the price of a novel at a level which is supposed to be fair and convenient to the library and the general purchaser. His argument is that such a price must be too cheap for the library and too dear for the bookseller. And the facts of the trade seem to support his argument. At no time did people buy six-shilling novels freely; and they are less inclined than ever to this extravagance now that reprints of older books are available at one shilling or sevenpence. As for the library, it can get along quite comfortably with a single copy of each book unless there is a large simultaneous demand. Mr. Flowerdew emphasises this fact as the essential curse of the cheap library book. It means that unless a book can, by some quality apart from serious literary merit, attract this large simultaneous demand, the libraries will not purchase it in adequate numbers. We see the effect of this system in the accepted principle that the life of an average novel is about three months. This surely is the crowning absurdity of the situation. Within that period the book does not touch more than a minute fraction of the reading public; the great mass of those who might have enjoyed it have never heard of it. Yet there is no possibility of keeping it moving so that in time it may permeate the market which is supposed to be open to it. In three months it is dead; and the business of "remaindering" is only a kind of pauper's funeral.

Neither of the writers quoted offers any specific cure for the depression which has settled upon the industry of novel-writing. It is not difficult to deduce a possible cure from Mr. Flowerdew's diagnosis, but even he throws the burden of discovery upon the Society of Authors. It was at the instigation of that body, he points out, that the common denominator between the library and the purchaser was attempted; and he properly asks the same body to find a way of reversing its mistakes. I shall not be at all surprised if the Society remains serenely passive. A body which is able to regard the establishment of a library censorship without even a tremor of protest is quite capable of declaring that the business of and the art of novel writing were never more sweetly wedded. The Society is governed by authors who have "arrived" and who have frequently followed other roads than the straight path which is lit by a single star. It is an admirable sheep-dog for the protection of innocents who fear the wolves in publishers' clothing; but it is no better than the individual author in the breadth and courage of its imagination as regards practical affairs. If it were, it could not tolerate for a single day the chaotic conditions of the book market, in which sound creative work is lost on the morrow of its appearance. If it were, it must appreciate the fact that neither the publisher, nor the librarian, nor the bookseller, nor the author, nor the reader, is at all satisfied with the present state of things. The essential point to be dealt with is the separation of the library demand from the public demand, both in price and in time. This is partly done in the case of memoirs and books of travel, which provide much better results to everybody concerned than the works of fiction which appeal, potentially at least, to a much wider public. In a previous article which appeared in THE ACADEMY I explained the necessity for an increase in the rates charged by the libraries to the public; there are also arguments for holding that the prices charged to the libraries for fiction are too low.

There is no shadow of commonsense in a system which provides an ephemeral volume of memoirs with a larger circulation and a larger margin of profit than a solid piece of creative work. In any case the Society of Authors ought to realise that the serious and capable novelist meets with more profound discouragement at the present day than in any recent generation. The difficulty is not so much a matter of money as of reaching the audience which ought to prove responsive. A circulation of five hundred copies gives an author the same cold, depressed feeling as an actor suffers when he has to play to empty stalls. It strangles inspiration and kills the joy of labour. It forces him gradually to lower his ideals and to strike the false note which alone will resonate among the artificial conditions of the market. Perhaps the only result which is not wholly objectionable is that it forces him, even when he has contrived to become popular, to find a fuller measure of reciprocity in writing for the stage. A. G. W.

The Theatre

"The Open Door" at the Lyceum

THE management of Mr. Walter and Mr. F. Melville, appears to be a very fortunate affair. They know what their public wants. Few people would have supposed that "The Open Door," a curious new and original drama of Russian Jewish life — as it is on the stage — would have been helped by the introduction of a personage who performs miracles; is divine, apparently; the friend of man; a sort of super-servant in the house. But this character, called rather quaintly, "Homo," is the life and soul of this new play. He is always in the strong, hard stage light, ready to help the good Jewish hero and heroine, ready to bear the pain of others and release them from sin and sorrow. Mr. Shirley and Mr. Landeck have been extremely bold in presenting this character, and the management must have had perfect faith in Mr. Halliwell Hobbs, who plays the part. This boldness and confidence was fully justified on the first night, for the story of "The Open Door" was followed with keen interest and enthusiastically applauded.

The ground-work of the play is pretty well-worn. There is a wicked Governor of a province who desires as his companion the young wife of a young Jew. The Governor is very, very naughty; prisons, whipping, and killing, and all that sort of thing are freely used. The old agonies that come to all the good people in the early stages of melodrama are clearly set forth. But in this play "Homo" is the one who puts things right—and very quickly. This is a new and noble idea of the authors. Writers used to have trouble in relieving the good people of their plays from painful positions; not so with the new style. Disgrace, dishonour, death—all can be put right if you have such a character as "Homo" always at hand. But, of course, the audience must believe in him, and somehow Mr. Halliwell Hobbs enables them to have faith. It is a remarkable theatrical victory, such as no other management would dare attempt. Indeed, Mr. Shirley and Mr. Landeck have created a new heaven and a new earth of melodrama. They have made agreeable to their peculiar audience the obscure and the vague; they have added utter mystery to the commonplace and released themselves from all the usual difficulties of the stage by the use of their remarkable "Homo." And they have done it very well and without offence. Whenever the wicked people are too victorious "Homo" appears, and all is well.

The last scene would have delighted some of the reformers of stage lighting. It is played in the dark. One gathers that Mr. and Mrs. Raphael, acted in true convention by Mr. C. W. Standing and Miss Bracewell, are released from a nasty-looking situation by "Homo" and pass "unto the sea and the Land Beyond." Possibly this is symbolic of death, but one never knows. At any rate, there are some long and excellent sentiments by Mr. Halliwell Hobbs—and exit "Homo," and "curtain."

The wicked governor of Mr. Albert Ward is cleverly played. Of course, it does not approach reality, but the convention is splendidly maintained. "Baron Petroff" holds the audience spellbound by his wickedness and his peculiar eye. Long ago I was at a rehearsal, in which the late Prince Soltikoff was interested. The play had a Russian baron in it. M. de Soltikoff bore this as long as possible, and then he spoke from his stall: "There are no barons in Russia. Anything else you like. Hundreds of thousands of princes, but no barons." But in Russian drama, such as "The Open Door," barons, knouts, and all sorts of things that do not really happen in the land of the Little Father appear again and again. However, it really does not matter. "Homo" arranges everything, and everything that "Homo" does is right.

Indian Reviews

THE Wednesday Review (Trichinopoly) from August 14 to September 4 welcomes co-operation with the Muhammadans for the good of the country. The wish is sound enough, but the performance will be difficult, unless fundamental differences can be annihilated. The Editor opposes the establishment of provincial autonomy in India if the right of intervention by Parliament is to be withdrawn. Self-government for India he regards as beyond the range of practical politics. The composition of the Public Service Commission is much discussed: the inadequacy of Indian representation is the general cry. The Editor again takes the unpopular view when he supports the Government's decision not to allow the proposed Universities at Aligarh and Benares to affiliate colleges outside of those cities. He denies that there is any large or influential section of the people who yearn that their children should be grown up (sic) into the peace of assured religious belief. The Calcutta High Court having received two severe blows in the Mymensingh and Midnapur cases, on which the Times demanded a searching inquiry into the administration of justice, this Review rounds on the Times, and states that the Midnapur case is to come before the Privy Council. If this is true, criticism should be suspended. Some observations on the increase of the Excise revenue and the question of dealing with the opium and liquor traffic betoken an absolute ignorance of the whole problem. A Madras civilian has written a Census report which "has all the charm of romance, and is aglow with life and movement"; its perusal "is an invigorating intellectual tramp, with an irrepressible humorist by your side." High praise, indeed!

The two issues of the Collegian (Calcutta) for August contain information, as usual, about current educational matters. The Calcutta University has made ample provision for post-graduate study, thus realising its functions as a teaching University. It would be interesting to hear more of the South India Branch of the Simplified Spelling (of English) Society at the Madras Presidency College. It sounds, prima facie, rather a waste of time. The Serampore Weaving Institute has lasted three years, and is making progress. This attempt to revive a decaying art deserves encouragement. An enthusiast has established "the All-India Academy of Music," with the object of reviving the music of the Aryan masters and increasing the felicity (sic) of learning the same. The learned and literary papers in this journal are too long and profound to receive more than a passing allusion here.

The Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay for 1911 and 1912 contains, as usual, various excellent papers. As an Indian Judge said, speaking on the study of Anthropology, "our philologists, our anthropologists, our antiquarians are doing us practical service. . . . We must understand the past aright to guide us now and build for the hereafter." Folk-lore, part of this subject, is "the science which treats of the survival of archaic beliefs and customs in modern ages." The papers published treat of certain castes, animal stories, relics of the primitive spirit-scaring idea in the Avesta and in prevalent Parsi religious practices, village gods and ghosts, the dog in myth and custom, the tiger in Malay folk-lore, stories of witchcraft and magic in Mogul India. The Malays have a proverb, "Two wives under one roof, two tigers in one cage," a sufficient reason for monogamy anywhere. The papers of this Society should be more widely known.

The Rajput Herald (London) for August has a paper by an Indian on "India's place in the British Empire," but the name of India is only once mentioned in it. The "Blunder of the East" is apparently the Persian revolution, a tragic blunder, because it has not gained universal moral acquiescence. The "net result of the Chinese Revolution" is said to be the break-up of diplomatic relationship between the East and West. Whose fault is that? The shameless reassertion of untruths is one of the difficulties in dealing with Indian writers. It is easy to perceive the point of view from which the Editor, Mr. Thakur Seesodia, writes his editorial notes, and reviews other reviews. He takes full advantage of having the last word.

The Hindustan Review for August gives from the very beginning the history of the appointment of natives of India to official posts in that country. The words, "Fitness is henceforth to be the criterion of eligibility," are italicised. The whole question is, What is fitness? Capacity to pass examinations is not fitness. The qualities required for administrators and rulers can be commonly found in Europeans, but not in Indians. The papers on the Mughal Empire, Akbas, and Dara Shikoh are historical, but they show no special originality; it is easy to make extracts or paraphrases from well-recognised authorities. Dr. Coomaraswamy's review of Dinesh Chandra Sen's "History of Bengali Language and Literature" does it no more than justice; the book is before us; it consists mainly of lectures addressed to the Calcutta University; it brings together systematically much matter that could not easily be found in a presentable form. The reviews of English writings such as Dickens' works, by an Indian, do not interest; the subjects are too hackneyed.

The Moslem World (quarterly) for October publishes a reprint of a "Call to a Day of Prayer for the Moslem World," issued by the World's Evangelical Alliance, to be observed on October 16, the centenary of the death of the great missionary and Persian scholar, Henry Martyn. This issue shows no falling-off in the number and interest of the contents. A French professor, writing on "A Moslem Policy," appears to recommend not so much the penetration of Islam by Christianity as the penetration of Moslem civilisation by Christian civilisation. His idea is that from oscillation to oscillation the latter will overcome in the end. The word "Jihád," which is generally believed to mean "religious war," comprehensively, is shown to have more than one meaning, which it takes ten pages to explain. The "New Woman in Persia" is a significant indication of progress: the higher aspirations of the sex can hardly end with change of dress and a smattering of education. The position of women in Islam is a very large question, which the Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali considers from its legal side. His reviewer states that the author has omitted equally cogent facts which militate against his conclusions. A writer admits that "the rapid expansion of Islam among the backward races of East, Central, and West Africa is unfortunately a fact which can no longer be denied." In this review the notes on current topics and reviews of books can always be commended. "The Islam series" published by the Christian Literature Society for India is a marvel of cheapness and excellence.

The Grey of the Morning

By the Late H. D. LOWRY.

ALL the day through I was wandering by the sea; all day the cold, clean air was about me, like the known presence of a friend. Night brought pleasant sleep, and never a dream came near until just before the dawn. Then I turned upon my bed, vaguely discerned the glimmering square of the window, and heard the whisper of the sea. And, lying thus, I dreamed.

It was the grey twilight of the morning: the beautiful grey twilight through which the sun's gold is presently to well up, as love in the grey eyes of a girl. I was walking in a great wood of beeches, a gloom of branches above, and about me a tremendous silence which dwelt among the livid trunks. In places where the wood broke a little and there was a way for the light, the daffodils showed yellow-green buds unfolding. But these could not stay me; I went forward in haste, although I did not know what I sought. It was as if some spirit had laid upon me, while I slept, an order which I now instinctively obeyed without remembering. And suddenly—in my dream—I had discovered the thing it was appointed I should find. For the trees stood in a circle intermingling their loftiest branches, and underneath among the dead leaves was a white flower, beautiful beyond words. I am careless of the names men give to things; yet I named this the wind flower, daughter of the good winds that come at evening out of the West. It was a flower such as no man would dream of gathering, nor could it grow in any ordered garden. For its grace was beyond the beauty of daffodils growing solitary by hill-fed streams, and it glimmered white and original in the gloom of the wood. I could fancy such a thing might grow out of the grave of some wild girl-creature, born before the race was burdened with souls, and dead in the first promise of her beauty. And whether the dream ceased or no I cannot tell. For I lay with shut lids while that marvellous white flower still glimmered through the grey of the morning, and the great sea hushed the world to sleep a little longer, since one man had found happiness.

But the dream changed. Under sheer cliffs is a beach, of which I think often whenever I have been overmuch in the company of my fellows. Here you might dwell a lifetime and see no man, unless it were a dreamer like yourself, or some solitary seeker after wreckage. It was still morning, and the sands were wet; as I went forward dryness and wetness played about my feet as the blood comes and goes in a child's face. And suddenly, rounding a high crag, I beheld a maiden standing by the mouth of a great cavern, whose floor is a deep pool. Her feet were bare, and her white arms; but a robe of silken stuff, coloured like the young leaves of the apple, fell from her shoulders, and about her waist was a girdle of sea-shells, pale-tinted like June orchids. The cold light played upon the thin robe as the wind blew along the sands, and the shining limbs showed underneath.

She looked on me without a word, and her eyes were grey as the winter sea; black rocks, deep-sunken in the sea, are not more black than her beautiful hair. She took my hand and led me forth until we stood upon the margin of the pool, the sea thundering behind us, and the wind chill as it came over the wet sands; then she stepped forward, and I went with her. And we plunged deep into the pool, walking forward into the black caverns which lie at the roots of the high cliffs. The water was like glass about us, parting and closing as we went; I could have fancied I was dead and freed of this body, for I breathed there as in the air, and walked comfortably, save for the loveliness which sprang from my companionship. Sea-creatures moved by us unreal as pictures on a screen, and the water had dark places in it, with brown weeds stealthily shifting. But we passed onward, the coldness of her hand—cold as Purity's self—seeming to take me also, and the darkness growing. Her black hair swam about me, darkening my sight; I began to falter and to be in doubt. . . . And suddenly this also ended. Again I was vaguely conscious of the light over against my bed, and a white flower was before my eyes.

It was but a little after that a peacock screamed on the lawn below, and called me back from dreaming. I rose and thrust aside the blind, to behold him standing with outspread tail, a garish incarnation of the day which is void of secrets. But my dream has not yet gone from me, and I would fain discover the meaning which is in it. This much I know: that only when I myself am a creature of the world of dreams shall I find the lady of the cave, and with her seek the white flower of the beech-wood.

Mr. Rathmell Wilson will commence the autumn season of the Little Salon, at 24, Bloomsbury Square, of which Miss M. L. Breakell is president, with a reading of Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler," on Wednesday evening, 23rd inst. Among those shortly to address the Salon are Dr. Stenson Hooker, Rev. A. H. Haigh, Mrs. Hubert Bland (E. Nesbit), and Mlle. A. V. Thirion, LL.A.

By W. H. Koebel.

IN order to approach anywhere near the status of the complete traveller it is necessary to "take notice" of the minor details as well as the more obvious circumstances. One need not proceed far from home in order to meet with a multitude of both. The traffic of London itself, for instance, yields up daily a vast amount of matter for reflection and wonderment. Take the motor omnibuses alone. Surely these Goliaths which have revolutionised the streets afford a sufficiently weighty problem for those who are fated to dwell among—and occasionally underneath—them. Their convenience is undoubtedly great. I should be the last to stand in the way of rapid traffic—literally as metaphorically. But it seems to me that a time has arrived when a check should be placed upon the exuberance of a certain number of the drivers. Of these latter there is one particular type which constitutes an unceasing danger to the life of pedestrians and passengers in other vehicles. Relying on the weight of his Juggernaut, he takes it for granted that the minor roadcraft will flee from him like sprats before a whale—the metaphor here is not much more involved than the traffic through which he is accustomed to force his way! It is when the other driver maintains his rights that an accident most frequently occurs. And an accident in which the heavy body of a motor omnibus is mixed up seldom results in a trivial affair. The recent statistics speak very tragically and eloquently on the point.

Now I do not approach this subject with any undue feeling, nor am I obsessed by any particular sensation of nervousness on the point. An experience of motor traffic in other lands has left me hardened and comparatively prepared for the worst. One who has driven in a motor-car with the average Latin chauffeur at the wheel, whether in Europe or South America will fully sympathise with me in this. He will understand the frame of mind which coincides with the termination of one of these particular orgies, more especially in Lisbon, Rio de Janeiro, or Buenos Aires. At such a time one is convinced that the sole reason for a continued existence must be attributed to the unseen presence of some strange new cherub which was born on the same day as petrol; a cherub which sits on the shoulder of a very skilful but completely reckless chauffeur, and carefully hoards the inch or two which intervenes between the hubs of the wheels of the various vehicles. Among his other weaknesses of the kind, a race constitutes the breath of his nostrils to one of these Latin chauffeurs. Should he chance to catch a glimpse of another car many hundreds of yards to his rear he will slow down and dawdle along until his rival has all but drawn alongside. This is the chosen moment. It is just then that he metamorphoses himself from a tortoise to a greyhound, and for the next few minutes the two will be rocking along in uncomfortable proximity, while all the other vehicles in the neighbourhood are left to make the best of their chances. It is an experience of this sort that tends to age the casual passenger.

. . . . . .

Matters, of course, have not yet attained to this pitch in the London streets. Nevertheless, when even some minor feats of racing are indulged in by the cumbrous motor omnibuses the possibilities are sufficiently unpleasant. And that this racing occurs there is no doubt whatever. In the competitive days of the horse-drawn vehicles such strenuous tests of speed were to be understood. Although they were in a way to be deprecated they seldom ended in a result more serious than a bump or two and a few damaged wheels. This is decidedly not the case with the heavy motor traffic. Now that this particular traffic is almost in the hands of a monopoly the reason of this racing and of the fierce struggle to obtain the pas is probably only fully understood by the driver and the companies, and the most logical point of view is that the latter are the principal culprits. Moreover—like Topsy before she had done—the thing is growing. If you would see it at its height—or lowest depth, whichever you prefer—it is merely necessary to stand at the corner where Lower Regent Street branches off from Pall Mall. When the traffic begins to grow thin of an evening the pace at which the westward-bound motor omnibuses take the corner is a revelation of the kind which is popularly supposed to be reserved for Tattenham Corner. Agility alone has saved many more dark splashes here than have actually stained the road. Undoubtedly someone will have to move—since just at present these bullying motor-omnibuses seem the only ones who are indulging too recklessly in any hobby of the kind.

As we have begun on local matters, we may as well conclude in consistent fashion. If precautions are unduly lacking in the omnibus world, the District Railway would seem to have been struck by an idea tending towards the other direction. The innovation here is trivial enough, yet it is certainly practical. The driver of the train is now provided with one of those little round mirrors which have become the popular adjuncts of a motor-car. Thus he has now a view of the entire train, and has something beyond the whistles of the conductors to guide his movements. Doubtless this arrangement has caused many a belated passenger to find a seat which he would otherwise have lost. From the driver's point of view the idea must be a distinct advantage. It is something to have the comedies of each station unrolled before the eyes of one who has it in his powers to take or leave the hindmost. Perhaps as he watches the jostling crowd of harried humanity some of the benefits due to the impunity of his career may become clear to him. One may argue with many folk. Guards, cab-drivers, conductors, and chauffeurs all come from time to time within the range of a lashing tongue. But never a driver of a train! He is a being apart.

The Magazines

ONE is compelled to admire the audacious courage of Mr. Austin Harrison, the editor of the English Review, even when least agreeing with the occasion of it. To print fifty pages of a poem by John Masefield in a monthly magazine is a feat that may or may not look amazing now, but it would have aroused more than a little wonderment among editors had it been suggested not so long ago. The present "poem" is called "Dauber," and treats of a man with artistic ambition who shipped to sea in the fo'c'sle in order to learn the way of a ship, and how the seas look in different weathers. In the end Dauber dies, however, and his intention remains unfulfilled. It is sometimes a little tedious, yet it forms a good tale that is even assisted by the occasionally desperate struggle for rhymes. But that it is poetry in the remotest sense, we deny. And even its originality is impugned; for, since Mr. Masefield has been publishing these "poems" of his, we have seen several poems of a similar order that had lain unheeded in their several writers' desks for years. "Dauber" takes up a good part of the English Review. Among other fare, Mr. G. S. Street tells of his experiences among card-sharpers in "Fallen among Thieves"; the editor writes of "The Vanity of Death," contrasting various conceptions of death in view of the suicide of General Nogi; and Mr. F. E. Green writes upon "The Tyranny of the Countryside."

In the Fortnightly, too, Life and Death figure in an anonymous article entitled "Life and Death: A Discursive Dialogue." Maurice Maeterlinck deals with M. J. H. Fabre's "Souvenirs Entomologiques" under the title of "The Insect's Homer." He makes his essay virtually a resumé of the book, and thus conveys a considerable amount of entomological information in a small space. We venture to suggest that the title is grandiloquent for so derivative an article. Mr. E. V. Lucas writes upon "Thackeray's 'Punch' Table Talk." He relies on the diary kept by one Henry Silver, a young lawyer who was appointed to "the place left vacant by the death of Douglas Jerrold in 1857," and who "kept a record of each dinner that he attended and the best things said there for twelve years, until, in 1870, he retired." In the way of reminiscence the article makes good reading; but it leaves one with a disastrous idea of Punch wit and wisdom. Possibly the wine helped things along. Mr. Basil de Sélincourt writes upon "Auguste Angellier." Angellier is a somewhat neglected figure, and Mr. de Sélincourt writes with a keen and critical pen. Mr. Montague Crackanthorpe discusses in detail "The Friends and Foes of Eugenics."

One of the most interesting articles in the Nineteenth Century is by Mr. Charles Edward Stuart, entitled "A Visit to London in the Year 1651." As it is chiefly derived from an authentic document of a gentleman who journeyed to London in that year, and who recorded his expenditures in detail, the document being reproduced with the article, despite some slight embellishments by

Mr. Stuart, it has an authority that raises it high above the fanciful accounts sometimes seen. The Hon. Mrs. Edward Lyttelton has an article of not less, though widely different, interest, entitled "Humours of Irish Servants." It is, in fact, not only with Irish servants she deals, but with the humours of all manner of Irish folk. She closes with a tribute that a good many will endorse. "No Englishman," she says, "ever gives credit to Irish folk for the depth of the reserve which, in all classes, lies below the apparent outspokenness. Such reserve one has learned—whether rightly or wrongly—to consider as a special tribute of the educated in both countries, but in Ireland it may be said to exist among all classes." Captain Rolleston deals with one of the greatest problems in India in an article entitled "Behind the Purda." Mr. Herbert Flowerdew is, we think, unduly pessimistic upon "The Lost Industry of Novel-Writing." Much that he says is indisputably true, and publishers will have very soon to take into consideration the question of cheap editions of novels. It is slowly and surely killing the purchase of six shilling novels, and booksellers are already becoming keenly alive to their own interests in the matter. But there will always be the element of gamble among publishers. And in view of the recent Meredith letters, surely his reference to the difficulty a modern Meredith would have in winning his way through reads a little ironically. Nevertheless, we venture to say that publishers will soon have to meet at a round-table conference upon the question of the publishing of novels. Mr. A. F. Shuster deals capably and convincingly with "Capital Punishment: The Case for Abolition."

The Oxford and Cambridge Review this month prints an interesting examination of "The System and Devolution of Indian Government" by "Asiaticus." There is an argument for the cessation of strikes, in verse, by Cecil Roberts. In the same magazine Mr. Hilaire Belloc further examines the process of Reform, and writes this month upon "The Restoration of Property." Mr. Francis Meynell has a poem upon the verse, "Greater love hath no man than this." In the Cornhill Mr. Edmund Gosse has an interesting article dealing with "Swinburne at Etretat." Practically for the first time—at least, for the first time in detail—the full account of Swinburne's near escape from drowning is given; and doubtless there will be many who will take advantage of the fact to gain possession of the Cornhill. Dr. Paget writes all too briefly on "The Genius of Pasteur." "In the Vineyards of France," by Sir Henry Lucy, makes good reading. One of the good things in Blackwood's is "Old Ulster Memories," by Mr. J. M. Callwell, the author of "Old Irish Life." Mrs. Andrew Lang writes upon "The Wife of Benedict Arnold" in an article that recalls a familiar pen. Mr. Farman in "The French Electoral Reform" shows considerable intimacy with his subject.

A good essay in the Theosophist for this month deals carefully with the "Zoroastrian Rites and Ceremonies." Unfortunately it is not complete; yet such articles as these have a deep interest, both from the point of view of the student of religions and the earnestly interested in spiritual discipline. Another article of more than ordinary interest is by Annie Besant on "Investigations into the Super-Physical." Mrs. Besant is somewhat too apt to have her vision bound by the demands of the society of which she is one of the luminaries; nevertheless, she writes with interest and instruction.

The Jubilee International Stamp Exhibition

A VERY interesting exhibition is taking place this week at the Royal Horticultural Hall, where there are being shown upwards of 120 collections of stamps. To those who are able to go in largely for the study of philately this exhibition must prove most valuable. One of the finest collections of the stamps of Great Britain is that of Mr. Sydney Loder, which contains some very rare specimens. Mr. Loder is also the fortunate possessor of the original copper-plate from which the Post Office Mauritius stamps of 1847 were printed. As these stamps are among the most costly in the world, this plate is both a unique and precious possession. Its value is estimated at £5,000. It is astonishing to note the number of "freak" stamps of which collectors have managed to become possessed. There are stamps from which the watermarks have been omitted, others with the perforation through the centre of the stamp, and some printed on the same side as the gum. It is not only Great Britain who has made all these mistakes; Sweden and other countries also possess careless printers, who, however, greatly add to the value of a collection. A model stamp factory shows the whole process of stamp-making, from the paper-mill to the Post Office. The principal stamp dealers have their stalls round the exhibition, and it is mainly owing to their support that the exhibition is free of entry money. A very good programme is arranged for the week; there are an official banquet, a reception and ball, and a special visit to the Coliseum for the entertainment of the foreign visitors. Thanks are due to the patrons and officers of the exhibition, among whom should be specially noted Mr. Fred J. Melville, President of the Junior Philatelic Society.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

By a Regular Devotee.

ON Wednesday, 9th inst., the Scottish Temperance Bill was got out of the way—somehow—anyhow—with a crop of injustices lurking in it which will come to light, not now, but later on. The slatternly legislation of the Shops Act is only just beginning to show itself after some months of working. The same policy of haste and carelessness is apparent in the Insurance Act, and, to crown all, the Radical Party are bent on rushing through in the same way a Bill dealing with the Constitution of the Empire. For instance, in the proposed time-table only two and a half hours are allotted to Clauses 42 to 48. All the finance of the Bill is to be considered in six days; the delicate questions of the religious safeguards are to be thrashed out in a quarter of that time, and the enormous legislative powers of the Irish Parliament are to be settled in four and a half days. The Unionist Party were delighted when they learnt that Bonar Law, instead of merely opposing the resolutions, intended to put on record a reasoned amendment, declaring that the Government had no right to pass Home Rule without an appeal to the country.

There was naturally a very full house on Thursday afternoon, but as I surveyed the benches I could not help thinking of the futility of the operation. Here were men summoned from all parts of the kingdom and abroad to attend for the purpose of what? For the purpose of walking through a narrow doorway and registering their names in two different lobbies. Some of them had come at great expense, but that was a detail. The fact that strikes me is that the whole thing is a foregone conclusion. Half a dozen men would speak—all well worth hearing—and yet not a vote would be turned. A Whip on either side could prophesy at three o'clock, within one or two, what the majority would be. As Bonar Law said later on: "In my sincere judgment, it would not have been in essence a greater travesty of the whole system of Parliamentary government if the right hon. gentleman had proposed that every stage of the Bill should go through to-morrow and that it would have been supported with equal equanimity." You can see the manifest difficulties of debating an important subject under such difficult conditions, and yet the men who took part in it put their backs into it, as if they were really trying to convince each other of the correctness of their view, the real fact being that they were speaking through the Reporters' Gallery to the nation outside.

Asquith was not and did not look well. He was not quite at his ease, and, in spite of his well-turned sentences and neatness of mind, his argument sounded as if it had been got up from a carefully drawn brief. No point in favour of his opinion was raised. History had been ransacked to support his view, whilst every precedent against it was carefully omitted. He callously put forward the views I have outlined above. What is the good of all this talk? The object of the Opposition is to destroy and not to amend the Bill. Why should they be allowed to prolong debate? He considered the time allowance had been generous.

Bonar Law received a great ovation when he arose. "What we want is a leader who can hit hard and keep on punching," is the view in the Smoking-Room. Bonar Law does not look like a hard hitter; he is slight and almost diffident in manner, and looked a little nervous as he looked down and carefully examined his finger-nails as the cheers resounded round him; but from the moment he opened his mouth you could see that he meant business. There was no feinting or circling warily round his opponent. He hit out straight and continuously—a very shower of blows. He analysed the time-table; he showed how the Liberals had avoided the question of Home Rule at the last election. Indeed, with the burning enthusiasm which always inspired him—a scornful description of the cold Minister—he had not mentioned Home Rule in his election address since 1895. The fiery scorn at the beginning of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition was turned to earnestness at its close. Ulster at this moment is like a powder mine. Do you mean to force Home Rule on Ulster at the point of the bayonet? If bloodshed comes, the bloodguiltiness will not be on us, but on the Government.

Lloyd George made the best speech on his side. But he, also, was not at his best. Insincerity hung over it like a pall. He was flippant at first, then declared he was only chaffing, and finally advanced the theory that Bonar Law was under the heel of the Ulstermen! It was a strange parody of our contention, and was met with cries of "What about your masters—Redmond and Patrick Ford?" Carson called it fooling, and practically defied the Government to prosecute him for anything he had done or said.

Winston was quite ineffective. His Heptarchy speech has killed all influence he might have had in the debate. In fact, there are a number of people going about saying that Winston is much too clever and too shrewd to have made a mistake—that he made that speech with the deliberate idea of throwing ridicule on Home Rule, and thus making it impossible. He made one or two amusing hits. "Surely forty days is long enough in which to lecture people you are about to lynch." And, "Those who talk of revolution should be prepared for the guillotine."

Austen Chamberlain wound up the debate with one of the best efforts he has made. It was largely impromptu, for he answered his opponents in detail, and could not have been prepared for the points they took. "If the Bill is passed in the circumstances proposed, men would say: 'The law has no sanctity; it is not carried by constitutional means; it is a revolution carried by fraud; it cannot last.' You may do immeasurable damage, you may incur the guilt of blood, but your settlement will be no settlement, and your Bill will perish before it is a year old."

The House then divided, and the Government majority was under three figures—91 to be exact—at which the Unionists cheered; but it was a foregone conclusion—not a single man voted otherwise than he was expected to vote. There was only a small unexplained shortage in the Government majority.

Early in the year a lot of people made a lot of money by gambling in Marconi shares on a rumour that the Government intended to give them a splendid order. Some lost money—and rumour began to fly about that people in high position had been making money in consequence of the knowledge they possessed. It was all nonsense. Happily for the country our public men on all sides are free from that kind of thing. There have been many Members who were poor men, and who could have made huge sums by using knowledge they possessed, but there is no instance on record of their having succumbed to that form of temptation. The Government showed a pardonable eagerness to allow the Opposition to walk into this pitfall, but the majority of the House showed they did not believe it by carefully staying away. On the other hand Sir Harry Norman—once a pet of the Radical Whips—made a very good case out for inquiry. It really did appear to be a bad bargain for the country—over-generous to the Company and unfair to other investors. George Terrell, a popular Wiltshire member, who does not speak half enough, bluntly declared it "was enough to ruin the reputation of any Government. The P.M.G. should have been warned by the tremendous rise in the shares —3s. to £9—but as a matter of fact, like all the other Ministers, he was too busy devising vote-catching schemes instead of attending to his department." Lansbury, who plays the gawky innocent, contrived to pour oil on the troubled flames by repeating what "he did not believe, and then wanting to know"—which brought Lloyd George to his feet.

Lansbury hoped there would be no shirking on the part of the Committee who were to examine the matter. Lloyd George heatedly replied: "I hope there will be no shirking on the part of the accusers," whereupon Lansbury blandly observed that "the irritation on the Treasury bench this afternoon was not a nice sign at all."

Rufus Isaacs—who had somewhat indiscreetly telegraphed to his brother, the manager of the Marconi Company, wishing them success—made a speech like an affidavit of documents—it was so comprehensive in its denials—whilst Herbert Samuel gave a whole history of the transaction from start to finish. "He was profoundly relieved that the matter was going to be inquired into."

He cleared up in a straightforward way much that had not been clear, and the resolution to appoint a Committee was agreed to at a quarter to five. The rival Peckham's then proceeded to discuss the Protection of Dogs Bill, but after so strenuous a week Members were not in a mood to stand this and the House was counted out at 4.56 p.m.

On Thursday the debate on the closure was a general one on the considered amendment of the Opposition. On Monday we came down to details and discussed amendments to the time-table. Bonar Law put the case in a nutshell: "This Government having in the Parliament Act destroyed one House, now refuse to allow discussion in the other." After the 11 o'clock rule had been suspended—the virtuous closing at 11 o'clock of which so much parade was made having become a farce —the House proceeded to discuss the amendments. Felix Cassel earnestly pleaded that the Report Stage might at least be left out of the closure until it was seen how the Bill had got on in Committee. It was the last chance we should get before the Bill became crystallised, as under the stupid and inelastic Parliament Act it cannot be altered by a single comma when once it is through the House. Not a bit of it. Birrell was adamant. Hayes Fisher then fought hard for an unrestricted debate on the third reading. Hayes Fisher speaks far too seldom—his speech was quite an eye-opener to the younger Members, who do not remember the old days. Birrell gave way to the extent of two days, which Bonar Law scornfully denounced as ludicrously inadequate. He suggested that the Government might just as well put down a resolution: "That this Bill now becomes law."

Bob Cecil obtained a useful pledge that the Bill would not be taken on a Friday without the consent of the whole House—but the whole day and night were spent by the Opposition in a fruitless attempt to get reasonable discussion for the measure. The object of the Opposition, said Bonar Law frankly, is to destroy the Bill by criticism—but the Government were frightened of intelligent criticism and dare not permit it. A very dull ding-dong fight went on until past 4 a.m., when a sleepy House dispersed in the raw fog. Weight of numbers had defeated the Opposition, but the tactics of the Government are strengthening the reasonableness of the Opposition in Ulster.

On Tuesday there were two slight breezes at question time. One was about a lady who had been wrongfully arrested in Scotland, her conviction quashed, and yet not compensated. McKinnon Wood endured a shower of questions from all sides of the House, and finally the Speaker had to come to his rescue and stop what was developing into a heated debate on the conduct of the Government.

The other question was addressed to Lloyd George. Had the Prime Minister received a communication from the Belfast Chamber of Commerce, formally announcing that they were preparing for organised resistance? The Chancellor acknowledged the receipt of the communication, but declared, in answer to William Moore, that it contained matters of opinion and not of fact. "Do you believe it, or don't you?" demanded Moore several times. The Chancellor fenced. "I believed it to be a matter of opinion that the Belfast Chamber of Commerce think so," said the wily one, which was an obvious subterfuge.

The correctness of our expostulations on Monday until the small hours was proved on Tuesday, when the machinery of the gag came into force. The whole debate became mechanical. There being no reason for silence, Radical members below the gangway were unmuzzled, and chattered to while away the time and still further restrict criticism. At 7.30 and 10.30 the guillotine fell, and hundreds of carefully drawn and important amendments were butchered and dropped into the waste-paper basket.

At 10.30 there was an exciting scene over the secret commission on land. Rawlinson wanted to know if the landlords were to have any opportunity of defending themselves from the insidious inquiries, whilst Mildmay, a model landlord in the West of England, passionately denounced such un-English conduct. Lloyd George defended himself with equal vigour, and Austen Chamberlain brought matters to a climax by asking if the names of the witnesses would be given. "Ah," screamed Lloyd George, "you want to retaliate! It is the game!" There were counter-yells of "Harcourt and De Forest!" and recriminations got worse and worse. Fortunately 11.15 struck, and the Speaker slipped out of the chair, or, I believe, blows would have been struck. As it was, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was booed as he left the Chamber.

This is the state to which a Radical Government have brought the Mother of Parliaments.

Notes and News

Miss Betham-Edwards has a new volume nearly ready with Messrs. Chapman and Hall, entitled "In French Africa." The book consists, as the sub-title indicates, of "Scenes and Memories."

Some time in October Mr. Murray will publish the complete collection of Mr. Henry Newbolt's work in verse, from 1897 to the present day. Besides the ordinary edition there will be an édition de luxe.

A course of lectures on "The Theory of Relativity" is being delivered by Dr. L. Silberstein (Lecturer in Natural Philosophy at the University of Rome) on Fridays, at 5 p.m., at the University of London.

Mr. Lacon Watson has written an unconventional volume of notes on a journey to America and Canada, which Mr. W. J. Ham-Smith will publish shortly. The title of the book is "A Conversational Tour in America."

Messrs. John Long announce for immediate publication a new book entitled "The Village Infidel," by C. E. Heanley, price 3s. 6d. net, and a new novel entitled "Queer Little Jane," by Curtis Yorke, author of "Dangerous Dorothy" and many other popular novels.

Later in this month Mr. Arthur Rackham's water-colours illustrating "Æsop's Fables" and some new drawings for "Peter Pan" will be shown in the Leicester Galleries, together with the collection of nearly 100 drawings by the late Phil May, formed by Lear J. Drew, Esq.

"The English Housewife in the 17th and 18th Centuries" provides Miss Rose Bradley with much attractive material for a book which Mr. Edward Arnold will publish next week. He will also have ready very soon a volume of short stories by Miss Anne Douglas Sedgwick, author of "Tante."

It will greatly aid the work of the secretaries if those who wish to take part in the memorial to the late Miss Rosa Morison will communicate with them forthwith. Letters should be addressed to the Honorary Secretaries, Rosa Morison Memorial Committee, University College, London (Gower Street, W.C.).

Father Robert Hugh Benson has written a new novel entitled "Come Rack, Come Rope," which is being brought out immediately by Hutchinson and Co. In this book Monsignor Benson has turned to Tudor times, and has written a story round the life of Catholics and seminary priests in England during Elizabeth's reign.

Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co., Ltd., will shortly issue R. L. Stevenson's "Edinburgh" in two editions, ordinary, and an édition de luxe limited to 375 copies, each labelled and numbered. The illustrations, coloured, are by James Heron, and great care has been exercised in the printing and binding to produce a sumptuous setting for this well-known work.

Admirers of Mr. Max Beerbohm's versatile and facile pen will welcome "A Christmas Garland," promised by Mr. Heinemann for immediate publication. Mr. Heinemann has also in preparation a series of little manuals on French Artists of Our Day, written by prominent French critics. The first three to appear are on Courbet, Manet, and Puvis de Chavannes. Other volumes are to follow.

"My Balkan Tour," by Roy Trevor (published by Mr. John Lane), who was the first stranger to reach Cettinje in a motor-car, is especially interesting just now. By the courtesy of the Montenegrin Government Mr. Trevor was enabled thoroughly to traverse the little kingdom; and he gives a vivid picture of its history, its foreign policy, its natural advantages, and an intimate presentation of its monarch.

Mr. Stephen Reynolds has in the press, to be published by Messrs. Dent in a few days, "The Lower Deck," a work which throws much light upon the faults of the British Navy as affecting the men. Mr. Joseph Conrad has written a new book, "'Twixt Land and Sea," which Messrs. Dent will publish shortly. It consists of three stories, each having its own specific characteristic, showing the author at his best.

Mr. Sterling MacKinlay is forming an operatic society which will meet for rehearsals on Wednesday evenings. Public performances will be given from time to time, and while, at first, only light opera will be undertaken, it is proposed later on to include excerpts from grand opera in the programmes. Rehearsals of Edward German's "Merrie England" will begin shortly. Application for membership should be made to the Secretary, 32, Baker Street, W.

Messrs. Crosby, Lockwood and Son announce that they have undertaken the publication of a new literary review, "The Blue Book," conducted by members of the University of Oxford, to be published every other month at the price of 1s. net. The idea of a substantial review giving expression to the Oxford view on matters of general interest has at last taken shape in a form that must attract University men. The review will contain articles on current topics, essays, poetry, and fiction.

The Drama Society will present two new plays at Clavier Hall, Hanover Square, on Tuesday afternoon, October 29—"Contrasts," a one-act play by the ex-Censor, Mr. G. A. Redford, and "The Experimentalists," a comedy in three acts by Mr. Rathmell Wilson and Miss Muriel Hutchinson, in which Miss Rita Sponti will play the principal part. "Contrasts" will be produced by Mme. Marie Vantini, and "The Experimentalists" by Mr. Henry De Bray of the Théâtre Des Arts, Paris.

In view of the well-known fact in the retail trade that it is difficult for booksellers to make a livelihood out of selling books at the present terms on which they buy, Messrs. Stephen Swift and Co. have decided on a new departure, and will in future meet the trade in the matter by doing away with the odd copy and allowing a discount, which they think will leave a fair margin of profit. The majority of their books will be issued at net prices, and in the interests of the trade they trust that booksellers will not allow any discount to the public except on non-net books.

MOTORING

IT is satisfactory to note that one of the leading organs of the Motor Press—the Autocar—is drawing special attention to a question of the utmost importance to every motorist—namely, that of high hedges at cross-roads and dangerous corners. The danger attaching to the continued existence of these uncut hedges, in hiding other traffic from the view of the driver of a motor vehicle, is one which must be obvious, not only to the motorist, but to everybody. Why is it that so little has been done since the agitation for the compulsory cutting of these hedges was begun several years ago? There is a disposition in some quarters to blame the Road Board, which was formed for the express purpose of enhancing the convenience and safety of the road for all users; but, as the Autocar points out, it is quite unjust to do so. The Board has no power in the matter at all. The only compulsion that can be exercised under the present order of things is by the local authority, which can compel a landowner to cut his hedges if they damage the road by preventing the wind and the sun from drying it, or if they cause an obstruction in any carriage-way or cartway. Whether this latter clause can be construed to cover cases in which the uncut hedge obstructs the view of the driver of a motor or other vehicle is one which has apparently never been determined in the Courts, and it is rather a matter for surprise that neither the R.A.C. nor the A.A. and M.U. should have raised the point in a test case. However, as our contemporary remarks, the matter could be settled and the grievance removed once for all by the introduction into Parliament of a short Bill giving the local authorities the power to trim the hedges wherever desirable in the interests of public safety, whether the landowners liked it or not; and the Road Board should have the power to move in cases where the local authorities proved too indifferent or apathetic to use the powers conferred upon them.

Many motorists, when disposing of their cars, either privately or to dealers, neglect to cancel the registration number and to remove the identification plates from the vehicles. Usually nothing happens, but on occasion the consequences of carelessness in this matter are decidedly inconvenient, to say the least. This was shown in a recent case, in which a well-known motorist, who sold his car in June last and neglected to remove the number-plate, was astonished to receive, on the 20th of last month, no fewer than four summonses—one for exceeding the limit, one for using fraudulent number-plates, one for using a fraudulent licence, and one for driving a car which was not registered. The trouble was really connected with the person to whom the motorist had sold his car months before, and who had been driving it with the old number-plate—a trade one. The case was heard at Brentford, and, to complicate matters still further, the police swore that the defendant was driving the car at the time it was stopped, and persisted in this statement even after being confronted with the actual driver, who admitted that he was the person "wanted." In the end, the defendant, being fortunately able to show an unquestionable alibi, was acquitted on all four charges, the police having to pay the costs of the case. It is quite easy, however, to imagine a different ending to the matter. An alibi, months after the date of the alleged offence, is sometimes a very difficult thing to prove, and the motorist in question must be considered fortunate in having been able to do so.

In the current issue of the Motor appears a sensational announcement to the effect that there is in existence in this country at the present time a vast plant manufacturing hundreds of thousands of gallons of an exceptionally high-grade motor spirit which is superior to petrol in every way—purer, possessing 15 per cent. more thermal energy, and more economical in use. Our contemporary foresees in this the possibility of the British motorist being, at an early date, absolutely independent of foreign motor spirit, although the estimated consumption in this country for next year is 80,000,000 gallons. The new spirit appears to be benzol, with the sulphur impurities practically eliminated in the process of distillation.

The mileages accomplished by the respective tyres concerned in the tyre test have now been published, subject to subsequent official confirmation by the committee of supervision. The totals are as follows:—Victor, 5,010 miles; Dunlop, 4,767½; Continental, 4,261; Michelin, 3,799. The entrants of the first-mentioned tyre are therefore entitled to congratulation on the notable success they have achieved. It is pointed out, moreover, that there is a question as to whether the Victor was really run to destruction. In the opinion of the members of the committee, including Earl Norbury, Viscount Deerhurst, Viscount Exmouth, Lord Tenterden, and Colonel Harrison Hogg, the tyre was merely punctured by a stud stem, and, by the use of an internal gaiter, would have been quite capable of indefinite further service. The entrants decided, however, to accept the decision of the technical supervisor, and rest content with the record mileage actually accomplished. R. B. H.

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

IT is not easy to see what will happen during the next few weeks, for we do not know the extent of the damage done by the panic last week. Brokers closed down accounts ruthlessly. Yet many must be anxiously awaiting the next pay day. I confess that I cannot understand why brokers do business with certain punters—men who have no money, open huge books, and if the market goes against them cannot pay, and do not even attempt to pay. As a rule they become abusive when the distracted broker asks for a cheque. But the position in London is very simple compared with that in Paris and Berlin. Here there has been a steadily growing "bull" account for many months past. Indeed, so serious is the position that under no circumstances could the Germans go to war. The whole nation would be ruined. The German banks do a huge business on the credit system. But their funds are locked up in quite unmarketable securities and they subsist upon credit. War destroys credit. Therefore, however much Germany might wish to assist her ally Austria in the present crisis, she has tied her own hands and is helpless. The position is so bad that it must make for peace.

In the meantime we shall get not only a Five per Cent. Bank Rate, but also some weeks of one at Six per Cent. That appears inevitable. If war destroys credit it also eats up cash, and with four or five of the nations of Europe engaged in cutting their own throats and those of their neighbours, it is idle to expect cheap money.

The promoters would appear to have lost heart. The Mackenzie and Mann offer of Income charge Bonds in the Canadian Northern met with no response. The Anglo-Argentine Tramways issue was no better received. Here there were various rumours going round that the City of Buenos Ayres had the right to cancel any of the concessions if they interfered with the traffic. Also there is an old claimant for the tramways concession. This sort of talk, though probably not serious, does not help a new issue. Birch Crisp was also asking for more money for his Anglo-Russian Trust. Perhaps his own shareholders will find the money. He is the hero of the hour—as, indeed, he deserves to be, for he handled the China Loan with great dexterity. When will he offer us the balance, and will he be able to keep the Chinese amiable? For he has the call on other loans under his agreement. The pig-headed behaviour of the Foreign Office has annoyed the City, and Sir Edward Grey, who knows nothing about Finance and very little about China, does not shine when heckled in the House. Poor man, he has his hands full these days.

FOREIGNERS are gradually recovering. Though why anyone but a "bear" full to repletion with profits should wish to buy Servians, Bulgarians, Greeks or Turks, I do not know. All must see much lower prices during the next few weeks. Austria and Italy will need more money, and will have to pay the Jews a high price for their accommodation. Pierpont Morgan is reported to have said that he would lend ten millions for peace, but not one halfpenny for war. But the great banking houses on the Continent who have been preparing for the storm and collecting gold, will readily lend their gold to the fighters—and make vast profits out of the loans. The Paris gambler loves Tintos and buys his millions as greedily as Berlin buys Can. Pacs. Hence the slump in which "Rios" fell 15 points in a few days. At present prices they are cheap, for the price of copper will not fall, and the share, even if it only pays £4 a share, gives a nice yield with the chance that the end of the year dividend may be 50s. or even more.

HOME RAILS have hung their heads. But there is no "bull" account, and the dealers have merely marked down the price in order not to be compelled to take stock. Metropolitans have had their slump, and we may expect another upward move before Christmas. They say that the deal by which Great Western take over the line is practically completed. I do not understand the rise in South London, and do not believe the story that the Midland intend to acquire the line. Its trains could not get through the tunnels. The cheapest stock in the market is Great Central, as I have so often declared.

YANKEES can be bought with confidence. Kuhn Loeb have been buyers all the week. When the market in Berlin slumped this great banking house bought all the stock that was offered. Morgans also came in and took whatever Eries and Steels were offered. These big bankers do not mean to let the market fall. They know that the crops are magnificent. They know that the trade of the United States is not only good, but that it is better than it has been since the great panic. Therefore they buy. For North America is self-contained. It is now occupying the position held by Great Britain in 1870. We then kept out of war and made huge fortunes. The United States will do the same in the forthcoming war. She sees all the great wheat producing countries at war and she puts up the price of her own staple commodity. Servia is one of her great competitors. The Servian is the pig-sticker for Europe. The U.S. will gladly supply his place—at a profit. No one can go wrong who buys Yankee Rails to-day. Unions may drop a few dollars, but they will see 200, and that before six months are out.

RUBBER does not interest anyone. The Malacca Report was very disappointing. Mr. Lyon promised quarterly dividends of 5s. a share. But he cannot pay even half this amount. No one ever expected that he could. Indeed, the company only pays its present dividend because it charges huge sums each year to capital account. There is no excuse for big companies doing this, and the sound plantations do not do it. Half a dozen small concerns have sent out reports, but none of them call for any comment. Kamuning, in spite of a larger yield, is obliged to reduce its dividend. Dangan is bad. It is little better than a gambling counter. Mr. Govett may understand quite well the intricacies of the Stock Exchange, but he should not dabble in rubber. His followers have lost the money in Danjans that they made in Zincs.

OIL shares slumped with emphasis, but they have recovered. The oil people have pluck. They have been buying Shells all the week and seemed quite delighted at the chance of picking up cheap stock. Urals have also been bought, and Red Seas are absorbed with equal gusto. The Baku report will be out in a few days, and they say it will be good. The price of oil is high, and the company has paid its debts. Mexican Eagles soon recovered their slump. I must say that I think oil shares a great gamble, but I admire the pluck of those who gamble in them. They are dismayed by no fall, however great. I hear that the Roumanian Consolidated are getting some wonderful oil at their Bana wells—nearly 40 per cent. of Benzine. This is phenomenal. I am glad Mr. Barnett is in luck—and so is the City, for he is popular, and clever.

MINES are hopeless. Paris seems to have sold all she had, and the market took them, being very short indeed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The magnates are waiting for better days. I see no chance of any rise this year. None of the companies are doing more than mark time. The De Beers report was good, and though the price fell it soon picked up again. There is talk of a "bear" raid in this market. But I am most suspicious of the gentlemen who whisper that De Beers must fall. I suspect that they are eager buyers all the time. Nothing has been done in Rhodesians, and nothing is likely to be done this year. Those who hold must wait until the market moves, then get out quickly.

The Miscellaneous Market has kept steady. Even Marconis did not fall much upon the abortive debate on the contract, which was cleverly turned into a debate on the honesty of the Ministers. The true question at issue is: Did the Postmaster make a good bargain? That was never discussed at all. The Commission will be a farce. The Telephone people are expecting to get £190 for deferred, and perhaps another £20 or £30 when the whole affair is settled. At present prices the Deferred look cheap. There is still buying of Electric Light shares, and at last the public realises that those securities are the cheapest things in the market.

CORRESPONDENCE

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of The Academy.

Sir,—Mr. T. G. Martin's second letter makes clear his first, but he will forgive me if I say that it does not shorten a correspondence when gentlemen are compelled to write commentaries on their own epistles. The worst of the dealer in epigrams is that you are never quite sure of his meaning. You take the trouble to answer what you imagine he is trying to say, only to find him serenely explaining that he meant something quite different. It is not always the stupidity of the reader that is at fault. Carlyle said of "Sordello," as far as I remember, that he read it without discovering whether the subject was a man, a city, or a tree, and we have lately been told a story of how George Meredith, asked for an explanation of a line of one of his own poems, humorously declared that, as far as he remembered, when he wrote it, it meant something like this—it is unnecessary to explain what the "this" was. However, now that Mr. T. G. Martin has formed himself into a Martin Society and expounded his own meaning, will you permit me to explain the position, I tried to make clear, a little more fully?

When I first heard of Christian Science, I was not in the slightest degree interested in it. What I believed to be its methods were as repugnant to me as were what I imagined its aims. Gradually I got interested in it, and I was, I think, fair-minded enough to take the trouble to examine it before I talked about it. My early reading of "Science and Health" convinced me that Mrs. Eddy was saying something I did not clearly understand, though I might superficially reject her arguments. I determined, therefore, to test her teaching, in the only fair way, by attempting to demonstrate it for myself. For two years I read "Science and Health," and applied its reasoning, so far as I could, to all the phenomena of daily life. To me, the result was amazing. By accepting her premise of the allness of good and the existence of divine principle and law, I was able, not merely to overcome such physical troubles as came my way, but to prove the efficacy of spiritual law over material belief generally. At the end of two years I had accumulated a, to me, vast mass of evidence, all tending to prove the fact of spiritual causation, and all demonstrating the fact that inharmony, of whatever description, could be overcome by obedience to the law of divine principle.

Mr. Martin says, "what differentiates the Christian Scientist from ordinary people is that, in his eyes, the reason why the man (the blind man) recovered is just as much a question of fact as his own recovery." I agree entirely with Mr. Martin, and I have given my own reasons for coming to that conclusion. If Mr. Martin will excuse me for saying so, the reason why an individual Christian Scientist arrives at a conclusion is very much better evidence of the reliability of that conclusion than the opinion of an outsider as to the train of reasoning in other people's minds. It is an a priori argument with a vengeance to form a conclusion by assuming you know how other people, whom you do not even know, worked out their conclusions on the subject at issue.

For two years before I called myself a Christian Scientist, and for very many years since, I have been daily proving that, by the acceptance of the postulate of the allness of good, of God, it is possible not only to heal sickness, but to heal sorrow and sin, and to overcome inharmony of every sort. During all those years I have accumulated an enormous amount of evidence which proves to me that the healing of sorrow, and sickness, and sin, and the overcoming of all inharmony is traceable to the fact of the existence of divine principle and spiritual law. I do not know if Mr. Martin knows a more scientific method of arriving at a conclusion, or if he thinks that it is unscientific to regard, on this basis, the reason why a man is healed as just as much a question of fact as his recovery.

If I may be permitted to sum up the conclusion for myself, it is this—that, when I hear what Lord Beaconsfield might have termed the hare-brained chatter of irresponsible criticism (let me specifically state I am not alluding to Mr. Martin or any particular individual) from gentlemen on platforms and in newspapers, who know rather less about Christian Science than they do of higher mathematics or the composition of ether, even when I read the reasoned criticisms of those who have spent some time in thinking out Mrs. Eddy's teaching more logically and with greater fairness, I am left in the position of the apostle to the Gentiles, when he wrote, "none of these things move me."—Yours truly, Frederick Dixon.

"TACITAE" AND "SILENTIA" IN AENEID 2.55.

To the Editor of The Academy.

On page 53 of "P. Vergili Maronis Aeneidos Lib. II" Edited by T. E. Page, M.A. (Macmillan and Co., 1911), the line 255 of Aeneid II, "a Tenedo tacitae per amica silentia lunae," is explained as follows:—"tacitae . . . 'through the friendly silence of the peaceful moon.' This phrase seems rather beautiful than appropriate: Virgil however chooses to dwell on the 'light' and 'calm' as making the passage of the Greeks easy and to ignore the danger which usually attends an attack in peaceful moonlight." It seems rather more probable that Vergil's "tacitae" in this line is both beautiful and appropriate, and to be explained like the famous verse of his pupil, Dante, "la dove il sol tace," where "tace" means "gives no sign, is silent by withholding light." The "silence" or "hiding" of the moonlight was the proof that Juno was friendly to the Danai, and connived at their arriving undetected by the Trojans. Did not Vergil indeed use it as a play upon the Greek word for "silence," σῑγή, suggested by "Sigea igni freta lata relucent," in line 312, words describing the result of their protected passage of those straits? If the moon had been shining, there would have been no need for the "flammas" in the line 256, in which stress is laid on the fact that the fleet was seeking a shore which had long been familiar to the Danai, and which it was, therefore, easy for them to attain without the moon's help. What light do the best commentators throw on this passage?

THE SOCIETY OF THE THEATRE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In your issue of September 28 Mr. Darrell Figgis, writing on Mr. Barker's production of the "Winter's Tale," holds forth with great energy on the "intrusion of the artist in the Theatre," which he regards as "one of the most considerable evils that the dramatist has now to face." He winds up his attack on the "artist" (we take him to mean the painter) with the following sentence on Mr. Craig:—"In the person of Mr. Craig, he (i.e., the artist) has declared that in the end he will turn out the dramatist and reign supreme with his moving pictures."

The statement rests on a total misapprehension of Mr. Craig's aims. As a matter of fact, Mr. Craig, born in the theatre, and of the very life of the theatre, has been compelled to resort to paper for the sole reason that he lacks a theatre of his own where he could realise his ideas, so that his drawings are merely a makeshift for preserving these visions, which for the present he cannot stage, and which he does not wish to lose. Surely it is a cruel satire on the times—all the more cruel because unconscious—that a theatre-artist so centrally associated with the innermost life of the theatre as Mr .Craig, should be mistaken for an "artist" "intruding" into the theatre.

We cannot stop to discuss Mr. Craig's idea of the theatre with Mr. Figgis in this place; at any rate the sentence we quote above conveys a totally wrong impression of the subject; and surely a critic like Mr. Figgis, writing in a paper of such standing as THE ACADEMY, owes it to himself to procure some exact information on the subject, which is set down in the plainest black and white, and is obtainable at the nearest bookshop, before sending out statements which are bound to be misleading. I am, yours faithfully,

H. SLONIMSKY, Secretary.

Adelphi Chambers, 7, John Street, W.C.
October 8, 1912.

Sir,—In reply to Mr. Slonimsky's courteous letter, I can assure him that I have given the matter some considerable thought and that I am not without evidence in "the plainest black and white." But may I first say that M. Slonimsky would have been wiser had he read my article carefully before coming to its attack? It is always as well to assume that the other man is not without his degree of ordinary thought. He speaks of my "attack on the artist," and adds, "we take him to mean the painter." Now I quite distinctly said, alluding to a certain type of decorative artist, that he had lost the power to work conviction on canvas, and that he was therefore turning to the stage to work his pictures there at the expense of the dramatists: taking the dramatist's stuff as the basis on which to produce his picturesque effects. It encrusts, in my judgment, the dramatists' vitality of conception with certain effects (baroque and fantastic in the play under question) that are foreign to it, and whose enforcement must therefore be prejudicial and inimical to it. Its continued enforcement, by reason of the continued "intrusion of the artist in the Theatre," can only mean that the dramatist will in the end be turned out and the artist continue to "reign supreme with his moving pictures."

That was my argument; and I said that Mr. Gordon Craig was the one artist who had the strength of mind to see it, and the courage to say it. For this Mr. Slonimsky takes me to book. Very well, then, to book I will go. What does he make of the following note on a design for the first scene of the first act of Hamlet," taken from Mr. Gordon Craig's catalogue for his last exhibition at the Leicester Galleries? Mr. Craig says: "Although this is for 'Hamlet,' it belongs more to Shakespeare than to the theatre. We shall reach to Shakespeare some day. Then we shall at the same time reach our ideal—and so the Theatre! That will make Shakespeare, alas, superfluous. In this way the great poet is the truest of our friends."

Sufficiently bland, is it not? And illuminating, too, I suggest. In fact, the whole of the argument for what Mr. Craig calls the Uber-Marionette in his book "On the Art of the Theatre," only means the same thing, less explicitly said, as any reader can discover by reading. Mr. Craig may retort on me that he with his "moving pictures" (by Uber-Marionette and design in costume and scenery) is the true dramatist, and that Shakespeare (and Æschylus and Sophocles and other artists in words) is the pseudo-dramatist. He has, in fact, hinted so much in passages I could quote did space permit. I submit that that is the first logical fallacy. But, in any case, it substantiates the point I made in my article. Yours faithfully,

DARRELL FIGGIS.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Mr. Martin has taken me to task for saying some "extraordinary" things in my last letter. On examining these things more closely, he may possibly see that they are not such "extraordinary" things after all.

Every schoolboy knows the rule, "Conjunctions connect the same cases of nouns and pronouns which have the same bearing or relation with regard to other parts of the sentence." This is substantially the same rule that I gave last week, overlooking, of course, the printer's error.

In the sentence, "I never knew such a coward as him," "him" and "coward," connected by the co-ordinating conjunction "as," and having the same bearing or relation with regard to the other parts of the sentence, should be in the same case (obj.); whereas in the sentence, "I never knew such a coward as he," "as" is a subordinating conjunction, and "as he" is equivalent to "as he is." It is felt that "as he" requires defence, which "as him" does not. Consequently I regard "as he" as unpardonable, since it is not in accordance with strict usage. Again, (a) "I gave you more than he" means something different from (b) "I gave you more than him." In (a) "he" is compared with "I," therefore "he" and "I" are in the same case. In (b) "him" and "you" are compared. I submit the following sentence for Mr. Martin's consideration, and I trust that he will at least show a little respect for "him." "I beheld a man in the dress of a postillion, whom I instantly recognised as he [him] to whom I had rendered assistance." Mr. Martin wishes to know, Would it be pardonable to add "am" or "was" or "shall be" to "She is not as big as I." "I" and "she" are compared, and, since "she" is nominative, "I" also must be.

She is not as big as I (am). (Complete.)
She is not as big as I (was). (When?)
She is not as big as I (shall be). (When?)
Is Mr. Martin really serious?

I would refer Mr. Martin to Lindley Murray's "Grammar," Mr. Fowler's "King's English," and to the late Dr. Hodgson's "Errors in English"; the last-mentioned having supplied me with my four typical examples, which are not so irrelevant as Mr. Martin seems to think.

The sentence, which Mr. Martin considers as Bengal "English," is taken from Jane Austen's "Emma."

But, then, who was Jane Austen?

Notes of the Week

WE welcome an eminently sane and practical pronouncement by the Rev. R. J. Campbell within the last week. It embodies the thoughts and aspirations which we, in our small parochial orbit have been trying to impress upon Christians, divided not by creed or by principle, but by over-prepossession for their own methods and presentments of Christian doctrine—namely, the necessity for co-operation and cordial sympathy. In connection with the situation in South-Eastern Europe the futility and collapse of the Christian gospel is hatefully apparent. A monstrous war, born of covetousness and chicanery, is in progress, when the Christian Powers of Europe—had they been more than nominally Christian—could have decreed peace on just terms, as any arbitral tribunal or court of law can decree it, if united and irresistible force is known to reside behind the decision. What compelling power is there behind the action of Christendom in the present day? Let the Rev. R. J. Campbell answer:—

> No single cause of the comparative weakness of Christianity to-day in face of a new world with its new syntheses and new problems is more potent than the scandal of its schisms, sectarian antagonisms, jealousies, and uncharitableness.

In all of which we agree, and, in agreement with which, we have not lately hesitated to expose shameless hypocrisy in the so-called Holy War.

The story told by Lord Haldane of how he became War Minister has been treated as a rare joke. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman is reported to have said to Lord Haldane: "The War Office full?—No one will touch it with a pole." The joke, we submit, is a sorry one. The reason why the office went begging was because every aspirant for ministerial rank knew that our military system was a sham, and was intended to remain a sham, and that the necessities for the transformation of it into even a tolerable bulwark of national defence would not be conceded. Colonel Seely is the author of a phrase nearly as cunning as "Wait and see." His prescription to vivify the Territorial fiasco is "Universal Service by Consent." A very pretty conceit. But Colonel Seely knows better, and so do we. Under the best auspices, combined villages with a population of 7,000 were invited to show enough interest in Territorial recruitment to form a committee to whom young men desirous of hearing something of the obligations and privileges of service with the Territorials might apply for enlightenment "without prejudice." Not one local man offered to serve on the proposed committee, and not one young man expressed his willingness to join the force. Good people all, but needing compulsion. This experience leads us to think that Colonel Seeley is no great improvement on his predecessor, who lost his way in Whitehall whilst endeavouring to reach—the Woolsack.

Through a tunnel beneath the House of Commons 30,000 cubic feet of fresh air are drawn per minute, and circulated for the benefit of legislators. Dr. Hill, writing to the Times, suggests that a quiet promenade in this tunnel would give the tired Minister "refreshment equal to a blow on Brighton pier," and adds that, if only a little salt spray were diffused by mechanical means, members might have the equivalent of a trip to the seaside whenever they liked. Evidently science holds many unexpected charms in store for us yet. The era of the week-end and the fashionable watering-place is passing; before long we may have halls in our streets, dotted here and there, as is now the ubiquitous cinematograph-show, placarded with invitations to enter and inhale the breezes of Bognor, the winds of Whitby; to grow pleasantly moist in the sprays of Scarborough, the foam of Falmouth. We shall stand in front of rows of tubes which will puff at us different blends of ozone, and retire to private rooms where sunburn as desired will be administered to cheeks pale with summers on the pattern of 1912; doubtless the deeper tinge due to a holiday in tropical climes will be available for an extra half-crown. In fact, with a few imitation rocks, a shrimp or two, and a bundle of seaweed thrown in, we shall not need a holiday at all, and life will not be worth living.

The first number of "The Independent Theatre-Goer," edited by Messrs. J. T. Grein and Hermann Klein, has reached us. Its style, perhaps, is bright rather than literary—which is as it should be—and its articles are certainly up-to-date and interesting. We imagine that this little paper with the big name will meet with a better success if it takes a decided line of its own and does not try too hard, as indicated in the foreword, "to hold the scales between the critics and the criticised."

The Return

(To E. W.)

HOME, O most pale adventurer, are you bound
From that strange kingdom where no love may trace
The life it loves to its abiding place,
Or hail it from afar with cheerful sound.
From deeps whose marges mortal ne'er hath found
You steal, and we are awed before your face—
For you are weird with wonder, with the grace
Of death's most delicate lilies are you crowned.

After the ranging sunset of Farewell—
When life's loved country fades, and hope is lorn,
Is it not fair from that dim, tideless bourn
To drift back home to man's own star and dwell
Fondly with time, in tune with bud and bell,
With midnight's shimmer of stars and the sheen of morn?

JAMES A. MACKERETH.

A National Reflection

ON the balance, there is much which is encouraging, and much which is almost heart-breaking in the national outlook at the present time. Trafalgar Day and the memorable Conference of 1912 on Sea Training exhibit the traditional tendency of the British disposition towards patriotism—in itself a religion.

In these days a religion in Christendom is—amongst large masses—much wanted. Scientists are informing us—with iteration which tends in some minds to conviction—that life is a chemical production; demagogues in Parliament are telling the negligible products of the modern laboratory that their only creed is greed. Why should one germ or microbe, or whatever you like to term it, be possessed of wealth? These teachers do not refer to all the power for good which wealth, honestly and with discretion distributed, diffuses in the world. It is their only aim in their Socialist, revolutionary literature to provoke civil commotion and national ruin, on the chance that they may personally derive profit, and with the comfortable assurance that their dupes will not survive their own synthetic existence, in order to put an end—possibly a painful end—to the combustible essence which has most noxiously brought their misleaders into a sort of being.

Such reflections are sickening. Those who foregathered at the National Conference on Sea Training this week were men—whatever men are made of—looking back to the days when chemical constituents were not accounted of much value, but when personal worth, personal charm, personal striving after something which made life worth living, were of more importance than ammonium chloride, and were valued accordingly.

Are we proud—as at all events sentient beings—of the position in which we find ourselves to-day? After we ceased to be Pagans, we became Christians, and in that capacity felt it to be our duty to burn each other on points of ritual—and invariably to burn the Jew, when we had by violence or cajolery extracted the last schekel from him. So does one chemical make war upon another—as, we are told, in latter-day medical wisdom, one microbe engages in battle royal with another, and the grand microbe—Man—survives or dies as a result of the Lilliputian contest.

If this is all, why prolong the agony, why especially allow hecatombs to be slain and hecatombs to be worse than slain on a flimsy pretext in South-Eastern Europe? We all know it is a sham, and a ghastly, dishonourable, and shameful sham. Article XXIII of the Treaty of Berlin. . . . Really! And this poor temporary excuse is to plunge the world into incalculable suffering. Veritably, the laboratory did not provide conscience, humanity, or critical balance in the doubtful product which it evolved.

The essence, called Mr. James Douglas, will not probably be accused of anything but abhorrence of the views of THE ACADEMY, and yet what does he write?—

> The attitude of Europe is that any religion is good enough for anybody. If the Crescent should triumph, well and good. If the Cross should triumph, good and well. . . . What is apparent now in Europe and in England to the most casual observer? It is the decline and decay of the Christian faith.
> When King Ferdinand points to the Cross, Europe replies: "Take away that bauble."

Bitter words, cruel criticism; but who shall say that they are not just?

Let us pass from a review which is nauseating, and refer to the great effort of sane England to awake a sense of responsibility in Governments and in the people of Great Britain in their duty to themselves and to the world to provide efficient seamen for their navy and mercantile marine.

Individual effort is doing much, Government action is being slowly compelled, statistics are unanswerable. If this nation is to maintain its comparative influence for good, the question of the manning of the sea-services is essentially urgent. We are sorry to see that some Government journals can spare very little space to report the proceedings of the important conference of Monday.

Fictitious telegrams from the censored seat of war, sporting intelligence, the doings of Mr. Jack Johnson, and encyclicals from the Memorial Hall commandeer so much of their space that the national existence of Great Britain, which in paragraphs is proclaimed to mean the destiny of the world, is crowded out of the editorial columns.

On the Eve of War

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

CONSTANTINOPLE, October 14.

TO-NIGHT as I sit at my window in the hour of shadows, when the heavy twilight has almost faded into night, I see below me beyond the ghostly cypress trees the Golden Horn, a lake of molten silver, with a single caïque lying motionless upon its waters, its graceful lateen sail poised like the wing of a hovering bird. Beyond is Stamboul, drawn like a ragged band of purple velvet across the horizon and studded with lights that glitter like jewels; its domes and minarets clear cut against the fading violet sky. Above the city shines the silver crescent of a new moon—the defiant gage of Islam hurled in the western heavens; while from the east great black clouds are creeping round the horizon, covering the city as with a pall. Across the water a soldier is chanting his plaintive song of farewell; all else is still.

Then the quiet of the evening is broken by the strains of a military band, and a regiment of khaki-clad redifs comes marching down the street towards the railway station. The sound of their music fades away in the night, and there is silence once more. Then comes the sound of the clapping of hands and of cheering as a band of white-capped Albanian volunteers marches to fight for the Padisha.

Night and day for a week past troops have been passing, until the spectacle has become monotonous. This morning six batteries of field artillery came rumbling over the badly-paved streets, and the corps of officers—magnificent young men torn from their military studies to receive a premature commission—marched to receive the farewell blessing of the Sultan. There is no hysterical enthusiasm; the patient Ottoman soldiers go to war with calm, expressionless faces amid a silence which is dignified as death.

To-day as I stood beneath the golden dome of the Mosque of St. Sophia, all around me bearded, barefooted soldiers in khaki were making farewell prayer to Allah. From its galleries the Empress Theodora, the courtesan of the East, looked down with a cynical smile on her cruel lips, on 20,000 Christians worshipping their God. Here, too, drunken crusaders danced obscene dances around a wanton whom they had placed in the patriarch's chair. Then when Constantinople fell before the Turks, Mahommed, the conqueror, rode through the door of the church, leaping his horse upon the dead bodies of Christians which were piled four feet high in a building in the galleries of which alone 10,000 persons may stand with ease.

And now another act in its great drama of thirteen centuries is opening, and soldiers are praying for strength to resist what they believe to be the last great effort of the unbelievers to drive them out of the scarlet city, where for centuries first Christian and then Mahommedan has massacred and sinned.

Outside I met a long line of men marching single file and holding each other's hands, down the narrow, precipitous street of Stamboul. Among them were beggars in gaudy rags, bearded men in striped caftans and bright coloured turbans, young Turks in the dress of modern Europe and slightly German in appearance; mild peasants in sheepskin coats, old men and young. It was one of the last batches of redifs marching to the barracks to join the colours. In a few hours they will emerge stripped of their motley Eastern dress, clad in British khaki, with a khaki fez on their heads, a Mauser rifle in their hands, and a modern field equipment on their backs. But they are none the less children of the prophet, confident that death upon the battlefield will ensure them an entry into Mahommed's material paradise.

I wandered home through the shadowy bazaars, where beneath vaulted arches old bearded men sit cross-legged and bargain amid a seemingly hopeless jumble of Persian carpets, costly silks from Damascus, gold, silver, jewels, shoddy tinsel goods from Germany, cottons from Manchester, and gimcrack furniture from Tottenham Court Road. Only old men and women are to be seen in Constantinople now, for the young men have marched away to the war.

Through an arch I caught a glimpse of the courtyard of a mosque all veiled in purple shadows, around which old men in turbans sat and smoked, while a blind beggar called for alms in a monotonous nasal chant. Farther on, in a remote alley of the bazaar, I came upon a white stone house, of the Byzantine empire, with a double façade of arches, which must have stood in the days when Constantine ruled the East; and I went on my way wondering if ever again Constantinople would become a city of Christ.

Unheard Melodies

Heard Melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter.

SOME years ago I remember hearing a literary lady express her opinion that Keats in this phrase was alluding to the Platonic idea of a supersensual music which is universal and appeals to the intelligence only, the divine archetype of all music which reaches us through the ears. Someone else, irritated at the pedantry of this interpretation, declared in a perverse fit of literalism that it meant no more than that the music which you imagined was more beautiful than that which you heard. At the time I could not make up my mind which was the more frigid or inadequate of the two explanations. For what can "music that you imagine" mean except tunes which you invent or repeat in your head? and even a Beethoven would scarcely admit that the undeveloped theme "in his head" was more beautiful than the finished symphony. On the other hand, a music which appeals only to the intelligence has the suggestion of a candidate for some diploma in musical theory, who sits down and works out figured basses and double counterpoint with perfect accuracy, but little or no conception of the effect which his exercise will have when translated into actual sound.

But like most misinterpretations, both these statements only need a little adaptation to express the complete truth. Keats does not indeed speak of his piper on the Grecian Urn as "playing to the intellect," but he does bid him

> Not to the sensual ear, but, more endeared,
> Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone.

Again, the love which the sculptor of the urn has portrayed is a universal, eternal love

> All breathing human passion far above,
> That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
> A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

This appears to mean nothing if it does not mean that the sculptor has by his representation expressed an idea of music which affects us in a different way from any particular music which we have ever experienced or ever could experience. It is not subject to the beginnings and endings of real melodies any more than the carven boughs of the trees need "bid the Spring adieu." It is of the eternal essence of music. Yet when we reflect on this idea, it puzzles us and makes us wonder if we have not been the dupes of an empty sentimentalism. We know that no carven image of a tree in spring could ever take the place of a living, radiant elm whose brilliance is our wonder and whose evanescence is our despair. Has not our unwillingness to give ourselves up to the enjoyment of what is so momentary and perishing a delight made us take cowardly refuge in a cold substitute, which tries to secure the permanence of the delight in a mere shadow of the reality, from which the freshness and the glory are eliminated?

It is a sufficent answer to this objection that no such low-spirited evasion could ever produce that high emotion which is the breath of life to a great poem. That the colour of the leaves should have been eliminated from the plastic representation of the scene is an accident. A picture would lose other elements. It would retain the colour and sacrifice the actual contours. But a successful picture of the same scene would not add or detract anything from the sentiment conveyed. Its emotional effect, if the artist were equally successful, would be exactly the same, with the possible exception that the idea of permanence, which is the essence of the poet's sentiment, is better expressed by marble than by pigments on canvas. And because this is so, it affects us with a kind of bewilderment. We are touched with the emotion and yet can give no rational explanation why we should be so touched. The intellect reels in the mazes of apparent contradiction no less than when it attempts to grasp the idea of infinite space or time.

> Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
> As doth eternity.

But the contradiction is only apparent, and arises from the same cause as that which perplexes the mathematician. His difficulty is due to the fact that he supposes a fictitious thing called Infinity, which has mysterious qualities differing from those of the Finite. Similarly we are perplexed by fancying that we have an eternal music which differs from any transitory music we have ever heard. But the truth would seem to be this. All art universalises in so far as it detaches certain emotions from the medley of our experience and reproduces them in a way which appeals not merely to this or that person, but to all who are capable of any emotion at all. If it did not deal in things which we can experience, however imperfectly, in our ordinary life, it would have no reality at all and would arouse no response in the human heart. But because in our ordinary life these experiences are crusted over with all sorts of irrelevances, we need to detach them and elevate them to a plane where these irrelevances do not affect them. Ford Madox Brown's "The Last of England" expresses the pure sentiment of the Emigrant. In reality, under similar circumstances, we have one eye to the thoughts of the Mother Country or Home, another to the luggage in the hold. Art eliminates the anxiety about luggage and all that is merely personal to you and me, and leaves that which makes the same appeal to all. It is true that a sort of Art can also deal with the luggage. But it does just the same; it universalises the hat-boxes and the rugs. Madox Brown has in fact thus treated the clay pipe. He would not have put it in if it were not part of the permanent meaning.

But how shall we thus universalise Art itself and express in a symbol what is its permanent meaning? It is hardly possible for Art to accomplish the miracle for itself, though some of the more titanic creations of Michelangelo or Beethoven or Shakespeare may almost be said to have done it. But for any single art it can be done through the medium of another. Botticelli has done it in Primavera, Donatello in his Singers, Wordsworth in Peele Castle. Keats has doubly achieved this result in the "Ode on a Grecian Urn," for he uses an art to describe an art which in turn describes another. The task is specially adapted to the poet's medium, and the graphic arts can fulfil this object better than the musical. But the process is sometimes reversed, as when music has the effect of a poem or rather of the Spirit of Poetry itself. The result is an idea which is supersensual, for it is not reached through the senses proper to the art described, but through another, and it is universal in so far as it suggests something better than any particular work of art, because it suggests the whole of which all are parts, and seems to gather into one that which we actually experience at sundry times and in divers manners.

But lest I should seem to have wholly justified one of those two equally false opinions from which we started while rejecting the other, let me point out in conclusion that this doctrine is far from Platonic. Plato would scornfully have remarked that since the poet gives us a copy (the poem) of a copy (the urn) of a copy (the music) which is itself a copy of natural sounds, which are copies of the one Reality, he is five times removed from the truth; which, as the mathematicians say, is absurd, and shows plainly how false was that philosopher's view of art, and of Beauty which is Truth.

The Smaller Wessex

The Woodlanders; The Mayor of Casterbridge; A Pair of Blue Eyes; Two on a Tower. By THOMAS HARDY. New Collected Edition. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d. each net.)

EVEN to the reader with few pretensions to discrimination, who reads more for the story than for the subtler intellectual delights of mode and manner, the work of Mr. Thomas Hardy appears as separable, broadly speaking, into two classes. In the first may be placed those books where the whole scheme is firmly built, strong, as we might say, architecturally—where, if the trick of coincidence is used, it is used sparingly and falls naturally into its niche as a shaped stone into its bed; where, whether the ending be grim or gay, the reader is possessed with a sense that nothing but this could have happened. With these books, while one is under their spell, the tragedy is as relentless as a quadratic equation, or, if they move rarely to the tune of comedy, it seems the peaceful and necessary conclusion of the whole matter. "Tess" and "The Return of the Native" may be taken as examples of the sombre aspect of this class; "Under the Greenwood Tree" and "The Woodlanders" may stand for the less clouded (one cannot always say more cheerful) aspect. In the second division may occur those books where, often with a more intricate plot, the reader is not carried away by the steady, machine-like force of what we may term the story's personality; where the coincidences seem to happen just as they are required for the development of the scheme and the bothering of the characters, and where sometimes the ending is perversely imposed upon a situation that might resolve itself easily in another way. Of this class the most striking instance is "Two on a Tower."

Here we have a story with a plot worthy of Wilkie Collins at his finest—a plot that could almost be set out with rule, compass and square in a mathematical figure. Lady Constantine falls in love with Swithin, the young astronomer ten years her junior, fearing all the time that her love will spoil his future; her husband being supposed to have died abroad, she marries him, not knowing that Swithin has declined a legacy contingent upon his remaining single to the age of twenty-five. By an accident she discovers this; she also discovers that her husband had died at a later date than had formerly been reported, so that the marriage so innocently, yet secretly, contracted was not legal. In her distress, denying her first impulse to have the ceremony repeated, she sends Swithin abroad to study, refusing to correspond with him until he comes to claim her. Then comes the most shattering discovery of all; and, in his absence, to save herself, she accepts the dignified proposal of the Bishop of Melchester. Swithin, absorbed in his astronomical studies at the Cape, hears of this; hears also, some time after, of the Bishop's death. He delays his return; but when he does return and meets Lady Constantine on the old tower of his boyish observations, she looks haggard and aged, and for a moment his exaltation is checked. She, reading his thoughts, bids him farewell; but he has hardly reached the ground before the flood of his love—and pity—overwhelms him; he climbs again, to cry her name. They embrace, and in that passionate moment—she dies in his arms.

Such, barely told, is the plot; and how is any reader to avoid feeling that an ending which makes for happiness is wilfully distorted into a tragedy? Further, several times in the process of reading he will have felt an uneasy impression that things are happening not as a natural sequence in human lives, but as events very convenient to the author's conception of the pattern he is weaving. The tangle is deliberately made and deliberately unravelled; and if it be objected that all novelists must laboriously construct and dissect their plots, the answer is that we ought not to find ourselves consciously commenting upon the fact as we read. On the very morning of Swithin's wedding-day, just as he is starting for Bath to meet his Viviette, the postman hands him a letter containing the news of his uncle's conditional bequest. On their return journey, man and wife, as they fondly suppose, Louis, her brother, arrives, and accidentally switches her across the face with his whip, the tell-tale mark compelling Swithin to keep her in seclusion in his little wooden cabin for a day or two. Conversations are overheard, more than once, thus thickening the complications. Coincidence, again, is evident in Swithin's movements—both the letters which in her distress Viviette writes to him fail to reach him. By the very ingenuity of these methods the story is weakened in its appeal, however fascinating it may be to watch the lovers through their manifold agonies and raptures.

Beyond noting this broad difference between certain examples of Mr. Hardy's work, we need not pursue this categorical method of criticism, since carried to extremes it is profitless and leads to obscurity rather than to illumination. We may note, however, as a remarkable characteristic of nearly all his novels, the range and remoteness of his allusions and metaphors. A man's reading need be wide indeed if he is to keep pace with Mr. Hardy in this; he must be a scientist, a mathematician, an architect, an engineer, an artist, to grasp all the subtle touches by which impressions of persons or descriptions of scenery are conveyed. In "The Woodlanders" we have the leaves rustling "with a sound almost metallic, like the sheet-iron foliage of the fabled Jarnvid wood"; a farmer, "panting with Actæonic excitement"; "Darling," the white horse of Grace Fitzpiers, becomes "a Wouvermans eccentricity reduced to microscopic dimensions." In "The Mayor of Casterbridge" we are requested to observe that the shop-blinds of the town are "so constructed as to give the passenger's hat a smart buffet off his head, as from the unseen hands of Cranstoun's Goblin Page"; the amphitheatre "might have been called the spittoon of the Jötuns"; Elizabeth-Jane's simplicity was "the art that conceals art, the 'delicate imposition' of Rochefoucauld"; the tumuli of Egdon Heath resemble "the full breasts of Diana Multimammia supinely extended there"; Lucetta, Henchard's charmer, "flung herself on the couch in the cyma-recta curve which so became her"—we have this again in "The Return of the Native": "Viewed sideways, the closing-line of her lips formed, with almost geometric precision, the curve so well known in the arts of design as the cima-recta, or ogee." In "A Pair of Blue Eyes" Elfride holds her head "in the Greuze attitude"; Stephen's manners, "like the feats of Euryalus, owed their attractiveness in her eyes rather to the attractiveness of his person than to their own excellence"; Mrs. Smith "threw in her sentiments between the acts, as Coryphaeus of the tragedy, to make the description complete"; and so we might go on from book to book selecting examples, often happy, occasionally laboured and unnecessary, of this parlour-game of allusions which Mr. Hardy so loves to play. Merciless is he to the ordinary reader; if his heroine's shape reminds him of a geometric curve, down it goes in its technical nomenclature; and even though at times we feel as impatient with him as we do with his vacillating "Jude," or his Elfride who travels to London with her lover to get married and returns, still a maiden, by the next train, we cannot but admire his fertility. It is all a part of the microscopic vision with which Mr. Hardy sees nature as well as humanity. When Knight, in "A Pair of Blue Eyes," is slipping over the edge of the cliff, the incident takes fifteen pages to describe, about eight of which are devoted to the sensations of the man as he holds on—he perceives in front of his eyes, embedded in the rock, a fossil Trilobite, and, "separated by millions of years in their lives, Knight and this underling seemed to have met in their place of death. . . . Time closed up like a fan before him; he saw himself at one extremity of the years, face to face with the beginning and all the intermediate centuries simultaneously." It is a magnificent passage; no one can read it without being strangely moved; and who but Mr. Hardy could have written it? And yet it embodies the very antithesis of the dramatic method which one would pardonably think essential in dealing with such an incident. Elfride, who would "say things worthy of a French epigrammatist, and act like a robin in a greenhouse," is one of the sweetest heroines of Wessex, though, for a country girl with a limited outlook, she often converses like a philosopher. The whole story is especially interesting to West-country readers, with its "St. Launce's" for Launceston, its "Camelton" for Camelford, its "Castle Bterel" for Boscastle, and its peculiarly Devonian air.

Comparisons without number have been made, to the point of exhaustion, between Mr. Hardy's style and that of Meredith; we shall not wander down this bypath at present, but it is fascinating to compare two or three individual passages in the different writers. A paragraph in "The Mayor of Casterbridge" reminds us irresistibly of a similar one in "Diana of the Crossways":

> Other clocks struck eight from time to time—one gloomily from the gaol, another from the gable of an almshouse, with a preparative creak of machinery more audible than the note of the bell; a row of tall, varnished case-clocks from the interior of a clockmaker's shop joined in one after another just as the shutters were enclosing them, like a row of actors delivering their final speeches before the fall of the curtain; then chimes were heard stammering out the Sicilian Mariners' hymn; so that chronologists of the advanced school were appreciably on their way to the next hour before the whole business of the old one was satisfactorily wound up.

We can but think, reading that, of Dacier, pursued through the night by the imperturbable hours, tolled twice over by a turret-clock out of order! And from "The Woodlanders" we will quote the description of Melbury's homestead:

> The house was of no marked antiquity, yet of a well-advanced age; older than a stale novelty, but no canonised antique; faded, not hoary; looking at you from the still distinct middle-distance of the early Georgian time, and awakening on that account the instincts of reminiscence more decidedly than the remoter, and far grander, memorials which have to speak from the misty reaches of mediævalism. The faces, dress, passions, gratitudes, and revenges of the great-great-grandfathers and grandmothers who had been the first to gaze from those rectangular windows, and had stood under that keystoned doorway, could be divined and measured by homely standards of to-day. It was a house in whose reverberations queer old personal tales were yet audible if properly listened for; and not, as with those of the castle and cloister, silent beyond the possibility of echo.

It is the sort of passage at which, in Mr. Henry James' books, we are accustomed to glow with serene pleasure; but had Mr. James written it, he would probably have omitted the words "dress" and "faces," and substituted other adjectives for "rectangular" and "keystoned."

With the broader aspects of Mr. Hardy's work we have dealt in these columns before, on more than one occasion, and there is no need to repeat our conclusions here. Few countries of fiction have so strong a basis of fact as Wessex; it is a little planet with an orbit all its own, unperturbed by the approach of any other sphere, and we may safely say that the orbit will not shrink or vanish as time goes on. A Lady of Quality

IT has almost come to this, that we should demand of every editor to-day who proposes to present the world with a new volume of memoirs something in the nature of an apologia. Book catalogues simply swarm with them—which may be an indication of considerable public demand. Indeed, there can be little doubt that there is an emphatic welcome for books of this order, and the most jealous conserver of literary interests may rejoice thereat, while he has an eye to the quality of the supply. We see little edification and little permanent value in the resurrection of scandals which, by every canon of taste, should be left to a deserved oblivion. Nor is there always sufficient justification for bidding us hark back to the often insipid details of the private life of certain people of importance in their day, but who no longer give us any concern that they ever existed. The considerations that may be justly regarded as warranty for publication are the permanent interest of a distinctive human character, and the personal first-hand contribution to history or to national biography. These qualities, we are free to state, after approaching the book in this, perhaps, hypercritical spirit, we have found to our delight in Lady Shelley's Diary.

Mr. Richard Edgcumbe's task must have been a pleasant one, for these pages are written with a never-failing charm and vivacity, and the writer reveals herself as a lady of much winsomeness and strength of character. The travel notes give no unpleasant reminder of the guide-book, while the animadversions on the society of the day have a truly critical and judicial quality as coming from one who, though in no sense a prude, was undoubtedly a high-minded and virtuous lady. A strong vein of good sense and a facile gift of expression lend a peculiar interest to her remarks on public affairs. Not that she is altogether without her feminine prejudices, as is more particularly apparent when she comes to write of men and women, but she is frank and generous in owning to a misconception when it is dissipated by better acquaintance, and impresses one as never deliberately unjust.

It is the personal reminiscences which will, for most people, constitute the chief fascination of this diary. Most of the famous men of Europe of the Waterloo period were of Lady Shelley's ken, and they live in her pages with a rare actuality. There is Byron, whom she dubs "the chronique scandaleuse," and whose facial expression she describes with some insistence as "demoniacal." He is recently married, and his sister entertains hopes that the experience will have a sobering effect on him, but Lady Shelley fancies, from what she has seen of him, that he will not be at all easy to manage. There is Sydney Smith, too—who could surely be allowed to pass without the credentials of an editorial footnote!—enlivening "our Sunday evenings with his fun, and not very clerical conversation." Canova chips at his fame-destined marble while my lady looks on, and Metternich makes a friend of her in Vienna. Talleyrand, that curious character of perennial fascination, sits opposite her at dinner, and she thinks she > never saw so diabolical a countenance. He has no very marked feature, is pale, has a crafty expression, and a most villainous mouth. His fiendish laugh still haunts me.

A second dinner-table acquaintance fails to redeem her dislike. "He is a frightful object to look at, and rolls his tongue about in a disgusting manner." All the same, she is obliged to admit that he tells a story well, and she evidently relishes this, from Brougham's lips, of Talleyrand and poor Bobus Smith:

> Bobus Smith was one day expatiating at great length upon the wondrous beauty of his mother. It was during dinner. After boring every one to death with a subject in which none of the company could be in the least interested, Talleyrand said in a drawling voice: "Monsieur Smith, c'était donc monsieur votre père qui n'était pas beau?"

Lady Shelley had the good fortune to accompany her husband on a tour of the great battlefield of Europe just after the stirring events of the Hundred Days. Scarcely a month after Waterloo she is in Paris in the inner circle of the great personages who had foregathered there after the final crash. Perhaps the most arresting of these—with one important exception—is Alexander I of Russia. Lady Shelley's first impressions of him, formed on the occasion of the Imperial visit to London a few months previously, were anything but flattering. He is > shy and very deaf. He has a bad figure, tightened-in at the waist, and has a chest like a woman. His epaulettes are large, and placed very forward; and his arms hang in front very awkwardly.

Again, he is > a foolish, good-natured dancing dandy. Although he has more good qualities than bad, he is but a weak, vain coxcomb. Personally, he is as brave as a lion, but entirely under petticoat government.

That is rather a perplexing description; but now, at Paris, she sees the Emperor at closer range, marks his conduct at the great review of the Russian troops, his reverent bearing at the impressive field service, and is privileged to hold several conversations with him, with the result that the unfavourable impressions are substantially corrected, and she discovers much to admire. She firmly believes that in spite of his faults "he sincerely wishes to promote the prosperity of Russia, and that he leaves nothing untried which may bring good to his country."

The supreme figure in this diary, however, is Wellington, and it is the intimate and authentic note of these particular reminiscences that give the book its chief value. Lady Shelley's admiration for the great Duke amounted almost to idolatry, and she makes no secret of the fact.

> Wellington condescends to converse with me as a friend. I hope my head won't be turned. . . Every day adds to my pride at being an Englishwoman, and to my joy at being born in the same age with this great being.

It is with a delightful naïveté that she tells of the thrill of being permitted to ride "Copenhagen," and how she cut off a lock of the Duke's hair and took possession of a pen he had used. She is denied the pleasure of sitting next him at dinner, and is "un peu triste," and a thwarted plan for the hero's company robs the whole day of sunshine. The view of Wellington's character presented in these pages is a very attractive one. He is here anything but the "Iron Duke" of legendary fame. Gentle, kind, even gay, he walks beside his fair chronicler, in her eyes, at least, a prince of romance.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

He even takes relief from sterner warfare in the momentous trivialities of court guerilla, and lends his sympathy to Lady Shelley for the dethronement of "Queen Willis"—otherwise the Lady Jersey of that day. But there are also such privileged glimpses of the Duke as the following, which must be our final quotation:

> Those who accuse him of a lack of feeling—and some there are who state as much—have not seen him as I have, his eye glistening, and his voice broken, as he spoke of the losses sustained at Waterloo. "I hope to God," he said one day, "that I have fought my last battle. It is a bad thing to be always fighting. While in the thick of it I am too much occupied to feel anything; but it is wretched just after. It is quite impossible to think of glory. Both mind and feelings are exhausted. I am wretched even at the moment of victory, and I always say that, next to a battle lost, the greatest misery is a battle gained. Not only do you lose those dear friends with whom you have been living, but you are forced to leave the wounded behind you. To be sure, one tries to do the best for them, but how little that is! At such moments every feeling in your breast is deadened. I am now just beginning to regain my natural spirits, but I never wish for any more fighting."

On many other features of interest we have not space to dilate; but sufficient has been said to make it evident that lovers of the journal of intimate recollections will find in this book one of the best of its kind. And, if we read Mr. Edgcumbe's preface aright, there is more to follow. If it is in any way comparable with this instalment it will be sure of a welcome.

WELCOME once more to Norman Gale's Arcadian muse! There is a dewy delight in these new poems of his; the sweetness we expected who had treasured his Country's Muse's Orchard Songs of many Septembers gone; and even an added charm, born of the light-following years. But the dew is here, and the bloom as in spring—only September's mellower sunshine: nothing of its decay. Mr. Gale seems to gather like the sun-kissed satiny fruit of his beloved orchards the clustering fancies and lovely grouping of tested words that other poets labour so assiduously, and so palpably, to fashion. Birds and flowers are the proper accompaniment of Mr. Gale's Orphic lute. They come at the call of image and fancy with simple inevitability—blackcaps and throstles and finches, larkspurs and hyacinths and decent sweet-williams. We doubt whether Mr. Gale has ever done anything better that his "Dream and Ideal," personified in

> Her wavering heart of lily-stuff . . . .

and

> The fragrant girl without a name
> Who at the edge of being runs
> Between the light and dark, and calls
> Across the distance for my sake.

Goddess of his dreams, maybe, it is ever the sweet mortal girl who runs before him in his waking hours, for the lyrics are tenderly human. Not the jealous solitudes of Pan, but gardens and green aisles haunted by lingering human feet are Mr. Gale's world: haunted sometimes by gentle shades, as in the touching little poem, "A Review," which tells how he dreamed, one evening, searching vainly among the flowers of Heaven for his mother's face, but presently saw a rarer vision:—

> For radiant in the window-seat
> My mother sat with downward look,
> Intently reading (how unmeet
> For eyes so fair!) my latest book.
> At last, when all the book was read,
> She gave a happy little nod,
> Drooped lower still her gracious head,
> Kissed it, and faded back to God.

Of the charm of the rest—of "The Barley Birds," of "Invocations," of "The Shepherd's Song"—we have no space to speak. They would befit the lips of the happy mortals in Morris's Thames-threaded "Nowhere." In the strained days when we seem to have lost all cognisance of Arcady we will gratefully remember Norman Gale.

The "Poems" of Mr. Lutyens call for little comment. They rhyme and scan tolerably well, and have a general so-so quality. He favours Biblical subjects, with an occasional digression into inanimate Nature; but his ideas are rather thin and commonplace. We are not quite sure, but fancy "Ascensiontide" is his worst essay; we cannot satisfy our mind as to which is his best.

We are rather disposed to fall in love with Mr. Burke's little book, from its modest grey cover and elegant paper to its smallest lyric. He brings a fresh zest to his poet's adventure, and tracks the Lady Beauty through many unfrequented ways; not a few of these are in London; grimy, noise-racked corners and thoroughfares, which he challenges with a fierce tenderness for the redeeming marks of her passage. The memory of a smile in a Walworth attic, of a vanished rusticity at Clapham, of a love-meeting in Charing Cross Road; the vision of a London sunset from Shooter's Hill, and a wild rose blowing by Bloomsbury—thus he discovers them. And since we do not remember to have seen a poem about dear bustling Paddington before, we are minded to quote a stanza from one of two Mr. Burke presents us with:—

> Deep in a dusk of lilac the station lies,
> Vasty and echo-haunted and fiercely made;
> Speared all about with sun where the arches rise,

Leaping on lusty limbs over pools of shade.
Oh, lovely are her lean lines, and lovely her poise,
Empanoplying the long, dim frenzy of noise.

Another poem distinguished by a refreshing novelty of vision and a generous discernment is that to "Elise Craven, Dancing." Sometimes Mr. Burke pays his fee to the older beauty, as in "Supplication" (which ACADEMY readers may remember), "My Beautiful," and an exquisite little song for music, called "My Heart"—pays it gracefully, too; but his poet's creed is best set set forth in "The Minstrels," a lyric which is worthy to set beside the best of the many apologias of the poet. Yet we will carp a little, of our fastidiousness, ere we leave him. He is a little overfond of mist and lilac, and combinations of both; and "pallid, passionate moons" are rather at a discount nowadays. "Children of Toil" is too much an echo of "Love in the Valley"—though adopt the fascinating metre and you have a task to clear yourself of the imputation.

Mr. Guy Kendall, some of whose work also has appeared in this journal, is the writer of accomplished verse. His is the eye, not "in a fine frenzy rolling," but rather gazing steadily on life, lit with the quiet gleam of unflickering faith. This he enunciates in "The Whole Design," and again in "The Labyrinth." He has a gospel of work, too, which contains both inspiration and a criticism:—

Work is to fan life's spark till the flagging flames suspire,
To watch the soul aglow in a mirror fashioned with hands,
The joyful signal-light of a spirit that understands,
Till answering beacons blaze with the full contagion of fire;

To set one's seal as a god, to crown one's head for a king,
To see the bone of one's bone, the flesh of one's flesh, and know
Not a workman on earth could have dreamed it, fingered and fashioned it so,
Not an Angel in heaven could copy this unrepeatable thing.

An "Ode on the Tercentenary of Charterhouse"—with which famous school Mr. Kendall is intimately associated—is a worthy and dignified tribute; and a "Hymn to Pan" is in many ways the most satisfactory thing in the book. It is interesting to note the dedication to Herbert Kennedy, the Charterhouse youth, untimely dead, whose "poetical remains" were published a short time ago. This little volume is no discredit to Mr. Fifield's "Grey Boards Series," which is a model of quiet taste in format.

When a poet is introduced in red letters on the wrapper of his book as "The Kipling of South Africa" it is liable to be used in evidence against him. And it is scarcely surprising to learn from the back of the wrapper that Mr. Unwin has also a Canadian Kipling in stock. Confidentially, we are only waiting for the Kipling of Honolulu to complete our collection, by which time, possibly, the original type will have become obscured in a total eclipse. A pest on all these Kiplinglets! Why will they not have the decency to tune their own pipe? We prefer to judge Mr. Gouldsbury in the moments when he is free of the awful ægis. We are not disappointed, for there is verse of good quality. "Dawn in the Hut," "Of any Port in Africa," "Exile," "The Shadow-Girl"—these are poems that live with no contemptible individuality, well turned, sweetly sung. Furthermore, in a group of Kaffir ballads he has found a distinct vein of his own. "Zama and Zirwa" is particularly successful. "Mambo's Burial Song," of which we give a couple of stanzas, is a worthy threnody:—

Still, though old and grey of beard,
His the voice the tribesmen feared;
His the name that we revered—Mambo, art thou gone?
Yea, to where the shadows grey
Swing like mealie-leaves a-sway,
Hiding from the light of day, leaving us alone.

Nay, it never shall be said
Mambo slumbers with the dead,
He who is of lions bred takes the lion's form;
Sometimes, when the moon is clear
We shall hear him stalking near,
Hear his thunder in our ear, louder than the storm.

Enough! Let the singer of the songs we have instanced not trouble himself about figuring as the "Kipling of South Africa," but content himself with being Cullen Gouldsbury, and he may live to vindicate his temerity.

We are relieved to find no hint of Mr. Scheffauer being the Kipling of California, though his opening poem might have stirred the rumour. This new volume which now he sends "into the carnage of the critic's pit" as food for the "stalled reviewer"—these are his cruel words—is an emphatic reaffirmation of his poetic virility; and it is a distinct advance on his last book. The fault of "The Masque of Elements" (which was reviewed some time ago in these columns) was that it was too highly wrought. It was like a design in ironwork, laboriously beaten and twisted; and the effect was of artificiality. In the present volume Mr. Scheffauer takes his art less frenetically, and the result is all gain. The title-poem is not remarkable for its substance—a Draconian critic might dub it "much ado about nothing"—but of course the verse is deftly fashioned, and it goes with a splendid swing. Its artistic success lies in the impression it certainly leaves of the gustiness and unleashed vigour of those remote robustious days. In truth, Mr. Scheffauer has a good deal of the spirit of those days in him—it has been called, we believe, "swashbuckling"; and the ballads which this volume contains are evidences of his real poetical exuberance when it trims itself for a clear course, and doesn't bother to stay every now and again tying fierce knots in the English language. Of the "Poems," as distinct from the ballads, we like best "The Secret Theatre" and "The Sea Slave"; the ballads are all good. A quartet of vigorous translations from Nietzsche rounds off the collation. Mr. Scheffauer still cherishes his extravagances—his "argentine largess of light"; his "glaring moons and asteroids"; he adds to our collection of verbal rarities such gems as "frore," "yarely," and "levins," and gives us a grievance against our somewhat conservative dictionary. All the same, this slim booklet of apple-green is by no means to be ignored.

Plato's "Apology" and "Crito," or "The Defence of Socrates" and "The Drama of Loyalty." A New Translation, with the Greek Text Parallel, and Introduction and Notes by CHARLES L. MARSON, M.A. (Andrew Melrose. 3s. 6d. net.)

"SCHOOLS and Universities often teach people to play tiring intellectual games with the jewels of literature. The one thing they forget to teach about them is that they are jewels. A new language has been invented for translation — the dead English of classrooms. . . . But Socrates talked market-talk. He would be better put into living Lancashire or vital Somerset than in this inhuman mechanical jargon." Thus Mr. Marson defends in his preface his excellent translation. We do not know whether, once got to work, he has really aspired to "living Lancashire" or "market-talk." We suspect that he has abandoned the attempt; the market conversationalists have rather too limited a vocabulary to discuss the origins of life and death, and the principles on which States rest, and Socrates was hardly a provincial. Moreover, there is Plato to be considered; he has something to say to the form in which we know the "Apology" and the "Crito," and, if his aim was verisimilitude, his media were Attic prose and the highest literary art. But Mr. Marson has not tried any of these experiments; he has given us a good, sound, vigorous, and sometimes homely translation. It is, as we were bound to expect, uneven, and some passages are almost stilted, but when he gets going he is excellent. We will quote a fairly typical passage:—"O men of Athens, I am far from defending myself, as a man might fancy. It is you I am defending: lest you should somehow miss the gift of God, by voting me guilty. If you kill me, you will not readily find another such, who is simply, if I may be allowed a bit of a laugh, sent to buzz at the city [by God], just as if Athens were a great blood-horse, so strong that she is very sluggish and needs to be aroused by some gadfly of a thing." The introductory matter is written in a strain of fine enthusiasm, and contains, among other things, the verdicts of the later Greek world and of the Christian fathers on the life of Socrates. The notes are occasionally rather incoherent.

Valserine, and Other Stories. (English and French Versions.) By MARGUERITE AUDOUX. Translated by JOHN N. RAPHAEL. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

MR. RAPHAEL has made a great "coup" in getting hold of the practically unpublished débuts of the authoress of "Marie Claire." Whether he has been wise to translate them, and to incorporate his translations in the same volume as the stories themselves, is a question difficult to answer. The charm of Mme. Audoux lies so much in her fresh, direct style that the translator has a hard task to perform. Mr. Raphael is only half-successful: he seems by turns too careful and too careless. Some passages suffer from a literalness that is almost painful, others from a rough rearrangement of effects that reminds us of the well-meant activities of a college bedmaker. Still, for those who can read French there is the original text, and for those who cannot this translation is certainly good enough to show them things they did not know before.

All the stories, with the exception of the longest—"Valserine"—were written long before "Marie Claire." The "juvenilia" of the author of a masterpiece are always interesting, and some of the minor contents of the present volume have distinct intrinsic merit. "Valserine" is a maturer, more ambitious work, and must be judged separately. Mme. Audoux is above all things an artist, and, if we do not always experience great thrills, we are, at all events, spared all shocks and jars. Some of the episodes are so convincing that we cannot but feel that they are a piece of life—a piece of the writer's life, we should have said, only they are not quite consistent with each other. We will indicate, for example, the two sketches, "La Fiancée" and "Mère et Fille."

"Valserine" is a fine piece of pathos. The heroine, a little girl, hardly more than a baby, loses her father, a smuggler on the Swiss frontier, to whom she is passionately attached, and whom she has assisted in his enterprises. She at first hears only of his capture, but when she learns the true extent of her loss she breaks from her benefactors and chooses a home and a career that shall be more like a continuation of her life with her father. The first loneliness, before knowledge, the roughness of the final enlightenment, and the sublimity of the commemoration, are told with an admirable simplicity and force.

We have always thought that M. Octave Mirbeau was the wrong sponsor for Mme. Audoux. She is not exactly a "Barrèsite," and it would be straining an innocent but fashionable word unduly to call her a "régionaliste," but she has too much of the sun and the soil in her to admit the claims of literary cosmopolis. She stands for the greater humanity—the humanity without the capital "h."

Histoire des Arabes. By CLEMENT HUART. Vol. I. (Paul Geuthner, Paris. 20 fr. the two volumes.)

WE must confess to a feeling of disappointment on reading M. Huart's first volume. It is probably through expecting what we had no right to expect. The birth of Islam has been so often painted for us in the brilliant colours of romance that the drab tones of scientific history have the effect of an unpleasant surprise. At the same time we submit that Islam is not complete without the romance; the gospel of Mahomet and its wonderful conquering career are miracles that summon our awe and demand our meditation. M. Huart explains them, satisfactorily up to a point, by giving us the data and simply recording the sequence of events. The great enigma of Mahomet's soul gets somehow put on one side. We suppose that it never has been really confronted: Carlyle's explanation of a "hatred of idolatry" affords very little help. In any case, the lack of psychological method and of picturesque treatment makes the present work rather difficult reading. The Arabs are so far away from us—further, indeed, than most Orientals—that sympathy requires a stimulus.

With all this, M. Huart has compiled a solid and much-needed historical work. He has limited his subject in such a way as to include Morocco and to exclude the Turkish Empire. He has shown great skill in elucidating the perplexity of social arrangements of pre-Mahometan Arabia, and he has explained the modifications of these arrangements due to the new way of life. The development of the Khalifate is worked out on good broad lines. Of Mahomet there are some excellent traits recorded. To a follower's suggestion of no quarter for some defeated Arabs, because they were "sons of pagans," he replied, "Et vous-même, n'êtes-vous pas des fils de païens?" The conquests of Islam are ascribed in part to the formulæ—drawn up for the purpose by the Koranic doctors—among which we will quote the surprising maxim, "l'homme mal monté mène la troupe," and also in part to the minimum nature of its requirements. It is possibly this characteristic of levelling up to a minimum that makes any but a short sketch of Arab history tend to be rather dull.

The American Government. By FREDERIC J. HASKIN. (J. B. Lippincott Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

THIS book is the offspring of frank megalomania. It is simply a swollen advertisement of the absolute perfection of the Federal Government of the United States of America, "the most active and powerful nation in the world"—"a story to make every American breast swell with pride." We admit that there is ample justification for pride—in dollars and machinery—but it is a little nauseating when arrogance is too blatant. At the same time, a good account is given of all the highly complicated and marvellously worked machinery of the numerous departments and bureaus of the Federal Government, and it makes very interesting reading. It is impossible not to be impressed with the extreme thoroughness which characterises the complicated working of the vast and intricate mechanism. Americans have a perfect passion for statistics on a stupendous scale. Mr. Haskin's work should satisfy their most voracious appetite. Millions and billions are nothing accounted of in the days of Taft. Even the number of million words uttered by the President in six years' speech-making is thought worthy of record. Everything in the States is quite superlative, "the largest and finest in the world," "nothing else in the entire history of the world compares with," "no other country has such an extensive system," etc., etc. Chapter after chapter begins with this sort of magniloquence, till there is no more spirit left in us. There is, however, one notable exception. It is admitted that the British Navy is the most powerful in the world, the United States being a good second.

With such crumb of comfort we return to our own insignificant country, all agape at this demonstration of the land that "licks creation."

The Church of Armenia. By MALACHIA ORMANIAN, formerly Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople. Translated from the French Edition by G. M. GREGORY, V.D. (A. R. Mowbray and Co. 5s. net.)

ARMENIA was converted to Christianity at the beginning of the fourth century by the preaching of Gregory the Parthian (S. Gregory the Illuminator), who died in the year of the Council of Nicæa, A.D. 325. Since his day the Church of Armenia has maintained a national independence through all the throes of religious and political persecution and the horror of "massacres which, with periodic recurrence for centuries, have played havoc with the nation's Fatherland and Church." The Armenians are a democratic race of sturdy highlanders, ready to make any sacrifice for their religion, and their history illustrates the importance to the State of maintaining a national Church as the symbol and bond of nationality. Dr. Neale and Dean Stanley long ago pointed out the parallelism between the cases of the Armenian and English Churches. In both lies the principle of national independence, compatible with true Catholicism, yet protesting against the infallibility of any one branch of the Church Catholic. In this work there is first a short history of the Church in Armenia, followed by a lengthy survey of its doctrine, rule, discipline, liturgy, and literature, with an appreciation of its present position and influence in the Near East. The account of doctrine, local customs, and ritual, of the clergy, and of the power of the laity is full and excellent. The book should be indispensable to students of comparative ecclesiology. Its chief value lies in the fact that it is written from within by a learned man who for many years held a high and important position in the Church. Colonel Gregory has given us a careful and sympathetic translation.

Through Dante's Land: Impressions in Tuscany. By MRS. COLQUHAN GRANT. Illustrated. John Long. 12s. 6d. net.)

IN this book Dante's land is made the scene of some adventures on the part of quite modern folk. We have first of all a squire from the County of Crowshire, whose conversation with his sister elucidates the treasures of the historic soil. The advent of a lady with second-rate airs and graces from the same county leads, by way of a reluctant companionship, to further explanations and discussions concerning the monuments of Sunny Italy. Before long the undesirable lady is disposed of, and her situation as receiver of information is carried on by two charming Americans, one of whom provides food for a most unexpected tragedy of the affections in the course of the final couple of pages. The book is pleasantly enough written, and contains some admirable photographs of Florence, Camaldoli, the Castle of Poppi, Vallambrosa, and similar spots. The scheme on which it has been elaborated is, nevertheless, not a happy one. The incidents of fiction seem to blend somewhat ill with the realities of travel and information, and vice versa. It is not always wise to attempt to kill two birds with one stone; in this instance both have been merely wounded. Not that the book should be misjudged from this latter phrase. It is both readable and useful—but it might have been better.

Gates of the Dolomites. By L. MARION DAVIDSON. Illustrated. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

THE Dolomites could scarcely have found a champion more ardent than Miss Davidson. Since 1905, she explains, "it has been my endeavour to enter and leave the Dolomites by every possible and sometimes seemingly impossible way during my thirteen visits, which, all counted up, together represent well over a year spent in the Mountain-land." The present book is the result of her numerous visits to the country of picturesque peaks, the geography of which, as the author explains, is familiar to so very few of the travelling world.

It will not be Miss Davidson's fault if this ignorance continues; for her book is comprehensive and thorough, and leads the reader to many of the least accessible and most fascinating neighbourhoods of this curious region. In many respects the work falls within the guide-book category; but the details of the various centres, routes, and hotels are pleasantly varied by the numerous incidents and minor adventures which are inevitable in a country such as this. In order, moreover, to add to the scope of the subject, Miss Davidson has enlisted the services of allied pens. Thus Sir Melville Beachcroft supplies an introductory couple of pages, and Miss Adeline Edwards the details of some very interesting ascents, while Mr. F. M. Spencer Thomson contributes some valuable matter on the Flora of the Dolomites and on the Tyrolese and their origin. To lovers of the mountain country the book cannot fail to be of interest.

Early History of the Christian Church from its Foundation to the End of the Fifth Century. By MONSIGNOR LOUIS DUCHESNE. Rendered into English from the Fourth Edition. Volume II. (John Murray. 9s. net.)

THERE are many histories of the Early Church, yet the student will surely find room in his library for a work from so learned a scholar as Mgr. Duchesne. This volume is in effect the story of the great Arian controversy and partly of the Donatist schism. Mgr. Duchesne is a writer of judicial mind and impartial criticism. He does not waste time in tilting at ecclesiastical windmills, but where criticism is necessary he is unsparing. His historical method is that of Lord Acton. He deals with the mistakes of the orthodox in the same spirit with which he judges the enemies of the Church. He is not devoid of humour. The faithful historian is not always a grata persona with the rigid ecclesiastic, whether Roman or Protestant. But this fact is one of the best tests of his claim to write history. The days of Froude and Macaulay are passing, and we live in an age when history must, as it were, stand the searchlight of a court of justice. Historical research must be as keen as scientific investigation. There can be no suppressio veri in the interests of persons or parties. Here Acton and Creighton clashed. Mgr. Duchesne is fearless. His judgments are refreshing. Thus alone can any true estimate be formed of periods of raging controversy. Therefore his work will be read and appreciated by all who are able to understand history in a spirit of detachment.

An Athenian Critic of Athenian Democracy. Being a Translation of the "De Republica Atheniensium." By FRANCIS BROOKS, M.A. (David Nutt. 1s. 6d. net.)

THE little essay of "The Old Oligarch," as Professor Gilbert Murray dubbed the anonymous author of "The Athenian Polity," is almost as pregnant with political interest for us as for those amongst whom its author moved. No man has ever appreciated more fully the strength of an island having command of the sea, and the weakness of a democracy. With regard to the tone of the essay, we are at variance with Mr. Brooks when he adopts the view that "the effect of irony is due solely to a cold and passionless detachment on the part of the writer, who sets forth his facts statistically and without emotion, and leaves the reader to pass upon them what judgment he pleases." Such a view is in our opinion unjustifiable in the face of the biting irony and bitter scorn with which the whole composition is impregnated, and the obvious insincerity of such praise as is bestowed. However, this is a question which does not affect the value of the translation, which is sufficiently close to convey the spirit of the original. But why does Mr. Brooks call the latter the "De Republica Atheniensium"? For all that appears to the contrary, one might imagine that the work was composed in the Latin tongue.

Sonnets and Ballate of Guido Cavalcanti. With Translations of them and an Introduction by EZRA POUND. (Stephen Swift and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

GUIDO CAVALCANTI, little known in England, has been considered by some Italian critics of repute as second to Dante alone among their lyrical poets. In spite of an occasional exaggerated preciosity and an occasional crabbedness, Mr. Ezra Pound has made it possible for the English reader to understand him. For the most part the translation keeps pace admirably with the text, and he that, unconversant with Italian, will read Mr. Pound will have read also Guido Cavalcanti. Mr. Pound believes in an absolute rhythm, and, finding its perfection in Cavalcanti, he has aimed at repeating it in his own verses. Originally he intended a prose translation, but, as he whimsically observes, "I cannot trust the reader to read the Italian for the music after he has read my English for the sense." Love and Death are the matter of the Sonnets and the Ballate, as they are of the "Vita Nuova." The identity of Guido's lady is lost with "les neiges d'antan." The colours of his palette are many, but his favourite harmonies are born of the sunshine and the spring—

> Avete in voi li fiori, e la verdura,
> E ciò che luce, o è bello a vedere.
> Risplende più, che 'l sol vostra figura.

—"Thou hast in thee the flower and the green."

Fiction

Darnely Place. By RICHARD BAGOT. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

SETTING aside the deference due to the consideration of the work of an expert in his own line, as is Mr. Bagot on Italian people, we must confess that "Darnely Place" wearied us, and would further venture to hazard a guess that it wearied the author too. There is nothing pronouncedly Italian, particularly English, nor especially anything about the setting of the story. The characters, unless we except the dog—who is charming—are not alive enough to excite any real interest in what they do or in what becomes of them, and they show a tendency to play with old nursery toys in the way of stage-properties, disappointing in children of so experienced a parent as Mr. Bagot. The people seem to be in the author's mind merely as puppets, used to demonstrate a theory. The theory does grasp our attention when it is first introduced, for the idea of visible psychic phenomena produced at third hand, traceable to a memory in the brain of a dead man and controlling the destinies of several living people, is certainly a scheme worth dressing puppets for.

This idea is all there is in the book, and Mr. Bagot has not had the courage to carry the thing through. In fact, having allowed us to see exciting visions of, as it were, the whole Cheshire cat, he withdraws, as the story goes on, more and more of the body and head of the animal, leaving us at length gazing in disappointment at a mere grin, and a half-hearted one at that. We are led to believe that either the materialist or Mr. Bagot, or some other agency out to spoil a good idea, must have suggested that a scene in the memory of a man, cast into the brain of another man, and out at length through a third brain—was a longer chain of psychic connection than any "reasonable Public" would accept. Hence the end of the story, where we find the second link, as we are led to think him, shedding false names and everything else, and declaring himself to be—with all the proofs that novelists keep in their store cupboards—the original villain of the original drama, "not dead after all."

This is a disappointment, for we had really hoped that when, through his gifts as a medium, this rather unconvincing person cast pictures of ancient events casually before a young descendant of the actors in the old story, he was passing on impressions conveyed to him by a dead and repentant villain. That would have been splendid and rather exciting—the whole bag of tricks exploited psychically—love, villainy, remorse, revenge, and restitution. Mr. Bagot, however, does us out of this, and really anyone who can delight us—as, in one grateful recollection, he has done—ought to show better stage management.

The book, on its own declaration, should figure for classification on the list headed "Ideas"; it does not claim a place among those catalogued as stories, tragedies, comedies, or character studies: it should, of course, be judged accordingly. When, however, the author maliciously deprives it of the greater force of the very idea itself, the critic feels inclined to shake his head and declare that he "won't play."

Rusted Hinges. By ST. CLAIR HARNETT. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

A PUBLISHER'S note concerning this book states that it is "a thing so novel in its form as to prick the interest of the most jaded reviewer." We would fain corroborate this statement, but confess that we find in "Rusted Hinges" a hotch-potch of mediæval romance—variety carried to such lengths that it becomes wearisome through its disconnectedness. Here and there, in the earlier chapters, we catch glimpses, faint though they may be, of that spirit of romance which the author invokes, but hardly evokes. Toward the end of the book we begin to feel that its author has grasped at the spirit in half a hundred different ways, and somehow has failed to clutch it. Had he made one decided grasp rather than these many little efforts, he would probably have achieved greater success.

His direct address to the reader is rather out of date, yet Mr. Harnett insists on using it. He affects mediæval style, too, to a rather irritating extent: "'proaching" for "approaching" strikes us as an unfortunate mannerism, rather than a means of conveying the spirit and atmosphere of a half-forgotten period. But we have said enough by way of criticism, and we grant that here and there Mr. Harnett evokes a real thrill, and betrays a capacity for writing fiction of a certain order which causes us to hope that we may hear of him again in work of more solid and—we regret to confess it—a more conventional form. It is unwise for the beginner, as Mr. Harnett appears to be, to attempt a reversal of the accepted forms of fiction writing. Innovations of that kind may be attempted when a man has won his spurs in whatever field he elects to fight. To attain success in the setting of a new fashion demands genius of a very high order, or extraordinary luck. When the possession of such genius has been proved, the attempt may be made, but it is unwise for a beginner to trust to luck to such an extent as is displayed here.

Told by the Ayah. By ADVENA HEARLE. (J. Baker and Son, Clifton. 1s. net.)

THE ayah, or Indian nurse, is a personage of some importance in an Anglo-Indian household, especially in the care of the children, whom she has to look after day and night. These stories, told by an ayah to her little charges in India, in the hot weather, when the hours pass wearily, will carry back many an English mother and child to the happy days of the latter's early youth, before the inevitable separation of Anglo-Indian families dealt its deadly blow on family life. The subjects are of common kind, of Indians of various classes from the Raja to the dacoit, and of animals from the crocodile to the jackal, in a setting of fairyland. They were taken down from the ayah's narrative, and have been well and clearly translated. They will entertain all young children and their parents too. It is a cheap gift-book for the young folk which they will value greatly.

Shorter Notices

FOLLOWING the example set by Lytton in his great historical romances, Lieut.-Colonel Haggard permits fiction to lead history blindfold in "THE ROMANCE OF BAYARD" (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.), and relates how Marguerite, sister of the then King of France, followed Bayard to his battles after disguising herself as a trumpeter, in company with no less a figure from English history than Anne Boleyn, also disguised in male attire. How far history countenances these extravagances it is not for us to say, but they make up an exceedingly diverting story until the moment in which the preux chevalier expires in his Marguerite's arms. The characters are well presented, though the author insists too much on their virtues and vices. It is quite unnecessary to describe a brave or contemptible deed, and then write a paragraph, or mayhap a page, informing the reader that the aforesaid deed was brave or contemptible, as the case might be; it is, moreover, but a poor compliment to the reader's intelligence. Still, Colonel Haggard has caught the flavour of the times concerning which he writes, and we wish he had given us all the story of Bayard, rather than the story of the only love-affair in which—so we are assured—the great knight played a part.

A rather slender love story is used in "THE BROAD WALK" (Constable and Co., 6s.) as a peg on which to hang certain descriptions of Russian life and character. M. Leonie Aminoff is decidedly epigrammatic, using that word in its best sense, and there are a number of witty little passages in the book which atone, in some measure, for the disjointed style in which it is written. This latter, doubtless, is consequent on the nationality of the author, who, however, displays a remarkable familiarity with English writers, classic and otherwise, in a number of extremely apposite quotations. Viewing the book as a whole, it forms a well-told series of incidents, but these are so loosely strung together, and the reader's attention is switched to such an extent from one to another that, at the end, one is left with the sense of a series of unrelated stories rather than of one tale. It is, however, excellent light reading, and, as such, will find its public.

Summing up his own work, and finally disposing of his characters, Mr. Bohun Lynch terms his book, GLAMOUR (John Murray, 6s.), "a fitful commentary," and the phrase is most apt. The story concerns modern Greece, an unlikely spot in which to find glamour of the sort which the hero set out to find, but Chrysoula, the little Greek heroine of the story, contents him—when he has won her. In the winning lies all the plot that the book possesses. We confess to a genuine regard for Hull, the adventurer for whom glamour no longer exists, but confess, also, that we find his strenuous career a trifle overdrawn. Hull is too complete; he has lived too many lives in too many parts of the world to be quite real. The writer knows his Greece, and the Greek character, in so far as the book expresses it, is well drawn. The Homeric fight with which the story concludes will provide a thrill even for the most hardened and blasé novel-reader. For that alone the book is worth reading.

Ianthe Cavendish has thoroughly enjoyed writing every line of what was evidently no task. Without the smallest effort, and with a great deal of spontaneous belief in them and herself, she presents us with three delightful people in "DOCTOR BROWN'S PARTNER" (Ham-Smith, 6s.), moving in a crowd of very reasonable satellites. The setting of the story, a "Cure House" run on novel lines by a young doctor with a personality, allied to a thoroughly well-bred snob of a partner, may not be new, but the author's conviction of the freshness and glory of her mise-en-scène persuades the reader into believing the idea to be a new one. Doctor Jack is a delightful person. He poses as the son of a Jewish rag-and-bone merchant in order the more triumphantly to subdue the young arrogance and girlish stubbornness of his guest and patient—the daughter of a Ducal Viceroy; and later on turns into a Duke, with a subtle sense of humour and the opportune quite as irresistible to the reader as the man himself becomes to the haughty young woman whom he loves. The patients are carefully not allowed to become caricatures—although the American Mrs. Locke narrowly escapes that fate. From her, however, we get one sentence so splendid that we can forgive much, both to the widow of Josias P. Locke and her creator: "No one could doubt the respect I show to the memory of Josias P. Locke in all Kensal Green Cemetery, and I reckon you won't find such a real sweet sarcophagus as I had erected over him, myself in marble weeping on the top!"

Much is being written just now on Wales and its people, and students who are unable to study on the spot may find in "PICTURE TALES FROM WELSH HILLS" (T. Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.) many illustrations of habits of thought and life as foreign to their ken as those of a far country. Speaking from personal knowledge, we can say that there is no corner of the world in which an Englishman feels so strange and out of touch as in some Welsh valley where the people cannot or will not speak English. The best of the stories, and the most characteristic, is "The Way He Went." The authoress gives a new version of a well-known rhyme:—

> Taffy was a Welshman and a thief was he;
> Taffy came to my house, and stole my heart from me.
> I went to Taffy's house as one goes from home,
> There I set my own house and seek no more to roam.

In "THE WOOING OF MARGARET TREVENNA," by Roy Meldrum (Andrew Melrose, 6s.) we have a tale of the seventeenth century well told, and full of incident from beginning to end. The wooing of Margaret—the reputed daughter of a country squire—by a highwayman, a heretofore gentleman of title and estate, is delightful and exciting. Her escape from a tyrannical stepmother who tries to induce her to marry a man she does not love; his escape from the officers of the King, a price having been put on his head; and their subsequent devotion in helping a plague-stricken village of three hundred poor souls furnish ample material for a story well worth the reading.

By W. H. KOEBEL.

FOR a good many decades the English Channel has been the subject of much ingenious thought. The unpopularity of its waves has given rise to innumerable schemes for their avoidance. Indeed, were someone to take the trouble to write a really comprehensive article concerning the various plans—sane and otherwise—which have been brought forward to this particular end, the result would be notable in the way of a revelation in the workings of the more imaginative human mind. For, as regards the general schemes contemplated, the famous tunnel, which not only was discussed and argued about, but the working of which was actually begun, formed only one of the numerous feats of the imagination. Although ambitious, there was, in the light of modern achievements, nothing wild or bizarre in the plan. It was otherwise with the amazing and wonderful bridges pictured by those experts whose minds had apparently become heated to an altogether undue extent in their frenzied efforts to foil the particular waters which have probably exerted a more malign influence over a larger number of human interiors than any other stretch of sea in the world. There is no doubt that in one sense the evil reputation of the Channel has been unjustly come by. It is due, that is to say, rather to the number of passengers who float uncomfortably on its surface than to any especial demerits of its own. In this respect the waters of the English Channel have much in common with those of the Bay of Biscay. In marine life both these places answer very closely to the Clapham Junction of the railway world. All three are spots of peculiarly crowded traffic, and are therefore subject a thousandfold to the ordinary run of criticism and complaints which attends the general path of the traveller.

It is true that of late years not a few winged men have flown from the coast of one country to that of the other, thus ignoring the waves of the English Channel for the first time in the history of mankind since restless spirits took to trusting themselves on the face of the waters. But such journeys still remain something in the nature of feats, and the ordinary passenger from England to France, or vice versâ, is quite content to remain profoundly unconcerned with any personal experiences of this nature. The methods accepted by the multitude of his fellow-passengers are quite good enough for him, and in this he is no doubt quite right. Hence any new scheme by which he is enabled to travel in company with his fellow ticket-holders is much more likely to meet with general approval than one which involves individual attempt. The latest of these—one, moreover, which seems to be receiving really serious attention from practical and interested quarters—is a project to institute a railway ferry service between England and France. The mail trains, instead of concluding their journey at the water's edge, will be run on to the deck of a great vessel and, having been carried in this way over the Channel, will continue, intact, their journey to the other side. By this means the passenger would be enabled to enter his compartment in London, and remain within it—whether completely undisturbed or not remains to be seen—until the train had reached its destination at Paris or any of the minor French towns.

Once instituted, the possibilities of the scheme are endless. The extension of the various termini of a direct route then would be nothing beyond a matter of arrangement and schedule. For the practical purposes of travel the definition of an island has already been destroyed by the invention of flight. But this, of course, as I have already said, is at present restricted to the very few. So far as unbroken communication is concerned, this ferry would serve the same purpose, less perfectly, it is true, but efficiently enough for all ordinary needs. The idea in itself is fascinating to those who love to travel in sublime ease. To be enabled to see one's impedimenta stored in a compartment at Victoria, Charing Cross, or any other of the London stations, and to remain in undisturbed possession of one's own particular itinerant corner until the arrival at some very distant destination affords a distinctly pleasant prospect. Given the ferry, St. Petersburg—that town which, for some reason or other, we in England alone have canonised—would come very easily within the category of the direct route. And why should not one see at Charing Cross a train embellished with such legends as "Through carriage to China"? There is no reason on earth why this should not come about. On the continent they have already become more or less accustomed to such things. It is only in our island that they would strike with the amazement of the utterly novel.

Railway ferries themselves are, of course, no new things. One of the most important I have seen is in South America. It harnesses the great river Paraná, and connects the former isolated province of Entre Rios with the main centre of Buenos Aires. The length of the journey is, so far as I remember, about sixty miles, and the passage of the steamer-borne train along the silent waters is not a little remarkable to witness. As regards mere length, the enterprise of the Channel is as nothing compared with this. But there are possibilities in the Channel which do not obtain in the sheltered stream of the Paraná. The question naturally arises here: What would happen in the event of a gale? The majority of folk are only too familiar with the sensations caused by a continued disturbance of their bodily equilibrium. What difference is there between rolling in a ship pure and simple, or confined in a railway compartment attached to the deck of a vessel? It is here that one may feel some discouragement concerning the venture; for it seems possible enough that the second state might well prove worse than the first. But this is a matter which the experts have doubtless taken into consideration, and much comfort may be derived from the feats which modern science has achieved in such directions as these.

The Theatre

Three New Plays at the Duke of York's

ROSALIND.

MR. J. M. BARRIE displays all his most charming, most arresting qualities in this tiny comedy. It epitomises his knowledge of the heart of man and his gay and tender imagination. It engages your interest from the first moment to the last; it may touch you to tears, or compel your laughter by a turn of phrase or a fanciful, gay thought. The story is the elemental truth that a woman can be young and middle-aged, in years, at the same time, and that she can enjoy both states with equal delight. But there are a thousand more things than this in the play which Miss Irene Vanbrugh, Mr. Donald Calthrop, and Miss Haye act with fine feeling and deep sincerity and a sense of gaiety and of pathos which is as rare as it is welcome on the English stage. Miss Vanbrugh plays the part of a greatly admired actress who appears like every other woman to be about twenty-nine. She is really middle-aged—"forty and a bittock." So this year, when the summer comes, she goes away, and hides in comfortable, commonplace lodgings, and feels and looks just as old as she likes. But there is her friend Charles, one of a thousand admirers of her youth and liveliness, who happens upon her secret dwelling and mistakes her for the mother of the girl he loves. The most delicious comedy scenes follow upon this situation, for Mr. Donald Calthrop, who plays the boy of twenty-three, is almost as skilful and as resourceful as Miss Vanbrugh herself. How the famous actress disillusionises the boy about his love, how she makes him love the middle-aged woman she is for the moment, how she changes again to the young girl and so off to London to play Rosalind, these things must be seen—and, if you are fortunate, seen several times. The whole play is a pure delight, instinct with the poetry and the sorrow of life; rich in laughter, yet deeply freighted with those half-suppressed tears which such great artists as Mr. Barrie and the lady who plays his heroine allow us to feel rather than to see. Mr. Frohman is, of course, a master of the arts of the theatre, and so he prepares for the enjoyment of the most charming little comedy of our time by presenting us with two dull plays.

OVERRULED.

This is, I am told, admired by those who follow the works of Mr. Bernard Shaw with blind appreciation. The period is yesterday night, and the humour and the acting of the piece appear to belong to the same time, unless, indeed, they have more in common with the day-before-yesterday. The fortunate may find Mr. Shaw's attempted satire on English conventions highly amusing; to us it seems stale and unprofitable. The actors appear well aware that they are boring the audience. The audience shows every sign of sympathy with the actors. The play, in which two husbands and two wives talk of love and separation, and about it and about, is described as a demonstration, and it certainly makes clear the interesting fact that the amusing author of "Fanny's First Play" can be intensely tedious.

THE WIDOW OF WASDALE HEAD.

The reign of George III supplies the period for Sir Arthur Pinero's so-called fantasy, and Mr. Byam Shaw has designed the costumes. As for the rest, it is a made-up story which does not convince us for a moment after the manner of true fantasy. It may be said that Miss Maude, as the widow, and Mr. Fred Kerr, as the ghost of her dead husband, do everything in their power to make us feel interested—but it is not very much. It is not a play to be criticised, but it serves an admirable purpose. It adds by simple contrast to the grace and charm and truth of "Rosalind." After all, to be able to give us one beautiful and successful play out of three is an achievement on which any management should be warmly congratulated.

"Zaza" at Queen's Theatre

THERE is the ring of old, forgotten, far-off theatrical things about the revival of Mr. David Belasco's adaptation of this once widely popular play. Old-fashioned stage characters, old-world pseudo-emotions, passé hysteria, half-remembered tricks, make up the sum of this production. It would appear that the active life of the stage during the last ten years has in no way affected the mind of the management at the Queen's; they have learnt nothing, they have forgotten nothing. All the work of the younger race—from, say, Mr. Shaw to Mr. Macdonald Hastings, counts as of no worth. The outworn conventions of the last century are good enough for the producers of the present "Zaza," and we are glad to admit that they make these effects as telling as it is possible. Just as there are many people who only visit the operas of their youth, so there must be many who enjoy almost extinct plays of long ago. Miss Ethel Warwick, who plays the rôle made famous by Mrs. Leslie Carter and Mrs. Lewis Waller, brings youth and beauty, splendid physical organisation, and a certain unrestrained freshness and strength to her rather ill-requited labour. Zaza is certainly a long and trying part—but Miss Warwick undertakes it with high confidence and bravery. The result is not quite as agreeable as we could wish, but that is one of the faults that is of the essence of the play itself. Miss Warwick's natural gifts and her evident efforts make one wish that she could be seen in some real part, something at least not quite so artificial, theatrical, and of yesterday. As to the play, the story of the café singer who determines to enslave a rather sophisticated man of the world, and does it with the greatest ease although he is happily married, loses him and gains him again when he is free, is already familiar and quite unbelievable. The fact that Mr. Guy Standing plays the part of the willing victim of Zaza's passion makes the story seem a little more improbable than it has sometimes seemed in the past. For he shows us the sort of man who knows his world, the kind of person little inclined to be very devoted—in the last act—to this unreal heroine. However, both he and Miss Warwick look splendid, and present their curious stage characters with even more conviction than one has any right to expect. Occasionally, it is true, both seem a little doubtful as to how to bring their various actions into harmony. But there are scenes in which they understand the theatricality of the situations and play them for even more than they are worth. Some of the minor characters are admirably played. Miss Kate Keary as the aunt of Zaza makes the most of the well-worn humours of a more or less secret alcoholist. Mr. Heath Haviland, too, is excellent as the stage-manager, Joly, but he, like many another accomplished actor in the cast, makes us long for a real play in which they might all shine instead of this thankless souvenir of days that are over, and stage dreams that are done.

"Captain Brassbound's Conversion" at the Little Theatre

THE brilliant attractiveness of Miss Gertrude Kingston's method, and the sincerity and clarity of Mr. Charles Sugden's stage manner, give something more than a touch of freshness and reality to this somewhat tentative and unimportant work by Mr. Bernard Shaw. It was, he tells us, written in 1899, a period when he was feeling his way towards later successes. But the author and many other people consider "Captain Brassbound" an admirable piece of work, epoch-making in its day and for all time. Personally, we think it is an attempt which has rather missed fire, and that although Sir Howard Ballam, the judge, and Lady Cicely Waynflete, his sister-in-law, are clearly drawn, delightful characters, Brassbound and the rest are uncertain, of the world of shadows, unconvincing in a marked degree. And yet with all its crudities and careless faults it is a far better entertainment than half of those produced in town. And the revival at the Little Theatre—with its pleasant, fresh decoration, its intimate and agreeable atmosphere—should be seen by all who are interested in the rapid progress of the stage. As we have said, two at least of the actors are immensely attractive in themselves, and then, from the point of view of the history of the stage, it is intensely interesting to note just how wayward and old-fashioned a play of 1899 stands forth in 1912.

DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU.

IN the October number we find an account by Herr Ermatinger of the relations between Gottfried Keller and the Dunckers—a Berlin publisher and his relations. The problem of Keller's passion for Frau Duncker's sister is only partially solved by the hitherto unpublished letters contained in the article; the next number, however, may help us. It is interesting to note that some of the first-hand materials for the characterisation of the persons concerned are due to the veteran editor of the Rundschau, Herr Julius Rodenberg. Herr August Fournier tells the story of the Viennese secret police, from its origins under Joseph II to its complicated activities during the Congress of Vienna; we learn, for instance, that Lord Castlereagh was careful to engage his maid-servants without the assistance of the native authorities; even that did not save him from police observation. Professor Federico Hermanin explains, with the aid of a map, the excavations planned in Rome by Professor Ricci; the scheme is to include the restoration of the forums of Augustus and Nerva, and the extension of the forum of Trajan to something like its original limits. Professor Hermanin incidentally defends these excavations from an æsthetic point of view. Herr Schneegans gives a study of Rousseau, and Herr Ernst Zahn contributes a story, to be concluded in the next number.

LE MERCURE DE FRANCE.

September 16.—The correspondence between Baudelaire's mother and his intimate friend, Charles Asselineau, contains some very pathetic passages. For instance, during the last illness of the poet, his mother writes:—"On m'a dit qu'il peut dire maintenant: bonjour, Monsieur. Je désirerais savoir s'il le dit spontanément, de lui-même, quand on va le voir, ou bien s'il le répète après M. Duval qui l'exerce à prononcer quelques mots." The disintegration and swan-song of geniuses are studied from a more powerful point of view by Dr. Paul Voivenel—Nietzsche, Rousseau, Schumann, and Maupassant serving as his examples. M. Georges Batault, in his long article—"Les Tendances de la Poésie Contemporaine"—is optimistic and informing. He recognises in modern French poetry a loss of interest in history, but claims for it "la redécouverte de la vie."

October 1.—Mme. Alexandra Davidson contributes a spirituel account of her interview at Kalimpong, "l'Avignon du Dalaï-Lama," with that august personage. Anne-Marie and Charles Lalo discuss at some length the abuse of the man of science as a dramatic character. M. Lauret writes of the Prussian poet-patriot von Kleist and his decadent notions. Tschaikowsky is also shown in a bad light, as inflated with ambition, and as jealously unjust to such names as Beethoven and Wagner, by M. Gauthier-Villars. M. Charles Chassé's investigations into Mallarmé's career as "professeur d'anglais" make delightful reading. The poet seems to have been very incompetent, but, in his own way, extremely conscientious. The verdict of a pupil is given: "Le père Mallarmé, on ne fiche rien dans sa classe; pas étonnant, il écrit tout le temps pour des journaux de mode." Space forbids us to explain the grounds of this charge. As a specimen of Mallarmé's educational writings, the translation of "fell a rubbing" by "tomba un frottant" should suffice.

LA REVUE.

September 15.—An "enquête" on "le monde sans l'or," conducted by M. Finot, does not impress us very much, except by the eminence of the contributors. The hypothesis is that the mediæval problem is about to be solved, and that it will be possible to manufacture gold; the general verdict is that it will make very little difference. Two great historical examples of platonic affection—Saint François de Sales and Jeanne de Chantal, Michael Angelo and Vittoria Colonna—are treated by M. Faguet and M. Edouard Schuré respectively. M. Mikaal Warandian waxes eloquent to the point of bombast on the Armenians as successful revolutionaries in Turkey, Russia, and Persia. M. de Tarlé discusses military service in Australia, and Mme. Marguerite Coleman gives an amusing account of "les clubs excentriques de Londres."

La Revue Bleue.

September 7.—M. Werner Söderhjelm explains the Finnish grievance against Russia; the Finns are neither Russians nor Swedes; "chacun sait ici que notre culture dépend tout entière de notre indépendance politique," and Russia is trying to destroy both. M. Régis Michaud writes at length on Walter Pater. M. Jacques Lux reviews a translation of Mr. Churton Collins' book on Voltaire, Rousseau, and Montesquieu in England, and also the Comte d'Antioche's work on Chateaubriand as ambassador to this country. M. Cleray narrates the fortunes of the Chancellerie at its old home in the Place Vendôme, M. Albalat tells us how to read Bossuet, and M. Duboscq discusses the results for France of the Tripoli campaign.

September 14.—Madame de Bovet knocks to pieces a dictum of Nietzsche's against learning foreign languages. M. Sanzède gives the history of the hospitality which the University of Grenoble has extended to foreign students. The souvenirs of de Pastoret conclude with some vivid pictures of the débâcle of 1812, and with some naive reflexions on the ingratitude of, for instance, the Prussians. M. J. Giraud recounts Musset's protests against Thiers' press-law of 1835; they seem to illustrate the incapacity of inspired poets for effective satire. M. Lucien Maury discusses Wagner's Memoirs.

September 21.—M. Paul Flat has a turn at Wagner, his theme being the insincerity of formal memoirs. In this and the following numbers chapters are given of M. Romain Rolland's impending tenth volume of "Jean Christophe." M. Lémonon considers the Mediterranean situation; he enumerates the factors that excuse Mr. Churchill's move, and believes in "l'effort militaire considérable qu'a fait et que fait chaque jour l'Angleterre," whereby her land forces will soon offer a quid pro quo for French naval co-operation. M. Henri Jacoubet begins some "Notes d'un Passant" in the Far East. M. Jacques Gautier sees in the recent Congress of Moral Education at The Hague the beginnings of an understanding between the representatives of religious and secular education.

September 28.—Letters of Goethe to his young admirer and interpreter, Carlyle, are given. They illustrate the "grand seigneur," and contain an amusing passage, very much in the style of a tourist agency, recommending Gotha as an educational centre for the English "young person." A misprint that seems to reveal a futurist compositor tells us that "l'intérêt suprême pour l'homme c'est en définitive l'ohmme." M. de Lada introduces the Polish dramatist, Stanislas Wyspianski, who is in course of being translated. M. Charles Bernard talks about Giotto, St. Francis, and Assisi. M. Dumont-Wilden points out the danger to French culture of a Walloon separatist movement in Belgium.

L'Action Nationale.

In the September number General Lebas concludes his reflections on the command of the French Army, M. Jèze answers M. Guyot and defends Italian national insurance, and M. Paul Louis makes out a terrible indictment against home industries. M. Norel deprecates the insufficient testing in the recent manœuvres of submarines, an arm of warfare which, he thinks, will dominate the future; in another place he ridicules the Franco-Russian naval convention. M. Auge-Laribé estimates that French agriculture is holding its own, and, with adaptations, will continue its sound and beneficial career. M. Leroy begins a historical sketch of internationalism.

La Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Litterature.

September 7.—M. Maspero partly reviews and partly uses as a peg for his own theories Herr Kurt Sethe's account of the myth of the eyes of the Sun, and Dr. Boeser's contribution to the Egyptology of the Leyden Museum: "Quand on a vécu longtemps en Egypte," certain things are more easily explained. M. Plattard reviews M. Oulmont's "Pierre Gringore," who seems to have really been a very "bourgeois" poet. M. de Curzon praises M. Pichon's "Fra Angelico," lately noticed in THE ACADEMY.

September 14.—M. G. Maspero's contribution deals in the most complimentary fashion with the Theban excavations of Lord Carnarvon and Mr. Howard Carter. M. Jean Maspero reviews Mr. Quibell's "Excavations at Saggara." M. Biovès considers that M. Raymond Guyot, in his big work on the Foreign Policy of the Directory, has not refuted Sorel nor justified the Directors.

September 21.—M. Maspero notices, among other works, M. Raymond Weill's "Décrets Royaux de l'Ancien Empire Egyptien," and Herr Junker's account of excavations at Tourah—"un début des fouilles autrichiennes en Egypte et un début particulièrement heureux."

September 28.—M. Fossey reviews books on Oriental religions, among them M. Nils Nilsson's study of Ishtar-worship. This and the first volume of M. Waddington's "History of Prussia," which is discussed by "R.," have been noticed in THE ACADEMY. "R." also notices the eighteenth volume of "Instructions aux Ambassadeurs et Ministres de France"; while "E." deals severely with M. Baudrillart's "Histoire de France," written from a Catholic standpoint.

Art and Life—II

LET us take a glance at what we know of Life, so far as the human brain has been able to tear aside the veil. First let us put aside religion and morals, with which we are wont to befog our concept of life—for religion, when all's said, from a workaday point of view, is the rough and ready compromise between the general concept of conduct of an age on the one hand and a vague following of the ideals of some great founder of conduct on the other. For instance, the white Western peoples affect Christianity, but they are torn with wrangles as to what each man considers to be Christianity, whilst in the bulk they set up a rude law of conduct which is often wholly inimical to the basic ideal of their Teacher—let us take the business community which is concerned from morning to night with profit by usury, with screwing down one neighbour to part with what he has at the lowest price, so that they may sell to another neighbour at the highest price they can compel upon him; here we have the commerce of the people absolutely opposed to the ordering of Christ, who bitterly assailed usury! And so with all religions. Morals again vary from generation to generation, and from people to people. Therefore let us try to see what is known of life by us to-day so far as it can be said to be generally accepted by all civilised folk, whatever their nationality, creed, or codes. Put roughly, and rid of all bias of religion, morals, systems and the rest of it, the general concept of Life, so far as we know of it, runs somewhat thus:

Whence Life comes, whither it goes, these remain the eternal mystery; but that it exists, and that it has increased in fulness, we know. At the back of all, away in the myriads of years, this mystic thing that we call Life essayed from the first to find the fittest lamp in which the flame may burn. Life essayed to fulfil itself in crystals. Baulked by the rigidity of rocks, it dived into the ooze, at first attached to a spot, slowly freeing itself into moving things. Baulked by the waters, it advanced from the fish in the seas to the reptile that could move on sea or land; and for æons, in the forms of mighty reptiles, it sought a wider fulfilment; baulked again, it evolved for itself the forms that could fly in the air, and from the great flying pterodactyl it took to itself the feathered flight of birds. Baulked again, but in each endeavour finding ever fuller and higher forms, it evolved for itself the forms of animals, essayed fleetness, power, strength, bulk, ferocity; built for itself the great forms of lithe cats and essayed to fulfil itself in the brutal ferocity of lions. Baulked again, life turned and sought fuller intelligence in the agile bodies of apes. At last, out of the mystic way, the eager life that is at the core of all existing things, evolving from stage to stage, and, in order further to fulfil itself, requiring to create for itself a more perfect lamp in which to flame, finds its supreme habitation in a wondering creature that drops from its ape-like habits in the trees and with ungainly straddle on the firm earth, takes its upright stand upon tentative hind legs—falteringly, hesitatingly, ready to drop on all fours at a stumble, bodying itself forth as Man, the Thinking Thing! Life's cunning, with increase of cunning, notes the hand's use and the value of that wondrous thumb that is on the hand—to grip, to throw, to hold. That Cunning, that is become reason in this blinking thing that thinks! That Thumb that, with the brain's cunning for guidance, is to chip tools and weapons from the flint, and give confidence to this otherwise defenceless being and lead him from his lair in the thicket and the cave out into the open strife that, for the body's sustenance and welfare, with pitfall and with gin, is to put to naught the lion's strength, the wolf's tooth, the wild-boar's fury, so that he shall wrap the skins of these powerful brutes about him against the frost's nipping cold, and use their hides to save his feet from wounds; that is to strike fire from the chill flint and bring warmth in the chattering winter, and give rise to the potter's art whereby also the earth's metals shall yield their ductile strength to his further enfranchisement; that is to break the dog and the horse to his bidding, and gather together flocks and herds that he may roam the pastures of the world; and, the wander-years being done, that is to fashion the plough whereby he shall settle on the land, and till the ruddy earth, and gather in the harvest to his body's use; that is to invent the distaff and the spinning-wheel to the weaving of cloth; that is to achieve the making of the fisher's net; that is to make the vast wide world tributary to him—the elements and the brutes, the valley and the plain and rock and stream and the raging seas, so that the exquisite eye of man shall see the stars a myriad leagues beyond the eagle's ken, his skill of transit make the swiftness of antelopes a sluggard's pace, his calculating hand cage the strength of many horses in the machinery's intricacies.

Now, mark this well! Life evolves; creating for its increase of fulfilment always a higher type. At the same time, it persists in all its earliest forms, the types degrading as they fall away from forward endeavour, and becoming subject to the higher types.

Mark well also another fact. Man, the thinking thing, from his lair in cave and thicket, increases his strength in the close-knit brotherhood of the clan. He foregathers in the valley Councils; thence makes fellowship in the village, uniting his strength with the skill and strength of others, until he that has the potter's skill barters his skill with him who has skill in battle; and he that has the builder's skill barters with these and with him that has the metal-worker's skill; and thus and so the trades and crafts arose to the mutual strengthening of the people; and power and increase of fulness of life, passing from the wild fellow of the cavern and the lake to the wandering tribe, passed therefrom to the settled village, and from them that made their narrow habitations in villages to them that foregathered within the stout walls of the populous city—from the city to the state, that crumbled the city's walls, grown inadequate against the power of states; from the state to the mighty races that are fenced about to their uttermost frontiers solely by the vast bulwarks of their daring spirits.

Now let us note well, as we go, as life fulfils itself towards fuller power and experience as it pushes forward, that the simple speech of grunts that was the stammering intercourse of the naked thing which, with low frowning brow, brooded upon but the scant desires and mean wants of his narrow cave, yielded a larger converse that demanded a fuller range of words at the valley's gatherings; speech that in turn acquired a fuller gamut in the village's debate; this in its turn brought forth the richer communion of the orchestral city's multitudinous voice; which by turn passed into the twilight of dead discarded things, giving birth to the wider accents of the state; until even the language of the state, grown parochial, fades and slowly dies, and in dying gives place to the deep august, far-reaching communion of the race.

Grasping this rough tangle through which life has developed the body in which it shall fulfil itself to the uttermost, so far as it has developed, let us next seek the means by which, through the human, it has achieved the fulness. It is clear that in evolving man as its supreme lamp in which to flame, life in man has thereby arrived above the brutes by some faculty that is denied to the brutes. That faculty is as clearly the power to commune with the intelligence of one's fellows, and to become partakers in their intelligence. Obviously, this faculty of intelligent communion is, next to life itself, the most important and significant factor in the life of man. In what manner has it been granted to us so to commune with our fellows? On the answer depends our significance, as men above the brutes; and the answer is clear. We are granted the power to exchange our intelligence by two means: we can exchange our thoughts and we can exchange our feelings. Speech is the means whereby we exchange our thoughts, or, if you will, the means whereby we exchange our reasons. Art is the means whereby we exchange our feelings—the means whereby we pour into the sensing of our fellow-men that which we have sensed. It may seem at first blush to the unthinking that speech is only a part of the communing of our sensing, but it is not so; it is only when speech is employed in such a way that it disregards reason and is compelled into such forms as to create illusion and so arouse our sensing that it becomes Art—or what we call the poetry of prose or verse.

HALDANE MACFALL.

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

THERE has been a good deal of quiet sniping going on during the week about the recent Chinese loan in the shape of questions—all leading up to why the Government have acted as they did. It is clear that Edward Grey is very angry with Charles Birch Crisp; the Six-Power Group appear to have acted exactly like an Oxford moneylender, inasmuch as they attempted to treat the heathen Chinee like a simple undergraduate. Instead of lending him hard cash, they wanted to fob off part of it in metaphorical bad cigars and worthless works of art. China knew her own business best, and, advised by Dr. Morrison, concluded a loan with the audacious young Crisp, who gave her hard cash untrammelled by onerous conditions. Questions have been answered acidly, and Ministers have done their best to queer Crisp's pitch by "bearing" his stock; I should not be at all surprised if one day soon we have a debate on the subject, when the whole story will be told, and I understand the Foreign Office will not come too well out of it.

William O'Brien, with that sprite-like spirit of mischief which sometimes possesses him, continued to make both the Government and the Nationalists sit up by an amendment on Wednesday to the effect that, if the Land Purchase scheme was not complete within three years after the passing of Home Rule, the Dublin Parliament might take it over. He declared that Gladstone had given a similar pledge in 1893.

Birrell jumped up at once. He could not accept the amendment, but he gave the sacred word of honour of the Government that they would not leave Land Purchase where it was, and he went on to say, in a remark which I think will be much quoted, that "Land Purchase was more important than Home Rule." Carson replied: When the Unionist Government agreed to lend 120 millions of money to Ireland, they did not anticipate Home Rule; 80 millions had been advanced; but, if Ireland wanted to manage her own affairs, why should she look to England to finance her? Both parties were pledged to Land Purchase, but that was so long as the countries were one.

Redmond was evidently alarmed; honestly it did not seem to have occurred to him. He was taken by surprise, and talked about this being a great Imperial policy; to suggest anything else was dishonourable and treacherous. Austen did not mince matters. As an Englishman, he was not at all sure he considered himself bound to the bargain when the conditions were so different; and in the end O'Brien withdrew his petit ballon d'essai.

The closure has a demoralising effect on the House, quite apart from the obvious disadvantages. When it is arranged that the guillotine falls at 7.30 and 10.30, members soon pick out the amendments which will last, and the bulk of them leave the Chamber and go about their business until quite close to the time when they think the division will be taken. An empty House is always discouraging, and the debate becomes mechanical.

The financial relations came up on Thursday, and Hayes Fisher—who, to our delight, is coming to the fore again—upset a lot of Radical Scotsmen by describing how Ireland might act if she were free to make her own fiscal arrangements. Gigantic Eugene Wason, Captain Pirie, and MacCallum Scott were all on their feet. They did not like the idea at all. With the mechanical gag on the House, their own gags have been removed; they are free to talk as much as they please—it leaves less time for Unionist criticism—and they availed themselves of it, but in a way the Government did not like.

Birrell was not in command, so the Infant Samuel, smooth-lipped and calm, went on to the bridge. He said the powers under the Bill were very limited; if Ireland reduced taxation, she would lose by it. "Yes," said Bonar Law, "but if the Imperial Chancellor reduced the duty on tobacco and tea before the Irish Parliament reduced it, the British would lose by it, but the Irish Exchequer would not be a penny the worse." This rather gravelled Samuel, but he got a large mechanical majority, who had not the faintest idea what it was all about.

On the question of the Post Office, the policy of the Unionists was further developed by Carson. In effect, he said, we do not mind losing money in Ireland when she is a part of the whole: because it was only right that the richer partner should contribute to the poorer. Bonar Law subscribed to the same doctrine; the moment Ireland chose to set herself up as practically an independent kingdom or colony, from that moment, without any spirit of revenge, but simply on the principle that our first duty was to our own people, the Unionists would put their own interests first, and money would be spent on Ireland afterwards.

"What becomes of Colonial preference?" sneered Churchill. "We intend to treat the Colonies," was the reply, "better than we treat any foreign country, but we do not intend to treat them as we treat ourselves. They do not do it to us, or expect it. Ireland cannot have it both ways"; and he ended by saying he thought the division of the Post Office a grave danger in case of war.

Friday is rapidly becoming what hunting men call a "bye-day." We have Home Rule all the week, and on Fridays oddments. Last Friday we had the Foot and Mouth Disease in Ireland. The veteran Squire of Blankney moved that the matter be considered, and it was—all the afternoon. The Irish naturally want the embargo removed, and declare that all risk of infection is over; moreover, it is causing enormous loss to the Irish cattle trade. T. W. Russell and Runciman vigorously defended the action of their respective departments, and promised to relax the operations of the order directly they could see their way to do so.

There was something more than a ripple on the placid waters of the debate at one time. T. W. Russell, with champing bit, complained of the action of some Unionist members in spreading rumours which had the effect of poisoning the public mind against the Irish Department, and pointedly referred to a question Lord Balcarres had put in the summer. The usually calm Unionist Whip was on his feet in an instant—in fact, I feared he was going to vault the table. He described it as a gross personal attack, of a most unjustifiable character, of which he had had no notice; he denied it in toto, and challenged the Right Hon. T. W. to quote his words. T. W. shrank from his square-shouldered opponent, and at once withdrew everything.

The motion was talked out. It is true it had been considered, but that was about all.

Monday was a dullish day. The Premier, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Long were welcomed back to their places. The latter would have received cheers from all parts of the House after his Canadian tour if he had not quietly slipped in when Bonar Law was speaking. At question time Asquith denied that he said "my" Government in his telephone dispatch—the words were "His Majesty's" Government, and it was a mistake by somebody else that it appeared otherwise.

The first amendment was to omit the control of the Protestant Universities from the Home Rule Government. Birrell was at first inclined to refuse, under the searching criticism of James Campbell; but Mr. Redmond unexpectedly gave way, saying testily, "If any body of his countrymen said they really wanted these safeguards, in God's name let them have them." Upon this, Birrell also abandoned the position; but William Moore chaffed him so much at being so obviously under the thumb of the Dictator that he sulkily said, "It does not encourage the Government to grant concessions if this is the spirit in which they are received."

Sydney Goldman, the little member for Falmouth, immersed in matters of big finance in the City, always finds time to study carefully and to consider his agenda-paper, and from time to time puts down questions or motions which have real substance in them. This afternoon he started what, in Committee language, is called a "runner," which ran for the rest of the evening; it was briefly to the effect that labour legislation should be removed from the purview of the Dublin House of Commons. He made an interesting speech, which was replied to by Ramsay MacDonald. The Labour leader, as usual, meekly supported the Government. This brought Mr. Balfour to his feet; time was, when the new Labour men came into the House in 1906, that they were very rude to the ex-Tory leader. When they heard his deliberate and hesitating method of speech—often retracing his steps two or even three times to get the exact word to express his shade of meaning—they looked at each other and said, "Is this the great Mr. Balfour? Why, he can't speak for nuts!" They howled him down with contemptuous unparliamentary cries; but they know better now. His gentle manner, the light, graceful touch of his epigram, and the ingenuity of his arguments charmed them as he captured the older members long ago. One shrewd observer whispered to me, "They take from Balfour what they would not take from Bonar Law." Mr. Balfour, in a searching analysis, tied the Labour men up in a knot. Home Rule has been declared to be the model on which a far larger and more comprehensive scheme of delegation is to be founded. He quoted Winston's idea of Home Rule for Lancashire, Yorkshire, and London—was there to be separate Labour legislation for these places also? Were the peasant farmers of Ireland competent to deal with complex industrial questions that would arise in Belfast? He received unexpected support from Chiozza Money, who lectured the House in his usual pedantic manner. Ireland was admittedly behind England in its ideas of industrial legislation, and, although he was an out-and-out Home Ruler, he implored the Government not to set the clock back.

The Government went to a division, and the Labour men once more sold their friends and voted with the majority.

After 11 the House was switched on to discuss the validity of certain marriages in Japan; but, as that did not interest me, I went home, "and so to bed," as Pepys says.

One of the greatest impostures of the Nationalist Party is their pretended devotion to their native language, Gaelic. On Tuesday we put down an amendment to the effect that English should be the official language. Ian Malcolm, a curly-headed Celt himself, reminded the House of previous movements in Ireland to force Celtic to the front, and "thus sever the last link between Ireland and England." The last links, by the way, are legion. The amendment was more serious than it appeared, for the Irish have more than once, in the past, slipped in a stipulation that ignorance of the Irish language would be a bar to this or that public office: a slim habit adopted by the Boers with far more justification, since the native Taal is largely spoken, whilst Gaelic is used very little; John Redmond himself cannot speak it. "Tay Pay" amused the house by reciting twenty words, but candidly admitted that the language of Shakespeare was good enough for him.

Birrell was in his element—he joked about it and played around it—in fact, he "birrelled" for all he was worth. Bonar Law pointed out what a powerful political weapon could be forged by these means if there was no such safeguard, but the Government would have none of it, and, when the chopper fell, a majority of 109 declared that the Irish could bar English altogether if they liked.

After that we sat up to a late hour, discussing the Expiring Laws Continuance Act—a subject always rich in debate for those who do not want to go to bed and wish to keep others up.

Notes and News

Mrs. Walford, the well-known novelist, has written her "Memories of Victorian London," and the book will be published next week by Mr. Arnold.

A new novel by Mr. James Lane Allen will be published in November by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. It will have as title "The Heroine in Bronze," and is a love story of modern New York.

Mr. Elliot Stock announces for immediate publication a new work by Mr. Harold M. Wiener, M.A., LL.B., entitled "Pentateuchal Studies." This book is a sequel to "Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism."

The Year-Book Press will publish shortly a volume of fairy tales by Margaret Gibbons, entitled "Good Night Stories." The book will be issued in crown 4to, with charming illustrations, by Gladys Thompson and Beryl Reid.

This week Mr. Herbert Jenkins will publish a new book by Mr. Hugh Stokes, entitled "A Prince of Pleasure," being the life of Philip of France, together with an account of his Court, 1640--1701; and within the next fortnight Mr. W. L. George's new book, "Woman and To-morrow."

Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Oxford University Press, will publish at the end of the month an important contribution to Syriac and Folk-lore literature by the Rev. Dr. Hermann Gollancz. It is called "The Book of Protection"—a collection of Syriac charms and incantations in the original, with translation, introduction and notes.

"The International Whitaker," a new departure, gives a graphic and succinct account of every country in the world, and concerning every nation there is a mass of detail in a handy and convenient form, such as has never before been presented in a single volume. The book is to be published early in December; and its price, in cloth binding, is two shillings net.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus hope to publish this week "The Poem Book of the Gael," selected and edited by Miss Eleanor Hull, containing verse-translations of Irish Gaelic poetry of all periods. Another book to be expected from the same publishers is Mr. Edward McCurdy's collection of critical and historical papers entitled "Essays in Fresco"—studies of men and books, with a few impressions of travel.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are bringing out at once a novel by Mark Allerton, entitled "Let Justice be Done"; the story of a Chief Justice who kills a scoundrel to save his son from dishonour, and eventually finds himself trying at Old Bailey another man who is accused of this crime. There is a description of a national strike which is a grim commentary on the prevalent industrial unrest.

"The Physiology of Faith and Fear; or, the Mind in Health and Disease," by William S. Sadler, M.D., will be published shortly by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. The author approaches the subject from the standpoint of the physiologist and separates its study from association, not with religion as a state of mind, but with any and all particular systems, sects, or forms of religious belief.

Mr. Murray is able at last to announce the early publication of the important new addition, in three volumes, of Crowe and Cavalcaselle's "History of Painting in North Italy." The work, which was entrusted to Dr. Tancred Borenius, while carefully preserving the essential and detailed information of the original authors, is supplemented with notes containing the new facts which have been brought to light in recent years.

South America will not for long be among the few countries unrepresented in Black's series of colour-books. A volume has been written by Mr. W. H. Koebel and illustrated by Mr. A. S. Forrest which will be published immediately. Mr. Koebel is a well-known authority on matters South American, and he has described in an attractive and entertaining style the republics of the Continent topographically, historically, and socially.

The first and second numbers of a new weekly paper, "Machinery," of value to all engineers and power-users, have just appeared. The paper is likely to be a success; its technical articles are excellent, and its practical hints —such as the admirable "Don'ts for Draughtsmen"— are a good feature. Messrs. Bonner and Co., of the Chancery Lane Press, are to be congratulated upon the high quality of printing shown in these issues—which are plentifully illustrated.

Those who are following with attention the startling course of events in the Near East will find of use two books which have been published by Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Ltd. "Servia of the Servians," by M. Chedo Mijatovich, formerly Servian Minister at the Court of St. James's, is an intimate account of the Servian people; and "Turkey of the Ottomans," which is also one of the volumes in the "Countries and Peoples Series," is the work of Miss L. M. J. Garnett, a writer of note on Eastern subjects.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. will publish immediately "The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter," by Mr. James Sutherland. The author holds the world's record in the branch of sport with which his book is concerned, and in this volume he has made a selection from his experiences for the ordinary reader, who knows little of the technicalities of big-game hunting. The stories are in every case absolutely faithful records of facts, elaborated from rough notes made within a day or two of the actual occurrence of the events.

The Pioneer Players open early in November with "The Good Hope," a play in four acts by the Dutch dramatist Heijermans, in the English translation of Christopher St. John. This will be followed by the production of three new one-act plays, one by Harold Chapin, "The Thumbscrew," by the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, and "Honour Thy Father," by H. M. Harwood. Later in the season a new three-act play by Cicely Hamilton, a play by a new Irish author, and a play by Mr. W. B. Yeats, new to London, will be presented.

The inaugural meeting of the eighteenth session of the Library Assistants' Association was held on Wednesday, October 16th, when the Worshipful Master of the Stationers' Company, G. E. Briscoe Eyre, Esq., presided, and the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's, delivered the inaugural address, in which he deprecated the lack of appreciation the general public showed for good literature. About 70 members and friends attended, and during the spirited discussion which followed the Dean's address several speakers took a more hopeful view of the people's reading propensities.

Miss Gabrielle Festing, author of "From the Land of Princes," "On the Distaff Side," etc., has now written a History of India from the beginning of the eleventh to the middle of the eighteenth century, which Messrs. Blackwood are publishing this week, at 7s. 6d. net, under the title of "When Kings Rode to Delhi." The publishers claim for the book an interest far exceeding that of most fiction. On the same day Messrs. Blackwood issue in book form the stories and pen-sketches which have been appearing in "Blackwood's" and other magazines, at the price of 6s., under the title of "Pike and Carronade."

By Lancelot Lawton.

THE MODERN CAMP-FOLLOWER.

October 23.

In spite of the elaborate arrangements made by the daily Press, with a view to describing the campaign in the Near East, little news of real importance has been allowed to reach this country. For the most part, the dispatches of the correspondents have consisted of picturesque descriptions of scenes to be witnessed in towns almost as far from the front as Liverpool is from London, not unmingled with those rumours of overwhelming victory which, in time of war, invariably originate in the café or the market-place. Up to the present not a single newspaper representative, with the exception of Captain Butler, who, on behalf of the Daily Mail, accompanies the Greek forces, has succeeded in reaching the actual area of operations. The Bulgarian and Servian regulations in regard to correspondents are far more severe than those adopted by either combatant in the Russo-Japanese War. In the case of Bulgaria the authorities have announced that any individual attempting to evade the censorship will be subjected to trial by court-martial; while the Servian Government has declared that correspondents who proceed into neutral territory for the purpose of availing themselves of an uncensored wire will not be allowed to re-enter the country. On the Turkish side we find that the correspondents and attachés are still detained at Constantinople, and are told that, when they accompany the headquarters staff to the scene of operations, they are to be kept under strict surveillance. Not only are telegrams arriving from all parts of the theatre of war hopelessly mutilated, but, as a re-insurance against risk of leakage, they are invariably delayed, in some instances as much as several days.

That the authorities are thoroughly justified in taking extraordinary measures to mask the movements of armies is beyond question. Daily in London the staffs of the various Legations representing the belligerent States search the Press for information likely to be useful to their Governments, and an indiscreet item telegraphed from one point in the Near East may within a few hours of its publication in London become common property throughout the theatre of war. The Servian Government was led to adopt stringent regulations only after a glaring instance, illustrating the danger of leniency, had occurred. A correspondent crossed the Danube into Hungary, and, taking advantage of neutral wires, promptly proceeded to telegraph the plans of the Servian War Ministry, including the movements and destinations of the various armies in the field. The journal which he represented, obviously delighted at his enterprise, gave prominence to the dispatch, and, a few days later, in publishing a further telegram, pompously announced that its contents proved that the armies were moving in accordance with the plans of the War Ministry which had previously been set forth in its columns. Then, in Bulgaria, another correspondent, whose enterprise was greater than his discretion, tore himself away from the bonds of restraint and made a dash for the front in a motor-car. After eluding at one place an armed guard which was placed outside the hotel where he was refreshing himself, he continued his journey until he actually got so near the front that he heard guns booming in the distance. Thereupon he penned a vivid dispatch, in the course of which he imparted to the British public his chauffeur's information that the pass over which he traversed was usually haunted with wolves and bears. Fortunately he did not meet with any of these wild beasts, and was able to give to the world an account of this circumstance. It only remains to be added that this adventurous individual is back at Sofia, safe and sound in wind and limb, and at Sofia he is likely to remain, beyond hearing distance of the booming of those terrible guns!

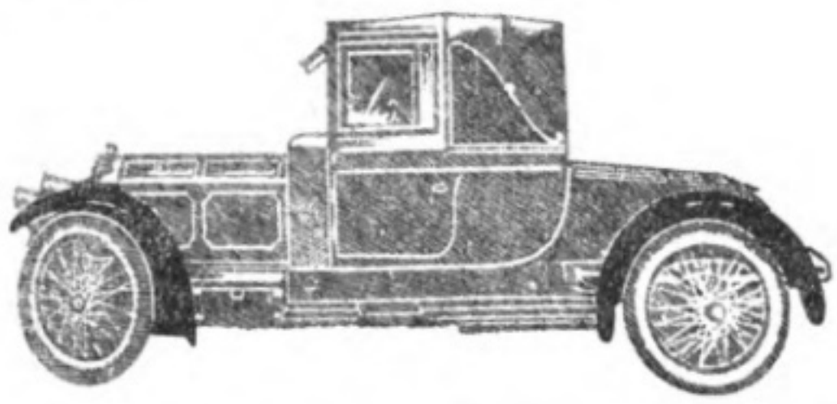
When the lives of thousands of brave men are at stake, it is altogether inconceivable that the authorities should be hampered by the eccentric antics of excitable scribblers. A modest estimate places the number of correspondents in the Near East at something like two hundred. A special train was requisitioned to convey no fewer than eighty of these men to Stara Zagora, representing every nationality and speaking diverse tongues. The Times correspondent writes that their arrival provided "the only ripple of excitement which has disturbed the air of absolute peacefulness in this quiet town." And he adds despairingly: "What will become of them all, as many of them are quite unprepared for campaigning, except in a train or taxicab, is still the secret of the authorities." He goes on to say that the weather continues to be perfect, with brilliant sunshine, and warm as in an early English September. One cannot help reflecting that this last circumstance is particularly fortunate. Stara Zagora, after all, will seem like home.

So far we have dealt only with the motley throng of correspondents. Some mention must be made of the battalions or corps of photographers and cinematograph operators who have thronged to the scene in large numbers, anxious to secure thrilling illustrations for the readers of the halfpenny picture-papers and the crowds who nightly fill the picture-palaces of Balham, Tooting, and elsewhere. With these latter, the army of modern camp-followers is completed—"followers" is indeed the correct term for such a strange assortment of commercial travellers, who are always going to the front and who never get there, passing over newly made battlefields, meeting the wounded returning, and ever and anon hearing the booming of guns away in the distance. The thought instantly flashes across the mind: How would Napoleon or Wellington have treated such pedlars in news and pictures? And the question is not difficult to answer.

MOTORING



THE unequal, not to say erratic, manner in which the Motor Car Acts are administered in different parts of the country has at last led to the issue by the Home Office of a circular designed to introduce some degree of uniformity into conflicting decisions. In the document it is pointed out that, occasionally at any rate, hardened and deliberate offenders are treated leniently, while trivial and first offences are sometimes punished with unnecessary severity. As a matter of fact, from the inception of the Motor Car Acts the unequal sentences passed by different benches upon motorist for similar offences have constituted occasionally a cause for comment, and the attitude of the respective magistrates towards the motoring movement is not always clear. As the circular in question merely expresses Mr. McKenna's "opinion" as to the nature of the penalties which should be inflicted for various offences, it will not, perhaps, have much effect. So long as the range of penalties imposable at the discretion of a bench for a specific offence is so wide, so long will the administration of justice to motorists be a matter which demands an unusual amount of patient investigation.

What would have been the most interesting sporting event in the motoring world this year—a level race between a Vauxhall and a Sunbeam of similar power—has, we regret to say, fallen through. The past season has been noteworthy for the keen and persistent rivalry between these famous British cars, first one and then the other setting up world's records, only to be promptly demolished by its rival. It is probably known to most motorists that a week or two ago Mr. Gordon Watney offered a prize of £100 for a ten-lap race between the 2,983 c.c. Vauxhall and the 2,996 c.c. Sunbeam, on the Brooklands track. In view of Resta's recent performance with the latter car at Brooklands, the suggested match on level terms would have been the motoring event of the year, but we are informed that the directors of the Sunbeam Company have finally decided not to accept Mr. Watney's proposal. No doubt the Vauxhall people think they are wise in their generation.

Messrs. Barimar, Ltd., of Poland Street, London, W., send us for notice a copy of a booklet descriptive of the Frankonia mudguard, of which they are the sole concessionaires in this country. Many of our motoring readers must be familiar with the design of this handsome and really effective car-protector, which increases in popularity every year, and is now to be seen as a regular fitment of most of our highest-class automobiles. For the benefit of those who are not familiar with it, it may be said that it is dome-shaped, and is stamped in one piece from a high-grade steel plate, the edges being wired and swaged to make rattling impossible. The car fitted with Frankonias practically never requires cleaning, no matter how muddy the roads may be, while on the score of appearance alone these guards are well worth the small increase in initial cost over that of the ordinary flat or "lipped" sheet-iron mudguard. We recommend those motorists who attach importance to the cleanliness and appearance of their cars to write Messrs. Barimar (Dept. A.B.) for a copy of the booklet referred to. It shows clearly the great advantages of Frankonias over any other existing type of mudguard. The illustration herewith depicts a Rolls-Royce equipped with them.

The many friends and well-wishers of Mr. Stenson Cooke, the secretary and leading spirit of the Automobile Association and Motor Union, will be pleased to hear that he is recovering, although slowly, from the effects of his accident a month or so ago. What the A.A. and M.U. would do without the energetic and ubiquitous "S. C." to superintend its far-flung organisation and manifold activities it is difficult to imagine.

The reputation abroad of the British flying machine appears to grow apace. It was announced the other day by Sir George White, chairman of the British and Colonial Aeroplane Company, of Bristol, that the Italian Government have just ordered 28 "Bristol" monoplanes of the military type, at a cost of over £30,000. It is true that the machines are to be built in Italy, but their construction and manufacture will be carried out under the supervision of the experts of the British company referred to.

THE great slump on the war news which engulfed the world of speculation was followed by a curious recovery—peculiarly interesting because I do not think that ever before has the small man come in and supported a market. The moment the war news became known every stockbroker told his gambling clients that they must close their accounts. He had no choice. And the accounts were closed. Big finance houses turned as much of their paper into cash as they dare. Prices fell all over the world. But the world is prosperous—it has made money. It does not know anything about war, and as prices fell so it bought. Not only in England, but in Paris where the little rentier came along to the guichets and bought. In Russia the slump caused a feeling of intense indignation and Paris was blamed. The whole phenomenon was curious. There was the big man getting out regardless of loss, and the little men coming in. The question may be asked: Who is right? I cannot hesitate as to the answer—the big men were right and the little men, as always, were wrong. War is a terrible thing—as bad in its immediate effects as in its after results. It destroys credit—it makes paper worthless. Therefore the only thing that tells is hard cash, and this the little man exchanged for shares which he thought were cheap. But were they? Time will show.

The promoter has made his arrangements, some of which he cannot break. Therefore we shall see a few companies launched during the next few months. But they will be few and they will not be successful. Mr. Arthur Du Cros and his group have asked the public to give them over £300,000 for the Clyde-Aboyne Estates—capitalised at something over £28,000 in Ceylon. The planters of this island know their tea and rubber, and they are rich. They would hardly allow an estate of 1,200 acres to be going a-begging if it were worth £310,000. No working capital is provided, and the whole promotion is negligible. Even the amiable Statist cannot speak with the patience that befits its age.

There seems to be no end to Canadian ventures. The South Ontario Land is the latest land company which the long suffering public is asked to subscribe for. It comes from 3, Lombard Street, whence some other audacious schemes have been launched. My readers should leave it alone.

MONEY can hardly be called plentiful. I notice some people think that the Bank of England should not have put up its rate. I do not understand their arguments. The whole of the Near East is at war. The Bank of France has raised its rate. Trade is booming all over the world. Harvests are magnificent. Everybody wants money. There was never a time when we needed to keep our money at home more urgently. And we can only do this by raising our rates. We all hope that we shall not have to pay six per cent. But that will assuredly be the price charged by the Bank of England if the war continues.

HOME RAILS interest nobody to-day. Towards the end of the year when the traffic figures begin to bulk large a few buyers will be tempted by the large increases and the small investor will pick up gilt-edged stocks to pay him five per cent. The big buyer is afraid of the Government. He thinks that it does not mean to keep its pledge to the railway directors. In Scotland an agitation is on foot to force the leading railways to put up both goods and passenger rates. Goods rates they cannot move without the consent of Parliament. Passenger rates are low, but Scotland says she will not travel at all if she cannot travel cheap. Passenger rates have risen all over England, and the effect will be seen in the accounts. But north of the Tweed no attempt has been made to advance fares. Metropolitans are deadly weak. The "bull" account here is being disposed of in summary style. When it has gone we may get another rise. The cheap things to buy to-day are Great Central '89 Prefs.

YANKEES have not been able to stand up against the tide of selling that has come from Berlin. The big bankers took many millions of stock in the slump, but they did not exhaust the sellers. To-day those who must get out have to be content with low prices. Clearly the great houses in Wall Street foresee lower levels and dearer money. They stand on one side. Perhaps their portfolios are full. They have to finance the huge crops as well as the railways, and the task grows bigger each year. The Louisville report is good. This line has made big progress. Atchison is doing well, Chesapeakes also. Indeed, all the companies have not only a big trade to carry, but they have big prospects in front of them. Canadian Pacifics are very weak. The news that the proposed new issue of shares is not the issue for which consent was asked of the Government, but will be made under a forgotten clause which allows the Canadian Pacific to issue common stock in lieu of debentures, has upset everybody both in Berlin and in Montreal. The C.P.R. is so prosperous that it dare not pay more than 10 per cent.

dividend. Therefore it goes on watering its capital and giving shareholders huge bonuses instead of dividends. But surely an end will be reached to this very unsound finance one day. Yet Canada is so prosperous and the C.P.R. so powerful and well managed that it is not safe to prophesy disaster. We have done it so often and have always been proved wrong by the extraordinary growth of the country and the astute management of the Railway. But, as I say, Montreal is aghast at the proposal.

RUBBER remains dull. The little buying and selling does not affect prices. The "bulls" dare not make another raid, for they had a nasty experience the last time they tried to put up prices. They found hundreds of small sellers anxious to realise, and they had some difficulty in getting out without loss. Indeed, they possibly hold many more of the cheap shares than they like. All the reports that come out are colourless. Sumatra Para and United Sumatra have held their own and show small increases. But Tebrau, an Edinburgh company, did not do well.

OIL.—At last the great Gadjinsky property in the island of Cheleken is registered, and will presumably be floated for a huge sum, just about double what it is worth. Mr. Boxall, of Premier Pipe, will join the board of the Galician Oil Trust as chairman, and this will thus fight alongside Premier and the Deutsche Erdol against the big Imperial Petroleum that is to smash Standard Oil. We shall see some fun here. Urals have, it is said, come to terms with the Government over the concession which has now expired, and they will take up about 6,000 claims. The Diaz outbreak in Mexico will not help Mexican Eagle unless the nephew of the late President is successful. The oil market is very dull. Spies look cheap, but no bull has the heart to buy anything. Not even the really useful news from Maikop has been able to put heart into the dealers in oil shares.

MINES interest no one. Paris sells on every chance and London will not buy. As for Kaffirs and Rhodesians, they are dead. It seems the moment to pick up a few of the best Kaffirs because the big houses are now really determined to crush only the rich ore and take the values regardless of working costs. This is the true theory of mining, though few people believe it. Copper shares could not withstand the war scare. The dividend on Amalgamated rose as I expected, but it had no effect. Yet copper will recover, for the position is sound. There is some talk of a shareholders' meeting in Akwara, that foolish trust floated by the Nassarawa crowd. I wish the agitation success, but I am afraid they are up against a tricky combination.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are almost as dull as the rest of the Stock Exchange. Electrics keep firm as the story of the big combine grows and grows. But P. and O. are now reduced to a very modest figure, and each week wilder tales are told, none of which help the "bulls." Marconis are sure to have been helped by the foolish management of the debate, and the contract is as good as signed. The tactics of the Government were good. Those of the Archer-Shee and Lansbury crowd bad as bad could be. It is a pity, as it may encourage more to buy Marconis and lose their money.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"BACON IS SHAKESPEARE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—A friend of mine some years ago pointed out to me that the words "shake" and "spear" were to be found in the forty-sixth Psalm, the first the forty-sixth word from the beginning, the other forty-sixth from the end, and laughingly spoke of it as being, according to Baconian methods, a proof that Shakespeare was the author of the Psalms. I am ignorant of what value or mystery there may be in the number forty-six, and I cannot imagine the object of counting the position of the letters in the alphabet that form the name Bacon. Andrew Lang, in an essay on "The Shakespeare-Bacon Embroglio," quotes someone—he calls him a sage—as saying "There are foolisher fellows than the Baconians, those who argue against them," and adds, "The Baconian creed, of course, is scouted equally by special students of Bacon, special students of Shakespeare, and by almost all persons who devote themselves to sound literature." The writer of a letter in THE ACADEMY two weeks ago alludes to the "gentle Shakespeare" as a drunken, illiterate clown. I protest against such a piece of foul-mouthed fanatical folly. An illiterate clown could not have taken part in those wit combats at the "Mermaid," described by Fuller in his "Worthies of England," especially when his combatant was the formidable, rare Ben Jonson, who, besides writing the famous line, "He was not of an age, but for all time," also wrote of Shakespeare, "I loved the man and do honour his memory, on this side idolatry as much as any." Of an illiterate clown it could not be affirmed, as Hemminge and Condell write, "What he thought, he uttered with such easiness that we have scarce received from him a blot in his papers." Their object in collecting these papers was "to keepe the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive, as was our Shakespeare." These extracts are from the dedication of the first folio. The prefatory verses include the splendid lines of Ben Jonson and those of Leonard Digger, who says, "This booke, While brasse and marble fade, will make thee looke Fresh to all ages." I prefer such sentiments—there are many more like them—to all that may emanate even from such an exalted region as Carlton House Terrace. I am, yours truly,

Peebles, N.B. JAMES R. FERGUSSON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In your last issue Tom Jones furnishes some extracts from paraphrases of some of the Psalms which were written by Bacon on a bed of sickness a short time before his death. Tom Jones draws the deduction that, because these extracts were very poor stuff, Bacon could not have written the Shakespeare plays. Some of these paraphrases, however, are by no means devoid of merit. The fact is that it is no easy task to paraphrase the Psalms.

If there ever lived a man who might be expected to possess all the qualifications requisite for reproducing "the devout strains of Hebrew melody," that man was John Milton. Unfortunately for his poetical reputation, Milton attempted nineteen paraphrases of Psalms. Here are extracts from that of Psalm VII :—

Lord my God, to Thee I fly,
Save me and secure me under Thy protection while I cry;
Lest as a lion (and no wonder)
He haste to tear my soul asunder,
Tearing and no rescue nigh.

* * * *

God is a just judge and severe,
And God is every day offended.
If the unjust will not forbear,
His sword he whets, His bow hath bended
Already, and for him intended
The tools of death, that waits him near.

(His arrows purposely made He
For them to persecute.) Behold,
He travails big with vanity;
Trouble He hath conceived of old
As in a womb, and from that mould
Hath at length brought forth a lie.

To apply the same argument it must be held to be impossible that John Milton wrote "Paradise Lost" or the lyrics in Comus.

But Shakespeare himself might confidently enter the lists in a competition for the worse verse. How would this, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," rank in competition with Bacon and Milton?:—

"When at your hands did I deserve this scorn?
Is't not enough, is't not enough, young man,
That I did never, no, nor never can,
Deserve a sweet look from Demetrius' eye?"

Pope said that, as Shakespeare "has written better, so has he perhaps written worse than any other."

After these, the real force of any argument founded thereon must be held to be rather in favour of Bacon's authorship of the Shakespeare plays than against. But really no reliable deduction can be drawn from such data.

11, Hart Street, W.C., October 16, 1912. WILLIAM T. SMEDLEY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. Tom Jones, asks for proof that Bacon assumed the pseudonym of Shakespeare. In a very large number of books of the period, upon page 53—frequently a false page 53—we find some reference to Bacon. In the first English edition of Bacon's "De Augmentis," called "The Advancement of Learning," we read upon page 55 (falsely numbered page 53), in the margin, in capital letters (almost the only capital letters in the margin of that book), "S. Fran. Bacon"; in Drayton's "Polyolbion," 1622, upon page 53, "Beconus"; in Florio's second "Frutes," upon page 53, "A slice of bacon"; and upon the next line, "gammon of bakon," to tell us that Bacon may be spelled in different ways. Now let us look at the first folio of Shakespeare's Plays. Upon the first page 53 we find "Hang hog is fatten for Bacon." Upon the second page 53, "Gammon of Bacon." These are the two visible pillars (the "Booz and Iactin," if you will). The third example (the shibboleth) must be upon the invisible page 53—that is, upon page 53 from the end. There, upon page 53 from the end, as the 53rd from the commencement of a new scene, we find "Wilde-Boores." Bacon's crest was a wild boar. The word "Wilde-Boores" is lugged in by means of a ridiculous story of eight wilde-boores roasted whole as a breakfast for twelve persons. The folio is also signed by Bacon upon the first page and upon the last page, and in very numerous ways throughout the folio. But what your correspondent fails to perceive is that there was not, and that there could not be, any writer of the new English in the golden age of Elizabethan literature outside of the "Baconian net," because Bacon created the new English language. When, as a youth, he resolved to undertake that task, almost the only literary works in the English tongue were "The Schoolmaster," by Roger Ascham; "The Governor," by Sir Thos. Eliot; and "Arts of Rhetoric," by Thos. Wright. Ere he died he had made the English language the noblest vehicle of thought ever possessed by man by means of his translation of the Bible and his Shakespeare. Upon these two works every writer now confesses that our glorious English language depends. We are mourning the death of a great scholar of Chaucer. Why did not he tell us that our "Chaucer" is not the Chaucer of 1532, but the Chaucer re-Englished by Bacon in 1598, to which edition is prefixed a poem telling us the story? This poem is perhaps too long for your columns, but the essential part is:—

Reader:

"But who is he that hath these books repar'd,
And added more, whereby thou art more graced?"

Chaucer:

"The self-same man who hath no labor spar'd
To helpe what time and writers had defaced,
And made old words that were unknoun of many
So plaine that now they may be knoun of any."

Watts, in his edition of "Don Quixote," is struck by the fact that Shelton is quite unknown, yet his translation (so called) is in the language of Shakespeare. Watts, however, fails to notice that Cervantes, in the prologue, says: "But I (though in shew a father, yet in truth but a step-father to Don Quixote)," which tells us quite plainly that Cervantes is not the "author"—the father—but only the step-father—the translator of "Don Quixote." Yours,

EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE.

"THE LOVE-SEEKER."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—I agree with your critic that the sentences he quotes from my book, "The Love-Seeker," are ridiculous when thus misinterpreted. I stated that "the deepest of women's wrongs will never be altered by any political liberty, nor honours of citizenship," but what inconsistency is there between this and the belief that "some day the long-awaited feminist prophet will arise, bearing the golden gospel that is going to make a new heaven and a new earth for us"? Must the golden gospel, then, necessarily be political liberty? What a paltry, limited idea of a gospel! Your reviewer is evidently an ardent suffragist, to whom the vote is the panacea for all ills.

Similarly there seems no inconsistency between the two statements that men and women now meet on equal ground, and that engaged couples generally act and sham to each other. Cannot one act and sham to one's equals just as one's inferiors?

My book is concerned with a very serious subject, perhaps the most serious in the world, and I certainly took it extremely seriously. To accuse me of sharing his own levity on so grave a matter, merely on the ground of an alleged inconsistency which he entirely fails to prove, would seem to indicate that, to say the least of it, your reviewer is no sportsman!—I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

MAUD CHURTON BRABY.

Holmwood, Hendon, N.W. October 6.

A mythical gospel in the dim and distant future is poor consolation for "wrongs" existing at the present time; for myself I should prefer something available here and now, although I cannot claim to be an "ardent suffragist," and have always opposed the franchise being extended to women.

I suppose Mrs. Braby would agree that a man and woman meeting "on equal ground, as friends," could not sham to one another, the very word friend forbidding such a contingency. Would it, then, not be probable, should this friendship ripen into something deeper, that the man and woman would prefer each other to remain the exact personalities they had learned to love, and not sham editions? In fact, would not an alteration such as Mrs. Braby suggests be a subject for ridicule, or, at any rate, of questioning, on the part of one or both of the lovers?

In conclusion, I can only regret that Mrs. Braby objects to my being entertained by her book.

THE REVIEWER.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The opening of a new gallery in Bond Street under the old name which is historical in connection with Bond Street shows a poverty in invention or an excess of the audacious, and makes one wish for copyright in names.

The mention of the Grosvenor Gallery revives pleasant memories to those who were acquainted with the work of Sir Coutts Lindsay, which, if not so successful in the end as could have been wished, was great work, and left its mark on the nineteenth century.

To Sir Coutts Lindsay and the Grosvenor Gallery the country owes a debt of gratitude for the support given to the Sunday Opening movement in the days when the reformers were few and the Sabbatarians many. There are signs that the shilly-shally policy of the London County Council in connection with the Sunday Opening will lead to a reopening of the Sunday question, so that it may be of interest to recall the connection of the Grosvenor Gallery with the movement.

Not only was the Gallery open to the members of the Sunday Society, but to very large numbers of the public, who made written application for tickets. So great was the crowd attending that often there was a current of visitors passing from Bond Street into the Gallery and out by way of the exits at the back. The announcement of the first Sunday opening was made on July 10, 1878, in a letter by Lord Rosebery as president of the Society, the late Professor Corfield as chairman of committee, and myself as honorary secretary, and published in the Times.

It was at the Grosvenor Gallery, on May 7, 1892, under the presidency of Lord Brassey, that the Memorial to the Convocation of Canterbury was adopted and presented by Dr. Randall Davidson immediately on his appointment to the Bishopric of Rochester.

The Memorial set out the facts which led the Sunday Society to ask for the opening of museums, art galleries, libraries, and gardens on Sundays, and concluded as follows :—" If the facts herein set forth are not sufficient to induce your lordships to support measures for adding to Hampton Court Palace, Kew Gardens, etc., now open on Sundays, the national institutions of a like character in the metropolis, your petitioners respectfully ask that steps may be taken by your lordships to ascertain the opinion of the clergy on the question in the places in this country where such institutions are opened on Sundays by national or municipal authorities."

On May 13, 1892, Convocation appointed a committee with Dr. Davidson as chairman, and after a wide inquiry the committee submitted an exhaustive report, concluding as follows :—

" Your committee desires the adoption of every possible safeguard against unfairness or misuse in the case of the libraries, museums, or art galleries now open on Sundays under the sanction of the law as it stands. Subject to these conditions, your committee is of opinion that the cause of the religion of Christ has nothing to fear from the reasonable and careful extension of the principle of Sunday opening described in the report, which it now respectively submits to the consideration of the Convocation of the province."

This put the Church of England on the side of a reasonable observance of Sunday, and was one great factor in the ultimate success of the movement for the opening of museums and galleries on Sundays, now, happily, accepted as a matter of course. I am, yours faithfully,

MARK H. JUDGE,
Honorary Secretary.

ART AND LIFE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—It will be conceded that a work of art is, in the highest sense of the term, a work of art only when it is "lived"—that is, when the artist has produced it as a result of his own experience. A truly great poem, therefore, is a "lived" poem ; any other is a mere conceit.

When Mr. Masefield wrote "Dauber," do you think he imagined it within the four walls of his study? I do not believe it. He wrote for the " land-lubbers " what he saw and " lived," in the same way as the poet of the " Seafarer " before him.

This brings me to the question : Is it within the province of a man to write of human passion, love, etc., without his having " sensed " human passion, love, etc.? "The height to which a man may rise can only be measured by the depths to which he can fall. . . Some men of genius have been foul rogues," says Mr. Haldane Macfall (ACADEMY, October 12, 1912, " Art and Life," page 490). I agree with him, and flout, as he does, Ruskin's theory that no great artist can be a bad man at heart. Some of the greatest geniuses have led most immoral lives, have gone through the whole gamut of vice. Again, some of the greatest men of genius have led most moral lives, have not followed " false fires of passion." Is the literary world the gainer by the one class or by the other?

An article from an unbiased pen will perhaps oblige others of your constant readers—and certainly yours faithfully,

H. LONSDALE.

Notes of the Week

THE general condition and state of readiness of the Servian people for emergencies, as shown by events in the present crisis in the Balkans, points a lesson which we in England may well take to heart. There was no laxity, there were no pleasant assurances that when war chanced to involve their country they would be perfectly willing to fight—unequipped, save by enthusiasm, and an easy prey to the invader; every man was thoroughly trained, familiar with the use and capabilities of his weapons, and was able to fall into his place in the general scheme of things at an hour's notice. Here, on the other hand, the prevailing spirit seems to be one of lamentable placidity. "We are quite ready to fight if necessary," say the young men of this country; "send us along to the front when war comes." An admirable sentiment; but entirely useless, as it happens, without practicality to back it up. It is common knowledge, as we remarked last week, that in a population of 7,000 not one response was forthcoming to the invitations sent out to join the Territorial Force.

Without endorsing Lord Roberts' references to Germany, in the speech which he made at Manchester last week, and which has raised such a display of peculiarly unpatriotic comment in the Radical Press, we may say that in our view the position he took up is absolutely sound. It would have been better, perhaps, had he seen fit to "gild the philosophic pill" by taking a leaf from the books of Mr. Anthony Hope, and inventing some hypothetical state or kingdom with a pretty name by means of which to point his remarks; but this is the only criticism we can offer. "There is a way," said Lord Roberts, "in which Britain is certain to have war and its horrors and calamities; it is by persisting in her present course of unpreparedness, her apathy, unintelligence, and blindness, and in her disregard of the warnings of the most ordinary political insight, as well as of the example of history." These are weighty words from a veteran soldier. Until our present ineffective military system is superseded by some scheme that shall make us as alert and prepared as was Servia when the moment of trial came, we are as a nation in a distinctly unsafe position.

The various ways in which Shakespeare's plays are produced would form an interesting theme for an essay. In some towns people will flock to the theatre simply because the play is by Shakespeare; in others they go eagerly because some favourite actor is taking a principal part; but in many places a system of elaborate coaxing is the only method of filling the auditorium. We have before us the record of an enterprising American manager who worked on the principle that almost any play would be a success if it was "billed right"; thus, acceding to the wish of an actress to interpret a Shakespearean part, he placarded the town with announcements of "Six Car-loads of Scenery," "Greatly Augmented Orchestra," "A Hundred and Fifty Fairies," "Eighty Thousand Dollar Production," and so on, not forgetting to repeat the clamorous print in the local papers. The play, of course, was the triumph he meant it to be; but what proportion of the crowd came because it was "billed like a circus"? And how many of them had ever read twenty lines of the text?

A Cookery Exhibition is a thing to be taken seriously; for who knows how great a proportion of national trouble may arise from individual indigestion? "The tocsin of the soul—the dinner-bell," in spite of all the charms of French culinary art, means more to an Englishman than many orchestral triumphs; Pope knew his readers when he wrote, "Swearing and supperless, the hero sat," since we may presume that his "supper" was the equivalent of dinner. For the first time, the inaugural luncheon of the present Exhibition at the Horticultural Hall was prepared by the young cooks now being trained by the London County Council, and served by boy waiters also under the same auspices. It seems a pity, however, that little attention is paid to British possibilities; judging from the menu, we might as well have been lunching at an ordinary West End hotel.

Congratulations to The World on the attainment of its two thousandth number, and on the excellent manner in which those at present ruling its destinies are preserving the traditions of the paper handed down from the days of 1874. They have done wisely in giving a tone of reminiscence to the current issue, and the various articles by well-known friends, dealing with literary adventures of years that are past, make fascinating reading, albeit at times tinged with sadness—as when Sir Squire Bancroft tells of the tragically sudden death of Edmund Yates.

The Spirit of the Summit

UPON the untrodden height she dwelt alone,
Where sheer rock-bastions sunder world from world,
Whose swarming plains the girdling clouds, close-furled
Around the summit, ne'er avow. A zone
Of filmy cloud she wore; like fashioned stone
Her white limbs gleamed; her shadowy tresses curled
About her brow, all virgin dew-empearled;
Her brooding eyes twin blazing beryls shone.

And with her face upturned to the arching sky
She pierced the hallowed stillness with a cry
That brimmed all longing: "O Infinitude,
Homed in the Height, so long, so vain pursued,
How shall I compass Thee, who from my birth
Press heavy feet on this low mound of earth?"

Travelling Moments

WHENCE comes the true joy of travel? The question may be answered superficially in several ways: one will say that the charm lies in change of scene, another in rapid motion, a third in the various hostelries that are visited or the different languages and customs heard and experienced. But it needed not the recommendation of Borrow and the host of other writers who have loved and expounded the beauty of the open road to tell us that the very finest joy of travel often comes to him who leaves the rail for those who are in a hurry, leaves the wheeled conveyance—be it motor, horse and trap, or bath chair—for those who are tender of foot, and, his pockets handsomely bulging with whatever fare he may fancy—in case of emergencies—takes to the lanes, the moors, or the downs.

Even then, however, the opening query is not answered. To tramp the miles merely to boast subsequently of the distances covered labels you as of a pedestrian soul as well as body; and that will never do. The truest joy of travel, it seems to me, comes in certain intermittent "moments," as they might be called; glorious times when, as you pass through a sunlit wood, or stand in buffeting wind at the edge of a cliff, or take the bounty of an unexpected wayside inn, the sensation of being thoroughly alive thrills the blood like a draught of wine. Three such moments came to me in a day's tramp a week or two ago.

The first was when, after four miles of fairly steady climbing, I stumbled down a spur of Dartmoor into a village of fairyland. The narrow road crossed a bridge; beneath the bridge a little brown stream—I know not its name, save that it is a tributary of the Dart—fussed and laughed and twinkled among many boulders. The parapet had a tempting shoulder of mossy stones; indeed, the whole bridge was dark with velvety moss; and I stretched myself upon it. Before me, six thatched cottages slept in the sunshine, set at all curious angles. A few minutes ago, on the hill, a gale had striven to deafen me; here, so deep and sheltered was the spot, the leaves hardly whispered. Two or three cottage doors stood open, but nothing moved, no voice spoke. Evidently, I thought, the place is enchanted, and I am one with the magic spell that dwells over it all. Greatly daring, I smoked a pipe as I lay on the warm moss and listened to the stream, determined to stay until something happened.

It seemed that one might wait till nightfall, so intense was the quiet. But presently—it may be a quarter of an hour had passed—a woman came from one of the open doors, singing; as she stood there, a cow lowed plaintively. The woman saw me, laughed, nodded greeting, and disappeared; and the spell was broken. I went on my way; but it was good to have had that moment.

The second memorable moment of the day came when, having climbed a lane of incredible steepness from Widecombe-in-the-Moor (that is not the name of my fairy village, by the way) and chatted with one old crinkled and weather-beaten gentleman who might have passed for the veritable "Uncle Tom Cobleigh," or at least for "Dan'l Whidden," I looked back and saw the church tower of Widecombe—the Cathedral of the Moor—grey against a blue-grey breast of hill; all far below me, shadowed by wide spaces and huge tors against which threatening clouds began to stream and break. The tall, lonely tower of stone—how immeasurably it gained in significance from its setting!

And the third thrill of that day, which even now seems long ago, was when, drenched almost to the skin by an hour of tramping in heavy rain across the wildest corner of Dartmoor, where not a tree offered its friendly shelter, and the great tors frowned from their granite brows through a shaggy hair of cloud, I stood in the kitchen of an old-fashioned moorland inn before a roaring fire, and received a real Devonshire welcome from people I had never before seen in my life. There, in borrowed clothes, while my own steamed mightily on chair-backs in the blaze, I sat and took tea with one of those worthy gentlemen of the road whose business it is to sell small draperies and fineries to country damsels who dwell far from shops; and good company he was, too. There I made friends with three jolly fellows of dogs, and two sleek, condescending cats; there, also, came curious youngsters of the hamlet to peep and run away; there, again, I was startled by the sight of a cow gazing mildly at me through a window. The bill for the two hours' shelter and refreshment was ninepence, and it was one of the pleasantest times I have ever spent.

The charm of these "moments" lies in their surprise. They are upon you, from the ordinary level of life, before you realise it; therefore they are sometimes missed. To know them when they come—to be receptive, to recognise that an hour to be remembered is now born—is the test of the true traveller, whether he go after all, by road, or rail, or sea.

The Shining Pen*

AMONG the frequently recurring platitudes which so assist conversation when ideas and imaginative flowers refuse to unfold, the saying that "the art of letter-writing is extinct" takes a foremost position. It bridges many an awkward gap, leads comfortably across chilly silences to gentle, meandering discussions on the prevalence of the picture-postcard—from which grateful divergence may easily and safely be made to holidays and the comparative virtues of Blankenberghe and Billericay. Yet, if we consider the words for a moment, they are a platitude merely by favour of an oversight. For the true letter eliminates art; it is merry, sad, sarcastic, grave, what you will—even spiritual—but it is essentially natural. Friend communing with friend discards art and all its minutiæ; a letter of envy, spite, or hate bears the genuine elemental fury—even the curb of convention is slackened. A lover may seek the choice word, the acceptable phrase, for his mistress, but he does so precisely as he would gather for her the sweetest flower, unconscious save of the sense of preference and fitness. And what we assume to be "art" in the words of the great letter-writers of the world is more often the irresistible signal of the mind and soul betraying itself, often hurriedly, but always unmistakably, to its fellow.

Thus we get the love-letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett—full of exquisite, peculiar cadences as of a song half heard, sprinkled with queer and sometimes forced allusions, ragged with scraps of Greek and truncated sentences, but all perfectly natural—to the Brownings. Or we have the rather stately letters of Goethe, who, whether he wrote to his "Dear little Aunt, how like a sleigh-ride goes my life—swiftly away, and tinkling and careering up and down!" or to Kestner that "it is very abominable and unkind of you not to entrust me the commission of the rings," seems always to hold a certain unapproachable dignity in reserve. Or we find Swift writing in impeccable English his portentous epistles to Archbishop King, and in English that might be another language his playful letters to "Stella"—both free from art, both natural expressions of the man, though in the one case guarded, in the other riotous. And so we could go on, giving instances from the correspondence of Lamb, of Cowper, and a dozen more indefatigable scribes, until we came by simple lapse of time to Meredith, whose inimitably natural letters are now before us.

We look to letters to give us the man, far more than we expect to discover him in his books; for the reason that the published word is chosen with two minds—one on expression, the other on the opinion of a hydra-headed and possibly unfriendly public; a public which will be critical, even when its sole exhibition of immatured criticism is a splenetic throwing of the book aside as incomprehensible. For another reason, perhaps: that most letters are little vessels of personality filled to the brim; draughts clear and sparkling or dull and turgid, according to the soul that dictates to the flying pen. And, in the present case, for a third reason: that there was in George Meredith a fine fearlessness arising from purity of life and a leonine heart which forbade him to use, as uncongenial, those phrases of dissimulation and insincerity that cloud the meaning of the writer and baulk the understanding of the reader. In his wildest, fiercest metaphors there is the rush of naturalness; they are the play of a happy mind that invents images and sets them down swifty as they come, not the laboriously polished and suspiciously clever similes of the study. "Last night," he writes to Mrs. Sturgis, his daughter, "we had a Bird of Storm brooding on us for hours, and away and back, with fifty million Electric lights and all the world's Cathedral organs crashing!" To another lady, concerning a gift of fruit, he says: "The Madeira apples were custardy and curious. Perhaps Eve would have fallen for them. I am not so sure about Adam. The pips furnish an agreeable entertainment. A high propulsion would enable them to kill." "My breakfast would supply a Workhouse," he laughs to his "Dear Tuck" (William Hardman): "my luncheons are equal to the refections of four fat Friars; my dinner would satiate the soul of a ticket-of-leave man. I go to bed when Apollo lays his red nose over the Eastern hill, and light-foot hours carry it on their shoulders in triumph to 27, Gordon Street, what time Tuck, with a final snore, says 'Blow it!' and consents to rise!"

These are the lighter passages, the glistening foam on the surface of deep waters, and they are plentiful on very many pages; but, as a whole, these letters, finely joyous and amusing as some of them may be, demand from the careful reader an attention far other than mere glances at humour or considerations of style. They demand no less than the acceptance of George Meredith as one of the most true-hearted, high-spirited men of his age; unworldly, yet loving the world; spiritual in thought; laughing in the face of death, yet clinging to Earth, his life-long love. "It is hard that one should strike the solemn peal of 80, and not be able to caper with the legs, though the mind and heart are elastically harlequin," he wrote on February 10, 1908, to Sir Francis Burnand; "however, good things come at this big age." To another friend he says, in the following year: "For me, I drag on, counting more years and not knowing why. I have to lean on an arm when I would walk, and I am humiliated by requiring at times a repetition of sentences. This is my state of old age. But my religion of life is always to be cheerful. Though I see little of my friends, I live with them." Splendid armour against the shafts of death, even then taking aim at him, that resolve "always to be cheerful"! And in all sorrows of separation, of loss of friends, of illness, comes the same heartiness of comfort, the same refusal to dwell in the shadows, the indomitable decision to capture what gleams of sunshine may appear. Only occasionally, and then chiefly in connection with his work and the slowness of the public to welcome it, do we find a touch of cynicism. On a puzzling verse in "In Memoriam" he wrote to Captain Maxse:—

> If I had written such a line, what vehement reprobation of me from Ploverfield! what cunning efforts to construe! and, finally, what a lecture on my wilfulness! In Tennyson it is interesting. In Browning you are accustomed to gnaw a bone, and would be surprised to find him simple. But "G.M.," who is not known, not acknowledged, he shall be trounced if he offers us a difficulty—we insist upon his thinking in our style. Very well, Fred; I am used to it.

With regard to such passages, and others here and there acidly commenting on similar themes, we cannot but feel profoundly glad that George Meredith lived until his was one of the honoured names in English literature—honoured in a wide circle, as it long had been among such intimates as Lord Morley, Mr. and Mrs. Meynell, Frederick Greenwood, Leslie Stephen, William Hardman, and many more to whom his letters are as gems in an unbreakable girdle of friendship. The little home at Box Hill was a centre from which rays of affection sprang forth in all directions, towards which bent the steps of those whose admiration of its owner as man and writer came nigh to reverence. To few men, perhaps, were close friendships more necessary. Some temperaments can shut themselves off as with a door of silence, living, thinking, and working in a lonely, soundless cavern, giving their brain and soul only the careful relief of the ultimate, printed word; not so was it with Meredith. He craved the instant pen, caught the winged minute, and his gusts of enthusiasm flew post-haste to those whom he knew were most fit to understand. Delicate little notes, rippling with fun, went to his children in their youth, and, a generation after, to his grandchildren; explanations of passages in his own novels he would write patiently to those who were practically strangers; frequent pages of mingled frolic and criticism delighted his literary compeers, and are here reproduced; and there are letters which seem almost too sacred for cold print, betraying his love for the one who was to be his wife. One can hardly read them without a catching of the breath; they sing for happiness.

It is inevitable that in reading so many letters, all from one hand, we long for some of the hidden ones to which they were answers, or for some of the replies which they incited. Mr. W. M. Meredith has chosen carefully and wisely, and it is but a very small admixture of dispraise to say that in several cases he might have given more annotations for the benefit of readers who were not personal friends of his father; that these would be many he could not have doubted. It is not a complete collection, and we notice in some quarters a hope for further volumes. If any issue of trivial consequence is contemplated, bearing no interest beyond the mere fact that the same hand wrote its contents that gave us "The Egoist," we take exception to that hope. It is difficult to think of any following volume as forming anything but an anti-climax to these inspiring books, and, just as we think it was a pity to include much of Meredith's "Miscellaneous Prose" in a series that was artistically satisfactory without it, we think it would be a mistake to attempt an addition to this entirely admirable selection. The man is here, living vividly in his brilliant words; what more is there to be said?

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

The Music of Venice

WHICH is the most musical city in Europe? Let Paris, Vienna, Munich, and Berlin sift the evidence and decide that question so far as the cultivation of artificial music is concerned, music that can be manufactured by the twin genius of heart and brain, and executed at will by those who are cunning of finger or throat. But this kind of music is but a makeshift after all. There are times when we rejoice devoutly that the gods have given it as a solace in those moments when the truest music is withheld from us; and those appreciate it the most who are readiest to acknowledge that it is only a substitute. So beautiful is some of this music of man, music of Palestrina, of Gluck, of Mozart, of Schubert, of Franck, that, hearing its sweetness, we are often tempted to forget the other and better strains which come and go, as the wind bloweth where it listeth, without our asking, utterly and entirely outside of any power or influence we possess over them. Perhaps, as Shelley thought, the sound of Silence is the most perfect manifestation of the true music. Let us listen to the silence, he said, for its tones impart what words can never render into music.

This music is very rarely heard in those cities which are thoughtlessly assumed to be the most musical. You might suppose, indeed, that the keenest listener would hearken in vain for the music of Silence in a city. Go to some unexplored cañon in the mountains, visit the lemon groves beyond the Epipolæ of Syracuse at midnight, row out upon a summer sea and ship your oars, when winds are hushed and the last fishing-boat is out of sight. You think it is in such spots, at such seasons, that you shall hear the diviner songs! And yet they are to be heard in crowded cities, too, these rapturous songs of silence; and even better heard. For then they seem more magical when you, the listener, are surrounded by objects which at any moment may burst out with the clamour of ten thousand tongues. In Rome, the august, we have heard this majestic music of Silence. If you can obtain permission to sit in the Forum or on the Palatine just before cock-crow you shall hear it, too. You will think from time to time that your ear catches the undertones in which dead Cæsars talk together, but it is only the passage of a Dryad from one cypress to another, and, her flight accomplished, the harmonies of Silence vibrate again unchallenged. In the cloister of the Terme also they have been heard at early dawn, but still more rarely, for the Ferrovia is near, and the plashing of the fountain in the Piazza can interrupt.

But Italy owns one city where the melodies of Silence, and those others which, even though they depend on men in one way or another, have nothing to do with the music of chamber, theatre, or concert-hall, may every day and night be heard to perfection. Its name is Venice. Lately we have sat at our window in the Grande Rue, between three and four o'clock in the morning, listening to music so magnificent that some of its cadences were almost intolerable in their beauty. Right before us in the sky shone great Orion, Sirius, and their attendants; their shining so brilliant that their reflection, in the Canal made the jade-coloured floor seem as if some celestial hand had sprinkled it with sharp-cut fragments from the pavement of emerald and yellow diamond that encircles the Throne on high. The morning stars were singing together, and all the sons of God were shouting for joy. Palace after palace, erect in the clear air, and seen in the mirror of the still waters, echoed the song. The bells of the Salute trembled with eagerness to swell the splendid noise, and we knew that great Marangona, restored to his belfry, was listening to the concert, but waiting the accustomed hour when the Silence having died away into earthly sound, he should be bidden to add the unapproachable dignity of that voice which speaks as if it were the sum of all the illustrious voices that ever were heard in Venice to the gathering hum of the rising music-makers going forth to their work and to their labour until the evening. This was music, indeed, yet until the bells began at half-past five those stars looked down upon what in the ordinary sense of language was an absolutely noiseless city.

Almost as enchanting are the semi-silences of evening, when only the occasional plash of the gondola's oar is heard, or the waves washing the marble steps, and the distant whisperings of the narrow streets; when the touching, mournful lines from Verlaine's prison come to the mind:—

> Cette paisible rumeur là
> Vient de la ville.

You must make the most of the rare minutes when these quiet concerts are given, for too soon a vaporetto will hurry by, and dispel the peace. But we do not hold that the noiseless music of Venice, though, to be sure, it is the most beautiful, is the only kind for which an hourly Laudamus should be uttered. For Venice has the secret of capturing what may be ugly in and by itself and turning it to a golden use. By this alchemy the horror of the chimney-stacks, and the new houses on the Lido, and the telegraph wires over the lagoon, and the merciless glare of incandescent lights, is transmuted; Venice uplifts her finger, and all that would be ugly hides itself, decently, and loses its identity among the ever-changing processions of lovely things. Venice has the same magical power over what in other cities would be disagreeable sounds. The little bells of S. Samuele and S. Barnaba wake you with an aubade performed, as it were, by sweetened flutes and the clangour, led by S. Stefano and the Frari becomes the most majestic of polyphony chanted, it seems, by deep-throated archangels. We lean over the wall of our friend's garden on the Giudecca and listen to the song of a boatman who is bringing his load of gorgeous fruits from Pelestrina.

Judged by ordinary standards, his voice is harsh and husky, and his tune is commonplace, but Venice makes it seem so beautiful that our pleasure in listening is immeasurably greater than that with which we heard Caruso, a few weeks since, in the hot Opera House at Vienna. The very wailings of the sirens, and the insolent whistlings of the steam-tugs, the riotous screaming of children, the violin practisings of schoolgirls, the murderous altercations of gondoliers at their traghetti — even these unmelodious sounds are caught up by Venice and used to enhance the glory of her music, as if she were some Debussy of Olympus, knowing well what is the value of a rightly-introduced dissonance. Her names as you read them on her walls are music. It needs not that you should speak aloud such a title as that of "Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari" to know that its music is like a rich sentence of Beethoven. And Venice gives you Beethoven also. His symphonies were not, it is true, written entirely for wind instruments, but when the Banda Municipale played some selections from them the other day in the Piazza they seemed to sound more gloriously under the shadow of S. Marco and the Campanile than they do in Queen's Hall.

Nor were we conscious of any other sense but an added delight when at the Angelus great Marangona joined in with a voice richer than a hundred thousand double-basses playing in unison. Exquisite music, too, is being made at this moment in Venice which all the world will presently be running to hear. For Signor Wolf-Ferrari lives here, and we have been privileged to make the acquaintance of his new opera, on a play of Molière, an opera which we do not hesitate to affirm will set the seal of fame and greatness on the career of the composer of "Il Segreto di Susanna." We must not speak further of this work, which is not yet completed, but we know already that its music is worthy of the beauty and wonder of the incomparable city in which it has had its birth. Yes, Venice, all melody herself, is now inspiring her young composer with something of her own delicious radiancy of heart. One must be glad at Venice, and here, by the side of one of her canals, music is being written which we are sure will add to the gladness of the world.

A French Historian of "Our Own Times"

Histoire du Peuple Anglais au XIXe Siècle. Vol. I—L'Angleterre en 1815. By ELIE HALEVY. (Hachette and Co. 15 fr.)

IN undertaking a history of England in the Nineteenth Century M. Halévy has demonstrated that he is truly brave, but, like the man with the five talents, he has made them other five, for he has shown himself modest as well as brave. We wish that some of the foreign commentators of English literature could take lessons at his school; their need of initial apology is, if anything, greater than his, since nothing, not even its customs and institutions, belongs more intimately to a nation than its language and its literature. M. Halévy's deprecative introduction exhibits one rather curious feature that supplies food for thought—he addresses himself formally and it would seem exclusively to his compatriots. This appears to us to illustrate a point of national difference; we find it difficult not to be personal or insular even in the region of ideas—to the Frenchman that region is a No-man's-land; we like to reserve a technical right of invitation to walk in paths we call our own—the Frenchman carries a passe-partout.

But there is another and a more obvious point to consider. When the eminent professor of the Ecole Libre des Sciences Politiques addresses his justification solely to his compatriots, he seems to imply that his book is intended solely for them—that it will be read, in fact, by Frenchmen alone. If so, it is carrying modesty too far. We shall be surprised if this work does not gain very general recognition in England. In the first place it supplies a great want—no one has done for the Nineteenth Century what Lecky has done for the Eighteenth—and in the second place it is admirably executed. Frenchmen have a secret recipe for writing modern history; we would quote, for example, the work of M. Seignobos and the lectures of M. Denis. They thread the most complicated maze with unerring instinct, and at the darkest corners they hang the guiding lamp of epigram. M. Halévy has all his countrymen's gifts in this matter. Nor does he weaken his qualifications when he suggests that a foreigner may see more of the soul of a country than a native of that country; the physician hands over the medical treatment of his own family to another physician. The foreigner has the capacity for wonder—"une bienfaisante faculté d'étonnement"—and wonder is the gate of knowledge. In M. Halévy's case this capacity is keen and effective; a very favourite expression of his—"dans aucun pays d'Europe" with its implied "except England"—exemplifies this. We do not know if M. Halévy knows all the countries of Europe, but he certainly knows the difference between France and England.

We believe in compliments. The truest history of a country during a period would be obtained by reading first a native and then a foreign historian. Of these the latter at least should be a genius. A symposium, even if it includes one or two foreigners, is very unsatisfactory.

M. Halévy, we have said, has the faculty of wonder. He displays it continually, and with abundant reason. No people has more consistently baffled expectation than the English of the early Nineteenth Century. Their polity was an organised weakness; their army was an organised anarchy; there was no reason why their navy should rise superior to its terrific task. Every time M. Halévy sums up at the close of some particular subject, he finds it necessary to defer his explanation of averted disaster to some later moment. When he gets to this explanation, it may be true, but it is scarcely heroic or impressive. It is most probably true—it is the unprejudiced outside observer, with the "faculté d'étonnement" who gives it to us. Here, at any rate, it is, this explanation:—

> Si le matérialisme historique état vrai, s'il fallait chercher, dans la série des faits économiques, la cause explicative de toute l'histoire, l'Angleterre du XIXe siècle devrait être le pays prédestiné de la révolution politique et de la révolution religieuse.

But—

> L'Angleterre a été le théâtre, au XVIIIe siècle, d'un grand mouvement religieux qui n'a pas eu son équivalent sur le continent, du dernier mouvement d'opinion protestante qui ait réussi à fonder des institutions durables; et c'est le "réveil méthodiste," le "réveil évangélique" qui founded, for instance, modern English Liberalism, and enables us to account for > la stabilité exceptionnelle dont la société anglaise est destinée à jouir, dans un siècle de révolutions et de crises, et ce qu'on peut appeler le miracle de l'Angleterre moderne, anarchiste et cépendant bien ordonnée, positive, industrielle, et cependant religieuse jusqu'au piétisme.

Even while searching for the miracle that saved England from the European earthquake, M. Halévy by no means excludes sympathy for the institutions, imperfect or "anarchistes" as they might be, that distinguished her at this epoch:—

> Si elles sont librement acceptées [aristocratical institutions, for instance, in army organisation] consciemment voulues par tous les membres d'une société, même par ceux qui, dans cette société, ne font point partie de l'aristocratie dirigeante, elles sont de nature à répandre, dans tous les rangs, une sorte d'orgueil collectif, source d'énergie et de puissance.

The English electoral system may have been corrupt, but there was nothing as good on the Continent, and it worked well enough to find many imitators. The ruinous scale of electioneering expenses and the orgies that accompanied a contested election, though no doubt exaggerated, were not wholly indefensible, for, apart from the fact that they might be regarded as the price of power and as a "sport national," they implied a large measure of political liberty, a possession that M. Halévy does not refuse to England during this period.

This work makes no pretence to being a "political" history, in the ordinary sense; it is a very complete "social" survey of modern England. The present volume is divided into three almost equal parts, dealing respectively with "Les Institutions Politiques," "La Société Economique" and "Les Croyances et la Culture." The last part, with its two sub-divisions, is perhaps the most interesting. We have seen how crucial the religious question is for the author. But he is also very much concerned with literary and philosophical currents; he has already published a considerable work on the history of philosophical Radicalism, and in the present work he devotes a good deal of space to the theories of Malthus, Bentham, Ricardo, and Mill.

We have already indicated roughly the lines on which the political institutions are considered. M. Halévy starts from the classical accounts of the British Constitution due to Montesquieu and Blackstone, and he concludes that by 1815 "les intérêts de la Couronne, de la Chambre Haute et de la Chambre Basse sont devenus solidaires, au lieu de se faire opposition et équilibre. C'est donc que la Constitution est faussée." Interesting in this connection and in relation to even more modern conditions is the account of Cobbett and his attacks on both political parties. The first part includes sections on the Army and the Navy. M. Halévy distinguishes between them as being respectively the Tory and Whig services; the Navy never came under popular suspicion; as to the Army:—

> A cause des vices mêmes de son organisation, les victoires remportées par l'armée anglaise n'ont pas mis en péril les libertés traditionnelles de la nation.

In Part II we find a very clear and exhaustive account of economical problems and conditions. The paradoxical triumph of laissez-faire, at the moment when it was condemning itself by its worst abuses, and at the very moment when the slave trade was being abolished in the name of humanity, is made quite intelligible. It was so easy to make a fortune in those days, and the way was potentially open to almost all. The fluctuations of the great war emphasised the speculative basis of wealth. It may be news to many that Napoleon had finally to defend French industry by conniving at the infringement of his own Blockade; nothing could more vividly illustrate the power that was in English commerce at this date.

The "snobisme" that is bound to come in somewhere in a work on England makes one rather curious appearance; we do not refer to "l'armée de snobs" as a description of the Peninsular army; but we think that it is taking rather a narrow view of human nature to say that it was principally "par snobisme" that self-made manufacturers were comparatively humane to their employees.

We will conclude by congratulating M. Halévy on a fine piece of work. May the other volumes not tarry too long, and may they be worthy of their predecessor! Above all, let us pray that the fourth volume may contain an index! It might be the one thing wanting to complete a monumental work, and as there are many French works that suffer from this defect, we venture to make the suggestion. R. F. SMALLEY.

Sixty Years Ago

THOSE who wish to understand something of the great difference between life in England sixty years ago and to-day should read this interesting autobiography, which covers the period of the writer's boyhood, youth, and early manhood from about the year 1833 to 1865. Mr. Kebbel contends, and we are inclined to agree with him, that "there is a much greater difference between the England of to-day and the England of 1840 than there was between the England of George I and the England of Charles II." The human boy is much the same in every age. Yet even this natural product is affected by the spirit of the age, and modern faddists, "education" folk, hygienists, and sentimental philanthropists do their best to lick him into an artificial shape. As the author humorously observes, "Well, well, School Boards, County Councils, competitive examinations, mown stubbles, French partridges, an improved moral tone, New Zealand mutton, University Extensions, threshing-machines, have made us the very superior people we are now."

From this it may be inferred that he is a sportsman and naturalist of the old-fashioned type, who learnt something of nature's secrets at the fountain-head. Certainly anything more ludicrous than the laboured attempt of town and college teachers in the primary country schools to teach children nature from handbooks and diagrams can hardly be imagined. It is, perhaps, only equalled by the modern absurdity of teaching children to play. The spontaneous games of children thirty years ago, many of them a part of traditional folk-lore, were worth dozens of the sickly, even if highly proper, inculcated relaxations of sophisticated teachers.

Mr. Kebbel's schooldays were sufficiently breezy, and afforded much valuable help towards the Battle of Life. It is a question whether the luxury and softness which has invaded schools in our day will be so efficacious. But the chapters which will be read with greatest interest, at least by University men, are those which tell the graphic story of Oxford life more than sixty years ago. Mr. Kebbel went up to Oxford from Merchant Taylors' School in January, 1846, and matriculated at Exeter College. Then frock-coats were beginning to supersede tail-coats, green or brown cutaways with brass buttons of 1837 being rarely seen. Men out for walks or rides, or even going down to the river, were expected to be in "beaver"—so called from the time when all tall hats were beaver hats.

Evening chapel was at 4.30 p.m., dinner at 5 o'clock. "Tankards of college ale were emptied" at breakfast parties. Port and sherry were chiefly drunk of "wines," though "men did not sit down to a wine party as a general rule with the intention of drinking a bottle apiece, and perhaps more." So even then there was a change from John Thorpe's assurance in "Northanger Abbey" that "there is no drinking at Oxford now. You would hardly meet a man who goes beyond his four pints."

And what a change to-day! Someone recently observed that the dull, serious conversation of modern common-rooms, and the absence of wit and humour, were in direct ratio to the flatness of the insipid mineral waters consumed at high tables, and had the hardihood to propose as a remedy the formation of a Society for the Promotion of Drinking among Oxford Dons. Anyhow, we remember dining in the common-room of St. John's a few years ago, and being felicitated by the host of the evening for not letting the port wine pass by. In the "forties" there was a curious passion among reading men for having the most elementary text-books expensively bound. One man had Trendelenburg's Logic bound in russia, another a lexicon to Æschylus. Handsome furniture and costly engravings were common. Indeed, "more luxury was displayed in the decoration of their rooms by most men than in eating and drinking," though "select circles" gave "select little dinners" with champagne and claret. At Exeter College routine appears to have been the first duty of man. "Never to miss chapel, never to 'cut lecture,' never to lurch in late, always to dine in hall, gained a man more credit with the dons than if he had spent half his nights in mastering Thucydides and half his days in pondering the Ethics." It was said that Sewell used gravely to caution too hard readers against "the pride of intellect." However, Mr. Kebbel, gaining an exhibition, migrated to Lincoln, where things were "very different." These were the early days of Mark Pattison, Kaye, and Perry.

Mr. Kebbel's love of sport and nature led him to explore the country round Oxford in a way little known to the average undergraduate. Godstow we all know, but we wonder whether the men of to-day dine at the riverside inn on "fresh-caught eels, spatch-cocked and fried," or, after a day's shooting in Eynsham Woods, at its "very good inn, boasting some real old port." Then there was Witney, where, after a day's roam through Wychwood Forest, "untouched by the reformer, curvique immunis aratri, you might dine out of doors in the garden; or Otmoor, a wide, marshy flat, good for a snipe or a widgeon; or The Oak in Stow Wood, half-inn, half-farmhouse, with its grand old oak-tree and the honest old farmer with his red face, the son coming up with his gun over his shoulder, and his pretty sister wishing you a smiling good-bye at the door." During one Long Vacation Mr. Kebbel stayed up at Oxford, ostensibly for the purpose of reading Roman history. But "staying up meant taking country lodgings at Elsfield, and reading Livy meant shooting partridges at Stow Wood." Yet after sixty years he gives us a delightful chapter on Oxford in a real vacation time, before the modern annexation of the month of July for examination work.

These, too, were the days before the mushroom growth of "tutoropolis" and suburbia between St. Giles's and Summertown. Oxford in vacation became simply the great county town. All University life was dormant. The silent colleges were like despoiled monasteries. The solitary University man "began to feel like a stranger in his own stronghold." And then, paradoxical as it may appear, he began to realise the genius loci of Oxford's memories and unique history, freed from "the tumult of term time, when the talk is of nothing but schools and wines, and eights and elevens, and who has got the Latin verse, and who has won the drag or the long jump." Then "he sees fair Oxford aright," and may call up her matchless associations, and all the charming romance of her history, religion, and literature, and of her great personalities, through the splendid traditions of a thousand years. Elsfield and partridges were not conducive to hard work, and to this vacation episode the author partly attributes the loss of his First Class. Being the son of a country rector, clerical topics are lightly touched, and there is a good picture of home life in the rectory, where so many country clergy were "squarsons" and sportsmen. It was thoroughly honest and wholesome, though it would shock the serious so-called Christian Socialist modern ecclesiastic. In one sense it was probably more Socialistic than much of the sentimental sham Socialism affected by that serious young person of to-day. Probably more was done by individuals to cheer and brighten the life of the agricultural labourer than is effected by the present State legislation and that dreaded bogie, the ubiquitous inspector. As to the "squarsons," it is worthy of note "that acceptance of the Anglo-Catholic idea as revived by Keble, Newman, and Pusey was not confined to a few ascetics or weak-minded enthusiasts, or ambitious sacerdotalists, but that it was embraced by clergymen who had passed middle life under the old regime, who were scholars, sportsmen, and men of the world, as soon as they understood its meaning and recognised 'its historic basis.'"

From Oxford Mr. Kebbel passes to London life in the Temple, and we read of the pleasures of a by-gone generation, of Cremorne, Evans's, the Casinos, the Cider Cellars, and dinners at the "Trafalgar" at Greenwich, at the old "Falcon" at Gravesend, and at the Eel-pie Island at Twickenham, till serious money difficulties arose, low water, and the perennial trouble with money-lenders, all bravely told as part of the Battle of Life. After much tossing on stormy seas, the author steers at last into the haven of the Press, and we find him at the annual Saturday Review dinner at Greenwich, in company with Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir W. Harcourt ("Historicus"), Saunders (the editor of Justinian), G. Venables, and G. H. Lewes; and, later, the present Lord Morley and Charles Austin of the Times.

It is difficult now to realise the England of sixty years ago, but a remarkable picture of some aspects of life in a period whose every traces are rapidly being eliminated will be found in this well-written and fascinating volume.

Tigers and Police

Life in the Indian Police. By C. E. GOULDSBURY. Illustrated. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE apologies which Mr. Gouldsbury offers in his postscript for any imperfections in his work indicate his modesty, but were hardly required. He has produced a book which will be enjoyed by all sportsmen who have pursued big game. Many Anglo-Indians, too, and others will read it with interest as describing the characteristic scenes and familiar incidents of a life spent in India. It is not the author's first literary effort. Mr. Gouldsbury gave a small sample of his adventures in his "Dulal, the Forest Guard," but he has now drawn more largely on his repertoire, and it may be hoped that he has not yet exhausted it. His numerous stories have a reality and freshness that carry conviction of their truth, and of his accuracy as an observer. It would have been easy for him to make the police portion of his book more prominent, but he has wisely said nothing of his departmental life that cannot be read with interest. The Indian police have, as we have had occasion to say before, been under searching inquiry, and no branch of the Indian services is better known or more bitterly abused. Improvements are being effected, but can only be gradual. Mr. Gouldsbury shows how useful the police are, even under present conditions, and how dependent the English police officers are upon their native subordinates. The instances narrated of torture inflicted by the police in old days to extort confessions are hardly credible, instances, indeed, of devilish ingenuity, as they are termed: they are becoming rarer, as severe punishment follows upon conviction of any policeman offending. In the backward districts, as an Inspector admitted to the author, "the peoples not being in advanced education state, there is not much work for police, but of hunting there is plenty, no doubt, especially royal tiger"; and, again, "No, your worship, there is no such important crimes, for the people are yet like barbarian rustic, and cannot read and write, but when there are more schools they will become intelligent, no doubt, and make organisation of criminal nature like in more advanced districts." In such localities the author evidently had much time for sport. Tiger-shooting had an extraordinary charm, an indescribable fascination, for him, and fortunately his nerve never failed, even in the most trying situations. On one occasion he had to get a tiger out of a cave where it was heard crunching human bones; on another a tiger had climbed out along the branch of a tree. But Mr. Gouldsbury always had the valuable assistance of an experienced shikari, and generally of staunch elephants. The former was, through excess of zeal, nearly demolished by a tiger. When the man was almost in extremities the civil surgeon's skill, aided by the old man's delight at finding two sahibs had come to see him, worked wonders, and from that moment he began to mend, eventually recovering. He survived for many years, falling a victim at last to a cobra-bite. The stories of elephants and their habits are equally interesting as those of the tigers. Few people perhaps know how frightened tame elephants are of a herd of their wild brethren, especially of the leading tuskers. The death of an elephant in a quicksand must have been a painful sight.

Though sport occupies the major portion of Mr. Gouldsbury's volume, he has observations to offer on many other matters. In one district where sport was wanting he found crime astonishingly prevalent, "yet, strangely enough, sordid, cunning, and intriguing as was the general character of these people, they were by no means deficient in courage," and they indulged freely in sanguinary contentions and riots, often ending in loss of life. He alludes to the "kindliness and good feeling which existed between natives and Europeans before discontent and sedition—the products possibly of a supererogatory education system—had laid their baneful hold upon the people," and, again, "it must be evident to anyone with lengthened experience of the country that, apart from the spirit of anarchy and socialism, now generally prevalent, the condition of unrest in Bengal is due in a great measure to over-education." Education was not the author's only antipathy. The Judicial Courts in India often require what appears to the executive and police officers an unreasonably high standard of evidence, unattainable under the existing conditions of the country, which favour untruthfulness and inaccuracy. Mr. Gouldsbury writes of a British officer, "As a Judge McTavish really was impossible, his unreasoning antipathy to the police blinding his eyes to any skill or virtue they might occasionally exhibit," and later he alludes to "that august and time-honoured assemblage of learned prætors known as the High Court." The description of a local Raja is not flattering—"Built on a scale even the Claimant would not rival, he stood about 5 feet 2 inches in height, with a form as rotund in full and profile as it is possible for the human frame to be, and arrayed in garments of startling hue. His coat was of pea-green satin, with stripes of yellow and purple, worn over trousers of crimson silk, sprinkled with gold stars and fitting closely to the legs, giving the impression of bolsters such as are sometimes seen on an ottoman of Oriental design": the "fractional portion of a rainbow," the "huge jelly-bag-like carcase of the potentate," "the porpoise-like proportions of our visitor" are picturesque expressions, but perhaps somewhat severe upon the Raja. The camp life, the Durbar on the frontier, the Frenchman's adventure, the planter's hospitality, the smaller matters of everyday existence in a station, are well described, without any effort or high-falutin. Mr. Gouldsbury had good luck in indulging his special love of big-game sport, and he has been equally successful in writing a book which provides plenty of entertainment.

George Borrow

George Borrow, the Man and his Books. By EDWARD THOMAS. (Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

"HE went out into the wilderness, and he savoured of it." This sentence, culled from the concluding chapter of Mr. Thomas's excellent biography, is perhaps as perfect a description of Borrow as it would be possible to give. Borrow was a many-sided man, and he presents himself to the reader under a variety of aspects. But one thing at least may be said about him: he dwelt always in the wilderness.

Perhaps it is for this reason that one of the most universal figures in English literature has merely succeeded in establishing a cult. Borrow is not for all. If you are not enthusiastic about him you will probably dislike him. It is possible to care greatly for English literature, and to care very little indeed for George Borrow. The genuine Borrovian is born, not made. That—or something like it—is one of the obiter dicta of Mr. Augustine Birrell, who is one of the chosen band. And Mr. Birrell is right—as, indeed, he invariably is in his judgments on letters. To appreciate Borrow you must rid your mind of a thousand prejudices; more, you will have to trample ruthlessly—for the time at least—upon some of your most cherished convictions.

For the man is full of faults—faults which would wreck the reputation of a lesser writer. His exaggerated Protestantism is always in the way, until one learns to accept it as a necessary part of his mental outfit. After a time one can even tolerate his violent tirades against the Pope. What reader of "Westward Ho!"—with the possible exception of Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch—ever enjoyed that stirring romance the less for Kingsley's ridiculous travesty of the Roman Catholic religion? So it is with Borrow. His essential greatness carries him easily over a hundred such obstacles. His occasional lapses into a slipshod Victorianism, his cavalier treatment of facts, his inadequate knowledge of Romany (for the authorities now maintain that his Romany studies need a very rigid revision)—these things, seen in just perspective, are but spots upon the surface of the sun.

He eludes classification. No author has ever been to a greater extent the despair of the system-mongers. He belonged to no school, and he has left no successor. He claims affinity with Cervantes, with Defoe, with Le Sage, and with Sterne, and yet it cannot be said that he resembles any of these writers.

For Borrow was before all things individual. No writer was ever more consistently and exclusively himself. He strikes always a note of bigness. "Big," indeed, is the only word that will fit him. His personality is at times almost overpowering in its forcefulness. By his side the men and women that we know—and we are forced to include ourselves—appear as pigmies. The petty restraints of civilisation are not for a man cast in this Olympian mould. There are evidences in this book that Borrow was a bear in a drawing-room. But he ought never to have been in a drawing-room. The sky of heaven was his natural roof; the sun and the stars his candles. He reminds one of those old Norse heroes whose biographies formed the inspiration of his childhood. A Protestant by accident, he was a Pagan by divine necessity.

In writing of Borrow, we have been in danger of forgetting Mr. Thomas. Borrow's latest biographer has followed in the wake of some distinguished predecessors. Both Dr. Knapp and Mr. Herbert Jenkins have made careful studies of Borrow, and the former has added considerably to our knowledge of his relations with the British and Foreign Bible Society. But Mr. Thomas, if he supplies us with no new facts, provides us with a new interpretation. As a reasoned estimate of Borrow's work and influence the book is far and away the best that has appeared on the subject, and the illustrations will be welcomed by all readers. The purely biographical portions of the volume are admirably done, while, as an example of Mr. Thomas's method at its best we may perhaps be permitted to quote the following summary from the concluding chapter:—

> He kept good company from his youth up. Wistful or fancifully envious admiration for the fortunate simple yeomen, or careless poor men, or noble savages, or unstatesmanlike fishermen, or unromanised Germani, or animals who do not fret about their souls, admiration for those in any class who are not for the fashion of these days, is a deep-seated and ancient sentiment, akin to the sentiment for childhood and the golden age. Borrow met a hundred men fit to awaken and satisfy this admiration in an age when thousands can over-eat and overdress in comfort all the days of their life. Sometimes he shows that he himself admires in this way, but more often he mingles with them as one almost on an equality with them, though his melancholy or his book-knowledge is at times something of a foil. He introduces us to fighting men, jockeys, thieves, and ratcatchers, without our running any risk of contamination. Above all, he introduces us to the Gypsies, people who are either young and beautiful or strong, or else witchlike, in a fierce old age.

If. Mr. Thomas succeeds in adding to the select band of Borrow-worshippers he will have rendered a by no means inconsiderable service to his generation. Even sublimity may pall, and the "mighty organ music" of a Milton is not for all moments. But one returns to Borrow as to the company of a loved and trusted friend. And there are those to whom Dingley Dell offers delights which they fail to find even in the Forest of Arden.

Men and Manners of Modern China

Men and Manners of Modern China. By the Rev. J. MACGOWAN. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. MACGOWAN has lived in China for fifty years, and has come to the conclusion that the Chinese are "a very lovable people, and when seen in their happiest moods, or when sorrow has been clouding their lives, or when aroused by some sense of injustice, they prove that they really possess the fibre of a great people." With due regard for foreign missionary enterprise, when it is conducted on the right lines, we are aware, now and again, that the author's zest for souls—however praiseworthy it may be within its own sphere—rather mitigates against the value of his book in certain chapters. It was Lafcadio Hearn's method to glorify Buddhism at the expense of Christianity. It is Mr. Macgowan's method to extol Christianity, to reveal the worst side of Chinese superstition, and to refrain from doing full justice to the ethical value of Confucianism. He gives us a fine description of the temple of "The White Deer," and warmly praises the Buddhist's unerring judgment in selecting a beautiful situation for his place of retirement and meditation; but surely all the Buddhist priests in China are not like the opium victim in the temple of "The White Deer"? The author is much too fond of those very objectionable words, "idol" and "heathen." We are scarcely given time to appreciate the quaintness of Chinese superstition, when the author, who is evidently not a folklorist, is busy in pointing out its villainies. His treatment of the Chinese classics is rather patronising. "The Spring and Autumn Annals" is certainly not a great book, but he might have spared us the following:—"A railway porter's memoranda of the arrival and departure of certain trains have quite as much enthusiasm as these records of men that lived in the ancient past." Mr. Macgowan has nothing to say about Taoism or the "Tao-Tê-Ching."

Apart from the author's outlook in regard to Christianity in China, he has written a most admirable book, and touched upon a variety of subjects with considerable charm and freshness. Ancestor-worship and fêngshui are treated in a most illuminating way. His description of "The Temple of the Emperor of the City" and "The Spokesman of the Gods" is replete with valuable material, presented with an eye to dramatic effect, and his comments on Chinese doctoring are very diverting.

Mr. Macgowan writes concerning the Goddess of Mercy:—"Her home originally was in far-off India, and the story goes that she was the daughter of a king, and she was so touched by the miseries of the women who lived in the neighbourhood of her father's palace that she made a solemn vow that she would never get married, but would dedicate her life to the service of her own sex. This she did, and when she died she was deified, and her worship became a widespread one." We do not think that this is the correct version, for, according to Dr. William Anderson, the Chinese claim that Kwanjin, the Goddess of Mercy, is of native origin, the daughter of the King of the Chow dynasty. She was sentenced to death by her father because she refused to marry, but the executioner's sword broke without inflicting a wound. When eventually her spirit went to Hell, we are told that there was something so radiantly beautiful about Kwanjin that her very presence turned the mournful abode into Paradise. The King of the Imperial Regions, in order to maintain the gloomy aspect of his realm and also to preserve the proprieties, caused Kwanjin to be miraculously transported on a lotus flower to the Island of Pootoo. There is nothing philanthropic about this version, but it is infinitely more romantic than the story given by Mr. Macgowan.

This work is the most important that the gifted Author has attempted. His long residence in France and his relations with many distinguished Frenchmen enable him to write largely at first hand. The book appeals to both readers of lighter literature and to students of history, for on one hand it contains a great variety of amusing and interesting anecdotes and on the other a full record of French Statesmanship and Policy.

Mr. Macgowan is at his best when he is depicting some phase of Chinese life—in the home, in the highways and byways, on the river. No one has written more delightfully or more accurately about the actors of the Celestial Kingdom, and we are grateful to him for presenting the plot of a play called "Sir Serious." The chapter we have read with most pleasure is entitled "A Ramble through a Chinese City." We like the placid tradespeople, as contented as a brooding hen or a cow chewing the cud. We admire still more the barber who shaves with a rough-hewn piece of iron, and uses a hot, damp cloth instead of soap. When this deft fellow has shaved round his customer's head, he proceeds to render ears and eyes less hirsute. "It makes one tremble to see how he plays amongst the eyelashes, trimming them here and there, and turning down the eyelids and letting the sharp razor meander along the inside of them." When the barber has massaged his customer's spine and replaited his queue, the clever man receives about a penny for his dexterous and daring services. If the barber is clever and placid, so, too, is the charming old letter-writer, who will pen a long epistle on any subject and in most flowery language for a halfpenny. Now we meet a fat mandarin, and now a quack doctor, who also puts in other people's teeth with a piece of wire. Further down this fascinating street we encounter two angry Chinamen, who thrust forth their second fingers as a sign of contempt—cowardly fellows who want to fight, but are lacking in the necessary courage. Only one with deep human sympathies could have depicted such scenes in the way Mr. Macgowan has done. The Chinese, with all their faults, have won the author's heart, and we warmly commend this volume because it reveals the character of a great people.

A Safe Guide to Print Collecting

Whitman's Print-Collector's Handbook. Sixth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With Additional Chapters by MALCOLM C. SALAMAN. Illustrated. (G. Bell and Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

AN essential volume in every art-lover's library was Whitman's "Print Collector's Handbook," out of date though it had long become. Edition after edition proved it. But that it required complete revision—"a scouring revision"—even poor Whitman realised during the long illness that ended by robbing the British Museum of one of its most helpful guides and one of the best friends of the public, which is eulogy, for no man who has had to work in the print-room but has found the lords of that realm most helpful and kindly guides. Whitman stood out even in such company. The publishers must have known some heart-searchings as to whom to entrust with the revision; and the volume that now emerges proves them to have been inspired—in Mr. Malcolm Salaman they have found an ideal re-writer of the book, which will be sought after by every collector. I know no better work to put into the hands of the man about to launch on this fascinating hobby. I have tested the book from end to end, without petty search for slips of the pen; and it is pleasant to find a man writing upon the subject with the breadth of sympathy and looking upon it with the largeness of vision that Mr. Salaman has brought to his labour of love. It is true, as it is inevitable, that the author walks too much in the harness of so-called "experts" and bookish men; but even here he breaks from servitude so frequently that we feel a personality behind all that he writes. The moderns he is inclined to rate at their high value—and he will rate them higher the day that he shuts up other men's books and regards their work fearlessly, for he has the right stuff in him.

The greatest living lithographer—probably the supreme lithographer of all time—is the Frenchman Steinlen; to miss that is to miss the whole significance of the thing. Mr. Salaman seems never to have heard of Old Crawhall, one of the supreme masters of pure woodcut, whose pupils and disciples to-day are amongst the greatest masters of the craft. Yet it must count for righteousness to Mr. Salaman that he seems to realise the splendour of Gordon Craig, one of the finest artists in the woodcut that we have ever known. Craig and Nicholson were inspired through Pryde from Old Crawhall. And the younger men like Lovat Fraser are their kin. Again, whilst Mr. Salaman pays a little bookish-taught homage to some lesser men in lithography and etching, at heart it is good to see that he feels the greater majesty of Brangwyn in both these realms. In these things alone he steps forward at a stride as a greater authority than the men whom he too modestly quotes. But whilst Mr. Salaman surrenders somewhat too much to fashion, even estimating works of art by the dealer's scales, he should realise that the work of Seymour Haden will drop in value as inevitably as the masterwork of such as Brangwyn will rise, nevertheless the whole balance of the book is extraordinarily just; and the sense of proportion is excellent—all the more excellent when it is realised that so small a space had to hold so vast a subject. It is a pleasure to praise so sound a piece of work; nor must the publishers be passed over, since they have loyally supported the man of their choice with the right illustrations scattered plentifully throughout this valuable volume, a thorough and workmanlike volume that does credit to all concerned in it. HALDANE MACFALL.

Leading Figures in European History. By R. P. DUNN PATTISON, M.A. (Rivingtons. 6s. net.)

MR. PATTISON'S object in writing this book has been to present to the general reader, and to all who do not specialise in European history, "a succession of sketches of the leading figures of the past, illustrating the growth of ideas and principles which have contributed to form present-day Europe." In his selection he has been guided not so much by the greatness of his hero as by his representativeness of the period to which he belonged. Thus no two contemporaries have in any instance been chosen, and some of Mr. Pattison's heroes are not men who are in the forefront of European history. Mr. Pattison also has been careful not to include any English name in his list. With such a programme before him the author has had an almost inexhaustible field wherein to work, and no fault can, on the whole, be found with his selection. His opening figure is Charlemagne. Next comes a less known hero, Richard the Fearless of Normandy, and after him Hildebrand and Philip Augustus of France. Other names that stand out in Mr. Pattison's narrative are as varied in their spheres of action as Luther, Columbus, Lorenzo de' Medici, Frederick the Great, Louis XIV, and Cavour. The biographical sketches are connected one with the other by brief narratives of the events which intervened between the different epochs with which Mr. Pattison deals in detail. To the ordinary reader the most interesting of these sketches are those which deal with men and events nearest to his own time. Of these that on Bismarck certainly deserves as much attention as any of the others. Without proceeding to inordinate length Mr. Pattison brings out very clearly this statesman's complex character and complicated policy, and enables his readers to gain a fair and clear estimate of the politics of Prussia of last century. The author's style may be described as similar to that of a popular lecturer.

Among Congo Cannibals. By JOHN H. WEEKS. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.)

THE travel works of missionaries have of late years taken an important place in literature. Mr. Weeks' contribution to the already lengthy list is a notable one, breathing out as it does a tale of adventure, peril, and varied experiences among the Boloki tribe in the land of the Congo. It must not be thought that because the book is the work of a missionary, it is intended for those interested in missionary endeavour alone. It has been written for the general public, and he who fails to open its pages will undoubtedly be the loser of much information won at a terrible cost. The chronicles of those who go out among really savage humanity cannot fail to be enthralling, and Mr. Weeks, though he does not deal in horrors for horror's sake, has some terrible scenes to portray. Here is a passage which describes the return of a victorious tribe from battle:—

> While we were sitting at our tea the last party of returning warriors filed past our house, carrying the limbs of those who had been slain in the fight. Some had human legs over their shoulders, others had threaded arms through slits in the stomachs of their dismembered foes, and had tied the ends of the arms together, thus forming loops, and through these ghastly loops they had thrust their own living arms and were carrying them thus with the gory trunks dangling to and fro. . . . The sight worked on our nerves, and in the night we would start from our sleep, having seen in our dreams exaggerated processions passing before us burdened with sanguinary loads of slain and dismembered bodies.

This was not surprising! Surely few scenes more ghastly have ever been pictured. It was among folk such as these that Mr. Weeks pursued his work, and the author, dealing with the lighter hours of these strange people as well as with the moments of tragedy, has produced a volume which is not only absorbing in itself, but which must be considered as one of the most valuable contributions of modern times to the knowledge concerning the anthropology of a portion of Africa that is still very dark.

Handbook of Idiomatic English as now Written and Spoken. Containing Idioms, Phrases, and Locutions collected by JOHN KIRKPATRICK, M.A. (Boyveau and Chevillet, Paris. 4s. net.)

A Combined Concordance to the Bible. (Thomas Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.)

A Dictionary of Argot (French-English). By W. VON KNOBLAUCH. (George Routledge and Sons. 1s. net.)

PROFESSOR KIRKPATRICK'S "Handbook," the result of long experience and study, is intended to help students and travellers of all nationalities to speak and to write English correctly. The author lays no claim to his work being exhaustive, but it certainly contains a lengthy and carefully-selected list of such words and phrases in everyday use which are idiomatic, and which are rarely to be found in any ordinary grammar or dictionary. The various idioms given have long been stamped as "English" by popular or literary usage, or by historical tradition, and they are adequately explained in the "Handbook" by synonymous or analogous phrases. The addition of some of the best-known proverbs and quotations from more or less ancient authors, but solely those in daily modern use, still further serves to familiarise the reader with this important branch of the English language. In the matter of pronunciation needful help is given by means of phonetic and other symbols in a section devoted to the subject and throughout the body of the work; while a few exercises in the appendix sum up most of its difficulties.

The latest addition to "Nelson's Encyclopædic Library" is "A Combined Concordance to the Bible," a volume of nearly 600 pages, comprising also a Dictionary of Proper Names and a Subject Index. To facilitate ready reference the headings of each section are respectively distinguished by a different style of type, while obsolete and ambiguous words are explained. The text of the Authorised Version, with the most important changes of the Revised Version, and all the changes of proper names in the latter, are given, together with various renderings preferred by the American committee. It is a valuable work of reference within the reach of all.

Messrs. Routledge and Sons' tiny volume—it is so small it could be carried in a waistcoat pocket—must not be judged by its size, for it will prove most useful to students of French. There are, of course, more ambitious and more expensive works on the same subject, but the amount of information contained in the hundred and odd pages before us will prove, we believe, quite sufficient for all ordinary purposes.

A History of the British Nation, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By A. D. INNES. Illustrated. (T. C. and E. C. Jack. 3s. 6d. net.)

IN this massive volume of a thousand royal octavo pages, embellished with some four hundred illustrations and maps, chiefly from contemporary sources, we have a truly monumental "History of the British Nation" which does justice to its subject. It is no dry-as-dust chronicle intended for the use of youthful scholars—indeed, its size alone forbids it a place in the satchel of "the whining schoolboy . . . creeping like snail unwillingly to school." On the contrary, Mr. Innes, well known as an historical expert, especially of the Tudor period, has produced a brightly written narrative of the growth of the British nation from the earliest to the present time, which cannot fail to appeal to everyone who understands or wishes to understand and enjoy our empire's story. The contemporary illustrations selected by Mr. S. G. Stubbs derive an additional value from his descriptive and historical notes; and there are fifty maps to further elucidate the text. The publishers boast that they are offering a 30s. book for 3s. 6d., and there is no denying that it is a marvel of cheapness which should meet with a large and ready sale.

Revelations. By ROBERT BRYANT. (Stephen Swift and Co. 5s. net.)

THE first part of this book consists of various maxims, learnt, so the author tells us, "from Elizabetus, my nurse," and from various other people as time went on. It is not stated whether or no all these pearls of wisdom were followed. Probably they were sifted, or some taken and others left. There does not appear to be anything very new or original in them; we think we have read similar things in a Book very much older than Mr. Bryant's.

"Dona Deorum," Part II, is much more interesting, and tells of youths and maidens as they go to crave their chosen gifts from the gods. There is, however, about the book rather too much an air of rewards for good people and punishment for bad. Not that we would wish the sentences reversed, but it is better that these little matters should be delicately implied than baldly stated.

Sally. By DOROTHEA CONYERS. (Methuen & Co. 6s.)

SALLY is a charming, irrepressible little person who makes friends with everyone, and weaves a romance for herself with every man she meets. She counts, as she thinks, at least three strings to her bow, and as each fails her she turns for support and comfort to a guide very suitable to take charge of her wayward person. The scene of the story is laid in Ireland, and one or two hunts are described in excellent fashion. If there is a weak spot in the book, it is in the easy way in which the man who had been a recluse for years, who never spoke, conveying all his wishes and commands by writing, and even went to the extent of engaging a dumb footman, not only allows Sally to join him in the hunt, but sends her a note of the next meeting, and soon after asks her to tea. With this reservation, the remainder of the book makes most exhilarating reading; there is no lack of real Irish humour, and a healthy and invigorating atmosphere pervades the story.

THROUGHOUT this story there are two quite distinct and separate parts; on the one hand there is the story connected almost entirely with the people at the rectory and their immediate neighbours; on the other we are given glimpses of the villagers and the lives they lead, but these latter folk have little or no bearing on the plot. It is hard to say which of the two portions we like the better. In their different ways both are good. The vicar's daughter is wonderfully well drawn, and her outburst to her brother when he, in his selfishness, reviles her on the narrow life she leads is very human, and reveals the pent-up passion of a girl who longed for a wider scope, but was restrained by a keen sense of duty. The shepherd, and Jim Thatcher, the poacher, are interesting specimens of their class, and with others fall under the influence of the energetic young priest who is left in charge while the vicar takes an enforced rest. The results of his ministration the reader must see for himself, and in doing so he will spend a very enjoyable time.

Old Brent's Daughter. By HELEN C. ROBERTS. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

THIS is a rather disappointing novel. It is an incongruous blend of realism and romanticism. When, in Chapter I, Roden Scardeville, schoolmaster, meets Lucy Brent, schoolmistress, in a railway train at Lausanne, the reader feels morally certain that, before the book is finished, these twain shall be made one. Nor is the reader disappointed. In the meanwhile, however, there are cross-currents in the stream of love. For Scardeville is a member of an ancient and honourable county family, while Lucy is but the daughter of a village butcher. In the end love proves stronger than class distinctions, and triumphant virtue gains its own. So far the story moves along the approved lines, and so far it is entirely satisfactory. The author has a quite delicate sense of humour, and her studies of lower middle-class society in a small Sussex town are admirably done. It is when Miss Roberts attempts to deal with the deeper passions of man that she fails so lamentably. Hugh Ridsdale will deceive no one. A young man who regards murder as a mere episode in the day's work has no existence outside Bedlam—or the imagination of the lady-novelist. Equally unconvincing is the villainous Harvey Watson. Our English villages are not peopled with human monsters. We advise Miss Roberts to shun sensationalism. As a chronicler of small happenings she is charming. When, however, she aspires to scale the dizzy heights of melodrama, she achieves a tediousness which has to be read to be believed.

The Upas Tree. By FLORENCE L. BARCLAY. Coloured Frontispiece. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

IN "The Upas Tree" Mrs. Barclay tells a powerful and moving story which will take a front place amongst the novels of the present publishing season. Love, music, literature, medicine, and evil passions are freely exploited by her facile pen in a way that keeps the reader's attention continuously on the qui-vive throughout this Christmas Story of Love Triumphant. There are the usual loving married couple and the villain who does his best to estrange them, though on this occasion he is overcome by remorse and confesses his sins. There is also "the deadly, mysterious, poisonous upas tree," which the husband encounters in the jungle in Central Africa, with dire results to himself. He has gone thither in search of a vivid and correct setting for his new novel, and, having camped one night beneath the fatal tree, he returns to civilisation with a diseased mind, a prey to constant nightmares, due to "some subtle malarial poison." But perhaps the most engrossing part of the story is that describing some psychical phenomena in which a violoncello, an old Florentine chair, and a huge mirror, together with two men and a woman of a century before play weird parts. Helen, the wife, is a fine portrait of a noble woman.

Shorter Notices

MR. STACPOOLE has caught the spirit of the time of which he writes in "THE STREET OF THE FLUTE PLAYER" (John Murray, 6s.). He has reconstructed Great Athens for us, and shown us that the men and women of old Greece were people of like passions to ourselves, yet different in that they lived in a younger world. The virility of the book impresses one; the keen Athenian wit is faithfully reproduced, and there are passages that bubble and sparkle like good old wine. The one drawback is that there is rather a slow opening; we are given rather too much of Pheidon, a fisher lad, before we reach through to Diomed, the Athenian aristocrat, whose love for Nitetis, the banker's daughter, brought about his doom and hers. Having read the first six chapters, we are forced on from incident to incident, from scene to scene lighted by the true spirit of romance, until the great tragedy of the end leaves us almost appalled. These two characters of Diomed and Nitetis are faithfully and consistently portrayed, as is that of Pheidon, the half wild fisher lad. For the rest, the book has the fine quality of inevitability; there was no other solution to the problem which Diomed set himself than that which the author gives. Greek in conception, setting and execution, the book is arresting in quality, and stands high out of the rut of modern novels.

As a period in which to set romances the end of the eighteenth century is somewhat outworn, but the story which Miss Fox has to tell in "THE BOUNTIFUL HOUR" (John Lane, 6s.) is one that never grows old, and the telling thereof is accomplished in an entertaining manner. The characters are not flung at us ready made, but are traced from early childhood; thus we feel that we grow into these lives, especially with that of Charlotte, the heroine, who is a woman born before her time, if she is to be judged by her acts. The ultimate sacrifice which she makes in order to go with the man of her choice is outlined for us in a piece of very fine writing, and in the unconventional end she retains all our sympathy. There is little excuse so far as can be seen for introducing Newton and the poet Cowper in the earlier chapters; their presence serves no definite purpose—they are rather irrelevant to the story itself. Still, there is sufficient of merit in it to atone for any slight defects, and the book may be considered as a welcome addition to the fiction of the year.

Mr. Whitham sets out to disprove the truth of the axiom that men make their own fates, and while the spell of his book remains, he succeeds; reflection convinces the reader, however, that he has failed, for both Casel and Clem, the twin brothers in "BROOM" (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.), made their own fates, with the help of the inevitable woman. With this as a first book, its author should go far, if he will only avoid split infinitives and remember that "different to" reads badly. He is addicted, also, to a certain grandiloquence of expression, and evinces a liking for such words as "impulsion" for "impulse," and "incidents of exemplification" in place of "examples." As the story concerns simple country people, dwelling in rural atmosphere, such instances of over-expression are doubly noticeable. We shall await Mr. Whitham's next book with interest, for in spite of its faults this sombre story compels attention until its last page is turned. The hopeless outlook at the end, the apparent desire to indicate the barrenness of life and futility of effort, are features of this work which we trust the author will endeavour to suppress in future, for it is of little use to point out the evils of life, unless one can suggest a palliative; we shall never look to a man of Mr. Whitham's temperament for a remedy.

One must fain confess to some disappointment in "SIMON BRANDIN" (John Murray, 6s.), for from Mr. Neuman's previous work we expected something above the average of the usual sensational novels which deal with modern Russia. It is to be feared, however, that there is very little reason to prefer the present story to any of the numerous other volumes of imaginative sensation with which the habitual novel-reader is regaled when he turns to Russia as a relaxation from Mayfair. In one aspect, however, of the subject with which he deals, Mr. Neumann carries conviction, and that is when he deals with the persecution of the Jews in Russia. Otherwise the narrative gives the impression of being crude, unreal, and unconvincing.

"THE GUILTY MAN," by François Coppée, translated by Helen Ruth Davis (Greening and Co., 6s.), is not a pleasant story, and as a novel it cannot be considered a success. The book, in fact, reads in parts more as a sociological treatise than as a work of fiction. The story is for the most part unconvincing, and the characterisation can properly be described only as crude. Yet at times the author is extremely powerful and rises to exceptional heights of eloquence. Pathetic eloquence, in fact, rather than skill in telling a story, strikes the critic of this piece of work. The book is in reality a commentary on that portion of the Decalogue which threatens the children with visitation on account of the iniquities of their ancestors, and thus it is not only a tragedy, except for the last chapter, but also leaves a bitter taste in the mouth.

No small amount of dramatic skill is displayed in the handling of the situations in "THE ORDEAL OF SILENCE" (John Long, 6s.), and the problem of a man whose youth has been spent in a hothouse atmosphere from which has been rigidly excluded all suspicion of vice, and even all feminine personalities, works itself out in an interesting fashion. This is inevitably followed by the compensating outbreaks which the first contact with the real and outer world engenders. With the advent of the "rare pale Margaret" we are led into purity, complications, and a whirlwind of "chic" society, which will doubtless cause the book to be read with avidity by those who possess no opportunity of knowing the socially important at first hand. We have a faint suspicion, however, that to those who move in the circles described the work will prove less convincing. But it is the larger public which is the more profitable.

The Theatre

"Tantrums" at the Criterion

THERE is an ingenious idea in Mr. Frank Stayton's play, and the first act, which ends with the marriage of the modern Petruchio and Kate, goes as merrily as bells should at that service. In the first act, too, Mr. O. B. Clarence and Miss Nellie Bouverie make the parents of the rather ill-bred, shrewish young lady, Virginia (Miss Marjorie Day) very amusing. And Miss Christine Silver, as their younger daughter, and Mr. John Deverell, as her cleverly stupid lover, all help to make us hope for better things. Unfortunately, the idea that the young husband, an American millionaire, who begins by telling the ill-tempered Virginia that she ought to be spanked three times a day, and ends by being entirely transformed into a "door-mat" by her, is not clearly or well developed. Still, there are many amusing situations, and all the characters are as admirably acted as their parts will permit. For the easily pleased playgoer who can believe in the violent changes that overtake Virginia, Miss Day, and Charles Vansittart, Mr. Charles Maude, there must be a feast of fun in store. That there remain such playgoers in large masses was clearly shown by the long run of "Ann," a play produced under the same management, which one hardly dared to think would reward its producers. In "Tantrums" the story is perhaps rather more possible, and the acting is certainly more sincere throughout the cast. It must be owned, however, that Mr. Stayton does not make the best of his acting material, and throws away his excellent friends of the first act—and they are heard no more. This is, in a way, like life, but it is not wise from the point of view of stagecraft. It is to be hoped that the author may not be other than heartened to higher efforts by the reception of his present play. Those who seriously considered even the least effective parts of "Tantrums"—the name, for example, is trivial, and suitable only to the first act—must have concluded that he possessed the qualities necessary for the writing of a really interesting comedy. He has had a good chance this time with an excellent group of players; next time, we feel sure, he will advance much nearer to complete success.

"The Only Way" at the Hippodrome

THIS is by no means Miss Fannie Ward's first play, and I am glad to hear that she is shortly to follow it with a larger effort elsewhere. In the meantime it may be noted that Miss Ward has developed immensely as an actress of late. Her present character, that of an American girl reporter, who breaks into the house of a doubtful financier—and lies, and lies, and lies—is not an agreeable one or very real. But Miss Ward grasps her nettle, and, with the aid of Mr. Dean and Mr. Ames, makes Mr. Megrue's very American little play swing along very smartly, greatly to the satisfaction of the Hippodrome audience. This theatre, by the way, appears to be particularly devoted to the rather obvious qualities of American humour. After listening here to the rich charm of Leoncavallo's enthralling music in "Pagliacci" or "Zingari," it is a little difficult to submit to the harsh methods of the "American Rag-Time Octette." I should think these eight gentlemen had uttered the last cry in regard to this unfortunate craze, and that in future, having brought the matter to its zenith of hurry and noise, it may be allowed to drift into the limbo that eagerly awaits such vulgar absurdities.

The New "Revue" at the New Alhambra

THIS form of entertainment, which Mr. George Grossmith calls, with the appropriate irrelevant note, "Kill That Fly," has at last come to dwell among us and make its home here. For years most people who know the past delights of Parisian revues have again and again urged someone to give us brilliant and amusing satire in this, the most easy-going and casual of forms. Many have tried, and most have failed completely. The nearest approaches to victory were, first, long ago, "Under the Clock," and, secondly, some scenes in the various performances of the Follies. The immense phantasmagoria of futile fooling which Mr. Grossmith puts together always enables one to hope that something amusing will happen, and one waits quite cheerfully, but somehow the great point is never made. The fun peters out, the laughter merely mocks at merriment. It is curious that so much care, such vast expense, such an inordinate amount of effort should produce results of such modest value. That there will be found plenty of bright music, crowds of lovely ladies, energetic comedians, and clever tableaux is, of course, understood; but, with all this gorgeous background, how welcome a little genuine wit would be! Fortunately there are moments that are engaging. The "Lucille" song in "Robes et Modes" seems, as do some of the other incidents, a little like advertisement, but it is very charmingly done, very gay and neat. And then the shadowgraph interlude is beyond praise. In this the most agreeable dancers appear to spring from the stage over the heads of the audience, becoming mysterious giants, after a manner which is at once simple and beautiful. This dance, doubtless already ages old, holds the audience far more firmly than, say, the pointless tableau of "The Maîtres d'Hôtel," or the weak attempt to satirise an American musical comedy. But the revue form is the most plastic of all stage productions, and, no doubt, long before these lines are in print, Mr. Grossmith, Mr. Leveaux, Mr. Charlot, and eight or nine other gentlemen connected with "Kill That Fly," will have added the touch of wit, the drop of vital essence, which will give life and merriment to the revue as a whole, and joy will reign in the box-office of the New Alhambra.

The Morris Dancers

IN going to see Mr. Cecil Sharp's School of Morris Dancing at Stratford-on-Avon we went in a frankly sceptical spirit. We were glad we did so, for it is always more satisfactory to have one's hostility overridden than to have lurking in the mind a suspicion that the mind was too suddenly caught into enthusiasm. Nor did we go, as it is conceivable that many go, out of a stirring love for an old English ideal. A difference of nationality held one immune from that. Moreover, to fulfil the account, we did not go because we had been stirred by the previous and other Morris dancers we had seen. We had been somewhat less than stirred.

We went because we were taken. And to give the brief of the matter at the outset, we came away with feelings as different from enthusiasm as thoughtfulness is different from praise. For there was something about some of the dances we saw that took us back to the days when wonder and awe were things alive on the earth. In our pride of what we are pleased to call civilisation —without a moment's examination of what we mean by civilisation—we prefer to think that the earlier inhabitants of the world were ingenious people with an itch for turning things into tales and myths—having, presumably, no better occupation for their minds than tale-telling and hunting. We never imagine that they believed in their Nature-beings. We should be astonished to think that they saw, with the two eyes in their heads, these Nature-beings, and that they caught them within their sight by means of certain rituals and symbols which were therefore to them the agencies of power, authority, and worship. Caught in great cities full of puny souls, we have no sense of the mighty Beings that are abroad, with wonder and splendour in their train, none the less because we, by the choice of an automatic and intellectual order of Life, have cancelled our sight of them.

Sometimes, under the oppression of the little imaginations of modern life, we lament the loss of splendour in Being; yet we never stop to inquire how it is that splendour has been lost, or how it may possibly be regained. And some of these dances made one think that its recovery need not be so difficult or so remote as it might appear. The function of the old rituals obviously was, as we have said, to perpetuate by enshrining the high moods once experienced. Poetry, when it does not forget itself and become a mere matter of direct statement or intellectual inquiry, elaborates its own new rituals, of metaphor, tone and phrase, for the same end. If we could pass ourselves through one of these ancient rituals presumably it would be possible to recover the old emotions of wonder and awe.

It is not at all a question of old England; nor is it merely a question of nationality or archæology. Whatever of this may prevail at Mr. Sharp's school is, to our way of thinking, a necessary or unnecessary impediment. We saw some dozen to fifteen dances; dances for men, dances for women, and dances for men and women; dances for as few as two, and dances for as many as eight. These were all covered by the wide term of "Morris-dances." Moreover, whether they were Moorish in origin does not, in the main, matter. For ourselves, we do not think they were. We think with Mr. E. K. Chambers that the origin of the name Morris was because the dancers were in the habit of blacking their faces, and so came to look Moorish; and that they blacked their faces for the same reasons that the old Greek dancers wore masks, on the principle that with a mask on his face and good wine in his veins there were no heights a man could not reach, free of recognition and consequent self-consciousness. It was the dances themselves that mattered; and they mattered in varying degrees.

There was one in particular. The name of it we do not know; probably it has no name. It was undertaken by eight men; and as it passed through its ritual there was no doubt as to what it implied, though it would not be so easy to put down the whole implication in words. It was something beyond the reach of words; at least, beyond the reach of words used logically and intellectually, and not used ritualistically as in the highest poetry. One could see quite clearly the old majestic Druids on the green sward passing through that mighty beat and measure. A certain well-known actor was sitting beside us; and, without any previous interchange of words, he said to us at the conclusion, "How would you feel if you were the sacrifice, though?" It was not a little remarkable to think that we should both have caught the same mood from the passing of the ritual. And one could imagine, too, if the sacrifice were a human one, that he or she would not have gone to the death without a feeling of exaltation and triumph.

It was not a sword dance. To judge from emotions, which are the only possible guide in the matter, the sword dances, with all their wonder and intricacy, were something considerably less primitive. For example, we do not think it would have been possible for anyone there to have associated them with a human sacrifice. They clearly demanded animal sacrifices, whereas the other, with all its majestic fierceness, had far more of terror in it. The intricacy of the sword dances, their perfect timing and organisation, was wonderful. And the precise moment when the sacrifice was slain, as the dancers moved out of their figure, still holding their swords, and lined out with a long, sharp action of their blades, was quite clear to see. But they had not the simplicity of the other. In it there was little intricacy; indeed, it was not easy to see how the mystical effect was achieved, though in that it only partook of the eternal mystery of Art.

There were others, too, catching lighter and less fierce moods. There were moods of gaiety and moods of riot. It was curious to notice that the fiercer, primitive moods were in dances rendered by men. It was also noticeable that the sexual element, as given in some of the dances of early Southern Europe, was absent. Some of the dances were sexual; but there was not the note of riotous abandon in them, attesting the northern origin of them. Yet it was the fiercer Druidical dances that had the highest spiritual import. Were one to participate in such a dance, and continue it till physical exhaustion, what extraordinary spiritual mood would it not produce?

DARRELL FIGGIS.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall announce the publication in the beginning of the year of "Charles Dickens: Social Reformer," by Mr. W. Walter Crotch, who was the founder of the Dickens Fellowship, now 20,000 strong, as well as the editor, some ten years ago, of Household Words.

Melodrama versus Music-Drama: A Protest

THE music-drama owes its origin to a remarkable discovery made by Richard Wagner. Just as Plato once discovered that, whatever man could do, woman could do also, and on this theory built up a new system of social organisation, so Wagner discovered that, whatever language can do, music can do likewise, and on this theory built up a new form of Art. "The eternal right of women to grow beards," as Mr. Barrie has pleasantly expressed it, is now the watchword of a great political movement, and the eternal right of music to represent or to attempt to represent any and every notion which language can convey is the basis of a great artistic movement. No music is considered to-day up to date which does not attempt to portray natural phenomena with the minuteness of the painter and spiritual phenomena with the subtlety of the novelist.

There are many reasons against acquiescing in this view of the office of music. In the first place, it is clear that the aim of all art is the same: to excite feeling. This, which music does directly, literature does indirectly by means of ideas; and the worth of these ideas is neither more nor less than the worth of the feelings which they arouse. Feeling is the grain and ideas are but the coin which we value for its power to purchase grain. Now, it would be strange if music which commands the true grain of emotion should desire to change it for the coin of ideas, in order that it may be exchanged a second time and at a great loss for its equivalent in feeling.

Moreover, if music can convey ideas, it cannot convey them with the same clearness and precision as language. Now, when music is united with language as in the music-drama, it must either convey the same ideas as the language or different ideas. If it conveys different ideas, it will merely produce confusion in the mind of the listener. If it conveys the same ideas, the same thing will be stated in two ways, of which the second is far less clear and effective than the first, which is absurd. Let us consider the case of another art which appeals to the mind simultaneously through two different channels: the scenic drama. The forms of natural objects can be translated to the mind by verbal description or by scenic representation. Let us suppose that a dramatist wishes to convey to his audience the idea of a wood. If the drama was being enacted on bare boards, it would be legitimate for the dramatist to give his audience a verbal description of the scene which was in his mind, but if he had employed a scene-painter to work out his fancies in paint and canvas it would be absurd to give by word of mouth a detailed description of those objects which were already present in perfect clearness to the eyes of his audience. He would be employing a slow and ineffective method to supplement a quick and effective one.

On the other hand, there are moments in any good tragedy in which the thing to be conveyed transcends the utterance of words. It is the fundamental weakness of the ordinary drama that the movement of dialogue or soliloquy must never cease from the first moment to the last, although it is a fact that in moments of great emotion men do not express themselves in eloquent prose or verse, or indeed in any articulate sounds at all. If the reader has witnessed the progress of a melodrama in that now fast-decaying institution, the threepenny gaff, and observed the part played in these performances by the young lady at the piano, he will have a better idea of the true and natural marriage of melody and drama than he will derive from any opera of Wagner. Through the greater part of the piece the music is silent, but just at that moment, when the emotional tension is approaching its maximum, when the capacity of language and gesture to excite our sympathy is taxed to the uttermost, although our emotion must rise yet higher or fall miserably into the abyss of bathos; when we must either weep or laugh, and language has failed to make us weep, at that moment music intervenes with a few poignant chords from the piano, a few bars of mellifluous melody; and in a moment all earthy impediments drop from our souls —the awkward mouthing of the hero, the daubed cheeks of the heroine, the stilted prose of the dramatist—for the time all are forgotten; by the magic of sound our souls are held aloft till the moment of peril is passed. Music has come to the aid of her faltering sister at the moment when no other could save her, and having executed her modest but essential part, retires from view, and the drama proceeds quietly as before.

Contrast this with the obstreperous, insistent, irrelevant, irrepressible orchestra in an opera of Wagner. No passage is so essentially ambulant and commonplace but it must be punctuated with bombastic chords and futile scales; no situation is so transparently clear, but music must intrude with pointless comments and explanations, which delay everything and advance nothing. Hence a drama of Wagner seems like a prolonged struggle between the desire of the drama to proceed and the determination of the orchestra that it shall not proceed till music has had her say on every point as it arises, no matter how inane her utterances on most of the things under discussion.

Wagner was, perhaps, the greatest musician that ever lived, and one of the ablest dramatists, and if his greatness in the latter capacity is often overlooked, it is because he employed one of his great gifts to neutralise the other. It may be doubted whether anyone for this reason ever enjoyed one of Wagner's later operas at the first hearing; the constant succession of musical explosions, crescendos and alarms, which accompany the action of the piece exhaust the emotions of the hearer long before the great crises are reached. It is not till we have learnt to beware of these false alarms and to reserve our store of sensibility for the great moments that we can extract the maximum of pleasure from the whole.

In short, the whole attempt to make music and drama play a game of follow-my-leader is doomed to undignified failure, by reason of the complete dissimilarity of their gait. Music has wings, but no feet; she must either fly or flounder, and it is an ill service to urge her clumsily for hours along the level road, where she has no room to spread her wings. Not emulation, but division of labour is the basis of all harmonious co-operation, whether in life or in Art. JOHN RIVERS.

Indian Reviews

THE dull season has left its mark on the Wednesday Review (Trichinopoly) of September 11-18. The Indian Government have had recourse, perhaps more frequently lately, to Press communiqués as a means of removing popular misapprehensions. The editor deprecates the issue of such communications when executive officers are censured by the Law Courts. But the Government are morally bound to protect their officers: misapprehensions uncorrected are believed to be correct. It is disappointing to read that a conference of fifty pundits took retrogressive views on such questions of social reform as sea-voyages, deferred marriages, readmission of repentant converts: social reforms constitute India's present need. An Englishman recommends that the people of India should be taught to finance their own railways. This is a counsel of perfection. Opportunities of making railways and investing in them have been afforded, and the natives have not accepted them. Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, aged eighty-eight, continues to advocate the Colonial form of self-government for India. He will never learn now. The Calcutta Marwaris have done well in founding a college for their community at a cost of £60,000. Demonstrative teaching of agriculture in the vernacular suitable to farmers is the right line for an agricultural college.

The Collegian (Calcutta), No. I, for September, has nothing very exciting, but the education of India is a prolific topic, and there are always new developments. The last scheme is for a medical college for women at Delhi, the new Capital, to include Lady Hardinge's project for a school for training Indian women as nurses and midwives. Subscriptions are being received. This is a good move, and not the only one. A college for women is contemplated at Dacca, and more girls' schools are to be opened by Government in Madras. Papers on the teaching of science and the contributions specially addressed to students supply ample material for the reader's instruction, if he has time and inclination to peruse them.

The Herald of Revolt, Savarkar issue (London) for October is an astonishing production. It calls itself "an organ of the coming social revolution," and has a picture of "Savarkar, the Hindu Patriot, who will be released from the Andamans Prison, December 24, 1960" (sic). This is the person who, after escaping temporarily from a P. and O. steamer at Marseilles, was recaptured, tried in India on various charges (waging war against the King, etc.) under the Penal Code, and sentenced nearly two years ago to transportation for life. The whole journal is a tirade against all government and all concerned with the Savarkar case. It is not stated whether copies are furnished to the India Office and the Government of India, who ought to know of this publication.

The Hindustan Review (Allahabad) for September continues its historical inquiry into the employment of natives of India in the public service, and shows a remarkable acquaintance with the official literature and the proceedings in Parliament connected with the subject. The House of Commons in 1893 passed a Resolution in favour of simultaneous examinations in England and India, which no political party has ever found itself able to enforce. An article on Christianity in India, by a Hindu, explains the author's antagonism in twenty-nine statements, with a number of comments. To meet the issues raised by such a writer a volume would be required. In spite of official explanations by Lord Crewe —whose name is persistently mis-spelt—that nothing like colonial government was ever intended in a dispatch, a writer harps on the subject of provincial autonomy, and asserts that the best efforts will be directed towards its development on the wider lines of the Dominions. Some people will not take "No" for an answer. The paper, among the reviews, on "The Sacred Books of the Hindus" announces the publication at Allahabad of this new series. The object is to propagate Hindu literature, and apparently the contributors are among the best-known native scholars in India. The English method of literal translation, with notes, is said to have been followed. A collection of recent works on China and Chinese problems is analysed, and will be useful to students of Oriental politics.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

WHENEVER a public man gets hauled over the coals for a rash remark in a speech, he has one unfailing refuge—he can always blame the unfortunate reporters for not being sufficiently proficient in shorthand; this is what Masterman-ever-Ready sought to do on Wednesday when Wolmer accused the Secretary of the Treasury of taking sides in the war. Asquith did not protect his young friend much, and added severely: "I say most emphatically that the attitude of his Majesty's Government in the war is one of strict neutrality, and it is the duty of Ministers and of everybody else to use no language inconsistent with that neutrality."

The doctors have beaten Lloyd George. They stood out for 8s. 6d. He artfully offered the same sum, but it is inclusive, and has so many conditions tacked on to it that it is not nearly so good as it looks. However, it is a substantial rise, and it is a question whether the doctors will not be wise to accept it. They have presented an unbroken front hitherto, but it will be difficult to maintain, in face of the undoubtedly substantial increase they have wrung from him.

These two subjects having been dealt with, Home Rule was continued. It is impossible in a short sketch like this to give even the briefest account of the intricate questions involved in the amendments. The dreary and bitter controversy arising over sectarian jealousy, which is one of the great difficulties of the whole question, is always skulking in the background, ever and anon to lift its ugly head and rouse fierce passions. "If Irishmen were all Roman Catholics or all Protestants, there would be no Irish question," said a leading statesman to me many years ago. I do not myself go as far as this, as I think the Irish temperament has as much to do with it; but it is clear that religious passion smoulders.

Birrell is a most irresponsible talker. Masterman blamed the reporters for not taking down his speech correctly: it is a marvel to me how anyone ever reports Birrell. I counted three sentences this afternoon, and they were five, six, and seven minutes long; sentences, I mean, without a full stop, but also full of parentheses and parentheses inside them. He rattles on, too, at such a rate that he makes most amusing blunders. For instance—"I hope it will not be thought I am doing this at the bidding of our leaders—I mean our Irish friends." The Opposition roared at this accidental revelation of the truth.

At the next amendment William Moore read out extracts from speeches made by various Nationalists in the past—before the days "when they all love Jack," he repeated tauntingly. This always leads to ructions, and Lynch made a lame excuse for a recent speech. "All right," said Moore, "I'll leave it at this: You fought for the Boers against us; you came here and were convicted of treason, and now you have been given a safe Nationalist seat."

Vengeance had been vowed against soldiers and police, and the Opposition were defeated in the lobbies in their attempts to protect them.

It is very aggravating to think that no amount of argument—however unanswerable it may be, and however much it may remain unanswered—has the slightest effect in changing the opinions of the majority. They voted solidly all the time at the direction of the party Whips. Take Thursday, for instance. There was an amendment to the effect that the executive control should remain at Westminster. Balfour, Bonar Law, and Walter Long riddled the present proposals, and showed the absurdity of them. The Irish Parliament was to be responsible for law and order, and yet for six long years they were not to have control of the police. Power was no use without force behind it. Mr. Balfour sketched the position of an unhappy Lord Lieutenant confronted with an Irish Government who resigned. He could call on no one to take their place; he would be forced to take the advice of the Imperial Government, and a deadlock between the two Houses of Parliament must ensue. Even angels could not avoid friction under such a scheme, said Carson. Rufus Isaacs thought he had scored a point when he said: "You would grant a Home Rule Parliament with far greater rights and powers." "Yes," said Bonar Law boldly, "if you turn Ireland into a self-governing colony, then we know where we are, but this is a hybrid monster—neither fish, fowl, nor good red herring." The Irish want control without interference, and also want all the money they can get out of the British taxpayer; in addition to this, they want to tax industrious Ulster, who declares she will never submit to be governed by an Irish Parliament.

Herbert Samuel and Rufus Isaacs fought gallantly, but all the arguments were convincingly on the side of the Opposition, and the Coalition looked glum until the guillotine fell, and we were once more voted down by large majorities. I am glad to think that there are so many Unionists absent and not taking part in this farce; they are doing far better service talking up and down the country and putting the facts before the electors in their true light—spade work which will bear fruit in the next election.

On Friday a House full of lawyers debated the question of the appointment of another judge. It is clear that the Bench is undermanned, and Rufus Isaacs stated that the Committee of the Cabinet who settled the matter, while declaring that an extra judge was indispensable, could not consent to the appointment of two. He said he could not vote for the amendment to increase the number to two, although he said he would not put on the Government tellers.

J. W. Hills, a hard-working solicitor, made an excellent speech, in which he proved that judges actually earned more than they received—in fact, that they were a source of profit to the country, and that hundreds of thousands of pounds were lost and justice denied to hundreds by the delay; but the laymen showed their old distrust of the law; the amendment was lost by thirty, and the petition will go up to the Throne for one judge only.

Who will get it? There are many rumours, but unfortunately deserving men in the House do not always have big majorities, and the Government do not like risky elections just now.

The Radical Party hate the motor-'bus; they see that in the end it will kill their beloved tramways, and prove once more that private enterprise and the march of mechanism will always beat municipal enterprise in the long run. On Monday a shower of questions on the subject of noise and danger and damage by the motor-'bus showed which way the wind was blowing. The London General Omnibus Company has a powerful group of enemies, and you will find that legislation will be invoked in some directions to tax them or curtail their profits and energy.

Mr. Runciman has put his foot in it again. He appears to have boasted somewhere in the country "that the fire-eaters of Ulster have settled down to the humdrum work of the Committee stage of the Home Rule Bill, as though that were of no more importance than the diseases of bees." He taunted the leaders with insincerity, and jeered at them for their moderation.

At the adjournment on Monday night Lord Castlereagh called attention to the matter, and Runciman did not improve matters by answering in rather a flippant tone. He declared that he was complimenting the Opposition on the admirable good temper and courtesy they had shown. He had used the words that he "would not for one moment underrate the seriousness of the feeling in some parts of Ulster about the passage of the Home Rule Bill."

Bonar Law castigated Runciman severely. Runciman's humorous tone "was an additional insult." The Unionist Party attach great importance to preserving the dignity of the House of Commons. He accused the honourable member of using language which was a direct incitement to people in Belfast to show by deeds the reality of the opposition to Home Rule.

Lloyd George, who understands the temper of the House thoroughly, saw at once that it was a serious matter. "If you take a phrase here and there," he said, "it is possible to make out a case against the honourable gentleman," but he was sure his friend "realised the earnestness of the feeling of the Ulster people." He was not surprised that the Opposition should be sensitive when anybody challenges a conviction which is almost a religion with them. When he sat down, the Unionists shouted "Withdraw!" but Runciman walked out, and the Unionists shouted, "Run away, coward!" In our opinion, both sides missed the real point. Runciman attacked the Ulstermen in the House for taking it so quietly in the House; it was not a question how the rank and file in Ulster would take it or how they felt.

All the afternoon the position of the Royal Irish Constabulary under the Bill had been discussed. Carson wanted to know if the Imperial Government kept the R.I.C. under their control for six years because, in the case of disturbance, they could suppress it without any odium being cast on the Irish Parliament.

Stephen Collins, who has the air of a vestryman, quoted poetry, and the Liberals urged that, under Home Rule, the military character of the force would entirely disappear.

Colonel Burn, Gilbert Parker, and Bonar Law all drove home the illogical position, but to no purpose, for at 10.30 the guillotine fell and Clauses 5 and 6 were added to the Bill. Carson was so angry that as a protest he stopped the Japanese Marriage Bill by moving to report progress; but it was only for a few minutes.

On Tuesday the Little Englanders held up their hands in holy horror at Lord Roberts' outspoken description of German preparations for war; Edward Grey, with bated breath, deprecated all such speeches, and rather sneered at the gallant Field-Marshal. Recently we have had nothing but useless debates on sham safeguards. To-day it was the veto of the Crown over Irish legislation. The Radicals say that we are perfectly safe, because, if the Irish Parliament pass any outrageous piece of legislation, the Lord Lieutenant can always refuse his sanction and veto it. That looks excellent on paper, but suppose the Irish Parliament—awful thought!—defied the Lord Lieutenant? That is the real question, and this afternoon it was shown that there is really no answer to it. "That it will never arise" is no answer at all.

I think Featherstonhaugh put the case in a nutshell when he said he did not value the safeguards one pin's point.

The Government, by means of a confidence trick, was asking them to entrust all they held dear to people whom they did not trust at all. The Government, with cheerful optimism, was setting up a fair-weather Constitution, regardless of the known conditions in Ulster; but it was no good. The lethargic majority strolled in from the smoking-rooms and libraries, and voted as they were told by the vigilant Whips stationed at the door. Eleven amendments were shut out and the clause added to the Bill.

Notes and News

Captain Harry Maitland has in the press with Messrs. John Ouseley for early publication a book entitled "The Dash for the Winter Sports." It will be illustrated by Alfred Leete.

Messrs. John Long will shortly publish (at 3s. 6d.) a new novel entitled "Céline: A True Story of the French Revolution," translated from the French of Mlle. V. de Regnier by Frances Elizabeth Fishbourne.

A course of five lectures on "The Rulers of the Balkans" will be given on Wednesdays at 5 p.m., beginning on November 6, at the London School of Economics, by G. P. Gooch, M.A. The fee for the course is 10s. 6d.

"The Man of Pleasure" is the title of a new book by Mr. Ralph Nevill, which Messrs. Chatto and Windus are publishing this week. The book contains a number of illustrations, plain and coloured, some of which have unusual historical interest.

The final performance of "Bunty Pulls the Strings" at the Haymarket Theatre will take place on Saturday evening, November 16. Mr. Harrison will produce Mr. Stanley Houghton's three-act comedy, "The Younger Generation," and Lord Dunsany's play, "The Golden Doom," on the following Tuesday evening, November 19.

The Navy League is taking a great interest in "Drake," and many members who have seen the play have become its ardent advocates. It is now proposed to give a special Navy League matinée, and after that His Majesty's Theatre may be filled on two occasions by audiences drawn entirely from the League's branches at Birmingham and Bristol.

On Wednesdays, November 6 and 13, and Monday, November 11, the Schweich Lectures on Biblical Archæology will be delivered in the theatre of the Academy, Burlington Gardens, at 5 o'clock, by the Rev. C. H. W. Johns, Litt.D. These lectures are open to the public, and free; those interested are cordially invited to attend by the secretary, Professor Gollancz.

"Romantic Ballads" (George Borrow) is announced for publication by Messrs. Jarrold and Sons. The book will be an almost facsimile reproduction of that only once issued and exceedingly rare volume, "Romantic Ballads translated from the Danish and Miscellaneous Pieces" by Borrow. The issue will be limited to 300 copies numbered.

"The War Drama of the Eagles," by Mr. Edward Fraser, which Mr. Murray is to publish within a few weeks, breaks fresh ground in a field of romantic interest, and should prove attractive to that wide public who are students of Napoleon and the European turmoil caused by him. The record of Napoleon's Eagles in war has never before been set forth.

The "Classification of Books on Photography" is the subject of a special article in the forthcoming number of the Librarian, to be published by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. In the same number Mr. Kenneth Cotton, of the London School of Economics, makes an interesting suggestion, by which librarians and library assistants would make exchanges with other libraries at home and abroad.

A series of three lectures on Modern French Poetry is to be given in connection with the Exhibition of Modern French Art at the Grafton Galleries, by M. Charles Vildrac; the poetry which forms the subject of his lectures will be interpreted by M. Jacques Copeau, director of La Nouvelle Revue Française and adaptor of the acting version of "Les Frères Kamarazof" by Dostoievski. The work of such poets as Verlaine, Verhaeren, Maeterlinck, Duhamel, etc., will be passed in review, and the lectures will take place at the Galleries on the afternoons of November 4, 7, and 11.

Messrs. Hutchinson announce two important books immediately. "My Life in Four Continents," by Col. Chaille-Long, tells the story of an adventurous career. The author played an important part in the Egyptian drama, under Gordon, and his narrative throws much new light on the character and methods of that famous soldier. One of the most interesting parts of Col. Chaille-Long's story relates to his exploration of the upper reaches of the Nile, the discovery of Lake Ibrahim, and the sources of the great river. This book will be in two volumes, handsomely illustrated. "Further Reminiscences of a Diplomatist's Wife," by Mrs. Hugh Fraser, though really an independent work, to some extent continues the story of her life from the finishing point of her last book. Among other subjects she has much to say of her brother, Marion Crawford.

THE FATE OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

October 30, 1912.

AT the moment of writing, the news reaches us that in Thrace there has begun a general engagement between the Turkish and Bulgarian forces which must inevitably develop into one of the decisive battles in the world's history. Concerning the military movements that have immediately preceded this great clash of arms little is known. So far, the swift and daring strategy of the Allies has been crowned with the glory of uninterrupted success. No doubts are any longer entertained as to the sweeping character of their victories in Macedonia. The Turkish army in the west has been literally routed, and its communications with the east, if not irreparably severed, are at least in grave peril. It is, however, upon the battle-line in Thrace that the attention of Europe is at present concentrated; for the issue of the stupendous conflict now being waged with relentless fury in this part of the field will decide the fate of the Ottoman Empire, and may conceivably shatter to atoms the delicate structure of the world's peace.

However much we are inclined to sympathise with Turkey in her extreme plight, we cannot blind ourselves to the causes that have brought her to the verge of downfall. Again and again in this column we have not failed to warn our readers that her supreme crisis was pending—that, in short, unless she set her house in order with miraculous haste, events would so shape themselves that the Ottoman Empire in Europe would be placed in deadly peril. The long period of internal dissension that followed upon the deposition of Abdul Hamid has undermined that only foundation upon which a State can continue to exist as a power in the world—the morale of the masses. Military organisation, no matter how perfect, is merely the skeleton of security; the eagerness of the soldier to sacrifice all for his country is at once the flesh that clothes this skeleton and the breath that gives it life. Thus, in the collapse of the Turkish forces we find that it is the soul of the nation which has fled.

In saying this we do not wish in any way to detract from the brilliant qualities exhibited by their enemies. For the Turk, even in his death-agony, is a magnificent soldier, a man who is inured to hardship, and who, in spite of the despair that afflicts his spirit, remains a fatalistic, almost a mechanical, fighter to the end. But the Bulgarians possess all the valiant qualities which are known to be inherent in their foes, with the added advantages that they are brilliantly led and that their heart is in their work. It is because we recognise these circumstances that we place no confidence in the prospect of a complete reversal of the fortunes of the campaign. The success of the Bulgarian arms has been solely due to their conspicuous ability to accomplish that which all experts must hold to be the supreme aim of offensive warfare. They have so commanded their own movements that they have dictated the strategy of their enemy, thus destroying completely his preconceived plan of campaign and paralysing his capacity for initiative. As a consequence, the decisive issue of the campaign is now being contested upon ground virtually chosen by the Bulgarian General Staff.

Too much importance need not be attached to the well-founded reports that the communications in the rear of Nazim Pasha's troops have been severed. The lay mind must not imagine that the destruction of a bridge accomplishes the isolation of an army. But were such an act to imply the presence of a considerable Bulgarian force in the immediate neighbourhood, then the Turkish position would indeed be hopeless. An interruption of the communications upon which Nazim Pasha is dependent for reinforcements, supplies, and munitions is, nevertheless, without doubt, of serious and significant moment. The mere fact that such an adventurous exploit has been accomplished points to carelessness and disorganisation in the Turkish forces; and although military engineering has reached so high a state of perfection that a break in the line of communications can be quickly repaired, delay and embarrassment at this critical juncture in the rear of the field forces will tend to spread confusion among troops already showing symptoms of wavering.

When all the available reports from the scene of conflict are carefully sifted and weighed, it is clear that, although the Turks are, as it were, in the last ditch, their grand army is still intact and unbeaten; in other words, a fighting, though somewhat forlorn, chance remains in them. As to the issue of the battle now in progress, much depends upon the fortunes of the Bulgarian flanking force which, in the extreme east, is creeping towards the last line of defence works which oppose the road to Constantinople. That the Turkish position is well-nigh desperate is abundantly clear. If with their back to the only wall that separates them from ruin they should rally and triumph, then, paradoxical as it may seem, they will owe their fortune to the very hopelessness of their present situation. For it is now only the courage born of despair that can save them.

Were it not for the plain evidence so far forthcoming during the short period of the campaign concerning the utter demoralisation that has seized upon the rank and file of the soldiery, we might attach some slight importance to the ray of hope always to be found centred in situations of desperation. But it is only too apparent that the Turkish soldier has lost his sublime faith in Mahomed. He lifts his sword as of old, but there is no strength left in his arm because there is no fire in his soul. Nazim Pasha telegraphs optimistic messages to Constantinople. He has declared his intention either to win a glorious victory or leave his body on the field of battle. Thus, on the eve of one of the greatest conflicts in history, the Generalissimo passes sentence of death upon himself. For the issue now being contested on the plains of Thrace is beyond the control of any Commander-in-Chief, no matter how skilful he may be. It was decided during the years that have passed, while the people of the Balkan States, with single purpose and willing obedience, patiently prepared for the hour. Throughout those years the Ottoman Empire, aided by German instructors, has kept its armour from rusting, but it has neglected the man within the armour and the soul within the man. History is at the present moment repeating itself with an accuracy that is positively awesome, pointing once again the eternal lesson that it is arrogance and ease, not alone foes from without, that throttle the lives of nations.

MOTORING

THE annual Motor Show is almost upon us, and, although it is becoming something like a platitude to state that it will be as interesting as ever, in spite of the fact that no striking innovations in motor-car design are to be looked for, the remark must be repeated on this occasion. According to present indications, based upon the preliminary announcements of the leading manufacturers, the car of 1913 will be essentially the same as the car of 1912, both in general design and in price. It goes without saying that practically every make of car will embody detail improvements and refinements, but that is practically all the visitor to Olympia this year may expect. Things are different in the accessory department, which has been growing in importance year by year, and which on this occasion is likely to be more voluminous and interesting than ever. We hope to describe some of the more important features of the Show in due course.

Universal surprise has been caused by the announcement, made a few days ago, that Mr. S. F. Edge has not only severed his connection with the famous Napier firm, but with the motor industry altogether. It is not too much to say that from the inception of the motoring movement in this country he has been the most prominent personality associated with it. His activities in every department—experimental, manufacturing, sporting, and social—have been most indefatigable, and have been continued with unabated vigour up to the very moment of his retirement. Apart from the invaluable services he has rendered to the industry and to the private motorist by the careful and exhaustive tests to which he has personally subjected almost every new motoring device, he has easily done more than anyone else to remove the reproach of incompetence from the British motor manufacturer, and to establish the high reputation now held by the high-class British car all over the world. The popularity of the six-cylinder car as the ideal automobile de luxe is almost entirely due to his persistent advocacy, the leading car manufacturers of the world having followed his lead in the adoption of the multi-cylindered engine. His achievements in the sporting and racing side of motoring are far too numerous to recapitulate here, but mention may be made of a performance which stands out as the greatest feat of skill and endurance in the annals of motoring—namely, his driving of a Napier for twenty-four consecutive hours at a continuous speed of over sixty miles an hour. This extraordinary performance was accomplished about six years ago at Brooklands, and is one which no one else has even attempted to rival.

On January 1 next the new regulations for motor-car taxation will come into force. It will be recollected that in September last the Special Committee, which had been sitting for some time to consider whether any alteration should be recommended, issued its report, which was to the effect that there should be no alteration so far as petrol cars are concerned; that the steam car should be rated upon its effective heating surface instead of upon its cylinder bores; and that the tax on electric cars should be reduced. These recommendations have been accepted by the Treasury, and, unless something unexpected happens in the meantime, will form the basis of the new taxation. Steam and electric cars being relatively insignificant in number, the broad position is that the old state of affairs remains. The principal grievance is upon the part of owners of old and second-hand cars, who have to pay an altogether disproportionate tax under the existing system, which is based entirely upon bore-dimension. Horse-power is the basis of taxation, and it is not disputed that old cars of a certain bore do not really develop more than about half the power developed by modern cars of similar bore. On the face of it, it appears, therefore, that they should not be liable to the same tax. It is stated that the R.A.C. and the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders intend to make representations to the Treasury on the subject, and there is nothing for the old-car owner but to wait and see whether these representations will have the desired effect.

A further batch of "guide cards" through towns, etc., has just been issued by the Automobile Association and Motor Union for the benefit of its members. The new centres dealt with are Birmingham, Bournemouth, Bristol, Cambridge, Durham, Edinburgh, Exeter, Glasgow, Gloucester, Guildford, Leicester, Lincoln, Manchester, Northampton, Nottingham, Oxford, Shrewsbury, and Worcester. To the touring motorist these cards are invaluable. In addition to indicating clearly the best roads into, through, and out of the various towns and cities, they show where the authorised hotels, agents, and garages of the Association are situated, and the mileages to the other important towns in the neighbourhood.

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE rash public that came in and bought as soon as the panic began are now regretting their haste. Prices do not rush up wildly. They tremble, and it would not take much to send them back to the levels of "Black Saturday." Stocks and shares have not found any permanent home. They were picked up by bankers and moneylenders whose sole object in buying was to make money. The philanthropy of the City is but skin deep. Those who support markets in panics are merely bargain hunters with big cash balances. The small people who came in will want to sell. Then they will find that the Banker who was so ready to buy at the bottom is not quite so ready a purchaser at to-day's levels. I expect that when the settlement has ended we shall find sagging markets.

Some few new issues have come out, but they none of them "went"; most indeed, did not deserve to go—for they were unattractive. The Motor Traction Co. was grossly over-capitalised, and the promotion profits were excessive. The New South Wales short loan was a useful floater for the banks. The Railway Loan guaranteed by the Province of Alberta was good, but will be a poor market. The Canadian Brewery debentures were but a poor security, for the prospectus contained no valuation. And an offer of common stock at 15 with a far-distant coupon attached, savoured of cynicism or impudence. Canada has assuredly lost her head. The plantation from the spare land of Telegoredjo would appeal to no one. The days of such rubber flotations have gone by.

MONEY grows tighter day by day. The banks put up their rates at the settlement, and brokers whose clients were in dire need charged as high as ten per cent. Gambling shares were roughly treated. But the banks seemed quite glad to lend good clients money to take up stock, and on the whole less trouble was experienced than anyone expected. Still the talk is of a six per cent rate.

FOREIGNERS are gradually recovering. Paris has financed all the Balkan States and she is mightily pleased at their success. There is a business side to this war which will help French trade. The guns and the ammunition are French, and they have proved better than those of the Turks, which are German. So France gets not only the money, but also a good advertisement. Greeks, Bulgarians, Servians, have been quite firm. These States will benefit greatly by the war. They will acquire rich provinces which France will finance. They will build railways which French engineers will construct. They will grow rich. Greece will take Salonica; Montenegro, Scutari; Servia will secure Old Servia, and Bulgaria will annex a large slice of land which will include Adrianople. This means added wealth. Roumania has arranged that she shall get her share—her neutrality will be paid for. Paris sees all this, and hard as she was hit in the panic, is now happy again.

HOME RAILS do not move. We must wait for a few weeks before the big traffics have any effect upon the thinking public. The Government intend to keep their promise and bring in a Bill. Not as good a Bill as the Companies wanted, but one that will help to pay the increased cost of wages and insurance. The companies could readily double their dividends if they ran upon Yankee lines. But they have lost all initiation. The officials only think of safety, the directors of precedent. Hundreds of thousands of pounds are wasted all over England every week. It is now said that the Midland is backing the Metropolitan purchase of the Great Northern and City. It would open up a large district and give the Midland a chance of getting a huge suburban traffic. If they are not interested in the deal they have missed the chance of their lives, and of all the companies the Midland misses less chances than most of the lines. The line is of no use to the Metropolitan unless it is linked up with one of the trunk lines, and if the Great Northern had wished the railway surely they would not have quarrelled with it in the way they did.

YANKEES don't move. The bankers bought, but they seem to have sold much larger blocks than anyone thought, for the markets are by no means strong, although business is good. A rise is therefore one of the certainties of the New Year. Except that the war ties up Continental money, and therefore cuts off the Berlin buyer, it should not affect American industries in any way. Indeed, it should do them good. I again say that those who buy Unions, Atchisons, and Southern Pacific will make money. Southern Common are also a very cheap lock-up for the line is doing very well indeed, and is now earning big dividends on the common stock, which have been used in putting the road in order and paying off the cost of the various bond issues. The South is prosperous, and as soon as the Panama Canal is opened Southerns will benefit as much if not more than any other road.

RUBBER is now 4s. 6d. a pound, and in spite of the prosperity of the United States does not improve. But the leading companies are doing well, and at present prices are certainly able to maintain their dividends. The well-known Antwerp Company, the F.M.S., whose 50 frc. shares are quoted 600 frcs., has issued a splendid report. It will increase its planted area to 5,000 acres, and this year will harvest three million pounds and pay 100 per cent. dividend. The shares at 500 frcs. are cheap, as the balance-sheet is strong and the planted area works out at only about £20 an acre. But the price seldom touches this figure, for the Belgians usually come in buyers on any fall. Singapore United is holding its own, but I see nothing attractive in the price either of the shares or the planted area. It is a long shot—and long shots in rubber are too risky to please me.

OIL shares were sold by the "bears" in the slump, and as a result they have been very hard indeed all the week. Indeed, Urals were scrambled for by those who had sold short and could not buy back. It is said that the agreement with Shell has been settled. A Maikop deal is on which will sweep up Maikop Props—Russian Maikop and the Deep Drilling Co., and International Maikop. It was said that Oilfields Finance would make the deal, but Mr. Barnett says, "No." Some of the companies have good plots and no money, others poor land and fat purses; so if they can come to terms they may do well. The New German Imperial Company, which is to compete against Standard Oil, is said to have made arrangements to purchase all the Mexican Eagle oil. It will want it badly, for Germany uses huge quantities of oil, which it cannot get from Galicia and Roumania.

MINES are more dead than the leaves on the trees. No one seems to care what happens to the market. The Kaffir houses say that they will now wait till the New Year. In the meantime prices sag away. The good Kaffirs are beginning to look cheap. For there are good Kaffirs—City Deep, were it well managed, would be cheap; Village Deep, were it cheap, would be good. Knights are good; Modder B is good, but I do not say buy to-day, for the whole position is uncertain, and in gambling counters like Kaffirs it is wise to wait till the bottom is touched. Some big blocks of shares have been pawned this account.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are hardly discussed. Yet the reports of all the companies are good. Aerated Bread showed a capacity to cut down expenses, which shows that the management is not so bad as the critics declared. The dealers in the House who pretended that they had the figures of the Wallpaper Combine were either deceived or deceivers, for the preliminary report actually shows reduced profits. We must wait for the full report before making any criticism. Roneo has done well, but defers the dividend. The insiders appear to be getting out of Telephone Deferred. But I am assured that £190 is the price that will be paid. The sale of the Perth Tramways will be agreed to. I congratulate Mr. Allan Stoneham upon his adroitness. To ask £500,000 and get £475,000 for a system that, to speak mildly, has been greatly neglected, was a piece of clever diplomacy. Some people grumble, but I do not see why.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Mr. Dixon has now told your readers again what he told them in his previous letter—that he was led to become a Christian Scientist by the observation of certain cases in which Christian Science had, in his opinion, done good. This is surely quite beside the point. I believe the questions at issue are, in general, whether Christian Scientists as a class are people to whom a hypothesis is as good as a fact, and in particular whether the evidence which led Mr. Dixon to his belief was of the sort which ordinary people demand before looking on any thesis as proved. As far as I can judge, Mr. Dixon has so far contributed nothing to the elucidation of these questions; yet he, of all men, could, if he were willing, do a great deal in that direction. The ordinary run of Christian Science testimonies are couched in much the same language, and have as evidence much the same value, as the testimonials to the virtues of patent medicines. "The doctor (name and qualifications not stated) said I was suffering from chronic small-pox. I took so many boxes of pills or went through so much Christian Science treatment. I am now quite well." The composition of the pills is for obvious reasons not stated, and it is manifestly impossible for anyone to say what the practitioner was doing during the treatment. Most characteristic of all, no evidence is as a rule given, beyond the patient's statement of his or her "sense perceptions," as to whether he or she was physically any better at the end of the process than before. Now it is to be presumed that Mr. Dixon, when he was testing the value of Christian Science treatment, was not satisfied with such evidence as this, and if he would give your readers some details about some of the cases he has seen, and bring forward, with regard to the condition of the patients before and after treatment, some evidence of the sort usually demanded and produced in the case of other curative systems, your readers would then know whether there is among Christian Scientists any higher standard of evidence than is to be found in their publications.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Dixon's latest letter contains a dictum which (if he really means it) would, I think, make it the merest impertinence ever to ask any man why he believes in anything. "The reason why an individual Christian Scientist" (or any other individual?) "arrives at a conclusion is very much better evidence of the reliability of that conclusion than the opinion of an outsider as to the train of reasoning in other people's minds." Assuming that this is a general proposition and that the words "other people's minds" mean "the mind of the individual in question" the effect of this dictum seems to me to be that any man who arrives at any conclusion is to be the sole judge of the validity of his reasons and of the correctness of his reasoning. The people who believed in the movement of the sun round the earth no doubt had reasons, or thought they had. The opinion of the outsider as to what went on in their minds was, therefore, of no value? If I am misrepresenting Mr. Dixon, perhaps he will explain: and I promise to make no reference to Browning. This promise is not due to any lack of reverence for antiquity or of a healthy taste for chestnuts. Many of your readers are, I am sure, anxious that Mr. Dixon should say something relevant about the questions at issue. I am equally sure that none of them takes any interest in my mental peculiarities. The usual explanation of the use of these controversial methods—that the user is actuated by a conscious or sub-conscious desire to evade the point—is, I am sure, not applicable in this case. Still, the tendency to wander away from the point into discussion of one's opponent's peculiarities is a hindrance and not a help. Mr. Dixon could, no doubt, go on showing how closely I resemble Browning and George Meredith from now till next week. I do not think your readers care, and I am sure that the process tends to prevent Mr. Dixon from realising the essence of the question which he has undertaken to discuss. If he would pay a little less attention to me, and a little more to the question, he would, I think, see that non-Christian Scientists are, from their point of view as to what evidence is, justified in saying that there is no evidence of any case of organic disease ever having been cured or ameliorated by Christian Science treatment, and that the idea of the thing being possible is merely a hypothesis in support of which no evidence has ever been adduced.

Mr. Dixon entirely agrees with my view that "what differentiates the Christian Scientist from ordinary people is that in his eyes the reason why the man recovered is just as much a question of fact as his recovery," and he adds, "I have given my own reasons for coming to that conclusion." The words "my own reasons" refer doubtless to the repeated statement "I had accumulated a vast mass of evidence, all tending to prove the fact of spiritual causation and all demonstrating the fact that inharmony of whatever description could be overcome by obedience to the law of divine principle." Now if Mr. Dixon wants to persuade your readers that it is rational to arrive at the conclusion on the strength of the evidence, the first step surely is to produce the evidence. Mr. Dixon's assurance that the evidence satisfies him is, of course, conclusive as far as he is concerned, but it is not likely to carry conviction to anyone else.

I can, perhaps, make my contention clear by putting it in a concrete form. A man leads for twenty years a life of reckless self-indulgence, with the natural result that he is crippled with disease. He becomes a Christian Scientist and leads a clean life, to the manifest advantage of everybody. There can, I suppose, be no doubt about what Mr. Dixon calls "the fact of spiritual causation," but what evidence is there that the inharmony has been overcome? Christian Science seems to say to this man, "Your heart and lungs and digestive apparatus are as sound as if you had led a decent life. You are as able to do good work for yourself and for the community as anybody else. If you have children, there will be no danger of their being handicapped in any way by the life you have led." It is, to my mind, difficult to imagine anything more immoral than such teaching. That, however, is not the immediate point. The question is: What evidence is there in support of this attitude? One can easily see the attractiveness of such a doctrine. Nothing one could say to this man would be so likely to make him happy, and as long as he is never asked to endure any mental or physical strain, and refrains from inquiring too closely into the physical or mental condition of his children, he may very likely be able to shamble through the rest of his life in the belief that all inharmony has been overcome. Ordinary people are not likely to believe it until they are supplied with far more evidence than has been laid before them so far regarding the present condition of the man's heart and lungs, and the condition of his children.

There is, of course, a large number of people to whom Christian Science has done great good. People whose troubles were entirely or largely imaginary have been led by it to take a more hopeful view of themselves and their condition; to pay less attention to their woes. In most of these cases no evidence is attainable: they used to feel ill or unhappy, and now they feel all right, and they and the world have every reason to be grateful to Christian Science for what it has done for them. There is, however, a considerable amount of real disease and trouble in the world, regarding which evidence is attainable. When Christian Scientists say that Christian Science can cure tuberculosis or a decayed tooth, they are saying something which, if it were true, could be proved; not on the lines of "The doctor thought I had tuberculosis and now I think I am cured," but according to the laws of evidence which are generally accepted as valid. If Mr. Dixon will produce a few cases of tuberculosis or decayed teeth, the existence of the disease and its disappearance being proved by analogous tests made by men of equal competence, he will have gone far towards proving his hypothesis that inharmony of whatever description can be overcome by obedience to the law of divine principle. Then the decks will be clear for the discussion of the further question: "What caused the disease to disappear? Good food, fresh air, favourable surroundings, or Christian Science treatment?" That question, too, could be tested. All that is necessary for the accumulation of valid evidence is greater willingness on the part of Christian Scientists to submit their ideas to the sort of tests which other people who have a thesis to prove are only glad to resort to whenever they have a chance. I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

"TACITAE" AND "SILENTIA" IN AENEID II, 255.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—If Mr. Dodgson will refer to Conington's edition of Vergil he will find this difficult passage fully discussed; although the note may leave him still undecided, a result not unusual where Vergil and his great commentator are concerned! Conington saw that the poet's meaning might be that there was no moon, and Mr. Dodgson's interesting quotation from Dante lends support to this interpretation. It was said jestingly of a certain living art critic that he "battens on the vague," and Vergil is certainly not averse from vagueness. Whether he meant us to think of the night of Troy's downfall as moonlit or moonless is a nice point. There is the passage under consideration; a little later some comrades confront Æneas "in the moonlight"; and a few moments afterwards "dark night enfolds us in its hollow covert."

If anyone will read the whole description anew, remarking at the start the lines—

"Vertitur interea cælum et ruit Oceano nox, Involvens umbra magna terramque polumque"

—where the impression conveyed is of "a darkness that may be felt"—he will probably incline to understand Vergil as meaning that the goddess gave the Danai a moonless crossing. The orb may have risen later, when the fighting was in progress. But as to the torch on the leading vessel, Mr. Dodgson is wrong in thinking it was lit for purposes of exploration—those shores being, in truth, familiar to the Danai—since it was a signal to Sinon to release the warriors from the wooden horse. Characteristically, Vergil says elsewhere that it was Helen who gave the signal.

One may the more favour the "moonless" theory when one remembers that repeatedly in Vergil the wind is said, presumably by its absence, to calm the waters. (See Ec. 2, 26, Georg. 4, 484, Æn. 1, 66 and 5,673; also a passage in Sophocles, Ajax 674, which may be their common source.) Similarly, may not the moon be regarded as, by a like complacency, effecting darkness? The moderns have not a monopoly of paradox! I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The remarks made by "Scotus, Edinburgh," were quite in order.

Allow me to supplement them. Nearly two years ago there appeared an article in an art journal asking the public to send particulars, etc., of any (well-known) men of importance.

I replied by sending to (Sir) Sidney Lee a biographical sketch of the late Admiral Lindesay Brine, R.N., F.R.G.S., containing such items as follows: Commanded a Battery in the Crimea 1854, in the Baltic 1855, Capture of Taku Forts 1860, Naval Assessor to the House of Lords, Asst. Superintendent of Naval Reserves, Brother of Trinity House, received six or more medals, and author of various works, etc., etc.

I gave more details and wrote the biography in the usual style. From that day to this (nearly two years ago) I have never received any acknowledgment of the biographical sketch.

I presume Sir Sidney Lee may wish to be the author of my work, or, he is still vexed with me for having asked him on a previous occasion "on what authority he published the biography of John Baverstock Knight, 1785-1859, as the account was not only misleading, but parts of it were absolutely untrue."

The author of this last-named biography was Mr. Lionel Cust, the Director of the National Gallery, to whom I wrote, also, for an explanation. Mr. Lionel Cust apologised to me and said he obtained his information solely from the Gentleman's Magazine.

Sir (then Mr.) Sidney Lee also apologised and said the biography should be amended in the next publication.

I contend that a copy from any work ought to state the fact of its being so extracted, and not be handed down in the "Dictionary of National Biography" as original.

I also contend that biographers ought to verify their statements before they put matters forward as part of a certain individual's life.

I am the author of the biography of the said John Baverstock Knight, which I published in order to place on record the actual facts of this most prolific and versatile painter, whose career would never have been truly known had I not done so, and who would have been under gross misrepresentation if left to the "Dict. Nat. Biog." account of the man.

The British Museum and other Libraries and Galleries possess copies of the Biography by me.

Yet with all the expense I have been put to, and apologies from Sir S. Lee and Mr. Cust, I have not yet received any intimation from either of them that the promise made has taken effect in the recently published new volume, and as I have not seen a copy, I am doubtful.

But why should Admiral Lindesay Brine not be included? He died 1906? Believe me, yours very truly, Ravenscroft, Shirley Avenue, FRANCIS KNIGHT.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The Baconian syllogism is this: "Shakespeare" is the work of a learned man. Bacon was a learned man, therefore Bacon wrote Shakespeare. But the notion that "Shakespeare" is the work of a learned man is comparatively of modern date. John Hales, of Eton, writing before 1633, and referring to a conversation concerning Shakespeare in which Sir John Suckling, Sir William Davenant, Ben Jonson, and he himself were engaged, says that, "hearing Ben frequently reproaching him [Shakespeare] with the want of learning and ignorance of the Ancients, he [Hales] told him that, if Mr. Shakespeare had not read the Ancients, he had likewise not stolen anything from them (a fault the other made no conscience of); and that, if he would produce any one topic finely treated by any of them, he would undertake to find something upon the same subject at least as well written by Shakespeare." Dryden said that Shakespeare "was wanting that learning and care which Jonson had." Naham Tate admitted, "however it fared with our author for book-learning, it was evident that no man was better studied in men and things, the most useful knowledge for a dramatic writer." Lady Margaret Cavendish, in the "General Prologue" to her "Plays," 1682, after praising Ben Jonson, says:—

"Yet gentle Shakespeare had a fluent wit,
Although less learning, yet full well he writ,
For all his plays were writ by Nature's light," etc.

And many other instances could be cited from notable judges of the seventeenth century to the same effect. But in the succeeding century there arose a contrary view; George Colman the elder, and others, thought the plays indicated an acquaintance with Greek, Latin, and later foreign authors whose works had not been translated into English when Shakespeare wrote. But Farmer, in his celebrated "Essay on the Learning of Shakespeare," 1766, completely refutes that idea. Dr. Warton refers to it "as a work by which an end is put forever to the dispute concerning the learning of Shakespeare." Another century passes, and it is again asserted that the plays must be the work of a scholar, and as Bacon was a scholar —then Bacon is Shakespeare. To persist in this fiction is not creditable. The lines quoted by Mr. Smedley from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," II ii., 124-127, are anything but "poor stuff." It should be recognised that they are dramatic, expressing excitement in the speaker. Shakespeare answers Mr. Smedley in line 129 in the same speech: "Good troth, you do me wrong, good sooth, you do." I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

"ANTONINUS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In your article on the present hypocritical state of man you ask a very significant question.

"Why at this stage—the Cross and the Crescent?" And then, by referring to Gibbon's well-known satire on the Crusades, you introduce an original historic indictment.

Indeed, it may be asked—"Why at any stage—the Cross and the Crescent?" It will be as well for us to remember that the Cross is not emblematic of world power, though, as you further have the happiness to state, the "monopoly of righteousness" by Whitefield's Tabernacle and the singular justice of our House of Commons make for the contradiction of this great fact. However, as the state of Antoninus' time proved, there is always the consolation that "Quos Deus vult perdere, prins dementat." Yours obediently, Hillcroft, Eastwood, Essex. H. C. DANIEL.

"ON LUCIDITY IN PROSE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In the article with this title in your last issue, Mr. Belloc gives us a very interesting quotation—a "text" which was a favourite of his old schoolmaster's, viz., "They shall file and flee into the valley of Beth-Ramon, where the lion roareth and the flap-doodle mourneth the loss of her first-born." Some years ago I bought for a ha'penny in a little East End shop a leaflet on which was printed a Yankee mock-sermon supposed to have been preached by what the Americans term a "hard-shell Baptist"; and one of the sentences in this sermon was the "text" mentioned above. But it differed from the schoolmaster's version in several vital particulars. It ran as follows: "They shall gnaw a file and flee unto the mountains of Rephsidim, where the lion roareth for his prey and the whang-doodle mourneth for her first-born." It would be interesting to know which of these gems is the correct one. It would also be useful to know how it would read if translated into the English language. Yours faithfully,

J. G. G.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Allow me to propound the following question for consideration by your numerous grammatical correspondents:—

"What is the actual logical connection between 'relative' and 'interrogative' pronouns?" Your obedient servant,

QUIS.

Notes of the Week

AMONG the many surprises that the present government have supplied the legislative sanction of flogging stands out pre-eminently. Everyone who is connected with the administration of the law is perfectly well aware that flogging is more deterrent than any other form of punishment. Despite Mr. Cunninghame Graham, who wrote to the press on Monday last in a manner reminiscent of his Tower Hill speeches, it is a matter of common knowledge that garotting was entirely suppressed by this efficient instrument when every other description of punishment had failed. Ranters suggest that the punishment is degrading to those who inflict it, as well as to those by whom it is inflicted. Such a contention is absolutely fantastic. Flogging is inflicted to-day for offences of violence committed in prisons. The concurrent evidence of everyone of authority who is acquainted with the punishment as a means of preserving discipline is to the effect that neither the person who is flogged nor the person who inflicts the punishment is in the least debased or degraded in consequence. When we observe robberies with violence occurring every day, in many cases accompanied with the latest substitute for the Burgundy pitch plaster of the garotting times, the efficiency of flogging as a deterrent is brought inevitably to remembrance. If Radicals—or rather some of them—do not think the White Slave traffic is sufficiently hideous to be suppressed in the most efficient manner, we do not think they will succeed in carrying wholesome public opinion with them.

Believing, as we do, that it is advisable, in the present state of affairs, that there should be a censor to supervise proposed productions on our stage, we may yet submit the criticism that the duties of this official are not carried out in the most satisfactory fashion. We say nothing as to the morality or otherwise of "A Venetian Night," recently forbidden, knowing nothing save the sketchy plot of the wordless play as given in the papers; but it certainly seems unfair and unbusinesslike to leave the prohibition of a piece until the very eve of its production. On another occasion, not very long ago, permission to proceed was only obtained, we believe, on the afternoon of the advertised opening night. These things should surely be managed more smartly, and not in a way which would disgrace any commercial office; at present the prohibition arriving at the eleventh hour means unnecessary expense, and may mean much hardship to a crowd of "supers," whose living is at no time too secure. Another objection is that if the ban is subsequently removed, the play has received a form of advertisement which is in questionable taste; it is labelled as at least "risky," and draws an audience fully prepared, in the cant of the day, to cloak its prurience under the plea of art.

We treat with becoming respect the story of an "antiseptic lady" which reaches us, not from America, but from one of the French scientific papers. This remarkable person seems to possess the power of preserving everything with which she comes into contact; oysters, wine, cut flowers, fish—she simply has to touch or handle these things, and they remain, as it were, in their pristine beauty, undergoing all tests for incipient decomposition with complete success. We cannot think that so desirable a lady will be allowed for long to blush unseen; what an acquisition she would be, for example, to any first-class hotel! At the same time, we grieve at the deliberate scepticism which inspires the editorial note: "It is not to be expected that the results will be accepted until someone else has repeated them."

Enthusiasm is a splendid thing when directed to a good cause, but we doubt whether Dr. Woodrow Wilson, the new President of the United States, wants to undergo again an hour and five minutes of uninterrupted cheering such as greeted him at one of his New York meetings last week. Fifteen thousand people shouted themselves hoarse, waved flags, blew whistles, rang bells, and sang patriotic songs; and then, when at last the hero rose to speak, his voice for a time was drowned by the "steady tramp of departing enthusiasts, who, having seen and cheered him, considered their duty was done." Compared with our own little election fervours, this is a veritable tornado: but was it so great a compliment, after all, to yell a frantic welcome to the lion of the evening, and then, when he wanted to do a little roaring on his own account, to get up and go?

Song of a Good-for-Nothing

WERE I a hearty husbandman it's happy I would be
With a loaf of rye and honey, twelve brown eggs, and apples three,
To make my daily faring for the bonny wife and me.

And had I half the wisdom that I've read about in books,
I'd leave the world of wranglers, and I'd love the world of brooks,
And willow-shaded shepherd lads a-leaning on their crooks:

A world where sleep holds out her hand and leads you, down the hill,
To a green untroubled valley where the wind has no more will,
And the songs of streams are memories that the city's noise would kill.

There with my lass my life I'd pass, and dream no more of towns;
There'd be crow's-foot and crane's-bill a-growing on the downs
For careless girls o' holidays to fasten in their gowns.

I'd toil for life, I'd toil for wife, and then when I'd be old
I'd like to keep a toll-bar and gather in the gold
To give to ragged wayfarers to clothe them from the cold.

I'll never keep, save in my sleep, a toll-bar nor a farm;
I'll live with strangers all my life, and some will do me harm.
If only I'd a strong will and a strong right arm!

WILFRID THORLEY.

Notre Dame

THE white clouds linger near thy stately towers
As wistful thoughts round some forgotten theme;
Sorrows that lived, and brave, impassioned hours
That died, are lost, and all things holy seem;
Like a sweet tale half-told,
Vague, magical murmur of a secret old,
The voice of the world is hushed to the song of a dream.

R.

The Honest Brokers

WE are much afraid that the Great Powers are sorry for themselves. The event of the struggle in South-Eastern Europe may yet be remote, but the present aspect is terribly disquieting for them as to the realisation of their immemorial policy on the Eastern question.

Mr. Gladstone's orations and perorations, "fierce as Frenzy's fever'd blood," ranging from "Abdul the Damned" to the expulsion of the Turk from Europe, "bag and baggage," would not be repeated at the present day by any responsible politician. Now that the Turk, despite the heroism he has displayed, is in a parlous state and almost ready for expulsion from Europe, the Great Powers are realising the peril with which his disappearance is inevitably involved. Abuse him as you will, the Turk has yet been in effect the safety-valve which has for long prevented an European explosion.

In 1876 the late Lord Stratheden and Campbell, whose knowledge and authority on the Eastern question was never appraised at its true value, in a speech delivered in the House of Lords, said: "It is now seen more clearly that the interests of Great Britain on the Bosphorus continue, whether the administration of the Porte is good or bad among its subjects." That statement is true, not only of Great Britain, but of every important Power in Europe. Hysteria has to a certain extent hidden the essential truth, whilst it was possible to cherish the secret hope that the Ottoman forces would at least achieve a sufficient success to cripple their opponents. When the material bankruptcy of both belligerents should become obvious, the Brokers looked forward to being put in possession. They would exact from the Turk the uttermost farthing they could, without abolishing him as the buffer which was the sole obstacle to an abysmal crash.

It was intended to reward the froward children of the kindergarten with a few garish toys and complimentary speeches—and then all would go on as before. The people of Macedonia would undergo extermination for another thirty years, and at the end of that period exclaim, as is usual about Christmas-time: "Here we are again!" Some Power in Europe would then feel constrained to reveal the horrors of which it and all the Powers had been complacently aware for the preceding twenty-nine years. After a certain number of the oppressed and oppressors had been horribly done to death, the Christian Powers would impose a truce.

Viewed solely from the standpoint of La Haute Politique, it is impossible to quarrel with the soundness of mundane wisdom enshrined in such a policy, but the children who were intended after a flogging to return to their normal subservience, have most unaccountably proved themselves to be so formidable that their mentors would really have to put themselves to some inconvenience to restrain them, and worse than all, would probably collide with each other with distinctly regrettable results. It was all very well to shout: "Que la Suisse soit libre, et que nos noms périssent" so long as there did not appear to be the remotest chance that the burden of the prayer would be granted, but only that the chestnuts would be nicely roasted when the benevolent onlookers were ready to partake of them.

The event, although as we have already said it is not yet decided, would appear to be tending towards inconvenience for the Powers. In any case, the usual farce "The protection of nationals," has become urgent, and Mr. Churchill has despatched many semi-obsolete vessels to the Levant.

REVIEWS

Germany—and England

Germany and the German Emperor. By HERBERT PERRIS. (Andrew Melrose. 12s. 6d. net.)
Les Embarras de l'Allemagne. By GEORGES BLONDEL. (Plon-Nourrit, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)
Grundzüge der auswärtigen Politik Deutschlands. By PAUL ARNDT. (Eugen Diederichs, Jena.)
The Secret of Germany's Expansion. By "44." (David Nutt. 1s. net.)

THERE are many ways of looking at the problem of modern Germany. One view, not a very popular one, but held by some persons of undoubted intelligence, is that there is no German problem, except possibly for the Germans. Another view is that there is a problem, and a very grave one indeed, especially for England, and that the solution demanded is a homœopathic one, compounded of blood and iron:

" 's ist ein Gesetz der Teufel und Gespenster:
Wo sie hereingeschlüpft, da müssen sie hinaus."

Among representatives of this point of view we may cite Mr. Blatchford, Captain Pierre Félix and "44," the author of one of the brochures before us. A third view admits the difficulty but believes that it can be overcome by the "paternal admonitions" and "well-meant feasts of brotherly love" that our German Ambassador legitimately satirised.

Of the works we are considering "Germany and the German Emperor" stands in a class by itself. Sometimes incoherent, and often irritating—in a healthy way—it gives as complete a survey as could be wished of the conditions of the German problem. There is no forcing of a solution; the facts are all there, and the door is open. Knowledge is the solution of most human difficulties, and Mr. Perris gives us abundantly the means of knowing. He leaves no side of Germany untouched, and nearly everything he says has a definite relation to the great question he prepares the way for answering. Thus, nothing could be more relevant than the section on German music: he who does not understand music can never understand Germany, and Mr. Perris shows that the development of music and of national sentiment have, in Germany at any rate, followed parallel lines. For the Englishman wishing to see German affairs through the right spectacles we can think of no better oculist than Mr. Perris—or, better still, Mr. Perris and Dr. Arndt in consultation. They are both patriots, which is the main thing, and neither of them believes in "paternal admonitions" or vague talk about the absurdity of national quarrels.

It is extraordinary that anyone should, after all these centuries, continue to believe that war can be abolished by a reductio ad absurdum. Nations, like individuals, are to be recognised by their passions. When a man has been a single week in love with a woman of, perhaps, no very apparent charm, his capacity for ill-considered action is perceptibly increased; when a nation has nourished for a week or a decade a possibly obscure grievance against another nation, it is likely at any moment to embark upon a course of action that might almost be described as altruistic, inasmuch as little will be gained and much may be lost. If we argue from purely positive data, no war is inevitable, but in all human affairs it is the "imponderables" that count, and he would be a rash man who would prophesy that war will follow close upon the hansom-cab into the limbo of forgotten institutions.

We are not sure if reference is made to the days of upon the string of war, when the subject under discussion is merely the position of modern Germany, and we had better at once explain that the connection of our ideas was not based on a possible etymology of the word "German." It is unfortunately too notorious that the names "England" and "Germany," set down side by side, evoke ideas of rivalry, distrust, objurgation, and potential war. Mr. Blatchford said two or three years ago that a state of war did actually exist between the two countries, and "44" seems to-day to be of the same opinion. Certainly, if ink could kill, there would be no lack of fresh graves in the two countries. Each possesses scores of writers who consider that the rulers of the other cherish designs on civilisation and the world's peace. Here is "44," for instance, who maintains that the manœuvres of Germany are so dangerous in view of the rise of China and Japan, that the proper course for a self-respecting English statesman is obviously to ally himself with these Oriental bogies, as a preliminary to allying himself with everybody else for the destruction of Germany. We have seldom seen a more cynical proposal, but "44" seems to think that it requires no defence. We will quote such justification as he gives: "Should it be necessary to justify such tactics, it may be said that Germany has set Europe the example, and is but being done unto as she has done unto others."

We are not sure if reference is made to the days of Bismarck or to more recent events. "44" has no dearth of rather wild statements and accusations to support his contention that Germany is treating the world in general, and England in particular, with contemptuous treachery. The weak point about this procedure is that it is of almost universal applicability. Dr. Arndt, for instance, marshals quite an array of counter-facts indicating consistent malice on the part of England against Germany. No good object is served by such an exercise; it can be performed for any two given countries at almost any given time. International law and international relations are really only in their school-boy stage, and "tu quoque" is an effective weapon of offence. As Dr. Arndt very truly remarks: "The reproaches that one nation casts in the teeth of another are nearly always the same—unscrupulousness, brutality, treachery, hypocrisy, etc. Intra muros peccatur et extra!"

The flaw in the German case is Bismarck. The ghost of that efficient statesman is, if we may say so, the most tangible thing in European politics. If we are beset on all sides by rumours of war and the clash of an armed peace it is due to the Chancellor who made three wars in eight years, who said: "It is not by Parliamentary speeches and majority votes that these great problems will be settled, but by iron and blood," and who taught a younger generation to say, and to draw their full significance from, the words "Universal history teaches us that the right of the strongest created states." We are not sure that either Mr. Perris or M. Blondel is quite just to Bismarck; the French writer is particularly explicit: "Nous pouvons constater adjourd'hui," he says, "qu'il a été plutôt un destructeur qu'un constructeur," and Mr. Perris says substantially the same thing. As for "44," his only allusion to Bismarck is concerned with the "falsified telegram" and "deliberate lie" of Ems.

Mr. Perris regards Bismarck—quite rightly, according to our ideas—as the key to the whole situation. He devotes a large part of his space to the career and character of the Iron Chancellor. The result is a long indictment, relieved by moments of ringing sympathy. Bismarck "faced facts, and he respected stout manhood, as he hated weaklings and dreamers," and when near the end of his career, some one quoted Goethe, "Blessed is he who retires without hatred from the world," he replied: "What! without hatred? What a tailor's soul he must have!" Mr. Perris has this great virtue—he can admire; many of his boutades seem to batter the causes he has most at heart. But he is no hero-worshipper; he has no great good to say of any of the central figures of history; the hero is "the *n*th power of the ordinary." We were early prepared to find him joining issue with Carlyle, and, about half way through the book comes the collision. Mr. Perris here pours ridicule on the hero-worshipper's conception of Bismarck as one of his "noble, patient, deep, and solid" Germans. The citation is from a Times article of 1870, and it is interesting to compare Dr. Arndt's use of a similar quotation from the same writer about the war of 1866.

Dr. Arndt is unfortunately anchored in the belief in him whom he calls "der Meister der Politik." We say "unfortunately," because, so long as Germans continue to regard Bismarck as the model man and statesman, rather than as a being of superlative mind and will-power who, spoiled by success, deliberately sowed tares in the fields of national and international policy, they will find it difficult to gain much external sympathy. It may be objected that Bismarck has been dead these fourteen years and ceased to rule Germany more than twenty years ago; we would reply that Bismarck lives so long as his system of politics remains an ideal for the more serious and cultivated of his compatriots. Twenty years are as nothing in the history of the world; least of all will they be insisted on by a nation that alleged a robbery of more than two centuries' standing to justify its annexation of Alsace. We see no end to the Anglo-German incompatibility of temper, till the Germans give up Bismarck. Let them admire the man as much as they like—we ask nothing better than to join in their homage—but let them also admit that the statesman was wrong. Let them admit that war erected into a principle, systematic deceit in diplomacy and the inoculation of the Press by official and semi-official poison are works of the devil. Hypocrisy is not the least of the vices, but, as compared with cynicism, she is a pale and ineffectual shadow; hypocrisy acknowledges the sovereignty of virtue, cynicism would banish her altogether from the world, and indefinitely postpone the Kingdom of God upon earth.

We find Dr. Arndt, usually so sane and conciliatory, very difficult to understand on this particular subject. He reminds us at times of some shallow commentator of a classical author. The formation of the Triple Alliance was, it seems, one of the noblest contributions to the cause of peace—peace having become for the moment necessary in order to secure the spoils of war. As for the Entente, "It has not served the interests of European peace, it has, on the contrary, increased the risk of war." Finally, for we cannot go on neglecting our other authors or the more practical and conciliatory part of Dr. Arndt's own work, why should he allow himself to entertain, even for an instant, such a possibility as "The conquest of Constantinople by Russia or England"?

We are convinced by Dr. Arndt's reasons for wishing for a great German fleet, but, so long as the ghost of Bismarck continues to walk, we shall continue to stipulate for a greater English fleet. Meantime we sincerely endorse the plea for co-operation in "Welt politik," at any rate as a principle. Circumstances may make it difficult, but, where it is possible, it is certain that the co-operation of two great Powers will give better results for both of them than their rivalry. Let neither country twit the other with "ambition" or designs of "hegemony"; these words form part of the "tu quoque" baggage to which we have referred, and "der Wille zur Macht" is a perfectly respectable possession.

Three of the four books before us are largely concerned with the history and present position of German institutions. In "Germany and the German Emperor" we have it on the grand scale, starting from before Arminius, and with an epigram to every century or so. M. Blondel is not quite so encyclopædic, but he manages to convey a pretty good impression of the development of modern Germany; his avowed object is to show the seamy side—he feels he has earned the right to do so by his previous books, in which a more general view is taken.

Dr. Arndt's retrospective glance displays a gloomy vista, broken by the blaze from the altar of Bismarck, and a lesser gleam from the chapel of Bülow. All three writers are agreed that the worst features of modern Germany are due to the lack of political traditions, and to centuries of small States with no central authority. Both non-German authors are moreover at one in condemning the Prussian Constitution as a national mistake. On the subject of German materialism the unanimity is more striking still; the too sudden industrial advance is the obvious reason for this apparently undisputed phenomenon. Dr. Arndt is inclined to leave out "Blut und Eisen" as ingredients, but admits that diplomacy has been "voreilig" through a mistaken analogy between commerce and politics.

We think that there is in the non-German books a disposition to underrate the solidarity of the Empire. Alsace-Lorraine and the Polish provinces are no doubt disaffected, but Bavaria, Saxony, and the rest have given substantial pledges of their loyalty. The campaign of 1812 is a good instance of the welding power of war and an Imperial banner on even the most heterogeneous elements. Against the many circumstances making for peace we must place one that does not seem to occur in any of these works—an inelastic constitution may be an encouragement to aggression, through the desire of those in power to turn public attention away from themselves. On the difficult subject of German finance M. Blondel is very instructive; his picture of over-tasked capital suggests the James Pinkerton of the "Wrecker" with his "Into the mill again." "44" in the same connection develops a lurid scheme for the "peaceful persuasion" of Germany by the wrecking of her credit system; an international bank is to be formed to carry out the plot and to compensate alien victims. But as we believe Bismarck to have been wrong, so we know "44" to be completely and utterly wrong, not so much through his irresponsible suggestions, as through his whole point of view.

After all it is the point of view that matters. A solution of the German problem cannot be forced, but it will be attained if knowledge and sincerity are allowed to do their part. We will conclude with two memorable quotations from Mr. Perris, to whom we feel we have hardly done justice.

"Life is a perpetual solution of apparently insoluble problems by a change in the elements"; and "Ideas are not immaculately conceived, but born in wedlock of fact with fact."

Marcus Aurelius in Colour

The Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Translated by GEORGE LONG. Illustrated after the Water-Colour Drawings by W. RUSSELL FLINT. (Philip Lee Warner. 10s. 6d. net.)

FOR the last three or four years publishers have poured forth a steady stream of sumptuous colour-books under the impression that grown-up people, as well as children, revel in the expensive reproductions of Messrs. Rackham, Dulac, Pogány, and other clever artists. So they do, and even those who possess twenty different editions of Omar will buy another provided it has coloured plates. Certain learned writers would have us believe the very feasible theory that the ancients were not cognisant of some of the colours we recognise to-day. Hundreds of modern novelists use a colour in the titles of their books. Purple patches and references to all manner of shades, tints and hues, are at a discount, while people who go in for soul-culture study the esoteric significance of colour. Swinburne was particularly fond of scarlet and purple; Hearn wanted to have all his books bound in sky-blue, while the railway porter and the Socialist are very partial to red ties.

We have grown excessively artistic of late, and are prone to attach a greater importance to book illustrations than to the text itself. We seem to have lost a sense of proportion in this direction. Illustrations, whether in line or colour, should reflect the author's work. They should possess imagination, but at the same time take a subordinate place, and not seek to oust, or distort, the writer's and reader's conception. Dickens was more than happy in his illustrators; but there are certain writers, such as Hardy, Borrow, George Eliot, and Jefferies, whose work we do not wish to see illustrated. Publishers, it would seem, having exhausted their legitimate sphere of colour production, have now trespassed into realms where illustrations border on the sacrilegious.

Mr. Lee Warner, justly celebrated for his superbly produced books and Medici prints, has, perhaps, made a mistake in getting an artist to illustrate Marcus Aurelius. Philosophy cannot be illustrated in either line or colour. Mr. Russell Flint was successful in dealing with "The Song of Solomon," but in the present volume he fails simply because he has attempted the impossible, and as Marcus Aurelius has observed, "to seek that which is impossible is madness." His productions are delightful pictures, but they have no bearing whatever upon the Emperor-philosopher's meditations. On the slightest pretext, and sometimes without a pretext at all, he introduces graceful nude and semi-nude women in all manner of postures; and this is the motif of most of his work. The simple words of Marcus Aurelius: "Tiberius at Capreae," immediately suggest to the artist's fertile imagination a dark-haired woman dancing against a purple night sky and juggling with hoops, while Tiberius is reclining amid women with fair and auburn tresses. It is an exquisite piece of colour work, which would have passed as an illustration for an Anacreon ode, somewhat after the manner of the designs by Girodet de Roussy, but seems strangely out of place amid so much chaste Roman wisdom.

Again: "Do not act as if thou were going to live ten thousand years," affords Mr. Flint the opportunity of depicting a youth with a bandage round his eyes, so that he cannot see the approach of death while he is being diverted by his women. We admire some of Mr. Flint's pictures immensely, especially the one portraying "certain islands of the happy"; but we must confess we should like to cut it out and hang it on the wall, partly because it is a fine piece of work, and partly because it is only vastly incongruous in this volume. Imagination has carried Mr. Flint away from philosophy into a sensuous realm of azure sea and fair women. Marcus Aurelius wrote: "What then art thou doing here, O imagination? Go away, I entreat thee by the gods, as thou didst come, for I want thee not." Philosophy and exotic imagination have nothing in common, and beautiful as these pictures are, we think that when the wisest of emperors wrote his meditations, he would have exclaimed, could he have seen these water-colour drawings, "I want thee not."

A Flood of Light on the Oriental Arts

Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art. By ERNEST FENOLLOSA. Illustrated. (Wm. Heinemann. 36s. net.)

THERE is to-day room for a great, coherent, and simple history of the Art of China and Japan, seen by a man of broad vision, recorded by an artist of the pen. We await it. That the two handsome volumes before us fulfil all these conditions it would be fantastic to affirm; they are written with dry ink, and phrased with not a little professorial colourlessness and lack of imagery, but they draw one by the inestimable boon of their simplicity, their clarity, and the coherence of view. That a man who has little power of artistic utterance in the medium of literature, to which he has given a life's service, is prone to have a deep sensing of any art, is not very likely; but that he may by careful culture give us the history of an art through the arrangement and codifying of other men's researches and biographies, and make an illuminating record of these things, is an affair of scholarship. Still, Fenollosa has done more than that—he has seen the history of the Chinese and Japanese endeavour as a whole; has dug down to its origins; and has brought the whole into relationship with the genius and development of the peoples. He has thereby come as near to the masterwork as in any book I know on the subject. Here at least is a work that every student and lover of Oriental art must possess. In its realm we have been given an "authority." And, be it remembered, these volumes tackle a subject difficult for the Western ear and mind—Chinese and Japanese names do not readily trip into nor easily remain in the memory. It is the supreme triumph of Fenollosa's work that he conquered this difficult task—his habit of professor has done him this splendid service.

And he brought to his endeavour a sincerity and enthusiasm which enabled him to triumph over his defects. He essayed to give a clear history of the rise and development and achievement of Oriental Art; I do not say that he wins us without a certain severity of study under his guidance, for, after all, it is a tough subject; but it will remain to the long credit of the dead man who planned the large task, and of his widow's whole-souled execution of her husband's life-desire, that a clear history has been set before us of the artistic achievement of China and Japan that may be understood of the Western peoples. Even as an ardent admirer of the arts of the East, and, judging others by myself, and presuming a like difficulty in these others that I experience when essaying to come to closer grips with Eastern art—that is to say with the essential basis of it, which is to arouse the senses through the utterance of that art—I find the volumes "tough reading." At the same time, they are clearly the presentation of first-hand material, codified into something like clear evolution; and in spite of the dryness of the manner of presentment, they add prodigiously to one's general impression of the rise and progress of the powers of utterance of the Eastern genius. They are not the sort of books that even Lord Avebury would take with him on a fortnight's holiday-making, I fancy; and I feel bound to confess that I feel it something approaching presumption to write upon so serious a lifework without going through a heavy course of the subject—the which, however, rather bears out what I have said, that they are scarcely as exciting as a novel.

That requires a rare gift of words which was denied to the dogged talents of Fenollosa, who was bred in a professorial atmosphere and could not, though he strove so to do, wholly rid himself of professorial greyness. Nevertheless, in spite of his dryness, and because of his clarity and orderliness of mind, Fenollosa will stand forth as an authority on the history of Eastern art; for he rids his survey of the huge subject of much of the blight that has heretofore lain upon it. He does not wholly confuse art with the technique that is the instrument whereby art is expressed, and by that alone he leaps forward to the essential grip of the subject. He confuses art with beauty, 'tis true—that was inevitable to the age in which he wrote. But he arranges periods by their creative intention instead of by their craftsmanship, which is a marvellous achievement for a man writing on any history of art—above all the art of the East. He nevertheless does to a certain extent confuse art with craft; and thereby lessens his high intention. But his deep Eastern culture has done this great service to the Eastern genius, that he realises the oneness of all art, particularly of the Chinese and Japanese, which must have struck everyone who has ever looked upon these things untrammelled by bookish theories.

He sees that art evolves; and that the art of China and Japan developed side by side as the arts of the West developed. Nay, more—he realises that the movements in the Orient were akin to the movements in our Western art. His theory of art is as precise balderdash as all other professorial theories of art; but, as it is all balderdash, this matters little. He speaks seriously of "principles of criticism"—his own conflict with all other principles of criticism proves that there are none such. He tells us that he only treats of "imaginative or creative art"—there is no other form of art whatsover. His definition of art as being "the power of the imagination to transform materials" is utterly paltry, and false as it is paltry. But the moment that Fenollosa gets to work in the origin and development of the Eastern genius as revealed by its art he becomes convincing; and had he been alive to-day he would probably have answered that that precisely was his aim and his endeavour; and is his reward.

Perhaps nothing could show more simply the clarity of Fenollosa's mind than the use of the small map in which he makes us realise how the Pacific, with its "stepping-stones of islands" was a wide centre of art. He brings home the obvious fact that primitive American art was blown abroad from a Pacific centre—a fact we find it hard to realise, since we always look upon America as the New World—a fact which at once convinces since without it we are in a whirl of confusion. I have but touched upon the threshold of Fenollosa's great work; and it would be impossible to handle it in detail in the space of a short review; but to the skill and dogged ordering of the evidences with which he proceeds to develop the rise and progress of the Oriental arts, and of the peoples who created them, one is compelled to pay the highest tribute that can be paid—that he is wholly convincing. He builds up his case with increasing force of logic. His rich volumes will vastly add to the study and interest in the Oriental achievement. He saw the prodigious eagle flight of the Chinese genius. He gave his life's work to glorify it and testify to it. And he has given to the world, through the devotion of his helpmate, a work which most fitly crowns a lifelong service to his chosen career.

HALDANE MACFALL.

The Indian Borderers

From the Black Mountain to Waziristan. By COLONEL H. C. WYLLY, C.B. With an Introduction by LIEUT.-GEN. SIR HORACE L. SMITH-DORRIEN, K.C.B., D.S.O., and Maps. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Lushei Kuki Clans. By LIEUT.-COLONEL J. SHAKESPEAR. With Coloured Frontispiece, Map, and other Illustrations. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.)

THE land frontier of India measures, roughly speaking, about seventeen hundred miles from sea to sea. For half its length the border is fringed by tribes forming small independent communities, with each of which the Government of India is obliged to maintain direct relations. The simultaneous appearance of two works, under official patronage, dealing respectively with the tribes on the North-West and North-East frontiers, is a seasonable reminder of the unceasing vigilance required to deal with the innumerable and complex problems that are constantly arising.

Colonel Wylly brings together in a compact form all the necessary information regarding the Pathan tribes dwelling east of the Indus, down to the Beloochistan frontier, with their geographical distribution, their relations with their neighbours, including ourselves, and a brief account of the many military expeditions for punitive purposes that have been forced upon us since the first Sikh war. One a year seems to be the exact average of military expeditions found necessary at one point or another of the Pathan frontier in a period of sixty-two years; and such an expedition may mean simply a military promenade of less than a thousand men, or some weeks of hard fighting with twenty or thirty thousand men in the field and a casualty roll equal to that of a Crimean battle. The 25,000 square miles of North-West frontier, occupied by independent tribes are inhabited by the most turbulent and unruly race in the world.

The Pathan frontiersman is the survival of a type that is now hardly to be met with elsewhere. A murderous, treacherous ruffian, fierce and bloodthirsty, he is brought up from his earliest childhood amid scenes of appalling treachery and merciless revenge. Every tribe and section of a tribe has its internecine wars, every family its hereditary blood feuds, and every individual his personal foes. Compared with a Pathan blood feud the Corsican vendetta is a tame and anæmic affair. But the Pathan has only to be taken away from his own valley to become one of the finest soldiers it is possible to conceive, serving his employer with the loyalty of a true Highlander. To deal successfully with such people, over a long series of years, requires powers of no common order, and the fact that these men who have fought us again and again are ready to enlist in our native regiments by the thousand, and do faithful service, when the humour takes them, speaks volumes for the confidence with which our frontier officials have inspired them, both as friends and foes. The most urgent question on the frontier to-day is that connected with the illicit trade in firearms of the latest type. The Indian Government, which is now overruled from Whitehall, lives from hand to mouth, and resolutely shut its ears to the reports of its officers, until the magnitude of the evil could no longer be ignored. It is likely to cost us many anxious moments and many valuable lives in the future.

The tribes dealt with in Lieut.-Colonel Shakespear's work are of a very different calibre. They are the dwellers in the hill tracts north-east of Chittagong, and about Manipur. Under the generic term Lushai, literally head cutters, are included a number of tribes speaking different languages, off-shoots of the great Tibeto-Burman family inhabiting the still unexplored hill country that stretches eastward from the Bay of Bengal to Yunan. Lieut.-Colonel Shakespear, who has before this published a work on these clans, now tells us that the name is properly applicable to one clan only, who are the overlords of a tract of hill country, part of which is still inhabited by conquered clans. To distinguish them he applies the term Lushei to the clan entitled to the name, using the term Lushai in a wider sense to include the other tribes dwelling in the same area. It is a subtle distinction that can only be made good in print.

Exhaustive accounts are given of their customs, religion, and folk-lore, and the interest of the work is almost entirely ethnological. The book is dedicated to Lieut.-Colonel Lewin, the pioneer of British influence among the Lushai tribes, a reprint of whose work on these tribes was reviewed in the pages of THE ACADEMY on September 28 last.

Home Rule Reviewed

Home Rule from the Treasury Bench: Speeches during the First and Second Reading Debate. With Portraits. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a handsome book of over three hundred pages, well printed in large type and adorned with excellent up-to-date portraits of eight leading Liberal statesmen. It may be useful as a party handbook, but it is not and cannot be a contribution to the history of the period. It has this fatal defect: it only presents one-half of the question, and is unilateral in its argument. It is like listening to a man talking into a telephone—you hear only one side of the conversation. The editor or compiler, whoever he may be, seems to have been conscious of this, for he eagerly seizes—with some exceptions—opportunities to report interruptions and questions, so as to give a slight hint of controversy, but this is a very poor substitute for the powerful speeches which answered the arguments put forward, or to which they were defences. For a real contribution to the literature on the subject the compiler should have come to terms with the other side, and arranged to print the speeches in their proper sequence. But we suspect that this would not have suited his purpose. An answer always sounds more powerful and convincing when you have not heard the question, and it would have been dangerous to report both sides.

It comes, then, to this—that, stripped of its dignified surroundings, the book is merely a pamphlet which might any day have been issued by the Liberal Publication Committee in stiff paper covers—at 6d. As this is probably its purpose, perhaps it would be useful for reference to record here the speakers and whom they followed:—

First Reading.
Mr. Asquith led off	11 April,	1912.
Mr. Herbert Samuel replied to Mr. Balfour	15 ,,	,,
Mr. Birrell replied to Mr. Balfour...	16 ,,	,,
Second Reading.
Mr. Churchill led off	30 April,	1912.
Col. Seely replied to Sir R. Finlay	1 May,	1912.
Sir Edward Grey replied to Mr. Balfour	2 ,,	,,
Sir Rufus Isaacs replied to Mr. J. H. Campbell	6 ,,	,,
Mr. Herbert Samuel replied to Mr. Austen Chamberlain	7 ,,	,,
Mr. Birrell replied to Mr. Geo. Wyndham	8 ,,	,,
Mr. T. W. Russell replied to Mr. Chaplin	9 ,,	,,
Mr. Asquith replied to Mr. Bonar Law	9 ,,	,,

The Premier's introduction is characteristically brief, but his statement is not quite accurate when he declares that "the people of England, Scotland, and Wales are now ready to consider the question stripped of prejudice and passion, and to come to a settlement based on justice, common-sense, and Imperial convenience." To criticise the book at any length would be to review the whole Irish question.

Mr. Asquith's two speeches are models of English prose, and might with advantage be included in any collection of speeches for the use of budding orators. They are examples of terse brevity and close reasoning combined with all the barrister's skill in skating over the weak spots.

Herbert Samuel began with an exceedingly graceful and well-turned welcome to Mr. Balfour on his return to the House of Commons "from those of us who on political grounds have most reason to regret the return to our debates of so formidable a controversialist." He claimed their title to legislate on the question by saying there is no man in Great Britain who, if he voted for the Liberal Party, did not know that he was voting for the Parliament Bill in order that the road might be clear through the veto of the House of Lords for measures of Liberal reform—and first and foremost amongst them for a measure of Home Rule for Ireland.

Birrell was not at his best, and he drew a storm on himself when he said there was no need to invoke elderly barristers to lead them (the Ulstermen) into the field. This extracted a bitter taunt from Carson which I do not see recorded among the interruptions. Winston Churchill's speech is well worth reperusal—in the light of his subsequent speech on the Heptarchy. Colonel Seely's speech was in his most superior manner, and seemed to irritate Mr. Walter Long.

Sir Edward Grey followed Mr. Balfour, and Rufus Isaacs replied to Mr. J. H. Campbell, but both speeches lose a good deal by not being able to compare them with the charges they are refuting. Herbert Samuel spoke again on the eighth day, and made a closely reasoned speech in reply to Austen Chamberlain, who naturally dwelt with the financial side of the question.

The Postmaster-General concluded by declaring that the debate showed—to his satisfaction—that all the larger arguments of policy are in favour of the Bill, and that only the petty ones can be advanced against it. So far as finance is concerned, he claimed that, viewed in detail, the Bill offers a just and stable foundation for the future financial relations between the two countries—equitable both to one party and the other. Birrell answered Wyndham, and paid him many compliments for his great and most beneficial measure of land purchase.

The nervousness which T. W. Russell showed whilst making his speech is not indicated in the book. He had a difficult task, for, as he said, he opposed the Bill of 1886, resisted the Bill of 1893, and was now supporting this one. Mr. Asquith's second speech on May 9 completes the anthology. He replied to Mr. Bonar Law, and wound up the debate.

On the whole, reading the book after listening to the spoken words, we are of opinion that the debate was a fine one—worthy of the House of Commons and worthy of the great issues involved. We were present during some days in the great debates of '86 and '93, and have refreshed our memory by glancing through Hansard. The style of speaking has changed—the speeches then were fiercer and far more voluminous, the periods rounder and more sonorous. This was a contest very much briefer, without so much eloquence, but more closely reasoned and more business-like.

Every man who took part in it on both sides had the subject at his fingers'-ends, and they do not smell of the lamp as some did in the earlier years.

We can only conclude as we began. The Radical Party are quite within their rights in extracting so many speeches from Hansard, but it is merely an artful way of putting their case before the public, and as a book is beyond criticism.

The Mastery of the World

Empires of the Far East: A Study of Japan and of Her Colonial Possessions, of China and Manchuria, and of the Political Question of Eastern Asia and the Pacific. By LANCELOT LAWTON. 2 vols. (Grant Richards. 1912.)

THE historical student who reflects on the developments of the last half-century cannot help feeling grave misgivings as to the future of our Empire in the next hundred years. The fate of Venice and Genoa, of Portugal, Spain, and Holland, left stranded on half-deserted highways of commerce, seems to warn the greatest commercial Power of modern times of possible reverses in store for it. When the Mediterranean was the great highway of trade, Venice and Genoa struggled for the monopoly of the exchange between Europe and the East. The discovery of the Eastern sea-route to the Indies, followed by that of America towards the West, brought the centre of trade to the shores of the Atlantic, and Spain, Holland, and England in turn became the centre of the markets of the world. In our own time a new ocean has been opened up to trade, new nations have grown to vigorous life on the shores of the Pacific, and ancient empires are awakening to take their share in competition with European civilisation.

The outcome of this struggle, of which we have seen only the merest preliminaries, is fateful for the human race, and we may rest assured that decisions which our rulers may be called on to make at any moment will have the greatest consequences in the future. Such decisions should only be made after deep consideration, and with a full knowledge of the character and resources of the protagonists in the drama, a knowledge which has been up to the present difficult to obtain. It is with great pleasure, therefore, that we welcome a work from Mr. Lancelot Lawton, whose writing is familiar to readers of THE ACADEMY, on the "Empires of the Far East," which will go far to supply that knowledge to the public. The East Coast of the Pacific, as far as international questions of commerce and politics are concerned, is shared between China, Korea, Manchuria, and Japan, and it is significant of the disturbance of the "Eternal East" that, since the title of the book was chosen, two ancient dynasties, those of Korea and of China, have fallen. Mr. Lawton has aimed at giving us, as near as may be, an account of the peoples of these realms, of their resources and activities, and of the political problems to which their contact with Europeans have given rise. The chief of these, the one on which all others turn, is the question whether Japan will become Mistress of the Pacific, uniting under one control the resources of these Empires of the Far East, and using them against the West—whether she has the material wealth, the moral qualities, the character, necessary to build up a World-State of this magnitude.

The answer may be gathered from the book before us. In it we have the most complete account of Japan from this point of view that has ever been put together—her history, her law and constitution, her administration, religion, and social life, her finances and industries. All of these are of deep interest, but the most valuable section of the first volume is undoubtedly that in which Mr. Lawton speaks with a first-hand authority, which can be claimed by very few—the chapters on the results of the Russo-Japanese War and the importance of the Amur Railway. His conclusion is, put in terms of historical criticism, that Japan has exhausted herself in that great struggle with Russia, as Portugal did in the early days of the conflict for the mastery of the Atlantic, and that her morality, social and commercial, betokens a character which does not promise recuperative power. His account of Japan is naturally followed by one of Korea and of the Japanese colonies, such as Formosa, and this by an invaluable section on Manchuria. It is hardly exaggeration to call this immense country the richest in the world, and it behoves British merchants to see that they get a due share of its trade, from which they are in considerable danger of being excluded. Lastly, there is a full account of the political and financial history of modern China.

It is not easy to pass a considered judgment on such a monumental work. There are probably not more than half a dozen men in our country who have the right to praise or blame it from the standpoint of equal or superior knowledge. From the literary point of view we may be less reserved. The book suffers, no doubt, as a work of art from the fact that Mr. Lawton has often been obliged to quote at length from his authorities—to sacrifice beauty to use. But this does not interfere with the fact that his book is clearly conceived, well planned, and admirably executed; that in its historical and descriptive chapters the interest does not flag for a single moment, and that the impartiality and accuracy which the author aimed at seem to have been attained. The immense accumulation of facts brought together is made accessible at a moment's notice by a very good index, and the whole is elucidated by a number of sketch-maps.

The problems of the Pacific, with which Mr. Lawton deals with the authority derived from long study and intimate personal knowledge, are, we repeat, of vital importance to this country, and it is the urgent duty of public men to acquaint themselves with their conditions. On the next few years depends the question of who shall obtain the trade of Manchuria and China, and whether Anglo-Saxon or Japanese shall be rulers of the Pacific. Mr. Lawton has rendered a great public service by the issue of these invaluable volumes, which bring together a complete statement of the conditions of the problem and suggest its answer.

Shorter Reviews

The British Empire Shakespeare: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Edited by HOWARD DE WALDEN and ACTON BOND. (George Routledge and Sons, Ltd.)

WE have noticed on previous occasions these neat booklets of the British Empire Shakespeare Society; this, the third volume, well satisfies the anticipations we had formed. The object of the production of the plays in this style, with certain passages in smaller type, is, as all our readers may not know, to enable each play to be rendered within a limit of about two hours, without sacrificing either dramatic continuity or beauty in the verse. Inevitably opinions must differ as to what can, with least damage to the whole effect, be omitted; especially, perhaps, in dealing with so famous a fantasy as "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Suffice it to say that in the edition before us we find no reason to complain; nearly all the well-known and beloved dialogue is untouched, and the general result, if not enhanced in its charm by compression—presuming the omission of the parts in small type—is, at any rate, unspoiled.

Legends: Autobiographical Studies. By AUGUST STRINDBERG. (Andrew Melrose. 5s. net.)

AUGUST STRINDBERG, perverter of youth, anti-Christian, scoffer of mysticism, is represented in these pages as longing to embrace the very teachings which in the past he had so strongly denounced. His search for the spiritual, or the spiritual search for him, is very different from that revealed in "The Everlasting Mercy" or "The Hound of Heaven." We do not doubt the sincerity of these confessions. The pitiful cry of anguish, the awful doubts, the self-revelations, remind most of us of certain days when our souls had no abiding harbour. Strindberg longs for peace, for one glimpse of the Christ Child that shall heal his wounds; but he is tormented day and night by malignant forces. He hears devils dancing strange measures, to say nothing of a horrible paw of some nameless animal scratching on his bedroom wall. He imagines that he is capable of invisibility, and on another occasion half believes that he is the Wandering Jew. He tells the story of a wicked friend of his who had a cigar snatched from his lips no less than three times by spirit hands, and frequently sees spots of blood on his own hand without being able to account for its presence. The man who has a cold bath in the morning and does exercises before breakfast will exclaim, rather contemptuously, "Nerves!" Granted, and we also admit that, when a man is consciously or unconsciously suffering from neurasthenia, he has no business to pore over Swedenborg, much less to dabble in spiritualism and mediæval magic. But the fact remains that we are given the study of a poor, nerve-racked outcast trying to lift a corner of the veil and failing, always failing. The heart that is not moved by such a spectacle is cold indeed.

The Ethical and Religious Value of the Novel. By RAMSDEN BALMFORTH. (George Allen and Co. 5s. net.)

THE title of this book is an ambitious one, leading the reader to expect a treatise in which literary, as well as ethical, canons are more or less scientifically applied. When we open it, however, we discover it to be a series of addresses—really sermons of an unconventional type—in which a whole novel takes the place of the usual Scripture text; Mr. Balmforth tells us that he delivered the contents of this volume to his congregation at Cape Town on Sunday evenings. The method of the author is so simple as almost to disarm criticism; he first tells briefly the plot of the novel he is dealing with, and then proceeds to moralise rather obviously thereon. His own religious attitude appears to be thoroughly modern and free from narrowness. The novels he has chosen are, however, of a kind that yield their moral quite easily to any thoughtful reader. This will be seen if we name a few of his sub-titles: "'Adam Bede' and the supreme moral law;" "'The Scarlet Letter' and the law of retribution;" "'The Increasing Purpose' and the law of development." A reader of any of these novels would have to be very dull if something of their moral import did not strike him. With strictly literary criticism our author has nothing to do; he keeps wholly to the ethical and moral aspects. Considering the nature of his work we suppose he could hardly do otherwise. We think, however, that there is room for a work on this subject of a more thorough-going and scientific type; done by a competent man it would be a valuable contribution to the vexed question of the precise relationship between literature and life. Such a work would sweep with a very wide net, and would include many novels in which the moral was by no means obvious. Meanwhile we commend Mr. Balmforth's volume to those who like that hybrid production which is neither a sermon nor an essay, but a little of both.

Bohemia in London. By ARTHUR RANSOME. (Stephen Swift and Co. 2s. net.)

THIS re-issue of Mr. Ransome's exhilarating book is welcome, for few other volumes paint so well the joys and sorrows, the hopes and despairs of the young artist who comes to conquer London. Only those who have been "through the mill" can truly understand the subject; to them the description of the arrival, the bare rooms furnished chiefly with unlimited faith and hope, the studio-life, the gay parties in Soho—still to be found by those who know where to seek—will make an irresistible appeal. The illustrations to this edition are by Fred Taylor, and add much to the pleasure of re-reading.

Browning's Teaching on Faith, Life and Love. By W. ARTHUR HIND. (George Allen and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

this little volume of essays to imagine, that the poet ever deliberately set out to preach a sermon, or even to point a moral. What he aimed at, what he was supremely skilled in achieving, was the unravelling of the tangled skein of men's hopes, fears, beliefs, and doubts. Ever and anon, it may be, there gleams from some subtle analysis of motives and emotions the suggestion that "all's well with the world," but the poet is stronger than the preacher, and, many as be his parables, there is never a sermon on the mount.

Mr. Hind, in his zealous propagation of that which he holds for truth, is apt to overrun his master. In his rendering of the story of Andrea del Sarto we lose the infinite pathos of a life ruined for despised love: "There's still Lucrezia—as I choose." Mr. Hind takes it for granted that Gigadibs' reading of the "latest chapter of St. John" was conclusive. Was it? And is not the final message of the Epistle of Karshish, "It is strange"? Indeed, the "strangeness" of it all is the predominant note in Browning's religious studies. "How very hard it is to be a Christian!" he sings, in the opening lines of "Easter Day," and the concluding words of that poem are the significant question, "Who can say?" The poet's mind was too vast and free to submit to the yoke of any dogmatism, Christian or otherwise, and one cannot but regret any attempt to call the wares of proselytism for sale beneath his sign. "Toleration above all things!" is his cry: "Mercy every way is infinite—and who can say?"

Take another of those examples upon which Mr. Hind bases his argument, "A Death in the Desert." The poem is very far from being the triumphant vindication of Christian faith which Mr. Hind sees in it. It insists rather upon the difficulties and inconsistencies of that faith—yea, through the very mouth of the last and best loved of the disciples. Cerinthus the heretic stands out in high and suggestive relief, and the caustic comment that, if anybody is "lost," it is Cerinthus is not that of the poet. Such was the way of him whose study was the heart and mind of man. To "cling to faith beyond the forms of faith," in the words of that other seeker after truth, availed not to blind his vision to the possibility of philosophic doubt. Therefore, from the point of view of orthodoxy, we doubt if Mr. Hind's fervour is wisely applied.

St. Lô. By DOROTHY M. STUART. (Holden and Hardingham. 6s.)

IT is good to read such a romance as this, for too often a story of mediæval times is wearisome by reason of vain attempts at atmosphere and long descriptive passages that thwart the reader. For, except in definite historical studies, the charm of olden time is best conveyed by the expression of character through action, and that action should be swift from beginning to end.

Here in "St. Lô" we have it, the swiftly moving story of a brave man and the just reward of his deeds. We are interested in the unmarquised marquis of old France before the first chapter is left behind, and long before half the pages are turned we are as deeply in love with him as was Elizabeth de la Vère. This probably is because the author has not paused to describe the man or his attributes, but has visualised him through his actions, and in terse, strong style made him alive and real. It is a book to be read at a sitting, for the interest does not flag for one page. Perhaps at one time we chafed at being kept in the dark—as in the case of Namur's lying letter—as to the reason for an act or the identity of an actor, but for the most part we were content to read on, and regretful when the last page ended a journey into the land of true romance. Miss Stuart's book must rank as a fine piece of work; it is a clean, brave story, bravely told.

Until that Day. By HAROLD WINTLE. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

MR. WINTLE is an enthusiastic yachtsman, and also a novelist-politician. We like him best on the sea, where he is quite at home, and can make one feel the rush of a great racing-yacht, with sails drawing freely the wind broad on the beam, speeding quickly over dancing sunlit waves towards her winning mark.

The political part of the book, which is very earnest in tone, deals with the question of party government as practised in these latter days—its abuses and selfishness and utter disregard of the interest of the nation as an Imperial nation. With all this we cordially agree. The degradation of politics to party uses is recognised by all thinking persons, and there are many who will agree with every word the author says; but the suggested remedy—viz., to restore the divine right of kings and make the monarch of these realms an absolute one—is out of the question. In the first place, no monarch, or even a President of the United States, craving for absolute power could or would go so far. His ambition would o'erleap itself.

The new movement in favour of an absolute monarchy is well described, and eloquent speeches are made by its adherents. The King himself is forcibly dealt with, but to no ultimate good purpose; but all this is part of the story, and we must leave our readers to study the cause and effect which form the two halves of the book itself.

Some of the characters we have met before in earlier books of the same author, and there is an undercurrent life history of one of them which prevents the reader from being for a moment bored by the political issue if politics are not to his fancy.

hypnotism, the position of women especially with reference to marriage, and the conventions attaching thereto, and religion generally. One or two of the men think they have godlike characters; but, if society were reconstituted on the basis suggested by the author, there would be but few children brought into the world, and these would not have a father to call their own. The ultimate result is easy to foresee. The sex problem is dealt with in quite a nauseating and brutal way, all in favour of women. The author's experience, if his ideas are founded on experience, are of a very unhappy nature; if not founded on experience, they are problematical and consequently worthless. In any case, he had much better have kept his opinions out of print. His medical knowledge is childish to a degree.

One protest we must make on behalf of general readers and parents and guardians who are responsible for the education of the rising generation—that is, books like the one under review should be labelled, and should not be thrown on the general book market under an innocent title which gives no idea of their special contents. Freedom of thought is one thing, its expression without any warning to an audience not desirous of hearing is another, and we are surprised that such a book should be placed on the market.

John. By STRAHAN RICHARDS. (Andrew Melrose and Co. 6s.)

WE make acquaintance with John at the point where he is tempted by a lady of greater charm than virtue from allegiance to his betrothed, and, despairing at his own weakness and conduct unfitting to a clerk in holy orders, he commits suicide. We follow him through some two or three hundred years of adventure as a disembodied spirit, and, half-way through the book, meet him in the flesh once more—he is reincarnated into the same family, set to withstand the identical temptation of old time—again as a clerk in holy orders. He is finally left chastened in spirit to await reunion with his true lady love, who has been reincarnated with him only to fade away into another life, rather than to die, in the manner of a very romantic and very consumptive damsel of early Victorian romance—although we are not definitely informed of the nature of this lady's disease. The book is a tangle of religion, superstition, theosophy, and Christianity, and since Mr. Strahan Richards attempts to reconcile orthodox Christianity with the doctrine of reincarnation, we are not deeply impressed by his conclusions—nor, as a matter of fact, by his book.

Shorter Notices

THE Napoleonic era has been productive of whole libraries of books, but we remember few dealing with the French and American prisoners on Dartmoor, and telling how they fared at the hands of their captors. In "THE LOVERS" (Ward, Lock, and Co., 6s.) Mr. Phillpotts has given us a realistic work on this subject, and, of course, he is at home on Dartmoor; still, there is something alien about this book. From some mysterious cause it is not the Eden Phillpotts of "Sons of the Morning" and other earlier works; it is as if an acknowledged master of his craft had grown somewhat careless, though there are passages, notably those which tell of the death of Richard Bolt, containing as fine work as any that this writer has accomplished. Again, that grim chapter which tells of executions on the Hill of Heavitree is sufficiently realistic to satisfy the most exacting. We own to a sincere affection for the young Godolphin and his love, as well as for his father; we feel that the author has tangled a number of threads to a certain extent, and then laid them out neatly and in order—and that is all. For the story lacks that fine quality of inevitableness which characterises such works of this writer as are built up on character alone, rather than character combined with period and historic effect. To put it briefly, we do not quite know this Eden Phillpotts, nor take to him quite so kindly as we did to that one who tells us stories of the Dartmoor of to-day.

Seymour King, actor, bore a striking resemblance to the King of Mysonia, which is yet another of those imaginary little Balkan States. At the last limit of an empty pocket, Seymour finds an opportunity of personating the other king and breaking up a certain gang of anarchists who had bombs in their possession which were to have terminated the life of Mysonia's monarch. Result—much glory for Seymour. That is practically all the story in "TWO KINGS," by Cosmo Hamilton (Chatto and Windus, 2s. net), but there are eight more sketches, in nearly all of which this business of the double is dragged in, and in practically every case the double succeeds in bringing off his scheme and securing affluence or whatever else he may happen to desire. This is all very well for one story, or even for two stories, but we must confess that it grows rather monotonous after a time. For the rest, the stories are written in entertaining magazine style, and are somewhat interesting—they do not bite very deeply, nor leave much impression on the reader's mind: in fact, they read rather like pot-boilers, collected and republished—which, in all probability, they are.

"THE MODERN MARKET PLACE," by "Coronet" (John Long, 6s.), might be acceptable as a novel for a wet day, but that could be the only excuse for reading such a book. Beautiful society ladies—a defaulting smooth-haired bank-clerk who becomes Prime Minister—plenty of whisky-and-soda, and cigarettes which are always lit by matches out of gold match-boxes, make up the story, together with caricatures of well-known men in not very good taste, and a beautiful Russian spy—they are all beautiful, these Russian lady spies. The total is supposed—but only supposed—to be a true account of the manners and customs of the highest English society of to-day. Let us hope for fine weather, and have no excuse for reading light literature of this sort.

Most books written about Ceylon are interesting, and in "THE PEARL OF THE EAST," by M. T. Hainselin (Greening and Co., 6s.), there is much fresh and forcible description of that pleasant country. The ancient history of the Island, the Kandian war of 1803-1815, etc., are well known to few people. This tale is founded on an old legend, and also on the theme of the transmigration of souls. The principal characters are skilfully and consistently portrayed. The heroine, nicknamed by the natives the Pearl of the East, is supposed by them to be the incarnate spirit of a beloved princess of Kandy who died with and for her lover a hundred years ago. It is somewhat incongruous, however, to suppose that a forest and jungle had entirely overgrown the ancient cities of Kandy in a hundred years, while the royal city of Sigri was found in the centre of the jungle, clear and clean, with its temples and other buildings in good condition, and containing the original Pearl of the East among other treasures. A somewhat problematical character is that of the Buddhist priest Goonetilleke, who is not only a clairvoyant—and incidentally a graduate of Oxford—but has the power of rendering himself invisible. On one occasion, a leopard, on the point of attacking the priest, passed clean through his body, an experience calculated to upset the nerves of any self-respecting feline.

"THE RACE OF CIRCUMSTANCE," by H. R. Campbell (Stephen Swift and Co., 6s.), is founded on the will of an American millionaire, who wishes to ruin the son of a lady who refused to marry him years before, and espoused his brother instead. John Manxe, a young man of fair ability as a lawyer, and a general favourite in a small provincial American township, has his life and character ruined by the temptations of the huge fortune he unexpectedly inherits from the uncle who had always done his utmost to harm him. He also derived from his father and his uncle the dreadful vice of drink, which he became incapable of checking after the inheritance of his uncle's great wealth. Mrs. Manxe, his mother, is passionately fond of him, and devotes her whole life to the attempt to check, if not to cure, this terrible curse. Her prayer is answered, partly by his own mad act and subsequent repentance, and partly by the benign influence of his playmate and life-long friend, Anne Denny. The story is interesting, although somewhat morbid in parts.

"Sandy and His Eliza" on Tour

IN a new play by Mr. H. V. Esmond, who has done so much interesting work, produced at Folkestone, both Miss Eva Moore and he are fitted with parts which keep them pretty constantly on the stage, and they play their by no means easy characters after a fashion which gets every ounce of fun out of them.

The author of a very successful play, the interesting development of which was founded on a very, very complicated will, told me, when I complained of this, that he was sure the public would accept anything, provided it was merely an initial circumstance—and led on to a powerful entertainment. Mr. Esmond, I apprehend, agrees with the writer of "The New Sin," for his premisses are a little difficult to swallow, but the fun he evolves is very real.

The Hon. Sandy Verrall is a young man about town—with all Mr. Esmond's liveliness and charm—who once had his life saved by a Salvation Army captain, Van Dam. The captain dies, and leaves his daugther for Verrall to "cherish." The hero engages an excellent old nurse, arranges a nursery in his flat, and awaits a blue-eyed, golden-haired little girl who will fill his home with sunshine and delight the actress, Vera Laurence—cleverly played by the beautiful Miss Diana Cortis—who is about to marry him.

Of course, the lady who appears is something quite other from his idea of an agreeable ward. She is really Miss Eva Moore, Eliza Van Dam, made up to look so extremely disagreeable that she was quite unrecognisable. But beneath this unfortunate appearance she has a heart of gold and all that sort of thing. She takes a fancy to Sandy, succeeds, of course, in usurping the place of Miss Laurence in his easy affections, and all ends well. As the play progresses, through many ingenious windings, she sometimes appears altogether beautiful and engaging, or over-dressed and ridiculous, or as one first saw her—the awkward, middle-class, badly dressed woman. These changes are a little difficult, both for the audience and the play. While Miss Moore is transforming herself "off," something has to be done, and thus there are pauses and rather dull passages which rob the new farcical comedy of the gaiety and élan so necessary to this kind of play. No doubt, however, if we in town are to see "Sandy and His Eliza"—renamed in the course of the action Dorothy, to match with her pretty frocks—the slowness will be taken out of the dialogue and the three acts played much more quickly. As it stands, it is difficult to take any interest in the minor characters, but they will improve their pace, I feel sure, and then "Sandy and His Eliza" may have a fortunate future.

"The Dancing Mistress" at the Adelphi

MR. GEORGE EDWARDES has recently been telling the world of changed stage ideals, and has hinted pretty broadly that he often anticipates or leads the London taste in those matters that concern musical comedy. He has certainly done many surprising things during the last twenty-five years, but for the moment, with "The Dancing Mistress," he does not produce an epoch-making change. In fact, the new musical play repeats the victories of many an old one, especially, perhaps, "The Quaker Girl." But that it will be none the less successful on that account there is not the slightest doubt. Notwithstanding Mr. Edwardes' truism that musical comedy is not what it used to be a quarter of a century ago, the latest production is at least uncommonly like a good many we have had during the last five years, with the exception of "The Girl in the Taxi." Mr. Launa, Mr. Ross, Mr. Greenbank, Mr. Lionel Monckton, and Mr. Malone do not desire to do anything other than follow the old roads of good fortune. Beautiful backgrounds, a gorgeous chorus, and a cast which is a constellation of stars will do the rest. The play begins with the delightful girls' school, near Brighton, where Miss Gertie Millar, a veritable mistress of the art, teaches dancing, and the amusing Mlle. Caumont gives lessons in French. After many gay airs, much more or less lively dialogue, and a little musical-comedy sadness over Miss Gertie Millar's dismissal from the school on account of the amusing "Porcupine Patrol," everybody arrives at the second act and the winter sports of Oberwald. But the well-versed reader does not care to learn just what happens. He is sure to see "The Dancing Mistress" for himself, and will find it as he wishes, an improved echo of a dozen such plays that have gone before, or an entirely new and delightful comedy, with the cleverest possible music, by Mr. Monckton, and all sorts of gay humours on the part of Miss Gracie Leigh, Mr. Joseph Coyne, Miss Elsie Spain, and other gifted people who do all that is needed in these splendid, if somewhat reminiscent productions. In some points the management has certainly outdistanced even its own records—the ladies are even more beautiful and the dresses a degree more ravissant than usual.

"The Good Hope" at the King's Hall

THERE was some very fine acting and some excellent scenes in Herr Herman Heijermans' play, "The Good Hope," produced on Sunday evening by the Pioneer Players, but it is doubtful whether the theme of the story is likely to appeal very greatly to English audiences at the present day. We do not know the exact method of procedure in Holland, but in this country insurance companies are now too astute to insure unseaworthy ships of unscrupulous shipowners, and merchants are not bent upon sending their employees to their doom in a "floating coffin" such as "The Good Hope." Three of the acts take place in Kniertje's cottage in a Dutch fishing village; Geert, Kniertje's elder son, has been imprisoned for insubordination in the navy, and returns to his mother's house in time to be taken as one of the crew of "The Good Hope." Barend, the second son, is an arrant coward, and requires two members of the police force to take him on board. The ship is wrecked, and in the last act at the shipowner's office wild scenes take place, as one after another the womenfolk come and learn the fate of the men.

As we have said, the play cannot make a universal appeal, but praise must be accorded to several of the scenes. It is sometimes asked, wherein lies the charm of some of the younger actresses? And the question might with equal reason be asked of the great favourite of the stage, Ellen Terry. As Kniertje she was excellent; always the respectful fishwife, she presented a great contrast to Geert, the soured Socialist, and Barend, the miserable ne'er-do-well. Her reception of the news at the shipowner's office is a very fine piece of acting. Miss Edith Craig as Saart, a lively widow, Miss Ellen O'Malley as Jo, Geert's sweetheart, Mr. E. Harcourt Williams as Barend, and Mr. Stanley Turnbull all do the best possible with their parts. We must, however, make two small complaints. We wish that less prompting was necessary, and why should there be such a long wait between each act when there is comparatively no change made in the scene?

Aspects of Ireland: The Old Irish Faith*

EVEN as new philosophies usually contrive to adjust themselves into creed and practice, so old faiths fell on either hand into cosmogony and ritual. And the ritual will often perpetuate itself through the years when the cosmogony has either passed away or been so kneaded into the substance of other things that it is not easy to believe that it was once a living and healthy faith. There can be few who have travelled through the western parts of Ireland without feeling continually that the remnants of an ancient thing spin through the whole of the social life like a web, holding it together often, like a pattern picked out on an older woof. Only a short while ago, for instance, in a remote end of the County Mayo, we noticed a deserted cottage of a strange appearance. It is no very strange thing to see a deserted cottage in Ireland, to be sure. When a cottage falls badly into disrepair, it is often as easy to build a new one as revise the old. But this cottage was not in disrepair: neither it nor its outbuildings looked as if it had been abandoned because the winds and the rains proved untimely bedfellows. Moreover, it stood alone, away from the cluster that formed the village, on a green headland. Inquiries showed that the headland was a fairy site; and, as we were told, "It was a widow woman, and she's a wiser woman at the present time, I think. She was advised, but she had a wilful way with her, and the first night her cow was took ill, the next night her horse died on her, then she fell lame, and, what with one trouble on another, she left the place she built, and she'll tell you so much herself if you'd like to step down to her." It was not necessary. There stood a good tenable cottage in proof of something more than the ordinary.

Yet this was only a more dramatic instance of something that is always occurring in the life of the people. The detailed memory of all that it once meant has perished, but its significances are quick and supple in their consciousness. Beltane and Samhain rites are still observed in many places, not, as in England, as mere festive occasions, but with all realisation of their religious and magical significance. Fairies are still seen and recognised, not, as in the Highlands of Scotland, in fear and a malign dread, but with a frank perception of their power, and even with respect and affection in certain cases. Yet the knowledge of who they are and what they are supposed to be has so far passed away that it is a frequent thing to hear certain knolls spoken of as Danish forts when it is fairly obvious that they are the "side," or raths, of the Dé Dananns. How truly alive the ritual of the faith is, and the vision that gave rise to the faith is abundantly shown in the numerous instances, personally procured, that Dr. Evans Wentz gives in his book. It is not very well arranged; and there is an unfortunate feeling sometimes that his zeal has run before his discretion: yet some such collection was called for; and no one who has come into any manner of touch with the instincts and emotions of a very purely lived people but will find his experiences reduplicated in many of the instances that Dr. Wentz gives. The fairy-faith is not a fantasticality; it is not a decoration; it is a living thing grounded on experience. The word "fairy," in its present meaning in England, is unfortunate. What is meant is certain hierarchies of Earth-presences, widely different in appearance, but seemingly similar in way of life, towards whose indisputable being many of the foremost minds of to-day are coming by different roads.

Who, and what, then, are these "Earth-presences"? It is truly a far wider question than appears in its more particular reference to Ireland. It is a significant thing that the Greeks had visions of such presences very closely similar to that which to this hour weaves its way through the earth-consciousness in, chiefly, the West and South of Ireland. That is a larger matter, and one for the poet to express. But in Ireland it has behind it a cosmogony that is more or less well defined. Professor Rhys, in his "Celtic Folk-Lore," has already dealt with it from one aspect; and Dr. MacCulloch approaches it from another point of view in the attempt to give the whole field a unity. Unfortunately the value of his book is a little apt to be lost in his display of learning for its own sake, and the omission of some differences that lie at the base of his whole inquiry. For example, from one way of regarding the question, these presences seem to be of two different orders: there are the fairies properly so called, water-spirits, tree-spirits, leprechauns, bocanachs, and so on, and there are the Tuatha Dé Danann. The former seem to be small and slight of build, whereas the latter are tall, white, and exceedingly beautiful. Then, again, there are those who appear to be identified with the spirits of the dead; and there are those who have an existence independent of men. Dr. MacCulloch faithfully covers the whole field with indefatigable patience, but he scarcely distinguishes between these clearly enough. Indeed, once or twice he speaks of them as though they were the same thing.

With regard to the Tuatha Dé Danann, for example, whenever these are referred to, either in the old Irish literature or on the lips of a modern seer, it is always clear that they are something quite different from the ordinary fairies—bigger, more powerful, and something more akin to gods. Yet on the borders of history and legend the Dé Dananns are one of the peoples who conquered and inhabited Ireland. It is arresting to read one of the seers whom Dr. Wentz quotes, who tells of an order of beings, tall, fair, and beautiful, and then to read the annalists, who tell that the Dé Dananns, a tall, fair race, came and conquered Ireland, vanquishing the Firbolgs, a short, dark race. It is more than curious to remember that both the Firbolgs and the Dé Dananns seem to have come originally from Greece. Did they bring with them the vision of earth-spirits? How came it that they themselves passed into a separate order of spirits that haunt the soil of the fairies? Did each race that possessed the land so cling to it after defeat that they became for their successors the spirits inhabiting the earth, together with those that had their natural life with the life of lake, stream, and tree? It is such questions that one is for ever asking, and that Dr. MacCulloch does not always attempt to answer. Moreover, there were the Druids, from whom, originally, it would seem, came the undoubted powers that modern witch-doctors and rann speakers wield. What order of powers was it they called on?

Yet, although such questions do not have an answer, it is remarkable to read these two books, and to note the way they fit into one another. Dr. MacCulloch does not order the cosmogony of the ancient Celtic religion as it held its rule in Ireland, chiefly, as it seems to us, because he has too much encumbered his pages with incidental references; but since he covers the whole field with indisputable learning, he makes it clear that there was some fairly well-ordered faith. Then, as one reads the instances that Dr. Wentz has gathered together in his book, of shrewd, keen men who have seen visions with waking eyes, and known experiences such as one may easily match in the country for oneself, it is plain to see the old faith in its modern reflection. Or, as possibly it should be put, it is possible to see the same experiences repeating themselves that were the cause of the old faith. One remembers that only recently the German philosopher, Fechner, was enunciating the life and sentience of the Earth; and one sees a people to whom the Earth not only demonstrates its life in beings and presences now, but to whom the Earth has always done so since the earliest trace we have of their instinct of faith and their order of religious rite.

The Menagerie of Travel

By F. G. AFLALO.

CARTOGRAPHERS of the Middle Ages employed a picturesque device for at once appealing to the popular imagination and hiding their own imperfections. Whenever they came to a vast tract of Africa, or any of the other less explored continents, they scorned to leave it as blank as their ignorance demanded of strict regard for the truth, but decorated it with a thumbnail sketch of some more or less appropriate animal vaguely supposed to be characteristic of the region. There is, for instance, the famous sixteenth century map of Africa by Diego Ribero, in which mammoth elephants and gigantic birds abound even in the Nile delta as reminder of the elephants that haunted the beaches of Morocco at the time of Hanno, as well as of the roc made famous by Sinbad the Sailor.

Yet, making some due allowance for the march of civilisation and resulting retreat of wild life to the inner sanctuaries of the virgin wilderness, it is a constant surprise to modern travellers, even off the beaten tourist track, that they should see so few animals. Truly there is more in these scenes of our travels than meets the eye. I have waited, hidden in a Russian forest a hundred miles from civilisation, for a shot at daybreak, without seeing any creature more formidable than a hare in a tract known to harbour bear, lynx, wolf, and other big game. I have camped in the Rocky Mountains, with never a glimpse of bear or puma; in Java, without a sign of tiger or rhinoceros; in the Caucasus, amid such lifeless stillness that all the wild game might have been exterminated by Demidoff, Littledale, and other famous hunters of that majestic range. That the animals of travel are so few and far between is due to the exceeding wisdom of the animals themselves, which, even more consistently since the advent of firearms than when the wise Brahmin conversed with Alexander the Great, keep as far from the lord of creation as possible.

This seeming absence of wild life from Nature's "backblocks" is, so far as tourist experiences go, in great measure due to the nocturnal habits of the greater carnivora, and even of some horned game, which thus play "Box and Cox" with the average traveller and wholly escape observation. Though he may wander for long hours of daylight in the bush, without the faintest indication of these timid neighbours, which, scenting him from afar, dash helter-skelter out of reach, he will often be awakened after the camp fire has died down to its last embers by the crack of a twig, as some curious deer or prowling bear comes nosing gingerly towards his tent, when he has but to turn in his sleep to send the intruder hot-foot back to safety. Hearing an unknown animal in the darkness, however, is very different evidence from seeing it in daylight, and it is more particularly the latter experience which—save in the case of those who deliberately beat the jungle for sport, or, as it appears, of favoured passengers by the Uganda Railway, who seem to be carried through a kind of unenclosed zoological garden—is so curiously rare. Even the silent angler, creeping along the banks of remote rivers that sing their happy way through the forest primeval, is not, as I can testify from almost barren memories in five Continents, vouchsafed a much closer intimacy with these shy freeholders of the jungle than those who travel in company and without any regard for studying to be quiet.

Here and there, it is true, an entry in old diaries tells another tale, but the occasions of these sudden encounters are so few and far between as to come at memory's bidding without even turning up the records. There was a cow moose which, with her two little calves, trotted down to the opposite bank of a Canadian salmon river one gorgeous July evening, and which, getting wind of me fully five minutes after I had first espied the family party, went crashing away through the timber, leaving her young ones to follow as best they could, a hint which they eventually took after floundering a few moments in the snow-fed water of the Miramichi. There was a rattlesnake, on which, as it lay coiled full in a sunny path close to the beach of a little island on which I lived awhile, in Florida, I came with such startling suddenness as to leave no choice but to clap over the deadly reptile a large butterfly net, with which I was, in fact, on the warpath. That done, the net had to be sacrificed to the occasion, since there was nothing for it but to break off the handle and with it batter the snake into something quite unlike its living self and effectually cleansed of its original sin. Thus died the serpent in my Eden, and I mused on the subject of such creatures. Il y a des héros en mal comme en bien, says La Rochefoucauld, and venomous snakes, like tigers, may serve some beneficent purpose in the great scheme of which we all are part; but I felt, even as the net descended over its yellow head, that the purpose of that particular individual was not to hurry me to a resort which, without irreverence, I purpose visiting more in my own good time.

As distinguished from such stationary types of wild life as are peculiarly associated with their own environment—the stag standing proudly on the skyline, the alligator basking grimly in the mud, the jewelled humming-bird and velvet butterfly flashing across sunlit tracks in the jungle, or the lammergeier poised between heaven and earth amid the mountains—there are those animals which, themselves travellers, are even less likely than the rest to be seen by the tourist, though residents in the country are familiar with the wonderful migrations of the Norwegian lemming or Newfoundland caribou.

On the other hand, though the creatures of the wilderness may obey the wise instinct which prompts them to give the human race a wide berth, there is, for those who travel in many latitudes far from the convenience of the railroad, a menagerie even in the beasts of burden enlisted in their wanderings. The different types of horse, from sturdy mountain ponies of the Yosemite to majestic stallions of the desert; the brutish camels, infinitely enduring and undeniably stupid; the obstinate mules and more amenable asses; not to mention elephants, yaks, reindeer and sledge-dogs. These

"House Animals," as our German neighbours not inaptly call them, are part of the abiding interest of the wander-years to which, emancipated from the Sturm und Drang of restless youth, greybeards look wonderingly back with further admiration for their immature selves, that were never happy unless for ever on the move.

Some New French Books

IT is perhaps the result of the Entente Cordiale, but, in any case, England has been the point de mire of innumerable French writers, be they novelists, psychologists, or even physiologists. They all seem to have awakened to the fact that their English neighbours may not be so irremediably opposed to their own sensibility as was currently admitted. And it is curious to note that it is quite a new side of English life and character which specially attracts their attention. Happily French authors of to-day do not seem to be uniquely preoccupied by the English hearth and home life as was Pierre de Coulevain in the insipid "Ile Inconnue," nor by the dissection of the influence of love and the passions on the English psychology, which seemed to fascinate "Femina" to such a degree that she wrote "L'Ame des Anglais," which contains perhaps a description of the authoress's ego, but surely not of the soul of the English people.

The young authors of to-day strive rather to probe the innermost recesses of the English heart, and to sound and comprehend if possible the pulsations of the various important movements of the last few years. None of them has succeeded so well in this as M. J. Raymond Guasco, who has just published a book of English sketches to which he has given the title of "John Bull's Island." M. Guasco's book possesses the great merit of not pretending to initiate his readers to English life en bloc; he wishes simply to tell them what he has been able to see of England and the deductions he draws from his impressions. He says himself:—"Ce livre n'a pas de prétention d'apporter la définition exacte de l'âme anglaise, pour la bonne raison qu'elle n'existe pas. Je ne connais pas cette entité mystérieuse. Je connais tout simplement un millier d'Anglais de classes et d'éducation différentes et c'est l'impression qu'ils m'ont produite que j'ai essayé de fixer."

But one must not think that these notes are merely amusing superficialities. Quite the contrary; this M. Guasco himself explains:—"Ce livre, sous une apparence d'étude superficielle est, si vous le voulez bien, un ensemble de documents exacts et précis se rapportant à l'Angleterre et aux Anglais. Les littérateurs à tendance philosophique ne pourront pas me blâmer si je leur confie qu'il a été composé après une sérieuse méditation des ouvrages de Berkeley. C'est en effet de l'auteur des 'Principes de la Connaissance Humaine' que je me réclame. . . ."

M. Guasco is both bright and concise; moreover, he possesses a quality which will greatly endear him to his English readers: humour, and what is better still, English humour. He is also a keen ironist, very personal, very modern, very sportive, and all these qualities make his book the most delightful reading possible.

The sketch entitled "Travailleurs Britanniques" is a vivid description of modern English workmen, acutely observed, replete with humour, and presenting in a simple form a part of the labour problem, to the comprehension of French readers. In the chapter called "La Présence Invisible," M. Guasco has, under an appearance of imperturbable seriousness, made fun of some of the traits of English mentality, and his courteous mockery is in truth subtle criticism.

One of his most amusing notes is on the subject of "Music Halls," and is really a delightfully funny "skit" on English shows. He has noted the reply one of his friends made when he expressed his astonishment at the hilarity provoked by the "gagger," the coster, and the clog dancer:—"Vous autres Latins vous avez le goût perverti. Il vous faut des choses sales pour rire. Nous autres Anglais, nous sommes restés enfants, nous rions comme des garçons de treize ans, et si jamais sur cette scène un chanteur se permettait quelque chose de risqué, le silence réprobateur vous étonnerait."

M. Guasco's book will certainly rank, for French people, as containing some excellent sketches of England at the beginning of the twentieth century, and as seen from an impartially sympathetic and humoristic point of view.

When a new book by Rachilde is announced it always causes quite a perturbation amongst her admirers or detractors. Rachilde's romances have hitherto been quite violent, very sensual, perfectly immoral; and it is a real surprise that the author of such excessive works as "Les Hors Nature," "Monsieur Vénus," and "L'Heure Sexuelle" should suddenly present us with a delicate, pure study of a young girl's soul. As Madame Rachilde's chief desire is to be original, it is not impossible that having discovered that passion is a string not to be too much harped upon, she decided that it would be a great deal more original to assume the demure, forget-me-not style. Her analysis of the awakening of a young girl's heart is certainly worthy of the best authors. But Miane, her heroine, strangely resembles Colette Willy's enigmatical Claudine. And it would not be surprising if she grew into as unrestful and curious a young woman as the famous Claudine, whose short frocks and Eton collars are of world-wide renown. But for the present Miane is a demure little person just beginning to be conscious of the charm of her femininity, and in whom the instincts of imperious nature have not yet awakened—happily for her and Madame Rachilde's reassured readers.

It is curious that two such concise, sober, and even severe writers as Jean and Jérôme Tharaud should have undertaken to describe Algeria. For neither their style nor their way of thinking seemed to fit them for such a task.

The theory expressed in "J a Fête Arabe," is not to be blindly accepted as absolutely exact. The brothers Tharaud assert that in Algeria the French element is gradually being overwhelmed and eliminated by the Italian and Spanish emigrants. This is surely subject for discussion. But apart from this it is wonderful that such classical writers have better than anybody been able to describe that glowing country by adapting their qualities of soberness, preciseness, and exactitude towards avoiding any false side-lights, or exaggeration of colours and effects which would diminish the harmony and beauty of the ensemble.

They have simply described two journeys they took in Algeria. The first was twenty years ago, when the colony was wholly under French influence and before the civilisation they found in their second journey had introduced such solecisms as electricity, modern comforts, railroads, and motor-cars.

MM. Tharaud contrast the impressions they gathered during their two stays in Algeria, and make certain deductions which we are not competent to appreciate. But their novel—if one may so call it—is remarkable by its sobriety, by the masterly manner in which the different personages are depicted, and especially by the impression of finesse which emanates from the whole work.

Some Christmas Books

THE great enterprise of our Colonies in opening their attractive departments in London must have secured a very large number of the boys and young men who, while they have British blood in their veins, will ever seek fresh fields where they believe there will be a greater scope for their energy than in the mother country. And as if these enticements were not enough, there are consistently issued, year by year, beautifully produced books further to entice our boys across one or other of the oceans which separate this island from her dominions. Sir Harry Johnston in "Pioneers in India" and "Pioneers in Australia" (Blackie and Son, 6s.) gives graphic accounts of daring deeds and hairbreadth escapes of those who helped to make these countries habitable by Europeans. Many of these adventures are claimed to be real. and there is no reason to suppose that the author, with his wide experience, had any need to draw upon fiction in order to fill the pages of the books. Both volumes are well illustrated in colour. The times of Queen Bess are responsible for "Two Gallant Sons of Devon," by Harry Collingwood (Blackie and Son, 5s.). The encounters of these two brave lads with the Spaniards make very exciting reading, and will appeal to all boys, whether they come from the county which has provided so many brave warriors or from others farther afield. Two new editions of stories by popular writers are "Foes of the Red Cockade," a story of the French Revolution, by Captain F. S. Brereton, and "At Agincourt," a tale of the White Hoods of Paris, by G. A. Henty (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d. each). Mr. Herbert Strang, in "The Air Patrol" (Henry Frowde and Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), writes a history of a time when an empire of the East shall attack India. How a handful of men held a pass is told in graphic style, while the whole story is brought quite up to date by the introduction of an aeroplane. Stories by Frank R. Stockton, Clive R. Fenn, Theodore Roosevelt, etc., have been collected by Mr. Alfred H. Miles, and appear "In the Lion's Mouth" (Stanley Paul and Co., 5s.). The S.P.C.K. are responsible for "By Pluck and Luck" (3s. 6d.), by Frederick Harrison, "The Fortunes of Harold Borlase" (2s. 6d.), a story of the days of Blake, by John Graeme, and "The Lost Exile" (2s.), a tale of Siberia, by Gertrude Hollis. Fleet-Surgeon Jeans does not go to warlike times for "John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N." (Blackie and Son, 6s.), but sketches a story in connection with the Atlantic Fleet in times of peace. The book is well illustrated by C. M. Padday, and is written in a lively and entertaining manner.

It is well known that girls always read their brothers' books, but that is no reason for supposing that they do not also read those published especially for them. In "The Unwilling Schoolgirl" (Henry Frowde and Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) Miss Marjory Royce has managed to catch the right kind of interest that will appeal to her girl readers. Ethne is a well-drawn little character, and her development from a spoilt and self-willed child into an affectionate and companionable girl is excellently portrayed, and proves that Miss Royce has what is necessary to make an interesting child-study, namely, a keen sympathy with children and their ways. "The Island of Rushes," by E. E. Cowper (S.P.C.K.), contains what is dearly loved by children—a mystery. The unravelling of this takes some 250 pages, and the book is cheap at the price of 2s. 6d. In compiling his books Mr. Miles has not overlooked his girl readers, and "Where Duty Calls" (Stanley Paul and Co., 5s.) is a good collection of incidents of courage and adventure from such well-known writers as Evelyn Everett-Green, Grace Stebbing, Ena Fitzgerald, etc. The stories are not all wild tales of daring perpetrated in moments of excitement, but deal equally with steadfast adherence to duty in homely and often humdrum circumstances—a courage much harder to maintain than that evoked by animated surroundings. The "Care of Uncle Charlie" (S.P.C.K., 2s.), by Florence Willmot, "Brandon Chase: a Tale of East Anglia" (S.P.C.K., 2s.), by William Webster, and "Her Adopted Son" (S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.), by C. M. Vincent, are stories suitable for either boys or girls, and form acceptable gift-books.

The studious child will doubtless appreciate two books issued by Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, entitled "Children's Stories from Tennyson," by Nora Chesson, and "Children's Stories from Longfellow," by Doris Ashley, 2s. 6d. net each. These books are illustrated, and will make a child familiar with the principal characters in the well-known poems to which they refer. A similar book is "The Song of Frithiof" (Henry Frowde and Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.), re-told in modern verse by G. C. Allen. As time goes on, more prominence seems to be given to stories and folk-lore of Norsemen and Russians. The present volume combines both amusement and instruction. There are several pages at the end, containing notes on the text in a similar manner to the school-days editions of Shakespeare and other standard works. "Stories of Old" (A. and C. Black, 2s. 6d.), by E. L. Hoskyn, consists of twelve short accounts of heroes, mythical or real, who have left their names in the history of various nations. To impress these upon the child's mind, the book is illustrated with maps of the countries referred to, and spread over the map is a figure of the person about whom the story is written. This cannot be said to add greatly to the beauty of the illustrations, and might possibly lead a child to suppose that a country was only noted as being the home of one great individual. Joan of Arc undoubtedly rendered a great service to the French, but it is questionable whether the Pied Piper of Hamelin, in the eyes of practical Germans, would be chosen as the most noteworthy figure that their country produced.

"Mac" (Henry Frowde and Hodder and Stoughton, 6s. net) is a saucy little Scotch pup which appears in all sorts of odd places and under all kinds of conditions. The drawings by Cecil Aldin are splendid, and show up well upon the light brown paper upon which they are produced. The text is in Scotch to match Mac. "White Ear and Peter," the life story of a fox (Macmillan and Co., 6s. net), is another book which will appeal to those who are fond of animals, while "Blackie's Children's Annual" (3s. 6d.), with its gay illustrations and varied stories, is calculated to please any child, whatever its particular taste may be.

"The Big Book of Fables," edited by Walter Jerrold (Blackie and Son, 7s. 6d. net), and illustrated by Charles Robinson, is a marvellous book for the price, and consists of a collection of fables taken from those usually associated with the names of Æsop, Jean de la Fontaine, and various other writers. Other fairy stories are "Trystie's Quest" (A. C. Fifield, 5s. net), by Greville Macdonald, illustrated by Arthur Hughes, and "The Magic World" (Macmillan and Co., 6s.), by E. Nesbit, illustrated by H. R. Millar and Spencer Pryse. These stories show vivid imagination, as does also "Timothy in Bushland" (Ward, Lock, and Co., 2s. 6d.), by Mary Grant Bruce. "The Brown Fairies and Other Stories" (A. C. Fifield), by Ethel M. Gate, can be purchased for the modest price of 1s. 6d.

"The Peek-a-Boos' Holiday" (Henry Frowde and Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), drawn by Chloë Preston and told by Tom Preston, is an attractive book for quite a small person. "Roundabout Ways" (Sidgwick and Jackson, 3s. 6d.), with verses by Ffrida Wolfe and pictures by P. A. Staynes, is an instructive book, and will convey many a geographical lesson by its dainty illustrations in blue and brown.

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

I REMEMBER the days when McKenna, Ellis Griffiths, and Lloyd George used to howl and hold up their hands in holy horror at the arbitrary way in which "Bills were driven through the House," as they alleged, under Arthur Balfour's gentle rule. If they were sitting now in opposition I wonder what they would have said had A. J. B. treated the House as Asquith did on Wednesday?

We were discussing the nominated Senate. To show the high pitch of slavish discipline to which the party have been brought, imagine the Radicals tamely sitting down and listening to arguments in favour of such a doctrine. Not a popular elected body, mind you, such as they say the House of Lords should be, but a Senate nominated by the Imperial Government, with ten of them to retire every two years until the whole forty at the end of eight years would be nominated by an Irish Prime Minister.

Lees Smith, a solid Liberal lawyer, who will one day adorn the Bench, felt this was almost "too thick," and said so. He thought that it was no real safeguard for the Protestant minority. He would prefer as a compromise that the nomination should remain with the British Government. Bonar Law pointed out that as long as Asquith was in power his amendment would not amount to much, because the Prime Minister was under the heel of Redmond and his nominations would really mean Redmond's nominations. William O'Brien had a third plan; he suggested that officials should ex-officio man the Senate—Lords Lieutenant, Chairmen of County Councils, Lord Mayors, and people of like kidney. Stephen Gwynn, a literary Celt, who looks like a Saxon with his fair peaked beard, said that if Mr. Redmond had the power of nomination he would see that the majority in the Senate were Unionists. This was a bold bid for the Ulstermen, but it did not come off. "No Unionist worthy of the name would consent to serve on such an assembly," said James Craig. Tim Healy out-bid Gwynn: "I would rather be governed by Orangemen in Ireland than archangels at Westminster," he said winningly.

Birrell hinted that he had another plan, and then it all came out. Asquith proposed proportional representation! Nomination was clearly not popular with anyone; very well then—let us have proportional representation. It had often been talked about as an academic proposition; why not try it on, as part of a still greater experiment?

Bonar Law demanded an adjournment so that the House "could consider itself." Asquith demurred with that cool brazen effrontery he always displays when in a tight place—he declared it was merely a matter of machinery. Sitting quite still and saying nothing, a complete deadlock seemed imminent. The proportional "representationers" were keen to discuss this new and delightful idea—what a grand opportunity for putting their views in practice! But it was found not to be practicable. Illingworth, the new Whip, had either not been told or had forgotten that an amendment ought to have been on the paper. O'Brien withdrew his amendment. There was nothing to discuss. The Opposition persisted and the Government had to give way.

"Nought could be done and nought could be said,
So my Lord Tomnoddy went home to bed.'

On Wednesday the sudden volte face of the Government was the principal topic. Why had the Government done it? When did they make up their minds? Were they riding for a fall? "You actually let us discuss an amendment for two hours in the short time we have at our disposal, when you knew it was absolutely wasting time," said Bonar Law indignantly; "you must have made up your minds on the spur of the moment." "Not necessarily," said Asquith; "I received a deputation in June on the subject had promised to give it careful consideration." "What comes then of the Solicitor-General's undertaking that he would give all the notice possible of any change the Government proposed to make in the Bill?" Asquith did not reply; he poohpoohed the storm. "The right hon. gentleman accuses me of fresh crimes every day; it will be necessary to compile a new Newgate Calendar of Parliamentary offences." The Opposition roared a fierce acquiescence, and Asquith lost his temper. Bonar Law had said that the proceedings of the previous day formed the best example they had yet had of the Rake's Progress. Asquith is singularly sensitive to gibes of this kind. Anything which affects his position as Leader of the House he at once takes up, and he referred to Bonar Law's "illustrious predecessor," Disraeli, who one fine afternoon in 1866 accepted without notice an amendment which transformed a restricted extension of the Franchise into household suffrage. Then the Ministerialists cheered until Austen swiftly reminded the House that the circumstances were very different then—Disraeli was in a minority. At 10.30 the guillotine fell as usual; this surprising amendment of the Government was agreed to without a division, and the clause was carried by eighty-nine.

A fairly full House for a Friday assembled at twelve o'clock to discuss the White Slave Traffic Bill. It had been so knocked about in Committee by the individualists that a great many earnest people thought it was no good, so everyone was petitioned and written to and urged to put back the Bill on the report stage to the same position it was in before it went upstairs. The two Peckhams, and Atherley-Jones, who cannot forget the Cass case which nearly wrecked a Government and made him Solicitor-General, were all in favour of freedom of the subject and against the risk of blackmail. However, the House was not in a mood to listen, and it was decided that an ordinary constable, even in plain clothes, and not a sergeant, can arrest on suspicion.

The next point was should offenders be flogged. Here the sentimentalists had a turn. Mr. Lynch, the pro-Boer, described how floggers cut fringes of skin on the men with one artistic drop of blood on each, and represented that that was what Mr. McKenna wanted to encourage. Mr. McKenna gasped out: "This is outrageous!" And so the debate swayed backwards and forwards. Mr. Leif. Jones asked if any member would take the cat in his own hands. "I would," said Mark Lockwood stoutly, at which the House laughed. Bob Cecil said he would vote against the amendment to flog for a first offence, but he thought a good deal of nonsense was talked about torture; all punishment was torture. The amendment was carried by four, which shows how strongly the House feels that it is necessary to put down this trade with a high hand. Flogging is conscientiously considered by many to be a retrograde step, and yet 136 were in favour of it and 132 were actually in favour of giving it for a first offence.

The House did not rise until 5.30.

The Government have three awkward inquiries on their hands at the present time—the Marconi contract, about which a Committee is sitting upstairs; the Crisp loan, which is a fertile field for questions; and now the question of Indian finance, in which the eminent firm of Samuel Montagu and Co. had large dealings. The chairman of the firm is in the House, and his brother is Under-Secretary of State for India. Robert Harcourt, the brother of the Colonial Secretary, who poses as a bit of a free lance, had some questions down; but, although he was in the House, he did not put them. People wondered whether he was a "Government bonnet," who, left to himself, had made the questions too searching and would thus encourage supplementary questions. At any rate, he disappeared on both occasions when they were called on. It will be remembered that the great Lord Aldenham and his brother both resigned their seats in the House of Commons because their firm sold some battleships to or for the Government. The law is very strict on this point, and the action of the Government on the matter is awaited with curiosity.

After questions, Colonel Hildred Carlile wanted to know why the Irish Parliament should consist of 164 members, and suggested that they should be reduced to 103. He firmly believed that the reason was because, when the two Houses were in joint session, the Lower Chamber could always defeat the Senate. Carson's bitter comment was, "They are now disavowing every safeguard to the Bill." A languid House assembled from the libraries and smoking-rooms, and defeated the amendment. Then came along Pretyman Newman, an Essex Irish Unionist, who parts his name and his hair in the middle, with an amendment on proportional representation. Bored to tears, the House melted, and found more interesting occupations elsewhere.

Pretyman Newman declared it was "so simple," and would protect the Protestant minority in the South of Ireland. Cecil Harmsworth, who is beginning to make neat little speeches, begged the Government to accept it, as the principle had been adopted in the Senate. Carson, with lawyer-like wariness, would have none of it. He challenged any Radical M.P. to describe it, and expressed his belief, amid laughter, that none of them knew any more about it than he did!

Alfred Mond felt hurt that the Government would not accept such a Radical proposal, but all to no purpose. The Government did not mind how illogical it was. Proportional representation was all very well as a theory, but they were not inclined to introduce such a novelty into their new model Constitution, and the amendment suffered the usual fate.

On Tuesday that "sea-green incorruptible," Philip Snowden, arose to move his amendment giving the local enfranchisement to women in Ireland. With his emaciated pathetic little face and gentle gesture he held the House for half an hour, pleading the cause of the women. Balfour always pays him the compliment of listening to him intently, and to-night supported him by voice and vote. "If this is really a bill for local government in Ireland, and not an imperium in imperio, surely you will allow the same franchise that obtains over here," Not a bit of it. Asquith gibed at Balfour's "dialectical dexterity"—at one time the Tories painted Home Rule as meaning a separate nation, and at others, when it suited their purpose, a twopenny-halfpenny vestry.

The voting in the division was very curious. Some Unionist anti-suffragists said, "I hate the women, but shall vote for them if there is a chance of killing Home Rule." Others said, "I loathe Home Rule, but I dread women government more. People who cannot control their tempers are not fit to take part in the government of a great Empire. I shall vote with the Coalition." Ramsay MacDonald made his usual speech. When he found that the Government were perfectly safe without him, he made a dramatic appeal to the Labour Bench, and vowed he would vote for the women. A number of Radicals and Liberals with mixed motives voted against the Government, but this was partly counterbalanced by the Unionists who voted in the other lobby, the result being a surprising defeat for the women. The amendment was lost by 173—a result received with cheers and laughter.

After this we turned on to the White Slave Traffic. Mr. Lamb wanted the Bill extended so that raids could be made on flats. Alfred Lyttelton made a splendid speech. The veteran cricketer hit to the boundary every time amid loud applause. "Nobody proposes to punish men for immorality. Why should the Government try to harass and hunt these unhappy women, who are the victims of society? They are carrying on their miserable calling as quietly and decently as possible." The amendment was withdrawn, and the House shut up at 1 a.m.

Notes and News

"The Experimentalists," the three-act comedy by Rathmell Wilson and Muriel Hutchinson, recently produced by the Drama Society, is published by John Ouseley, Ltd.

Messrs. Duckworth and Co. will shortly publish "The Sea and the Jungle," by Mr. H. M. Tomlinson, a volume which describes the author's impressions and experiences of an adventurous voyage up the Amazon and its tributary, the Madeira River.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are bringing out at once a new novel by Gaston Leroux, author of "The Mystery of the Yellow Room." The new book, which has been translated by Edgar Jepson, will be called "The Man with the Black Feather."

"The Insanity of Genius, and the General Inequality of Human Faculty Physiologically Considered," by J. F. Nisbet, sixth and new edition, with an introduction by Dr. Bernard Hollander, is to be published shortly by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co.

In his new novel, "Hocken and Hunken," which Messrs. Blackwood announce for immediate publication, "Q." returns to the field in which he first found fame as a humorist, and all who have pleasant memories of "Troy Town" should read it.

Mr. Andrew Melrose announces that Miss Mary Cholmondeley, Mr. Joseph Conrad, and Mr. W. J. Locke have agreed to act as adjudicators in his Fourth 250 Guineas "Prize Novel" Competition. All inquiries should be sent to the Literary Agency of London, 5, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Messrs. Hutchinson have almost ready "Parodies and Imitations, Old and New," edited by J. A. Stanley Adam and Bernard C. White, with a Foreword by Sir A. Quiller Couch. It is believed that this will be almost the only modern collection of poetical parodies of a really comprehensive character.

In connection with the jubilee of Gerhart Hauptmann, the celebrated German dramatist and poet, a series of matinées of his play "Lonely Lives" has been arranged by Miss Vera Tschaikowsky. The performances will be given at the Court Theatre on Friday, November 8, and on subsequent Tuesdays and Fridays.

On Sunday evening, November 10, at 7.45, the Play Actors' Society will, at the Court Theatre, open its eighth season with Ibsen's "Brand." A novelty this season will be performances on Monday afternoons, at 2.30, of the plays produced on the Sunday. To these matinées the general public will be admitted.

A loan from the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda, consisting of an interesting selection of 101 Indian drawings from the Baroda State Museum collection, will be exhibited in the Indian Section of the Victoria and Albert Museum, from Monday, November 4, for a period of three months. The collection comprises chiefly Rajput illuminated tempera paintings of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and has been arranged in Room 4 in the Lower Gallery.

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have accepted the dedication of the "Dictionary of English Church History," which has been in preparation for over two years under the editorship of Canon Ollard, of S. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and Mr. Gordon Crosse. The dictionary, which Messrs. Mowbray hope to issue on November 15, is intended both for the student and for the ordinary member of the English Church who desire to know the best ascertained facts in the history of the society to which he belongs.

Messrs. Nelson and Sons announce that they will publish, about the middle of November, in their Shilling Net Library, a work on the Balkans and the Balkan problem written by Miss M. Edith Durham, at present war correspondent of the Daily Chronicle at the front. She has travelled through every part of the Balkan States, and in "The Burden of the Balkans" she not only describes the theatre of war, but expounds the problems on which is based the whole Balkan question.

An Exhibition of Arts and Handicrafts is being held by The Englishwoman at the Maddox Street Galleries, 23a, Maddox Street, Regent Street, W., from November 6 to November 16, 1912, inclusive, 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., under the direct patronage of the Duchess of Marlborough, the Lady Frances Balfour, the Lady Betty Balfour, and many other well-known ladies. All the exhibits will be of a very high standard, and this should be a unique opportunity of seeing what women especially are doing in the region of applied art in 1912.

Mr. John Lane publishes this week "The Letter Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer Stanhope," by A. M. W. Stirling, author of "Coke of Norfolk," "Annals of a Yorkshire House," etc., in two volumes, at 32s. net. These papers, collected from the Cannon Hall Muniments between the years 1805-1873, owe their preservation to Lady Elizabeth Spencer Stanhope, daughter of the celebrated "Coke of Norfolk." They give a picture unrivalled in vividness of social and political life during nearly seventy years of the nineteenth century.

The Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester, having been recognised as the centre for advisory work in Forestry in Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, Monmouthshire, Herefordshire, and Worcestershire, Professor H. A. Pritchard, F.S.I., has been appointed Technical Adviser, and Mr. A. D. Hopkinson, B.Sc. (Aberdeen), Lecturer in Forestry and Forest Mycology. The vacancy caused by the promotion of Professor R .G. Stapledon, M.A., to the post of Research Botanist at University College, Aberystwyth, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. C. B. Saunders, B.Sc. (London), who has for some years been Lecturer in Biology at Holmes Chapel Agricultural College.

THE DECISIVE BATTLE.

BARELY three weeks have elapsed since the Sultan ordered his armies to advance against "our small neighbours," and to-day the ever-victorious Bulgarian forces are hammering at the gates of Constantinople while the Ottoman Government pleads with the great Powers for mediation in the cause of peace. Thus the edifice of an Empire centuries old has crumbled to dust in a period that can only be measured in days. The almost incredible swiftness with which the débâcle was accomplished benumbs the imagination. It has, indeed, been a veritable Messina for Turkey, save that the forces of human folly, not of Nature, have wrought the wreckage. During the past week the columns of the daily Press have been filled with vivid descriptions of the decisive battle fought in Thrace, notable among which was an historic dispatch from the pen of Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett, who exhibits in his writing the observant faculties of the careful correspondent together with the insight and experience of the trained soldier—a rare and valuable combination.

For the first time we are made fully acquainted with the real causes that led to the great disaster. In everything that is considered necessary for a modern and efficient army, save the pluck and endurance of the common soldier, the Turks were lacking. To begin with the General Staff was hopelessly incompetent; the army was therefore without a brain. This circumstance explains everything, but it excuses nothing. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett tells us that the "grand" army had no commissariat train, that the soldiers fought with incomparable gallantry for three days without so much as the ration of a single biscuit, that not a field dressing station or a field hospital existed, that there were few surgeons, and that thousands of wounded whose lives with reasonable care might have been saved died unattended where they lay. Then the artillery went into action with only a few hours' supply of shell, ignorant peasants who never previously had carried a Mauser rifle in their hands were hastened to the front, not a single machine gun was to be seen, and there were no aeroplanes. Thus, as it were, the foe that faced the Bulgarian army was from the first blind and helpless—without brain, without eyes, without arms. The despairing character of the situation was evidenced by the lonely and isolated position of the Commander-in-Chief.

> "I will interrupt a further description of to-day's fighting," wrote Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, "to present to the reader the hopeless position of the Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish army, directing as he was, or as he should have been directing, the movements of four army corps, ranged over a front of twenty-five miles. Abdullah remained throughout the entire day, except for one brief interval, on the mound of which I have already spoken. His sole companions were his staff and his personal escort, and his sole means of obtaining any information as to what was happening elsewhere were his pair of field glasses. Not a line of telegraph or telephone had been brought to the front, and not a single wireless installation, although the Turkish army on paper possesses twelve complete outfits for its army corps; and not an effort had been made even to establish a line of messengers by relays to connect headquarters with the various army corps. I need hardly add that not a single aeroplane was anywhere within 100 miles of the front, and if any exist there was no one to fly them."

Contrast with the above pathetic incident the state of Japanese organisation at the battle of Mukden. There Marshal Oyama and his brilliant Chief of the Staff, General Kodama, practically conducted an engagement, covering a front of ever one hundred miles, by means of the telephone. Spread upon a table in the centre of the little hut which they made their headquarters were a number of maps studded with coloured flags, while set apart on trestle stands were the signalling apparatus, switch-boards, and batteries from which radiated a veritable web of wires. Here, above the distant booming of hundreds of guns, the tinkling of the telephone bell seemed strangely incongruous. History repeats itself with insistent and unerring accuracy. After each great conflict the same lessons are to be learned. Similar stories as those which are now being recounted to explain the Turkish defeat were heard after the Franco-Prussian War, the South African War, and the Russo-Japanese War. So long as the world goes on, there will always be wars, and always a defeated side whose downfall will be attributed to want of foresight, of organisation, and of skill. "The most splendid material," says Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett to-day of the Turkish Army, "has been sacrificed on the altar of stupidity, conceit, self-satisfaction, and the grossest ineptitude." Elsewhere we are told that, when the Turkish soldier began to meddle in politics, the Turkish army was doomed. We cannot refrain from reversing the comment, and urging that in any country where the politician interferes in the legitimate sphere of the soldier, the inevitable effect will be to destroy the work of the soldier, and thus to deprive a State of its only bulwark against aggression. At such a moment as this, serious thoughts must be uppermost in the minds of the British citizen, who, while realising his responsibilities, is more often than not prevented from bearing them. Have we sufficient shell for our cannon, have we sufficient machine guns and aeroplanes, have we sufficient men trained in the use of the rifle? Or will it one day be written of Great Britain that she "sacrificed the most splendid material on the altar of stupidity, conceit, self-satisfaction, and the grossest ineptitude"?

THE FAR EAST.

While events in the Near East are pre-occupying the public mind, the situation in the Far East is developing in a startling manner. Russia has recognised the independence of Outer Mongolia, and as an answer to a protest from China it is expected that she will declare a protectorate over the territory. Japan will not be denied adequate compensation. Indeed, it is believed that months ago she reached an understanding with Russia on the matter. The time cannot therefore long be delayed when the division of Manchuria and Mongolia between these Powers, so often predicted in the columns of THE ACADEMY, will become an accomplished fact.

MOTORING

ONCE again the unattractive and out-of-the-way building at Olympia is the Mecca of the motorist, and for the next week, at any rate, the one topic of conversation in the motoring fraternity will be the Show. Unworthy as is Olympia for the holding of an exhibition of such national, or rather international, importance, inadequate in size, comfortless, and an architectural abomination, it still remains the only available building at all suitable for the purpose, and interest in motoring developments is now so universal that one may confidently prophesy a record attendance during the coming week. As this is necessarily written before the opening of the Show, it is, of course, not possible to give here an independent description of what is to be seen; but below we refer briefly to several of the more important and representative exhibits, the information being based partly upon preliminary inspections in exhibitors' showrooms and partly upon details supplied.

On the Napier stand (No. 48) there are only three specimens of the famous car which has done so much to demonstrate to the world that British design and workmanship in motor construction, as in every other branch of engineering, are second to none. They are sufficient, however, to show that the "Noiseless Napier" continues to represent the latest word in every department of motoring development. The exhibit consists of a 15-h.p. three-quarter landaulette, a 30-h.p. torpedo touring car, and a 38.4-h.p. Royal torpedo saloon. Of the last-mentioned it is difficult to speak in terms of moderation, but it is no exaggeration to say that a more beautiful and perfectly appointed motor-car has never been turned out. Every part and detail of the body-work bears evidence of the great amount of thought which has been brought to bear upon it by the designers, the Cunard Motor and Carriage Co., and its finish is perfection itself. We have no space here for details, but the visitor to Olympia should give this particular car his especial attention. In spite of the general advances which have been made in the coachbuilder's art in the last twelve months, the Napier Royal saloon will be a revelation to him. The body of the 15-h.p. landaulette is also by the Cunard Company, and, in its way, is an equally fine specimen of artistic workmanship; whilst the 30-h.p. (six-cylinder) will make a strong appeal to those who appreciate the combination of smartness of appearance with comfort and facilities for touring under the easiest conceivable conditions. All the Napier models for 1913 contain numerous improvements and refinements, full particulars of which may be obtained on application to the firm at New Burlington Street, W.

On Stand No. 47 will be found four examples of the new 30-h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex, and all who are familiar with the fine qualities of this high-class British car will be curious to see the result of the association of those past-masters in motor design and construction, Messrs. Percy Richardson and Warwick Wright. The specimens shown are (1) the chassis itself, with standard finish; (2) the "Devon" Limousine (enclosed drive); (3) the "Grove" four-seater torpedo; and (4) the "Pytchley" limousine-landaulette. All the bodies are entirely original, their characteristic being a continuous graceful curve from the radiator round the body, and back again to the radiator. No dashboard is visible, and there are no gable ends to collect dust or mud—two valuable points which greatly facilitate the cleaning of the car. Altogether, the fine and original bodywork of the Sheffield-Simplex exhibits renders them one of the most attractive and conspicuous features of the Show. The chassis itself embodies many new and important innovations. The radiator is of a novel and imposing design, there is a new system of springing, the frame is specially dropped to permit of low entrance bodies, and the brakes are fitted with ingenious hand-adjustments which act independently of the hand-lever and foot-pedals. The general verdict on the Sheffield-Simplex of 1913 will be that it is good enough to satisfy the most exacting connoisseur of luxurious motoring.

Of the comparatively few Continental cars which have fully maintained their popularity in this country in face of the great advances made by the British manufacturer, the Delaunay-Belleville holds pride of place. It is essentially a car for those whose purses are sufficiently deep to enable them to extract the highest joys of motoring, and in this respect it easily maintains its place in the front rank of the world's automobiles. A few of the characteristic features of the Delaunay-Belleville are its patent carburettor, which supplies the engine with gas of a constant quality, irrespective of throttle position or engine speed; the great strength of the back axle; the ample proportion of the system of springs; and the unusual power of the brakes. Another noteworthy feature of these fine French cars is the bodywork. This is by the famous Van den Plas of Belgium. Every visitor to the Exhibition who inspects the exhibits on Stand 66 will admire the beauty of design and perfection of finish.

Those visitors to the Show who actually contemplate buying cars will do well to remember that the task of making a judicious selection is now more difficult than ever, owing to the multiplicity of models on the market. Money and worry will be saved by securing the advice and services of a reliable expert adviser who knows the qualities of all the principal makes of cars and their suitability for particular requirements. One of the best-known and most efficient of these advisers is Mr. H. L. Aldersey Swann, consulting automobile engineer, of 9, Regent Street, London, S.W., who will be pleased to place his services at the disposal of any prospective buyer, free of charge. Mr. Swann has been entrusted with the selection of cars by many motorists of distinction, including the Duchess of Albany, and his advice can be implicitly relied upon in every way.

On Messrs. Bowley's stand (No. 213 in the gallery) a space has been set apart for demonstrating the Bowser system of economising fuel, and, in view of the present high price of petrol, many motorists will doubtless avail themselves of the opportunity of examining the new method of reducing their fuel bill.

One of the interesting exhibits in the accessory department of the Show is the "Airless Resilient Wheel," which is claimed to supersede all pneumatic tyres and to be adaptable for every class of motor vehicle. It is stated that over 300,000 miles have already been covered with these wheels, without a breakdown or breakage of any part. Those interested may obtain full information as to the construction of the new device at the stand of Messrs. Connolly, Ltd. (No. 175).

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

IT is evident that the public do not intend to buy stocks and shares as long as the war lasts. Business was never so stagnant; not a broker has an order. Many of them do not desire business; they are anxiously wondering how their clients will manage to pay the differences at the last account. Far too many accounts were arranged, and far too many punters had time given them, which makes the outlook unsatisfactory. Continental Bourses are jumpy. On one day Paris thinks that everything will go smoothly and she ventures to buy. The next day she is terrified lest Austria should ask for Salonica. France does not want war, neither does Austria. Indeed, the finances of that empire are not in a condition to permit war. The whole of Austria appears to have been gambling in a most insane manner. The gamble in Austrian industrials has equalled if not exceeded in violence that of St. Petersburg in Russians. Continental speculators have been buying industrial shares to pay them three per cent. There is only one end to such nonsense. Luckily that end makes for peace, as in spite of the depressed condition of markets, promoters have been offering shares, probably without success. The Southern Ontario Land was circularising all over England recklessly, and foolish statements were made as to the profits that the land would produce. It is doubtful whether any sober-minded people would subscribe. The Calthorpe Motor asks us for a small amount of money, and the certificate showed that the profits are on the increase and that the business was prosperous. The motor trade is good just now, but shares in motor companies are highly speculative. Lever Bros. offer 507,500 "C" preference shares at 1s. a share premium. The issue is attractive and the shares a first-class industrial investment. The Queensland Government loan gives us 4 per cent. on the trustee stock, and is a sound, gilt-edged security. The Dutch company for the Exploitation of Margarine Factories is offering £240,000 5½ per cent. cumulative preference at 22s. per share. The Company is a sort of trust for the investment of money in margarine factories. It is a prosperous concern, and the famous house of Van den Bergh guaranteed principal and interest. Therefore, although the shares appear over-priced, it is a sound industrial and would have been extremely attractive at par. Mexico Tramways are offering their shareholders some fresh capital. There are stories going about that the monopoly hitherto held by this Company is likely to be attacked. At the same time the shares appear a fair risk.

THE CHINESE LOAN appears to be forgotten in the excitement of the Balkan war. But the banks at the back of the Six Power Group are just as energetic as ever in their intrigues. I have before me a copy of a document that was affixed to the guichets of some of the principal Continental banks some weeks ago, in which the most astounding statements were made with regard to China and her loan. In their eagerness to discredit the Crisp group, the banks seem quite to forget the absurdity of the position. Although they are ready and willing to lend China as much money as she wants, they never cease to declare that if anyone else lends the money they are running a terrible risk. The position would be ridiculous in the extreme were it not that it is very serious for England. The Chinese do not like the Germans, they hate the Japanese and they distrust the Americans, but they have great faith in the English, and they do not understand why Great Britain, which is always supposed to be a powerful nation, should be dragged in the mud of these intrigues. None of the Six Powers does any trade with China that is worth considering, with the exception of England, which does 52 per cent. Therefore, the sooner Sir Edward Grey intimates to the other Powers that he proposes to act on his own account, the better, and the sooner he throws over the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, which is a semi-German institution, the sooner will he regain the confidence of the Chinese. Some months ago, the Six Power Group instructed two Japanese gentlemen to make a report on the advisability of lending China money on the Salt Tax. These gentlemen, who are admittedly experts, reported to the group that there was security for a loan of £26,000,000 on this tax alone. This report is now more or less public property. I wonder how the Six Powers can explain the figures in the report? The Foreign Office comes out of the affair very badly. Everybody in England knows that it is quite honest if stupid, but on the Continent people say that our Foreign officials must have been bought over. They cannot believe in our stupidity, for they see clearly that if we are doing this we must be doing it because of some sinister motive. Our prestige in the East has been very seriously damaged.

MONEY remains very tight, that is to say, no one who wishes to discount a three months' bill can do it under five per cent., although day to day loans can be arranged at two per cent. This shows what the monied people think of the position. If the Turks do not promptly yield, and if the Bulgarians do not realise that they cannot rule the world, we shall have a six per cent. bank rate before Christmas.

FOREIGNERS.—Paris did not like the Austrian rejection of the French overtures, and it is plain that the story that France and Austria had agreed upon a modus vivendi is untrue. However, there are so many "bears" in the foreign market that prices are distinctly firm. Indeed, the Bulgarian loan is now quoted at the same price as it was a year ago, and is up eight points on the last make up. German Threes are distinctly weak, but none of the nations who are deeply interested in the war appears in the least concerned, the defeated Turkey least of all. Turkish Unified at 82 are only six points lower than a year ago. This seems absurd when the newspapers are full of stories of the complete collapse of the Turkish Empire. It only shows how strong a market "bear" selling will make. The public is always abusing the "bear," but we have had a magnificent example during the past three weeks of what an aid he is in keeping a market firm. Had it not been for the "bear" selling we should have seen the most tremendous slump in all foreign securities. Indeed, wherever there has been a "bull" account, as in Tintos and Perus, the price has fallen away to nothing, and Peru Prefs., in spite of the fact that they are supposed to be worth 80, look very sick at 51½, and Tintos seem unable to lift their heads.

HOME RAILS are hardly affected at all, for there has been some heavy gambling in Dover A on the news that the Tilmanstone pits were on the coal. There is, however, no doubt that it will be twelve months before coal is shipped from these pits in any quantity. All the coal raised will have to be used by the Companies themselves, so that the railways instead of gaining traffic will have a certain loss, for to-day they are carrying the coal used by the Burr group. It is estimated that the railways now carry about two million tons of coal into Kent, and it must be understood that three or four years will elapse before the present collieries in Kent are raising such an amount. Therefore, those why buy Dover A to-day are looking at least three years ahead. No doubt in ten years' time Kent will be a great coal field, and then Dover A may go to par. The Stock Exchange always discounts the future.

YANKEES keep very firm. There seems no doubt that the democrat will get in, and as he has assured the financiers that he does not intend to attack them or indeed to interfere to any serious extent with the tariffs, we may expect a boom next year. Unions, Atchisons, Eries, and Southerns all look good, and Steels seem worth their price.

RUBBERS are dull. The event of the week has been the report of the Kwala Lumpur. A friend of mine who has lately returned from the Malay tells me that, in his opinion, this is the best of all. It has improved its dividend from 57½ to 65, in spite of the fact that the capital has been increased to £210,000. The capital cost per acre is now £43 13s., and the total acreage is 6,176. The Company harvested 859,660 lbs., which cost 1s. 6½d. and was sold at 4s. 9½d. The estate is well managed, and the accounts are admirably presented. It is a pity that other rubber companies do not attend to depreciation in the same manner as Kwala Lumpur, which has written off this year over £5,000. Nearly all the companies charge the cost of obtaining labour to capital account, but Kwala Lumpur charges these costs to revenue. This is thoroughly sound. The shares to-day can be bought under 6½, and they are a very reasonable rubber investment.

OIL.—The oil market has been dull, probably because those people who came in when the slump was on have been taking their profits, and partly because the Maikop Wells have all been giving reduced productions. Anglo Derek report was colourless, and certainly does not justify any boom in the shares. Tulsa Oil is being puffed, and the chairman has been making long speeches, no doubt with the idea of getting rid of some shares. It is clear that a market is to be made in Tulsas. The Financial Times on Wednesday had nearly five columns devoted to the speech of Mr. Meares. It is hardly likely that they inserted this verbatim report for the love of the beautiful eyes of the chairman of the Company. I am assured that the Maikop Deep Drilling Company have nothing whatever to do with the amalgamation that I mentioned last week, and they desire me to contradict the rumour.

MINES.—The Goldfields dividend announcement was a terrible disappointment. We all expected at least 3s. per share, but the profit available has fallen by nearly half. Nothing is written off, and after paying the dividend, there is a debit balance of £14,376, which, being deducted from the amount brought in, reduces the carry forward to £52,112. Thus the position of the Goldfields is distinctly bad, but the "bulls" say that the Company would never have paid away all its money unless it had been perfectly certain that it expected a boom next year. Goldfields has been going from bad to worse for many years past. In 1909 it had nearly one and a quarter millions available for dividend. This year it only has £335,624. The Falcon report was also very bad. We had expected great things, but instead we found that everything had been cut down, and the ore reserves which in 1911 were valued at nearly three millions are now only valued at just under one and a half millions. They have dropped 50 per cent. in a year. Falcon ore is complex, and even when the plant is started, which will not be for another eighteen months, we are not likely to get more than 20 per cent. dividend, even if every expectation is fulfilled, and I never yet found a mine that came up to expectations.

MISCELLANEOUS.—This is the period when the nitrate reports make their appearance, and they are coming out rapidly. I cannot agree with the "bulls" that these shares are under-valued. They appear to me priced at ridiculous figures. Most of the nitrate companies entirely refuse to realise that their grounds are being worked out. Santa Catalina has only eight years to run, yet the depreciation writen off this year is only £4,136. Colorado actually increases its dividend, but it has only a few more years to live. It has to pay off £66,000 of debentures, and the company owes £74,360. The properties stand in the books at £286,473. Liverpool, which belongs to the same group, is managed, however, on entirely different lines. It pays 50s. a share dividend, and the whole of its properties are entered in the books at £43,557. There are no debentures, and although Liverpool shares are very high, they are very safe. RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CORRESPONDENCE

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In your issue of October 26 your correspondent, Mr. James R. Fergusson, flies, as do most of the Stratfordians, to fiction for evidence.

The author of "Fuller's Worthies" was but eight years old when Shakespeare died. His supposed report of conversations between Ben Jonson and the Stratford clown is pure romance, and does not profess to be a description by an eye-witness of any real event.

Then Mr. Fergusson seems to imagine that, when I describe "Bill Shaggs" of Stratford, who could neither read nor write (See Notes and Queries, August 24 and October 26) as a drunken, illiterate clown, I am striking a blow at the mighty author of the plays who, outside of religious teachers, was the greatest of the sons of earth.

I thought that everybody who knew anything of the literature of the Elizabethan age was aware of the fact that the preface of the immortal plays was certainly not written by Hemminge and Condell. In the poem signed Leonard Digges there is a particularly clear "Biliteral Cypher," which was easily read by Mrs. Gallup as follows: "Francis of Verulam is the author of all the plays heretofore published by Marlow, Greene, Peel, Shakespeare, and the two-and-twenty now published for the first time. Some are alter'd to continue his history.—F. S. A."

In order to check Mrs. Gallup I caused Digges' verses to be photographically enlarged twenty-fold. Your readers may therefore rely on the correctness of Mrs. Gallup's reading.

In my unique library there is a copy of Bacon's complete works in Latin, published at Frankfort, which is dated 1665, and also another copy likewise issued at Frankfort bearing the same date, 1665.

To an ordinary observer the title pages of each appear alike, and when I gave a copy to the British Museum, they simply catalogued it as "another" copy.

The title page of one tells me that in it the mystery is solved. In this copy the printing is throughout in two founts of type. The alternative copy (in which the title page tells me the mystery is not solved) is excellently printed from a single fount of type. No one examining these two editions together, which are word for word and column for column—excepting in one special place—the same, can refuse to believe that one of them is carefully printed from two founts of type. This means that this edition contains another story, to be revealed at some future date by means of the biliteral cypher, which Bacon (in his "De Augmentis," chap. vi) tells us he invented when in Paris as a youth. It is practically the same as the Morse code, now universally used for all kinds of telegraphy, excepting that five symbols are employed for every letter. It is exceedingly simple. You write "stay in till I come." Then your friend reads the ordinary type as dots and the italic type as dash, and cuts them up into fives. Thus: . . — . — . — . — . — . — — . — — . which he at once reads as "Fly." (F being . . —.—; L .—.—. ; and Y —.— —.)

Bacon does not call the two founts of type dot-letters and dash-letters, but "a" letters and "b" letters, which often seems to puzzle people.

Permit me to remind your readers that a grammar school was a Latin grammar school, where the rudiments of learning were never taught, where English was never spoken, and where Latin was never translated into English. In 1580, when Bacon was twenty years old, the statutes of Harrow School provided that no boy (excepting in the lowest form) should speak anything but Latin, even in the playground.

When Bacon was born English, as we now understand it, did not exist. Ere he died he had succeeded in creating our present English language, which is the noblest vehicle of thought ever possessed by man. This he accomplished mainly by his translation of the BIBLE and his SHAKESPEARE. It is now universally admitted that the English language of to-day subsists upon these two books. Yours, etc.,

EDWIN DURNING LAWRENCE.

13, Carlton House Terrace, S.W.
October 30, 1912.

Sir,—Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, in his pamphlet "The Shakespeare Myth," gives a photo fac-simile of the veses by B. I., descriptive of the portrait of Shakespeare, which face the title-page of the 1623 folio. As might be expected, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence finds all sorts of hidden meanings in this perfectly straightforward piece of doggerel. Here is a sample of his method:—

"B. I. never calls the ridiculous dummy a portrait, but describes it as 'the figure,' 'put for' (i.e., instead of), and as 'the Print,'" etc.

Having dealt with other points, the author gives what purports to be a paraphrase of the verses, revealing their true (i.e., hidden) meaning. The paraphrase begins thus:—

"The dummy that thou seest set here
Was put instead of Shake-a-speare;——"

Now, in the passage quoted above, the author distinctly asserts that B. I. describes the portrait as being "put for" (Shakespeare). This phrase "put for" he translates as "put instead of," and uses the translation in his paraphrase.

Now, "put instead of" can doubtless be used to render the meaning of "put for." But it is surely remarkable that, in spite of the author's assertion, the phrase "put for" actually does not occur in the verses! The first two lines run thus:—

"This figure that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakespeare cut;——"

To support his argument, therefore, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence has not merely altered a phrase used by B. I. Before altering it, he has invented it! I am, Sir, yours faithfully, HENRY STACE.

"THE EARL OF MACCLESFIELD'S BASQUE MSS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Under the above heading one finds on pages 168 and 306 of vol. 26, THE ACADEMY (1884), two letters from Sir J. Rhys, which led to the printing of most of those manuscripts. An account of them will be found in the works of Mr. Ll. Thomas and Mr. Wentworth Webster, graduates of Oxford, now dead; in the Revue de Linguistique; in the Bibliographie Basque of M. Julien Vinson; and in The American Journal of Philology for 1902. Among them is a copy, made in 1807 by Samuel Greatheed, of the translation of Genesis and part of Exodos into the dialect of St. Jean de Luz, written about 1715, by Pierre d'Urte, who was in London in the reign of George I. That copy was useful for the edition of d'Urtes version, published at the Clarendon Press in 1894, because, since he saw it, some parts of the original had been cut off by a binder. With it there are notes shewing that he had read the other MSS. of d'Urte. S. Greatheed died in 1823. His grandson, Mr. W. Greatheed, of 67-69, Chancery Lane, W.C., adds to what we knew about his work this memorandum dated October 14, 1912:—

"Dear Sir,—This is a further reply to your letter of April 2 than I could give when I returned Mr. H. Jenners flattering, but very pleasant, postcard as to my father. I have been spending time at Cambridge reading the 105 letters of my grandfather upon which Mr. L. E. Tanner has been at work, and which, as you know, turned up mysteriously after dormancy for a century. S. Greatheed refers to Baskish, not this time as Portuguese, but as 'Cantabrian,' and he expects to have literary assistance from Lord Macclesfield (by the influence of Cosway, the artist, and Lord Leicester) in the shape of 12 MS. volumes of a 'Cantabrian dictionary.' The motive at the time was not 'Christian Missions'; for it was a period when he was a little soured by public inappreciation of his history, but he was being made a Fellow of the Antiquarian Society; he was kicking at the accepted theory that British were all Celts by origin; they were more probably by origin 'Iberian'; and study of the 'Cantabrian' language would help to solve the point. He subsequently published in the Society's proceedings those papers on the subject of our origin, which I remember looking at long ago, and not being much interested. It still seems to me probable that it was from the French émigré, the Baron Tardif, that he got the loan of d'Urte's work: that he copied it for his own purposes, and that he eventually gave the copy to Lord Macclesfield, perhaps in appreciation of the loan of the 12 MS. volumes: also that Lord Macclesfield bought the d'Urte copy, or was given it, after my grandfather's death. But this last paragraph of mine is guesswork. It is curious that in this way one should get back to the Macclesfield library, of which your letter of April 2 tells me. I presume the 12 volumes are familiar to you, and that you know why Lord Macclesfield should have specialised in this way. I don't."

I did see those MSS. at Shirburn Castle, including the "Cantabrian Dictionary," i.e., Latin-Baskish, ending at "Commodus," and bound, long after 1823, in five volumes. Has any part of them been lost since Greatheed saw them? It seems that they may have been there in 1749. The Grammar, dated 1712, and a specimen of the Dictionary, were published defectively by Mr. Webster. Though not scientific, yet they are worth quoting to shew how the language was written 200 years ago, and a critical edition might be of value to a few scholars. In my letter in THE ACADEMY of May 10, 1912, read "Pembroke College, Oxford," instead of "Brasenose," as the place where Sir T. Browne graduated. I am, Sir, yours,

EDWARD SPENCER DODGSON.

A NATIONAL REFLECTION.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—All lovers of fair play will welcome the article referred to in Mr. Daniel's letter last week, for, surely, nothing can be more absurd than the attempt made by the Masterman Brothers to give to a war of aggression the character of a Christian Crusade? Moreover, even if Greeks, Bulgars and Serbs had any right to pose as Christian Crusaders approval on our part would be absurd since we in this country have definitely decided that a man's religion, or want of it, is a matter of no concern to anybody but himself.

If any man doubts this let him remember that our rulers think so little of religion that they do their best to keep it out of our schools, and, further, did not think it worth while to make any inquiries at the census about our religious convictions. When we dwell on other things and also call to mind the fact that avowed atheists may be Ministers of the Crown and controllers of our destinies we begin to understand that all talk about "our common Christianity" is pure cant. To our Mussulman fellow-subjects in India it must seem like pure hypocrisy, for they know that the same Radical Statesman who denounces Mahomedanism will expect Mahomedan soldiers to give limb and life, in case of need, in the service of the Empire. How long Mahomedans will submit to be treated, alternately, as ruffians when we want to turn them out of Europe, and as heroes when we wish to exploit them to prevent ourselves being turned out of India, is a question which the future must decide. Yours faithfully,

C. F. RYDER.

CHRISTMAS HAMPERS AND CLOTHING FOR LITTLE CRIPPLES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—May I once again ask the courtesy of your columns to remind your generous readers of the distribution of Christmas hampers and clothing to poor crippled children?

Every year, for the last eighteen years, I have, by the kind permission of the Corporation, entertained some 1,200 poor children at the Guildhall.

I hope, as usual, to dispatch the welcome hampers to my little friends on the morning of the day when this annual banquet will again be held.

His Majesty the King is again graciously pleased to continue his subscription to this fund, which it is my privilege to bring to the annual notice of the public.

I am hoping that this year I shall be able to say I have denied no deserving applicant. As usual, I propose to hand any balance I may have to the Hospital and College for Crippled Children at Alton, which bears my name, and to the Ladies' Guild which has been formed for the purpose of clothing the 270 children residing there.

The Hon. Mrs. H. Lawson is president and Miss Treloar hon. secretary of the Guild.

With the hamper the little cripple entertains the family, and on a modest estimate the Fund brightens the lives at Christmas-time of over thirty thousand of the poor of London.

Donations may be sent as heretofore to me, addressed "Little Cripples' Christmas Hamper and Clothing Fund."—I am, Sir, yours truly,

W. P. TRELOAR.

P.S.—I may add that I intend to ask the incoming Mayors of the Metropolitan Boroughs and the London City Mission to co-operate with me, and I hope, with their kind help, to distribute the hampers on the widest possible basis in this the nineteenth year of the distribution.

SIR HENRY STANLEY'S GRAVE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Having heard from a seemingly reliable source that the grave of Sir Henry Stanley was in an unsatisfactory condition, I took the opportunity, when staying with some relatitves at Woking a few days ago, of motoring to the neighbouring churchyard of Pirbright, where the great African traveller lies buried, and found to my relief that his last resting-place, which I visited for the first time in 1910, was still in perfectly good order. It is surrounded by a fine yew hedge, and the tomb consists of a massive unpolished granite rock of considerable height, containing the following inscription cut into the stone in large letters: "Henry Morton Stanley, Bula Matari, 1841-1904, Africa." It is a superb monument, and in perfect keeping with the magnificently grand and rugged character of the immortal deceased. Yours very faithfully, ALGERNON ASHTON.

Notes of the Week

THE reasons for the resignation of Mr. James Bryce, the British Ambassador to the United States, have not been fully disclosed, but it is permissible to surmise that the attraction of literary affairs, which has always been strongly upon him, has not a little to do with the step he has taken. As long ago as 1862 his work on "The Holy Roman Empire" brought him fame; his book on "The American Commonwealth," published in 1888, is a classic on the subject, and in America is regarded as a text-book for all students. In the intervals of a strenuous official career—for within the recollection of many of our readers he has been Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, President of the Board of Trade, and Chief Secretary for Ireland—he has evidently found time to go thoroughly into subjects which need deep study and a well-balanced mind before any critical essay can be composed upon them. Whatever we may think of his political opinions, there is no doubt as to his qualifications as a writer; his latest volume on South America ranks high with those who are fitted to judge, and we hear that he has other works in hand, notably one on Democracy, which, if we mistake not, will embody much that is new in the treatment of a difficult theme.

Many old customs, a few of which still linger, are associated with the choosing of a Mayor and his assumption of office. In London, in the year 1825, a "precept" was issued to the Aldermen which contained some amusing instructions "for the more decent and orderly Performance of the Solemnity"; among these the beadle was to go from house to house and "acquaint the several Inhabitants that by an Act of Parliament made in the reign of King William the Third It is enacted that no Person of what degree or quality soever shall make, sell, or expose to sale, any Squibs, Serpents, or other Fireworks; or any Cases, Moulds, or other Implements whatsoever for making such Fireworks." The populace were requested "to adorn the Fronts and Balconies of their Houses with their best Hangings or other Ornaments," and to have their streets "cleanly swept, well paved and amended." Some years ago the new Mayor of Newcastle-on-Tyne had to kiss the prettiest girl he could find—and pay a sovereign for the privilege; and at Grimsby three candidates, each with a bundle of hay on his back, submitted themselves to a calf, who made choice. There was doubtless more fun in the old days than there is now, and more pageantry, especially when the barges of the City Companies accompanied the Lord Mayor-elect from Westminster to Blackfriars; but, on the whole, our choice in these more sober times is quite as sound, and the results probably better.

We shall be very sorry, from more than one point of view, if the system recently advocated by a writer in The World's Work of using magazines as text-books in the education of children ever becomes general. The attitude of one teacher who is "running a magazine class," and the value of her remarks, may be judged from her own words; she "can't keep up much longer the deception that De Quincey, Pope, and Addison are the best literary diet," and she hopes that "sometime an advantage of analysing these moth-eaten worthies will appear." If it were worth while, it would be interesting to hear what graceful raillery from Addison, and what bleak satiric couplet from Pope, would greet a statement so pretentious and so peculiarly expressed. Doubtless—indeed, inevitably—the popular magazines are more to the taste of this pert, self-satisfied lady than any masterpiece of English literature. Sad indeed will be the reflections of the pupils thus "educated" when, in after years, they mingle with ordinary people who happen to have enjoyed the work of Shakespeare, Spenser, Swift Pope, Addison, and other "moth-eaten worthies" who, curiously enough, have managed somehow to gain an honoured place in history, but whose charm makes no appeal to the lofty-souled "teacher running a magazine class."

China, we understand, is to have a new alphabet, in order that the task of the student in committing to memory 8,coo ideograms may no longer be necessary. The laborious duty of reforming the language has been entrusted to a distinguished Committee, one member of which is Professor Solonghello, of the School of Oriental Languages at Naples, and "one of the greatest polyglots in the world," according to La Revue. With no disrespect to the Professor, may we suggest that his name is prophetic, in our English colloquial speech; "so long" to the old, "hello" to the new. To reduce so complicated a tongue within the compass of forty-two letters, or rather characters, is a triumph indeed.

The Paradox

I.

WHEN I have gained the Hill
Where beats the clear and rigid light of God
Full on the path by fearless comrades trod;
When I have tuned to theirs my will and word,
And by my prompting voice their ranks are stirred
To hail each height with "Higher! higher still!"
That luring glow which from the Valley streams
Warns me I am not what my spirit seems!

II.

But when my life descends
Into the Hollow, where no wild thoughts reach,
And all that lawful yearning can beseech
Sits at my hearth, or in my garden grows;
When I need match no more with noble foes,
Nor share the yoke with unrelenting friends,
That strange veiled star which o'er the Hill-top beams
Shows me I am not what my body dreams!

G. M. HORT.

Politics and Pelf.

AFTER a long experience of politics, which—if they are clean—afford an honourable career to any man, we are able to offer to Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill—for the latter of whom we have hardly ever had a good word to say—our cordial congratulations on their speeches in connection with the crisis in the East. Their utterances are worthy of Conservative statesmen of the most patriotic type—as indeed these statesmen, in reality, are. Their views are, of course, hateful to Sir John Brunner, Sir William Byles, and the rest of the proletariat of the Radical Party.

The only fault which can possibly be alleged against the wholesome members of the Government is that they have found salvation late in the day. For long—whilst they have not been guilty of the atrocities of the 1878 Bulgarian era—they have still clung to a pious belief in the greatest fraud of modern times—the European Concert—and the harmless, unnecessary Hague Convention.

The Ottoman Empire in Europe is to-day cursing Young Turks and their Committees, Cabinets, and kindred impostures; the day may come when the British Isles will join in the lament. You can't muddle through somehow always. Any commercial man will tell you any day that a business concern run on the lines of the hired assembly which sits at Westminster would be bankrupt in a week.

We are not in this article affecting a style, because we wish to be brusque and, if necessary, brutal in showing up shams and make-believes which are used to hoodwink a people who in their constant delusion think that they are governing themselves. Are they doing so? At the last general election and the preceding one, a quantity of gentlemen were elected who ranted and railed against the precise methods which their leaders are adopting, and which they support in the Government lobby. Only Sir John Brunner, who has done pretty well out of his workmen, protests. He is no longer a member of Parliament, and therefore his unsalaried tongue is loosed. Where is his army?

The story is told—it may be true, or it may be false—of a very celebrated actress who was performing in the provinces the part of Joan of Arc. After praying for guidance, which we believe the Radical Party never does, she summoned her Army on to the stage. Forthwith appeared two supers—one of whom was cross-eyed and club-footed—and the actress herself joined in the laughter. It was a poor show, we admit; but could Sir John Brunner muster even such an army as this?

In a review which we wrote a few weeks ago of the Plutus of Aristophanes, we quoted the passage:—

> So poverty exclaims—
> "Look at the politicians; while my restraint they feel
> The people and the State in them may safely put their trust,
> But once enriched from public funds they show themselves unjust,
> And plot against the masses and oppose the people's will."

The present Ministry and their followers are doing something of the sort. Elected as Radicals and Peace-at-any-price tabernacle spouters, they are showing themselves to be thorough-going Jingoes, out-Heroding Herod. We commend their attitude most heartily. They show themselves to be worthy of the position in which they were placed by an enlightened electorate. But what about false pretences? Don't mention the hated words! Great is Diana of the Ephesians, and greater still is the worship of four hundred sovereigns per annum.

Sir Frederick Banbury has delivered a smashing blow against the edifice of racecourse tricks which the Cocoa Evangelists hoped they could practise with impunity, and the "higher and lower branches of the profession" in conference have evolved a scheme for reducing the House of Commons to a nullity. It has got to eat "'umble pie," if not to sit in sackcloth, with ashes heaped on its head. We shall see.

The mother of Parliaments is, we think, in a parlous state, and, if her decline has been undignified, we can only hope that her sepulture will record virtues which existed—at least in imagination.

The Work of Mr. Algernon Blackwood.

By H. BELLOC.

IT is not too early in the day to call attention to the particular position enjoyed by Mr. Algernon Blackwood among writers of English. His work is so much his own, it is so complete, it is so sincere, and it is so final that it deserves and will attain not only a high but a permanent place in English letters.

It happens not infrequently to-day with the curious—though happily waning—influence of daily-news-getting and news-reading that some writer is lifted altogether out of his due place too rapidly, and usually without sufficient judgment. He writes some one book, often his first; its subject as often as not is rather his claim to notoriety than his method; his grasp, his presentment are any title to fame. The process is familiar, and, by a metaphor drawn characteristically enough from the Stock Exchange, the result is known as a "boom." It is not universally true, of course, that reputations so made are valueless. The past, though less frequently than the present, gives us examples of artificial rumours of the kind, and in the present, as in the past, some few of them, though artificial in origin, prove themselves just in the long run. But it is generally to be observed that the reputation of a man whose art is at once novel and sober is a thing of reasonable growth. It can hardly of its nature be explosive. It must come and grow as natural things do, and if, as is the case with Mr. Blackwood, the work is, as it were, an outcrop of the man's own nature, then its advance into public recognition will necessarily be accompanied at first either by irritation or by neglect.

It has been Mr. Blackwood's singular good fortune never to provoke the first, but it is no injustice to him—rather the reverse—if we admit that for some years his really excellent management of his own subject has suffered a little from the second. It is time that this neglect, such as it is, should cease, and that we should appreciate how thorough and permanent an addition to the monuments of the language we are in process of receiving from his pen.

Mr. Blackwood has now to his account a number of books, all written within the framework of one large theme, and each of so singular a merit within that field that it is impossible to choose one volume before another, either as an illustration of his merit or as an illustration of his easy success.

That theme is what is generally and loosely called the Supernatural, and whether we look for it in that extraordinary first unique collection of stories which he called "The Empty House," in "The Listener," in "John Silence," in "Jimbo," in "The Education of Uncle Paul," in "The Human Chord," in "The Centaur," or in the last of his gifts to the public, "Pan's Garden"—wherever we see it treated, and from whatever side, we discover in the first sentences of our reading that it is treated by a master. By this I do not only mean that it is treated by one who has profoundly felt the omnipresence of things commonly unseen—that would be no more than to say that Mr. Blackwood had been granted his material by nature—it would not account for his art. No nation more than this and no literature more than the English is in contact with such theses, unless we except the Western populations: those "children of the Night" in Ireland, in the Highlands, in Brittany, and in the Galician mountains, who seem to draw their violent perception of the spiritual from some Atlantic influence. At any rate, of the great European languages our own is specially rich in the sentiment of which I speak, and it would be no appreciation of Mr. Blackwood's work to say that it was nothing more than one unit in so lengthy a series. Mr. Blackwood's position, the very high position which he must necessarily occupy among our men of letters, will reside in a much rarer thing: the invaluable power of presenting to others the conviction of the life beneath all our externals. I say "the conviction," for the mainspring of this remarkable prose is faith. He takes for granted what he makes it his business to portray. It is clear that he has never doubted it at all, and that vivid spiritual experience, the reality of which in others many recognise, and for the possibility of which many more would argue, is to him as obviously true as the daily experience of the senses is obviously true to all of us.

But here again conviction alone, or rather an impossibility of doubting, would not be sufficient to account for what he has done. It is the ability to produce in others either a similar conviction, or, at any rate, a sharp comprehension of it, that is so astonishing and arresting a character in all that he writes.

Few of us but are familiar with the effect of spiritual horror which a good ghost story well told can produce. Much more rarely we discover the power to introduce that unexplored line of interior experience developed by a writer who deals not with the traditional and narrow material of the ghost story, but with the very nature of the soul in this respect and the general capacity of any human spirit to suffer the unnamed assault of darkness. Perhaps the best modern example of this is Mgr. Benson's "The Necromancers." But Mr. Blackwood can do this and much more. He can write and has written much the best ghost stories of our time. He can describe and has described that general spiritual peril or fascination which I have just mentioned. But he can also describe the spiritual mood of creation; the spiritual mood of recognition; the exaltations of the soul and the life of everything which is not man where it is happy, where it is triumphant, where it is merely different from us, where it is sorrowful; in so much, at least, as man can be by some development of spiritual power in touch with all those lives that are not his. Thus in "Pan's Garden" we have a whole series of such lives woven into men's lives; the life of the sea, of the snow, of the sand. In "The Centaur" it is mythology which becomes real; in "The Human

Chord" both the Word and Music; in "Jimbo" the atmosphere of childhood.

No one else, perhaps, has done this, and certainly to-day no one else can.

Though criticism is the dullest and the least profitable of trades, curiosity impels one to discover, if it be possible, how such effects are produced, and the first and most convenient answer will, of course, be to say that the effect was due to "style." So it is. It is the choice of words and the order in which the author puts them which does what no one else could do. To analyse the style in detail, to take a passage from, say, that marvellous description of the haunted eyot in the Danube, under the high, clear wind and subject to the rising flood, would be to no purpose at all. What is magical in style escapes analysis. But one can at least, for one's own comfort and perhaps for the comfort of others, consider the chief character in any writer who has so perfectly achieved his end; and in the case of Mr. Blackwood this chief character is facile exactitude.

The power to find exactly what English word one needs in some particular connection, not only its sense but its sound, its ancient connotations and its exact place in the rhythm of the sentence, all making for one end, and that the end one desires, this is not a thing which any labour or choice could produce. Exactitude thus constantly and surely repeated, and never failing to hit the mark time after time, is the fruit of facility.

The word "facility" is used by tutors and such abusively. Yet it is the rarest of human gifts. It is the gift by which long flights of poetry are made possible, unbroken fugues of rhetoric, and a native lucidity in common expression. Newman had it without a doubt, and, in quite another sphere and used for totally different objects, Cobbett had it; Byron had it, and Dryden had it; on the other hand, Rossetti had it not.

There is an unmistakable difference between that art—and it is often of a very high character—which is the product of erasure perpetually exercised and of exception and of self-doubt, and that art which is the product either of a command over, or of a necessity for, expression. Now, when to the necessity for expression is joined an instinctive command of it, we have, in their various degrees, the kind of artists of which Mr. Blackwood is one, and in that school he stands very high indeed.

If I seek for a further thing to say in the contemplation of such work, I find little of equal importance, but I must, of course, note this: that it is work wholly devoid of superfluity.

Here, as in the case of facility, we are threatened by false values and the tedious repetitions of the schools. It is so taken for granted that mere brevity is the equivalent of terseness, that an excision of adjective and adverb is a sufficient rule of thumb for strong prose, that men often speak as though the absence of superfluity were a thing commonly to be attained, and following certain easy rules. It is nothing of the kind. It is both rare and complex, and it is rare on account of its complexity. These are a few passages in Mr. Blackwood's work in which qualification is piled upon qualification; there are many in which long and intricate descriptions of a spiritual condition—especially of its advent and of the preparation of the soul for magic, for illusion, for vision or for fear—are drawn out to such a degree as lesser men would fear to admit. There is hardly one piece of work of his which is condensed. I can recollect no single sentence that could be called epigrammatic. But when I say that the work is singular for its total absence of superfluity, I mean that all that is necessary for the effect aimed at is present, and that nowhere will you find in it those floating pieces of disconnected matter which the reader's mind itches to reject as disturbing to the general concept it is in process of forming, or blurring to its distinctness of vision, or irritant to its acute and excited mood. It is not enough to say that in the crises of his stories Mr. Blackwood's outlines are as sharp as outline can be. One must also say that when he has to be long, or desires to be long, he can be long and is long without one word too many and without one word too little—that is the extraordinary thing.

But I will not linger upon the somewhat futile and always tedious task of analysis. It was rather my purpose in writing this to communicate to others both what I myself had so strongly enjoyed, and also what is of common interest to all of us: the presence, in the midst of our wretched turmoil and breaking up of creed, of a new but established name in English letters.

When the Boats came Back

By the late H. D. LOWRY.

THE little harbour called me. I was miles away in a small inland town, and though the stifling air might itself have suggested an escape to the sea, I had business to discharge, which made me repel the thought. It came again, and again I reflected on the foolishness of such an expedition on a day when I could not possibly reach the harbour before the hour of sunset. Nevertheless, I presently took the train, and, under the hour, was tramping over the reedy sandhills towards the harbour. To every boy who traversed those lonely dunes, they once teemed with possibilities of solitary adventure; now by the unkindness of fate, these same sandhills figure in advertisements as "the finest golf links in Cornwall." So I hurried until the path rose above the level of the towans and offered a wider view of the bay.

Sea and sky were wonderful to behold. Straight ahead the sun was a white rayless disk behind a grey smoke that rapidly became angry-looking cloud. Yet the long reaches of the bay's remoter side seemed to have sunlight upon them as they shone through the blue haze, and between the two a line of greyness overhung the sea and drifted, a mist, over the horizon line. Already I could see the brown sails coming round the western point of the bay, and at first I was surprised, for to land fish on a Saturday night would be the merest waste of labour. There are limits also to the activity of people who have lately been selling fresh fish to the farmer for use as manure.

I walked on more quickly. On the high ground was hardly a spray of heather but showed signs of withering. It is the chief beauty of the plant that once you have it underfoot again, you are not greatly concerned to consider whether it be newly opened or at the point of death. Moreover, the autumn gorse was all aflame and seemed to retain its fierce vitality though every little bush was cumbered with that thread-like parasite the dodder. Once, too, when I had left the waste country I passed a field, hedged with piled granite, a field in which only poppies and yellow mustard and coarse white "cherry-pie" could make shift to grow.

Already I fancied I could hear unwonted noises. When I came to the summit of the last hill and looked down upon the harbour I was certain. Also there were many people on the pier and—besides those who moved—certain black masses which might have been groups of holiday folk. I thought for a moment they had brought an excursion steamer to this Arcady! But there was no sign of such in the little narrow streets. The men, and those who would soon be men, stood about in the accustomed groups, glad indeed to have their freedom and to have donned their holiday attire, yet seeming a little at a loss for occupation. The barbers were busy. The little round meat market in the centre of the town looked like a toy. I took a narrow passage which led down to the sandy beach. Everything was eloquent of the day. Damaged fish were scattered here and there at the tide mark, but the boats lay idle, or, where drawn up high and dry, afforded resting-places to the ancients of the quarter. I crossed to the back of the harbour, passed by the rough granite building which was once a saint's chapel and is now only a shelter, and so gained the pier.

I saw at once that something was in the air. The motionless black masses I had taken for groups of people were huge piles of nets, but a multitude of men, women and children stood about, and one or two pilchard boats had come down from Lelant to be in readiness for the drift fishery when it should begin. The interest of the assemblage, however, was centred on some yawl-rigged boats, carrying seven or eight men apiece. From these the nets had been landed, as well as the great coils of rope which lay along the harbour wall and the broad step below it. Linen kit-bags, pillows and food bags had been thrown on to the quay, the great boom hauled inboard and laid with the sails and the sweeps under the starboard bulwarks. These boats were among the first which had returned from the North Sea herring fishery, and they had been long away. The women in the crowd were few; one imagined them busy with culinary matters at home. One very pretty girl walked with a youth at her side. There was something a little odd in their demeanour, a something which was presently explained by a cry from one of the boats. "Go it, Jim," said the voice, "do the best you can. You won't have much chance when Willie do come back." Evidently the swain was second string!

By this time it was grown late. Above the harbour hung a glow of dusky gold, and the clouds had broken up. I mounted the sea wall. At the extremity of the bay the revolving light shone on Godrevy. Between the flashes you could dimly see the white tower of the lighthouse. Inside of this was the vague line of low sandhills, and below them the white beaches glimmered faintly. A round moon was rising, golden at its upper edge, but mostly of an opaline pink in the blue haze. To right and left two boats were approaching the harbour. There was hardly a breath of wind. The dark sails swayed from side to side, and even to me, a mere spectator, it appeared that the boats would never get in. In one they were working the sweeps and that vessel swayed from side to side even more foolishly than the other. At length some men went out in a long white gig and gave the big boats a tow. They had hardly reached the pier head before I heard mention of a name already familiar. "Yes, Willie. You can go ashore at once," and a young fisherman clambered into the gig and so up the slippery steps to the quay. He looked about him and then disappeared.

The boats drew in, their nets were landed, the booms slowly and laboriously drawn inboard and made safe with the sails under the canvas covering. And gradually night settled down upon the harbour. Before I left on either side of it the lights were lit. At the back an old gentleman in a silk hat was giving a temperance address in the customary form of a reported dialogue between two quite impossibly idiotic persons. There was a Salvation Army service, disregarded like the address. The streets were still more crowded and now they were positively doing business in the toy meat market. I gained the station and took my place in the train. The harbour was out of sight but below me a quiet and lonely beach stretched to a low black point and above high-water mark a crowd of superannuated pilchard boats lay deserted. The moon had risen beyond the haze and taken its proper hue of gold, and the sea looked infinite.

The Viceroys of Ireland*

THE deplorable ignorance of Irish history even amongst well-informed persons cannot be better illustrated than by the appearance of such a book as Mr. O'Mahony's. It gives a true and even valuable account of the Irish viceroys of the nineteenth century, which indeed we may conjecture is the reason for the existence of the book; but while the story of the Plantagenet rulers of Ireland has a certain grotesque resemblance to the truth—the author had Gilbert's generally trustworthy account before him—that of the Tudor and Stuart rulers contains hardly a single accurate statement of date or fact, and that of the early Hanoverian viceroys seems to be gleaned from a cursory study of the less trustworthy eighteenth-century pamphlet literature. When we add to these remarks that the author nowhere explains the exact position of the persons he calls "viceroys," a title unknown to English or Irish law, and gives no account of the governmental machinery of Ireland, we shall have enabled our readers to form a just idea of the value of the work, which is, however, illustrated by a good number of portraits.

The relations between the English government and that of Ireland have been conditioned, between the Conquest and the age of steam, by the fact that while a message might cross the Irish Channel in a few hours, it might, on the other hand, be delayed for weeks or even months, and accordingly, that a great amount of power must be left in the hands of the Irish executive. It thus fell out that within a few years of its conquest Ireland was constituted an appanage of the Crown, and nanded over to John (1177) as Dominus Hiberniæ, Lord of Ireland. When John came to the throne in 1199 he retained the title, and it was not till 1254 that Ireland was again taken out of the direct control of the Crown, Edward, afterwards Edward I, being appointed Lord of Ireland in that year. On the death of Henry III the title again fell into the Crown, and our English kings remain Lords of Ireland till Henry VIII in 1542 assumed the title of King of Ireland.

The chief governor of Ireland was, for the first two centuries of English rule, called the Justiciar when he was formally appointed by the King, and Keeper of Ireland when he was elected by the Council to fill for the moment a sudden vacancy in the office. After the visits of Richard II. to Ireland the chief governor seems to have been for the first time entitled the locum tenens of the King, his lieutenant, while a governor elected to fill a sudden vacancy began to be called a Lord Justice. Occasionally, when the lieutenant was needed elsewhere by the Crown, a deputy was sent to fill his place. At the accession of the Tudors, therefore, three kinds of viceroys were known: Lord Lieutenants, Lord Deputies, and Lord Justices.

In Tudor and Stuart times the title of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was regarded as an honorary one, restricted to persons of the highest rank. The list of its holders includes Henry VII's uncle, Henry VIII when Duke of York, Sussex and Essex under Elizabeth, Strafford at the end of his career, and Ormonde. The actual government of the country was carried on by a Lord Deputy appointed by the Crown, or, in his absence, by Lord Justices nominated by the Crown and elected by the Council. The last Lord Deputy appointed was Lord Capell (1695-6); since his time the government has been carried on by Lord Lieutenants and Lord Justices. No accurate and complete list of the chief governors of Ireland exists; one of the Tudor and Stuart governors may be found in the tables of "Tudor and Stuart Proclamations."

The viceroy of Ireland had not unlimited power. The settled policy of the government was to appoint to the post, whenever possible, great English nobles unconnected with Irish affairs. Their power was always exerted through and shared by the Privy Council of Ireland, and they were continually held in check by the Lord Chancellor, who had greater patronage and controlled a larger armed force than the viceroy, and was usually a member of one of the great Anglo-Irish families. The internal politics of Ireland were for centuries ranged round this opposition of Viceroy and Chancellor, in which the nominal ruler did not always carry his point.

It is to be hoped that the History of Mediæval Ireland, which is long overdue, will be written, when it comes, by someone free from sentiment and familiar with English law as with Irish chronicles. Under the early Plantagenets Ireland, like England, was a country in which two nations dwelt side by side, one of freemen living under the King's law, and the other of serfs or outlaws outside its jurisdiction living under local customs; the difference between the countries being that in Ireland the second nation had a language and a literature preserved to our times, while in England a literature of the serf did not exist. The efforts of the Edwardian lawyers were devoted in Ireland, as in England, to extending the royal jurisdiction and bringing as many as possible of the King's subjects under his protection, until their ends were thwarted by the Scottish invasion on the one hand, and by the great earls on the other. But the royal power, which had extended over the whole island directly or mediately, never shrank to the extent that is commonly supposed. It is true that at one time the King's writ did not run outside the pale, but it must be remembered that till the reign of Henry VIII the King's writ did not run in Cheshire or Lancashire or Durham, and for the same reason the great palatinate jurisdictions of Ulster, of the Butlers, and of the FitzGeralds, had their own chanceries, and the royal writs passed through them. The authentic documents available for the writer of Irish mediæval history are few. Nearly all the ancient records of Ireland were burnt in 1302, and an enormous number of later ones were destroyed in Henry VII's time by O'Neill. All the records of the Privy Council were brought to England in Henry VIII's reign by Sir William FitzWilliams, and what fire spared of other and later records, neglect has done much to destroy. A great deal of early Irish history may be gleaned from English records, and something from the chronicles, but great gaps in our knowledge must always be left unfilled. It is to be hoped that some of the younger school of Irish writers will turn their attention to this almost unworked mine. What passes for Irish mediæval history at present is beneath contempt.

The Girlhood of Queen Victoria.

The Girlhood of Queen Victoria. A Selection from Her Majesty's Diaries between the years 1832 and 1840. Published by authority of His Majesty the King. Edited by VISCOUNT ESHER, G.C.B., G.C.V.O. Two Vols. Illustrated. (John Murray. 36s. net.)

THESE journals do not, perhaps, throw fresh light on the history of the period, neither can they be said to possess great literary charm. It was meritorious to write a journal in those days, and little Princess Victoria chronicled her doings because it was considered the correct thing to do. We read them with delight, struck by their wealth of picturesque detail, and as page succeeds page we watch with ever-growing interest the child developing into a woman, and trace some of the potent influences that went to the making of England's greatest Queen. There is nothing of the protégée in these journals, nothing brilliant or exceptional; Princess Victoria was simply concerned with setting down a description of her everyday life in a homely and unassuming way, without analysis of character and certainly with no striving after effect. Her education can be summed up in the typically Victorian word "accomplishments." She did not possess "high intellectual curiosity or fantastic imagination." Her soundness of judgment depended upon receptive qualities rather than upon creative faculties. Those who watched over her youth were content to foster, not great learning, but good sense, "and to inculcate high standards of private and public virtue."

The journals begin in 1832, when Princess Victoria was thirteen years of age. We find, even in her early entries, a marked regard for detail; she is careful to note the exact time she wakes up, dresses, has breakfast, and goes to bed. But through all the precise detail the child peeps out in her early entries, and there is no hint that some day she will become a Queen. She writes: "I received from the mayor an oaken box with a silver top, and filled with the famous Shrewsbury cakes." Again: "When I came home, I first worked, and then we blew soap-bubbles." She revels in such adjectives as "beautiful," "wonderful," and, in order to give special emphasis to her most choice observations, she writes certain words in capital letters quite as frequently as Charles Reade did in his novels. After returning from Drury Lane at ten minutes past twelve, she writes: "I was VERY MUCH AMUSED;" we like this frank admission, for even young princesses, in common with little girls generally, look upon the early bedtime hour as an atrocious parental arrangement only amusing when violated. The Princess is, perhaps, most truly childlike in the descriptions of her dog Dash. She writes: "I dressed DEAR SWEET LITTLE DASH for the second time after dinner in a scarlet jacket and blue trousers." On her sixteenth birthday she writes: "Dashy gave an ivory basket with barley-sugar and chocolate," and three years later that intense lover of animals described with pleasure the funny way young Prince Albert fondled her beloved dog.

In 1835 we find the Princess developing a critical faculty. Of a sermon by Mr. Pope she writes: "It was not one of his best sermons, and it was not to my liking." On perusing the journal of Mrs. Butler—the daughter of Charles Kemble—she expressed the opinion that the style and authoress were pert. Sound judgment, when we consider that the book in question was decidedly indiscreet. Lord Melbourne admitted that the Princess had read a great many dull books. It is amusing to observe that she did a portion of her reading, historical, biographical, and theological, while her hair was being dressed. Until the advent of Dickens's "Oliver Twist," it was not considered proper for young ladies to read novels.

On June 20, 1837, appears this momentous entry: "I was awoke at 6 o'clock by Mamma, who told me that the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Conyngham were here, and wished to see me. I got out of bed and went into my sitting-room (only in my dressing-gown), and alone, and saw them. Lord Conyngham (the Lord Chamberlain) then acquainted me that my poor Uncle, the King, was no more, and had expired at 12 minutes p. 2 this morning, and consequently that I am Queen." How simply this memorable event has been recorded! "Alone" suggests a good deal to one who had been guarded night and day with loving care, to one who "had never been permitted to walk downstairs without someone holding her hand." And yet, when the great crisis came, the young Queen rose to the dignity and responsibility of her new position. She who had cried, "I want to be good," found in her queenship the will of God. Her Ministers marvelled at her self-possession; but they soon learnt that her sweet face and girlish figure concealed a strong, finely wrought character. The Monarchy had suffered many indignities in the immediate past, especially during the reign of George IV; but with the accession of Queen Victoria a new epoch began, and under her wise and beneficent rule Great Britain was destined to become a wide and mighty Empire. In looking back upon Victoria's glorious reign, we like to recall the generous words she wrote on her Coronation day: "I really cannot say how proud I feel to be Queen of such a Nation."

The most fascinating pages in these journals are devoted to a description of the Queen's intercourse with Lord Melbourne, and it is a frank and refreshing eulogy of one who was worthy of her whole-hearted praise. Lord Esher writes in his Introduction: "He was no longer young, but he was not old. His person was attractive. According to Leslie, no mean judge, his head was a truly noble one, and he was a fine specimen of manly beauty in the meridian of life. . . . His laugh was frequent, and the most joyous possible, his voice so deep and musical that to hear him say the most ordinary thing was a pleasure, and his frankness, his freedom from affectation, and his peculiar humour rendered almost everything he said, however easy and natural, quite original."

Small wonder, then, that Lord Melbourne should have attracted the affectionate regard of a young and impressionable Queen. As Prime Minister he discussed the affairs of State with Her Majesty; explained difficult points with a patience that never failed him, and gave the gist of long and wordy dispatches with fatherly solicitude. How frequently she mentions this most estimable man, what he did, and particularly what he said, in her journals from 1837 until the day of her marriage! She found strength and inspiration in his very presence. Very often he must have relieved the tedium of Court life by becoming for the nonce Court Jester, or rather jester for the special benefit of the young Queen. Now Lord Melbourne is speaking disrespectfully about Dash's legs, and now the Queen is smilingly upbraiding her Minister for not going to church. Her Majesty thus records an amusing incident: "I couldn't get my gloves on, and Lord M. said, 'It's those consumed rings; I never could bear them.' I said I was fond of them, and that it improved an ugly hand. 'Makes it worse,' he replied; I said I didn't wear them of a morning. 'Much better,' he said, 'and if you didn't wear them, nobody else would.'"

Lord Melbourne must have laughed, perhaps with a tear in his eye, when the Queen asked him how she was to propose marriage to Prince Albert. The scene is thus quaintly described: "At about ½ p. 12 I sent for Albert; he came to the Closet where I was alone, and after a few minutes I said to him that I thought he must be aware why I wished them to come here, and that it would make me too happy if he would consent to what I wished (to marry me). We embraced each other, and he was so kind, so affectionate."

Greville writes of Lord Melbourne and the Queen: "I have no doubt that he is passionately fond of her, as he might be of his daughter if he had one, and the more because he is a man with a capacity for loving without having anything in the world to love." Greville, while paying a tribute to the Queen's First Minister, private secretary, and daily tutor, suggested that, with a change of Government, the dissolving of the relationship might be painful. When the parting came it was painful, but Lord Melbourne concealed his feelings. He rejoiced in the consummation of a pretty idyll. His one wish was for "the happiness and security of the young Queen," and that happiness and security she found in her union with Prince Albert. In 1839 she writes: "God knows no Minister, no friend, EVER possessed the confidence of the Crown so entirely as this truly excellent Lord Melbourne possesses mine." Three years later the Queen added this note: "I cannot forbear remarking what an artificial sort of happiness mine was then—kind and excellent as Lord M. is and was—and what a blessing it is I have now in my beloved husband real and solid happiness!"

What the Judge Saw.

What the Judge Saw. By His Honour JUDGE PARRY. (Smith, Elder and Co. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.)

WE have in our time seen many volumes of legal jokes and dicta. Probably none of them, unless we except Mr. Justice Darling's Scintillæ Juris, is entirely satisfactory. Of course, not one of these books can be read with anything like commensurate enjoyment with Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors and of the Chief Justices. The times are different. Where several volumes were formerly welcomed, a small book of this kind has now alone a chance of success. This is not the place to treat of the decay of literary taste. We hope we may on a future occasion deal further with this subject which we have already touched upon more than once.

The volume before us is in effect a trivial one, although it is quite readable in spare moments. Judge Parry does not claim to have partaken in any considerable degree of the reputation at the Bar which his father, Serjeant Parry, acquired for himself. Possibly Judge Parry was appointed to the County Court Bench somewhat too soon, because, as he says in a passage which we do not claim to quote quite accurately, the Bench is a position of isolation, whilst the advocate is daily brought in touch with personalities, both agreeable and instructive. There are many good stories of Sir Charles Russell, Gully, Aitken, and others whom Parry met on the Northern Circuit, but it must be confessed that the work as a whole is scrappy and without much literary merit. The chapter "That Reminds Me" is perhaps one of the weakest in the book, and was hardly worth the trouble of composition. The chapter on "Quarter Sessions," with which we are fairly conversant, is otherwise. We welcome the tribute to Justices' Justice, and we believe in the truth of the statement that "at the bottom of the heart of English folk there is a feeling of love for these old institutions, and after all—fair play to them—they work well, and make no more blunders in the administration of justice than any other courts, as the statistics of the Appeal Courts will testify." Judge Parry, it is true, a page later, quotes with apparent agreement Sam Weller's judgment that "there ain't a magistrate goin' as don't commit himself twice as often as he commits other people." We should not be surprised if Sam Weller's judgment were not to prove in future to be nearer the truth, having regard to the recent appointments made by Lord Haldane, than was true of the author's estimate of the occupants of the magisterial bench in older and more decent times.

As regards the Bar, we see no reason to dissent from the opinion expressed by a briefless cynic on the Northern Circuit, who was watching a third-rate encounter between barristers of different religions, and who said: "Parry, if I had my time over again, I should start the Bar as a Jew or a Roman Catholic." We certainly believe, as ourselves a disappointed cynic, that the two religions referred to know how to look after their own. Many other anecdotal passages could be quoted.

The main point which strikes one as of unusual interest is the pronounced liking of Judge Parry for the city of Manchester. We are quite aware of all the good people who pass their existence in that most dismal centre of the country, and it is apparent that the author's view of his surroundings was most favourably coloured by the cordial and genial friendships which he formed. The book is nicely printed, and got up in the usual style which we expect from the eminent firm who publish it.

The Letters of Lady Lyttelton

WE have frequently been told that the art of letter-writing is either dead or dying out, and that the reason for this dire calamity is to be found in the high pressure of modern life. A time may come when we may even type a love-letter, or dictate it to a stenographer. It is certainly pathetic to think that the majority of people are content with hurried notes, and have a mania for the abominable postcard; but it will be still more sad when we cease to read the correspondence of our great letter-writers. Literature does not contain a more happy medium of expression than a really finely written letter. We might, perhaps, very reluctantly spare Lamb's essays, but we could never dispense with his inimitable letters, for it is by his letters that we have learnt to know and love him.

Lady Lyttelton's letters cannot be compared with those of Mme. de Sévigné, or Lady Dorothy Osborne, or Lady Mary Montagu, for they are lacking in the literary flavour. There was no need for the last-mentioned to write to one of her correspondents: "Pray, my dear, begin at the top, and read till you come to the bottom," for no one is likely to skip Lady Mary's delightful correspondence. If Lady Lyttelton's letters are not stamped with abiding literary merit, they are, nevertheless, full of charm. She had the power of loving intensely, and that power alone would be sufficient to make her letters attractive. Her love was fortunately combined with a keen sense of humour, sometimes expressed in an irresponsible vein. Like Miss Austen, she could describe the various foibles of those with whom she came in contact, but with a raciness that might have surprised, even shocked, the subtle author of "Pride and Prejudice." Now she is in a religious mood; now describing the scene at some assembly, masquerade, or dance; now laughing at certain young men who went about with straws in their mouths and delighted to imitate their coachmen; now poking gentle fun at the arrangement of her father's library, or expressing her opinion of Napoleon; now at pains to describe the latest fashion to some feminine correspondent; and now, in her most pleasing vein, writing to her favourite brother, Robert, and telling him how, to her shame, she let out the secret of a great prize-fight. A change in the Ministry was not half so important as a change in the Spencer household when it necessitated a stranger dressing her hair. She frankly admits that she would rather dance a hornpipe on her head than faint in an assembly—an opinion diametrically opposed to that of Mrs. Bardell, who was willing to faint anywhere if there were a possibility of her falling upon a masculine arm.

After the marriage of Lady Sarah her letters deal largely with an account of her travels in Russia, Italy, and elsewhere. From Sweden she writes to her sister, Lady Georgiana: "Heaven bless you, my sweet dear Ginny! Why, to-morrow will be its birthday! And it will be nineteen. Well, I am sure I can't believe it. Well, God bless it, most seriously and earnestly do I pray, my dearest, slim, un-Swedish, kind-hearted sister-kin!"

The letters of 1830-1850 are of particular value, and will be generally regarded as the chief attraction of this volume. After the death of her husband, Lady Lyttelton was appointed Lady of the Bedchamber to Queen Victoria, and subsequently governess to the Queen's children. There was much that was stiff and dull about Court life, but Lady Lyttelton, thanks to her sense of humour, soon became accustomed to her new environment. She gives a most vivid account of her life at Windsor Castle, and is particularly happy in portraying the young Queen and the Prince Consort. With infinite delicacy, and yet with considerable enthusiasm, she writes of the happy married life of Queen Victoria: "We of the household staid in one room, while the Queen was with her family in another, and she staid long, and sang to them, and seemed quite snug." On one occasion Lady Lyttelton chanced to hear Prince Albert playing on his organ, and she was so struck by the music that she ventured to speak to him about it. "Oh, my organ!" the Prince replied—"a new possession of mine. I am so fond of the organ! It is the first of instruments—the only one for expressing one's feelings—and it teaches to play—for on the organ, a mistake! Oh, such a misery!" Lady Lyttelton has coined a new word—"wifeism." It exactly expresses those little but charming courtesies the Queen delighted to shower upon her husband. No matter how cold she might be, she must needs ask if the Prince would like another fire lighted before considering her own feelings in the matter. Victoria, in her domestic life, was wife, not Queen. In a hundred little ways she showed her dependence upon her husband in a manner that must have gratified one who was not understood, and therefore not appreciated, by a certain section of the British people. Lady Lyttelton writes:—

> Prince Albert is now quite well. Last I saw of him was half an hour ago. On the Queen fidgeting after some book, and saying, "Where can it be? Does it belong to me?"—"Everything belongs to you," was her husband's answer, with a most graceful bow of real chivalry. "No, no, no!" she replied, very red, and more than half really angry.

> How glad she would be to leave her throne for him, and "wash the feet of the servants of my Lord!"

We could quote much in a somewhat similar vein, and much, too, depicting scenes connected with the Royal nursery, but must be content with one more excerpt, in which Lady Lyttelton describes the Queen's birthday:—

> All is very auspicious here on this fête. We had a pouring morning, but all is now fair and fresh again. Princessy surtout, she looks the image of May Day, dressed in a very fine muslin frock, embroidered in wreaths of lilies of the valley and rosebuds, with an apron of bright green silk, embroidered to match, presents from the Duchess of Kent. The Prince is beautiful, too, in his sky-blue velvet. The Queen looks all over happiness. Her birthday presents (from Prince Albert) were arranged under a bower of magnificent flowers erected in her breakfast room. Never were there such flowers I do think as in this garden. . . The chief present is a beautiful sketch by Landseer of the Princess Tiny (Princess Alice), in a cradle lately given, which belonged to the old Saxon house. The child lies most nestly and "comfy" in it asleep, watched over by Dadie, the black terrier, with an expression of fondness and watchfulness such as only Landseer can give. It was prepared in secret by Prince Albert, who looks very rayonnant to-day, and made his appearance at eight o'clock in the morning in the nursery, in a handsome, many-coloured dressing gown, to fetch the children to "Mama."

The Cream of Parody

A Christmas Garland. By MAX BEERBOHM. (Wm. Heinemann, 5s. net.)

NONE but an abject misanthrope could resist "Max" when under the disguise of the court jester he proceeds to wield the lance of criticism. The bells jingle, there is a burst of laughter, and—the sharp thrust goes home; somebody of importance is unhorsed, with armour scattered and the real man showing for the merriment of the onlookers. As a rule, it is a kindly stroke, and no damage is done; occasionally, however, we feel a little sorry, as when in the present volume a parody of George Meredith's style is included; we wish that some heroes might be sacred from the jester—especially as he is the only one out of seventeen authors here presented who has passed beyond the reach of friend or foe.

In more than one of these sketches the question occurs as to what happens when parody becomes sheer correct imitation. If we have a few pages of Mr. Henry James so closely copied that we might be reading a passage from one of his books, where does the fun come in? Mr. Henry James has a style that is exceedingly easy to parody, and an under-current of charm that refuses to be parodied at all; hence we get the husk without the kernel, and, in spite of being vastly amused at the ingenuity of the mime, we feel rather that the effort is frosty. We read these pages some years ago in the Saturday Review, and remember a similar sensation. More thorough enjoyment comes from reading the wicked imitation of Mr. A. C. Benson, in which comes the sharpest thrust of any:—

> In boyhood he had felt always a little sad at the approach of autumn. The yellowing leaves of the lime trees, the creeper that flushed to so deep a crimson against the old grey walls, the chrysanthemums that shed so prodigally their petals on the smooth green lawn—all these things, beautiful and wonderful though they were, were somehow a little melancholy also, as being signs of the year's decay. Once, when he was fourteen or fifteen years old, he had overheard a friend of the family say to his father, "How the days are drawing in!"—a remark which set him thinking deeply, with an almost morbid abandonment to gloom, for quite a long time. He had not then grasped the truth that in exactly the proportion in which the days draw in they will, in the fullness of time, draw out. This was a lesson he mastered in later years. . . . .

This is really fine; it is precisely the right touch of exaggeration which reduces a method to absurdity, and incidentally shows how very near to absurdity that method is in its usual form. There are many other parodies as good. Mr. Wells, in his enthusiasm for the renovation and spring-cleaning of humanity, is hit off neatly in "Perkins and Mankind"; Mr. Galsworthy's impressive manner is changed by an impish skill into an oppressive manner in a dialogue wherein a nut is cracked with a steam-hammer—otherwise, "the genius of infinity, dispassionate, inscrutable, grey," broods over the question of keeping or not keeping a canary. If we quote one sentence only from the essay "of Christmas," supposed to be written by Mr. Belloc, it will be enough to exhibit another conquest:—

> There was a man came to an Inn by night, and after he had called three times they should open him the door—though why three times, and not three times three, nor thirty times thirty, which is the number of the little stone devils that make mows at St. Aloesius of Ledera over against the marshes Guela-Nuce to this day, nor three hundred times three hundred (which is a bestial number), nor three thousand times three-and-thirty, upon my soul I know not, and nor do you—when, then, this jolly fellow had three times cried out, shouted, yelled, holloa'd, loudly besought, caterwauled, brayed, sung out, and roared, he did by the same token set himself to beat, hammer, bang, pummel, and knock at the door.

The style of Mr. Arnold Bennett, of Mr. Hewlett, and of several other well-known men is pilloried; the least successful essays, in our opinion, are those on Shaw and the continuation of Mr. Hardy's "Dynasts." For the excruciating imitation of Kipling—duly embroidered and elaborated—we give hearty thanks; and from almost every page there is something worth quoting. We must conclude by recommending this latest achievement of "Max"—for not all these sketches are reprints—to all our readers who want an hour's real fun mingled with some very keen-edged criticism.

The Soul of a Tramp

A Tramp's Sketches. By STEPHEN GRAHAM. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)

THIS book is a record of a walk along the Caucasian and Crimean shores of the Black Sea and of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. It differs markedly from most books of travel, however, in that the author is less concerned with the things seen along the line of route than with his own spiritual emotions and experiences. As he himself says, "It is not so much a book about Russia as about the tramp."

Mr. Graham is among those who find salvation by going out into the wilderness. He reminds one at times of Thoreau. There is the same impatience with the meaningless restraints of civilisation, the same wild, exuberant delight in the freedom of Nature. But whereas Thoreau's withdrawal from the world had bred in him a certain scorn of humanity, Mr. Graham is overflowing with the milk of human kindness. He finds friends everywhere—among the peasants of the Russian steppes, in Eastern monasteries or Turkish bazaars. Thoreau was, alike by conviction and temperament, a pagan. The tone and temper of Mr. Graham's book, on the other hand, are those of the Christian.

So one is not surprised at the note of blitheness that runs through these pages. Often footsore, the wanderer is never weary. The world is full of unexpected delights. There is the joy of the road, the feeling of exhilaration that comes upon a man as he shoulders his knapsack and sets forth bravely into the Unknown, and there are quiet resting-places at the journey's end. Sunrise and sunset, the sound of the sea, the music of birds, darkness, and the coming of dawn—these things become invested with a new meaning to the man who has gone out into the wilderness to find his soul.

He has time, too, to think—and to pray. And prayer, Mr. Graham would have us believe, has an added effectiveness when offered amidst the silences of Nature.

> . . . Prayers (he writes) are strong out of doors, made in the presence of all the stars. One is compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses. There is calm all around and in one's own heart. The mysterous beauty of the starry sky reflects itself in the soul, and across its mirror sails the pale moon. My own body becomes a cradle in which the little Christ Child sleeps. There are angels everywhere. I am in universal keeping, for the stars are all looking and pointing to me. Because of the little Child the shepherds near by hear heavenly harmony, and journeying through the night to the land of dreams come the three wonderful old kings with gifts.

To have read "A Tramp's Sketches" is to have been lifted into a higher and rarer atmosphere. It is to have been made free, for a few hours at least, of the company of saints and heroes. This much we owe to Mr. Graham, who has added to English literature a book that, if we mistake not, is destined to endure.

The Alien Immigrant

The Promised Land. By MARY ANTIN. Illustrated. (Wm. Heinemann. 7s. 6d. net.)

FROM whatever point of view one looks at this book, whether as a psychological study, or as a photographic account of home life in the Russian Pale of Settlement, as a description of the struggles and hopes of the Russo-Jewish immigrants in the ghettos of the American cities and as an illustration also of their life in those of this country; or if one looks with the eye of the hardened novel-reader, who seeks merely amusement, it stands forth as a book quite out of the ordinary. It is the autobiography of a Jewish girl, who, when the story ends, is still in her teens. Born in comfortable circumstances in Russia, she undergoes with her parents what is too often the common lot of the Russian Jew, who, in the land of his birth, has practically to purchase from the corrupt local officials the right to breathe, and even often then finds that the other party to the bargain repudiates this right. The story is a narrative of fact, and no melodramatic details have had to be invented to enhance its interest. The intensity of this interest does not suffer thereby, and if the bestial excesses of a pogrom do not obtrude themselves upon Miss Antin's scene the pogrom atmosphere is sufficiently produced by the shadow of the pall which is ever over the Jewish subjects of the Tsar; and the appeal is intensified by the echo of anti-Jewish excesses in other districts which now and then falls upon the reader's ears.

To those who desire to study the conditions which prevail among the Jews of Russia this book, in which sincerity marks every page, will prove a necessity. Equally indebted to it will be he to whom the conditions in the foreign quarters of the great cities, American and English, are a matter of study, for Miss Antin, by means of her rare gift of literary photography, is able to create in her reader's mind a picture of the conditions in which she and her family lived after their migration to Boston. So far for the social economists. And it may be said that no one can now find justification for an attempt to influence public opinion or action on the Aliens Question until he has made himself master of the book. Further, the reader's prejudices must indeed be hardened and impervious if no impression is made by the naive and convincing narrative, which renders English literature once more a debtor to the alien element in the nation.

The psychologist will delight in the self-analysis by a mind which, although a very young one, is far above the average. Not often is so interesting a personality as that of Miss Antin made available for public dissection; under her hands her life story takes the form of a poem in which, as in the story of the Jewish race, pathos and humour are mingled, with the former greatly predominating. In fact, although the autobiography of one individual, this book may also be taken as the autobiography of Russian Jewry: many of the vicissitudes which befell the Antin family, both in Russia and America, are unfortunately only too common among the people to whom they belong. To illustrate the Russo-Jewish problem, one could quote page after page, and as a hint of what the book can teach on this subject we give the following passage, which, it should be remembered, is the record of a well-authenticated fact, but a fact unknown by those who experience a feeling of resentment when the Russo-Jewish immigrant crosses their path:—

> Some of these soldiers of Nicholas, as they were called, were taken as little boys of seven or eight—snatched from their mothers' laps. They were carried to distant villages, where their friends could never trace them, and turned over to some dirty, brutal peasant, who used them like slaves and kept them with the pigs. No two were ever left together; and they were given false names, so that they were entirely cut off from their own world. And then the lonely child was turned over to the priests, and he was flogged and starved and terrified—a little helpless boy who cried for his mother; but still he refused to be baptised. The priests promised him good things to eat, and fine clothes, and freedom from labour; but the boy turned away, and said his prayers secretly—the Hebrew prayers. As he grew older, severer tortures were invented for him; still he refused baptism. By this time he had forgotten his mother's face, and of his prayers perhaps only the "Shema" remained in his memory; but he was a Jew, and nothing would make him change. After he entered the army, he was bribed with promises of promotions and honours. He remained a private, and endured the cruellest discipline. When he was discharged, at the age of forty, he was a broken man, without a home, without a clue to his origin, and he spent the rest of his life wandering among Jewish settlements, searching for his family; hiding the scars of torture under his rags, begging his way from door to door.

The practice thus described has been abandoned by the Russian authorities; the account is, therefore, now but a matter of history. The spirit of inhuman cruelty which inspired it is, however, still alive, and it is the manifestation of that spirit which shows itself to the peoples of the West in the persons of the broken, cringing Russian immigrants who seek refuge on their shores. If only the inhabitants of the lands of freedom could be made to know the conditions from which the refugees who seek their hospitality have fled, their judgment of these outwardly unattractive human jetsam and flotsam would be less severe. In future, before judging the alien, might not the Englishman stop for a moment to picture how he himself would appear if his life history had been that of the average Jew in the Russian Pale?

"The Promised Land" stands out as a book far beyond the ordinary, and one that gives every promise of permanent life. As a living book dealing with living issues, it will still be read and enjoyed when many of its contemporaries have been forgotten. So long as the problems with which it deals remain unsolved, it will remain a text-book which no thinking Englishman or American will be able to afford not to read. The book is a window to a new world—the soul of the alien immigrant.

Shorter Reviews

The Doctor and His Work, with a Hint of His Destiny and Ideals. By CHARLES J. WHITBY, M.D. (Stephen Swift and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

DR. WHITBY'S book follows quite closely the lines one might expect from the title, and will prove interesting to both the lay and the medical reader, for whom it is clearly intended. An outline is given in the early part of the book of what course a student follows, of the relations between the general practitioner and the specialist, and between medicine and surgery, with an indication of how much they are both dependent on and independent of each other. The author speaks, too, of the trials and the triumphs of a doctor's life, of the many scientific advancements with which he must keep in touch, and of the necessity for him to do more than carry out text-book methods, which can be summed up by the saying:—"Treat the patient and not the disease." The important part of preventive medicine is insisted upon strongly, and, without doubt, quite rightly. Of course, all this information is collected from Dr. Whitby's own experience, and the only adverse criticism possible is that in places it is tinged with rather more pessimism than is warranted; this, however, is a small matter.

Later on Dr. Whitby shows what a large part the medical profession must play in the improvement of the race by introducing elimination of the unfit, by the improvement of unhealthy children, and the treatment of crime by methods that will tend to reduce it in some degree, by recognising it as a sign of mental instability. He is entirely right in saying that confinement in prison is more likely to confirm a criminal in law-breaking than to cure him of it, but there seems to be no real suggestion as to how this condition of affairs can be improved. He begins, apparently, with a strong conviction that the medical profession should be made to play a more important part in matters that are now chiefly the concern of the law and the Church; then, when he comes to methods, he seems to think that things if left to go on as they are will effect these changes without any forcing. He gives one the impression at first that he is going to advocate some drastic change, but one reaches the end of his book without finding any sign of it. It is not to be thought that we undervalue Dr. Whitby's work. This would be wrong, for he has excellently described the path the medical profession is following, and probably most of what he hopes for will come to pass. His book, however, is a descriptive rather than a constructive work.

Die Wirtschaftlichen Grundlagen des Modernen Kunstgewerbes in London. By Dr. BRUNO RANECKER. (G. Himmer, Munich.)

DR. RANECKER had heard much of a great Renascence in English Art. He has been over to London, looked in the shop windows, dined in the restaurants, "in die" man "eben geht," visited the Palace, His Majesty's, and the Museums, and he has gone away disappointed, or rather reassured in his Teutonic patriotism. And very soon he is asking why English industrial art is such a failure. The short interval that appears to elapse between the disillusionment and the question suggests to us the logical flaw that has been made most familiar by the example, "Have you left off beating your wife?" But we English are so accustomed to having our deficiencies pointed out and accounted for that every Nestor is sure of a welcome. Let us grant, then, that something is wrong with our art—it could hardly be otherwise, seeing that error is part of the connotation of humanity. Our art is being killed by commerce, though our snobbery is acting as an artificial stimulus to procure it a few more precarious days. An élite learnt art some time ago, and has been since communicating it to ever-narrowing circles. Without is barbarism. All this is perfectly true, but when and where was it not true? "There never was an art-loving nation"—Whistler was sometimes right. Dr. Ranecker is on newer ground when he suggests that the theorists of High Art have exerted a disastrous influence on general practice. William Morris and the founders of the "Arts and Crafts" were too doctrinaire; the antithesis between hand-work and machinery has been exaggerated into an absurdity, and the decadence of English decorative art, if it be a fact, may certainly be traced to a "Mangel der Anpassung der kunstgewerblichen Erziehungsmethoden an die Produktionsformen der Neuzeit." The same circumstance explains the anarchical position, in regard to economical laws, of the workmen. As. Dr. Ranecker very properly observes, "Wer Kunst will, hat die Pflicht, sich um den Künstler umzusehen." Adaptation is the law of development, and this thesis may have a beneficial effect by insisting that forces are not to be despised simply because they are new.

Marius, Saturninus und Glaucia: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Jahre 106-100 v. Chr. By Dr. FREDERICK WALTER ROBINSON, M.A. (A. Marcus and E. Webers, Bonn.)

THERE is not very much in the way of conclusion to this interesting study. The legend of the two sinister demagogues and the ambitious and gullible general is put on its trial and is discharged with hardly a stain on its character. The impression we had received at school is in the main a true one. Mommsen remains the man he was. In one or two details only we may have been misinformed: the respective rôles of Saturninus and Glaucia perhaps need reconsideration. Dr. Robinson thinks that the latter was "der erste, der im antisenatorischen Sinn politisch tätig war, woraufhin Saturninus sich ihm anschloss." The equivocal part played by the Equites is made a little more intelligible than before—"von den Gewalttätigkeiten der Volksführer wollten die Ritter nichts wissen." The whole story is of permanent interest; it is as good an example as we could wish to find of demagogy in a vacuum. The French Revolutionists were not so far wrong in working from classical parallels; political sums are easier to work out when the big factors due to modernity are eliminated. And, apart from more general political considerations, the subject is interesting as exemplifying the recurring problem of the soldier in politics. Dr. Robinson has written some pages about Marius as politician that might, mutatis mutandis, stand for many a modern warrior who has suffered shipwreck on the rocks of administration. We are even reminded of Napoleon—"der Glaube an seinen stern" on the one hand, and sudden flaws in the resolution, like that of Brumaire on the other. "Gesunder Menschenverstand . . . im Reden eine gewisse Schlagfertigkeit und würdige Ausdrucksweise," keep us still near to Napoleon; other qualities suggest more general application—"ein Misstrauen in sich selbst"—"die lange Ausübung eines absoluten Regiments hatte sein Verständnis für die verfassungsmässigen und üblichen Formen der inneren Politik, wie auch seine Geduld, nicht vermehrt." The catastrophe of the fall of Saturninus, connected with Cicero by the "pro Rabirio," is handled, for a work of this scope, almost dramatically. The jejune sources are well analysed; they are more fruitful and consistent than might be supposed. Even Appian the word-painter is not without his uses.

South America: Observations and Impressions. By the RT. HON. JAMES BRYCE. With Maps. (Macmillan and Co. 8s. 6d. net.)

WHEN a British Ambassador to the United States writes his impressions of South America we are justified in expecting a book worth the reading; but when this Ambassador bears a scholarly and literary reputation, such as that of Mr. Bryce, we anticipate something quite notable from his pages. We have, moreover, no reason to feel disappointed in these expectations. Concerning South America Mr. Bryce does not profess any important degree of local experience. This work is the result of four months' travel: not too liberal a period for the inspection of a continent such as that which lies to the South of the Isthmus of Panama. But these four months of travel have been supplemented by a study of South American affairs sufficiently deep to render in one sense the actual journal merely complementary to the research involved. As might have been anticipated, the result is displayed in an exceptionally well-balanced set of views. Mr. Bryce is little concerned with judgments here. These, in his opinion, do not come within the province of the passing traveller, and his continuance in this respect might well be imitated by many lesser authors.

Digitized by Google

The main portion of "South America" is devoted to the places and incidents along the route from Panama southwards along the Pacific coast, taking in the coasts of Peru and Chile and the inland Republic of Bolivia. After this we are taken northward along the Atlantic seaboard by way of Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil. To one who possesses some knowledge of these countries the accuracy of the observations is as remarkable as the selection of salient features. Perhaps some of the most interesting chapters in the book are those at the end of the volume on "The Rise of New Nations," "Relations of Races in South America," "The Two Americas," "Political Conditions," and "Some Reflections and Forecasts." The author has full scope for lucid reasoning here, and his ideas concerning the blending of the white and of the aboriginal races, and of the future of the various Republics are of peculiar interest. It is undoubtedly the absence of a racial question in countries such as Brazil and Paraguay which affords one of the greatest fields for speculation concerning the future. Mr. Bryce's unbiased reflections on topics such as these cannot fail to render immense services to all students of South American affairs. As to the volume itself, there is no doubt that this valuable work must appeal to a very large and general public.

The Favourites of Louis XIV. By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE. Illustrated. (Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

READERS of "The Favourites of Henri of Navarre" will gladly welcome this companion volume. The Court of the "Grand Monarque" offers a wide field for gossip, and "Le Petit Homme Rouge" avails himself to the utmost of the materials placed at his disposal. It is a sordid picture, though its accuracy is placed beyond all possibility of dispute. In the matter of morality, kings are conceded a licence which is refused to their subjects, but the gallantries of Louis XIV were the scandal of a shameless age. A physical degenerate—the catalogue of his complaints makes reading more instructive than edifying—the King figures in these pages as something not far removed from a moral imbecile. With unfailing tact and discretion, "Le Petit Homme Rouge" conducts us through the whole of the sorry business. La Vallière is succeeded by Montespan, and there is a plenitude of subsidiary episodes. The abandoned cynicism that characterised French society of the seventeenth century is portrayed with an unerring fidelity. Even the Church was tainted with it, though one recalls with gratitude the courageous protest of the Archbishop of Sens. Louis receiving Holy Communion with his mistress; Louis turning from Louise de la Vallière—who was, after all, the only woman who ever appears to have loved him disinterestedly—to the calculated embraces of Montespan: these are pictures from the contemplation of which one gladly turns to themes more wholesome.

But the study has a distinct historic value. In the introduction to this book "Le Petit Homme Rouge" maintains that, "although the Salic Law has debarred women from reigning in France, they have there wielded, directly or indirectly, more real influence than in any other country." He finds no difficulty in proving his thesis. The causes that contributed to the rise of the French Revolution have been variously defined, and the subject is one that is still constantly engaging the attention of the historian. One of them, at least, may be found in the Court of Louis XIV. "Le Petit Homme Rouge" is to be congratulated alike on the industry and research that have gone to the making of this volume, and on the candour with which an important phase of French history is here presented.

Spes Vitæ, and Other Poems. By ROBERT CALIGNOC. (G. Bell and Sons. 1s. net.)

IN January, last year, a little volume of poems entitled "Love's Protest" fell into our hands, and we expressed the opinion that any future work of Mr. Calignoc must receive the consideration due to a careful and capable artist. This new book by the same author is bound to win the approval of the critical reader. The opening poem of thirty pages, "Spes Vitæ," is a romance in blank verse, with the mysticism of the Celtic temperament for its dominant theme, and there are passages in it which reach a high level of accomplishment, in spite of an occasional slip into an awkward measure, such as the line, "But the keen spark snapped, and the lightning sang," which mars the effect of an excellent page:—

> . . . . The Saxon bloods rolls on
> Like an old van; his, whom we call the Celt,
> Surges in crimson foam, while tragic-wise
> He chides his lingering stars, cries out on Fate,
> And rattles at the Moon. In Heaven and Earth
> Two never were more sundered.

From the second half of the book, containing verse on various themes, the following sonnet, "Lux Amoris," stands out remarkably:—

> Come, Love, and solve me with thy subtle sight
> Those darker secrets which infest the mind,
> That Cynic men no more may justly write,
> Perusing thy fair face, that Love is blind.
> Illumine with thy penetrating ray
> The dusty chambers of the intellect,
> And, viewing her disuséd mansions, say
> What's sound or rotten, well or ill bedeckt.
> To thy o'ershadowing purposes we look;
> The thread that binds us to thee none can sever;
> Thou art the Heart of Life; from thee we took
> Our primal source, towards thee we're moving ever.
> O Love, the mind is to thy service plighted!
> If thou be wronged, how can she e'er be righted?

This sonnet has a genuine Elizabethan ring, and, being thought out instead of merely imitated, carries conviction. Many readers will prefer this section, with its lyrics and sonnets, to the lengthier title-poem; for ourselves, we have taken considerable pleasure in both parts, and can recommend the little book as one that stands a good deal higher in literary value and technique than some of the much-belauded work issued under names that are better known.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Algiers, The Sahara, and The Nile. By RACHEL HUMPHREYS. Illustrated. (Ham-Smith. 5s. net.)

HAVING read this book quite carefully, we are at a loss to account for the fact of its publication. The writer visited Algiers, and went down into the Sahara as far as Biskra, whence we get references to "The Garden of Allah" and "Hichen," by whom, we presume, the author intends "Hichens"—at least, that is what we have always heard him called. The camel is designated "The Ship of the Desert," and there are some grammatical tangles in which singular and plural quarrel with each other to an almost unbelievable extent. The following two sentences concerning Algerian women will serve as sufficient example: "She is evidently a toy to the rich and a beast of burden to the poor. They are simply bought in marriage; the man never sees the face of the bride till the wedding day." Again we find "these sort of things" and other crudities, which, even if the book were above the average, would mar its effect.

The book, however, is below the average rather than above, for it is a mere list of things seen on two ordinary tourist trips, one to Algiers and one to the Nile. There are two ways of making these lists, and the author has chosen the wrong way, for there is no colour in the book, no special point of view to make the narrative interesting, nor any one thing to lift it above commonplace tourist level, while the photographs which accompany the letterpress are sometimes bad, and sometimes very bad. Bearing in mind "Hither and Thither," which Mr. W. J. Ham-Smith published a short time ago, and remembering the very high level maintained throughout that work, we are rather surprised at such a book as this, in which no one page bears evidence of originality or of thought whose expression would benefit readers.

Fiction

The Streets of Ascalon. By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. (Appleton and Co. 6s.)

THE trouble with Strelsa Leeds, widowed after two years of hateful married life, and beginning the world again after two more years of retirement, was that she tried to consider herself as other than physical, rejected love's material side. In this frame of mind she cannoned against Rix Quarren, an idler, who stiffens into a man through his love for the platonic-minded young widow. Enough of her past is shown to enable us to understand her view that platonic friendship is the highest form of affection, but at times we feel inclined to shake her and demand that she shall be reasonable, just as Quarren must have felt.

How these two settled their lives, the reader of the book must find out for himself, and it will prove a pleasant search. There are a host of other characters in whom we feel more than passing interest; the "belted earl" with his taste for vaudeville; the author who believes in himself and his mission, and who is not a little disgusted when a book of his turns into a "best seller" because it happens to contain a good story as well as a moral; the villain of the piece, who meets with just retribution in a scene which once again proves Mr. Chambers' capacity for grim, strong writing, as well as for brilliant dialogue and luminous descriptive work. And there are two or three little love stories in the book—a captious critic might complain that there are too many of them—with which we cannot do other than sympathise. Mr. Chambers, though he writes of the very highest of New York society, gives us neither heroes nor heroines, but just a dozen or so of faulty people like ourselves. Their reality disarms criticism—here are real people, real passions, and consequently real romance.

Bachelors' Buttons. By EDWARD BURKE. (Herbert Jenkins. 6s.)

THE format of this book reminds us of a certain old firm, long and justly celebrated for the production of works artistic in type and appearance. The matter, we must own, is scarcely up to the same level, for, witty and amusing though it is, the shy bachelor is a trifle overdrawn. We find it hardly possible to believe that a man of forty should be such an innocent, to put it frankly, and this to a certain extent mars our enjoyment of the little slips he makes, previous to exchanging bachelors' buttons for wedded bliss. We confess, however, that it is excellent fooling, and certain remarks here and there strike us as perfect gems. For instance, the old gardener: "I've alluys intended to remain a bachelor, D.V.—or not!" Things of this kind are plentiful, and add to the joy of the book; but while granting that the shyness of the bachelor hero might lead him into some of the errors set down here, we cannot help wishing that he were not quite such a fool. This over-drawing does not apply to the other characters, for they are excellent representations. "Pansy" is simply delightful as the managing sister-in-law, who, now that Edward has come into a fortune, would fain superintend his household for him, and arrange for everything, with the exception of his own comfort. On nearing the end of the book, we decline to believe that our bachelor is deficient in courage so far as facing the other sex is concerned, for he married a woman named Sophonisba. And surely no greater proof of courage than that could be required of any man.

Faustula. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

THERE is a certain similarity between this book and "Quo Vadis," although the author treats not of the time of Nero, but of the brief period of persecution to which Christians were subjected in the time of the Emperor Julian. And, whereas he slurs over the unpleasant details of his theme, the great Pole did not scruple to give us all the picture. We feel that the motif of this book is the persecution to which Faustula is subjected, and yet two-thirds of it are taken up in telling how Faustula arrived at years of discretion as a vestal virgin. There appears to be much preparation—or rather introduction—and very little story. We must confess that our sympathies for the most part lie with Faustulus, the heroine's pagan father. Faustula herself is rather pale and ineffectual, and the book ends with an anti-climax which neutralises its power to a certain extent. At the same time the author strikes a note of true pathos at intervals; we wish those intervals were not so far apart. As an historic study, the book is quite interesting, for the most minute details of Roman life are punctiliously correct, and the descriptions of scenery are attractive. Mr. Ayscough writes, however, not as a Latin viewing his own country, but as one who views Rome and the Sabine hills from afar. We feel that the scenes are foreign to him, that he has failed to enter entirely into the spirit of his work, and that he tells his story rather as a dispassionate historian than as a novelist to whom his characters are real and living.

The Clay's Revenge. By HELEN GEORGE. (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.)

THE publishers announce on the wrapper of this book that the story is "undoubtedly painful in the ruthlessness of its analysis," and we hasten to agree with them. As for "the fateful march of its plot," to which they also refer, we are not quite so sure about this. The story is that of Bertha Hammersley, who, having married a man who loved her with his brain—one whose face the author describes as delicate and classical—finds after a time that the clay in her asserts itself. The man through whom this assertion becomes evident is a mere brute, one to whom Bertha appeals physically, and who seems capable of response to no other than physical appeal. She, in her turn, cares little for him. It is the clay that drives her, the instinct which lies dormant in many women far too long, thus rendering possible such marriages as that which Bertha made. Throughout the book our sympathies are with the woman. Neither of the two men attracts us in the least—perhaps they were not meant to do this. "The Clay's Revenge" is, in fact, an artistically ugly production, a book which convinces while it repels. At the same time it is no mere piece of sensationalism, but a story that conceals a fine lesson.

The Theatre

"Officer 666" at the Globe Theatre

IF the general public likes to be amused without bothering itself about anything in particular, except sheer enjoyment, Mr. Augustin MacHugh's melodramatic farce will have a victorious career. For nothing quite so brisk and amusing has been imported from America—with the very bloom of New York still fresh upon it—for many a long year. Mr. Wallace Eddinger is a delightful young millionaire, Travers Gladwin, who returns to his home just in time to try and prevent his extraordinary collection of pictures being stolen from his fine house in Upper Fifth Avenue. These pictures, by the way, seem to be the only thing in the play lacking in the right touch of melodramatic farce. They are too bad to be a satire, and, besides, all the American millionaires I have known understand all about pictures and the other arts, and would never be taken in by such a quaint array of quite impossible copies. But, no matter, Mr. Gladwin believes in them, and the most agreeable thief of the modern stage, Alfred Wilson, played with a fine spirit of elegant convention by Mr. John Miltern, likes some of them, and determines to cut them from their frames.

For this purpose he poses as Gladwin, and is duly confronted by the real person of that name. Incidentally, the sham Gladwin wishes to marry, secretly, of course, the most beautiful girl in the world, Helen Burton, made delightful by Miss Viva Birkett. This lady has been seen and loved at sight—one cannot doubt that for a moment—by the real Gladwin, and thus the affair of the pictures and the lovely lady begins. Everyone will go and see "Officer 666," so will know all the spirited complications that grow quite naturally out of the affair. The audiences will be immensely diverted by the new sort of cheeriness of Mr. Eddinger, the skill of Mr. Sam Sothern as the millionaire's friend—an Englishman with a slight Cockney note in his voice so as to convince the Americans—and with the humour of Mr. Dan'l Moyles, who as "Officer Phelan 666" lends his uniform to both the real and the pseudo Gladwin, with highly amusing results. Miss Birkett, as the beloved of everyone, is worthy of great admiration, and is cleverly supported by Miss Helen Ferrers and Miss Enid Leslie.

Among many other new ideas Mr. MacHugh gives us a strange Japanese servant and a crowd of little tricks and happy turns which keep the play lively from the starting gate to the winning post. In fact, the thing is as swift as a good race at Newmarket, and as invigorating and entertaining. Like the French maid in Mr. Max Beerbohm's latest novel, the author appears to be one of those who are born to make chaos cosmic. For from the wildest melodrama and the most impossible farce he evolves some hours of charming fun. Some people may remember the sort of revolutionary effect that the coming of "The Belle of New York" wrought upon musical comedy.

I have no doubt that Mr. Winchell Smith's production of "Officer 666" will have much the same result upon our farces, and that we shall be as grateful to him later on as we are delighted by his neatness, care, and speed at the present time.

"A Venetian Night" at the Palace

AS advertisement agents, the censorate which now reigns would appear to be, in value, above rubies. The booking for the first night of Mr. Carl Vollmöller's wordless play was immense; the fine house was packed in every part. And this Venetian night's entertainment deserved a good audience, for it is curious, interesting, and sometimes the episodes are exhilarating, and often macabre after the fashion of the late seventeenth century in Italy. The story is one of the most lucid we have seen in wordless play or pantomime. Miss Maria Carmi appears as an exquisite young marquise who comes as a bride to an old-fashioned hotel with her elderly, unattractive groom, Mr. Klein. It is the year 1860 when the Austrians occupied Venice. She has a lover in a splendid Austrian officer, Mr. Hans Felix. On the evening of her wedding she wants to hint to him that her marriage is a business arrangement of her excellent parents. At the moment when she leaves her wedding party and proposes to see her lover on the bridge of a canal, a Young Stranger, Mr. Biensfeldt, sees and of course loves her—for is she not Miss Carmi in the most delightful 1860 frock? The Stranger thinks the flower she lets fall is for him; it is really for the lover. After this the episodes are of a wild and passionate dream in which the Young Stranger and the other characters do many weird and exciting nightmarish actions, and during which Miss Carmi acts with superb elegance, power, and skill. After adventures of the maddest kind—in which a revolving stage is of great value, the Stranger awakens to find that the bridegroom who, alas! has been drinking, has fallen heavily across his bed. The rest is simple. Everyone is awake. It was a dream. And yet when the gondola puts out from the hotel the Austrian lover sits very closely to the bride; the groom has to pay a very long bill, and the Stranger who watches from the bridge knows that the flower was not for him and gently drops it on the passing boat. Apart from this little story there is an immense amount of pantomime fun in "A Venetian Night."

People in all sorts of gay costumes dance many lively dances, and are smacked and dragged and pushed about to very festive music written by Mr. Friedrich Bermann. All this is, in a way, in the picture, and is made entertaining by the beggar boy who, I presume, is the Pipistrello of Mr. Ernsh Matray. After these thirteen merry, tragic, dramatic and knockabout episodes one is left wondering what it was the censor censed. Really the management ought to ask us to a répétition generale now and then. But why Prof. Max Reinhardt in such enormous letters? Any clever stage manager could produce these admirable effects without overworking himself.

"A Penny Bunch" at the Vaudeville

THE astute reader, as Mr. Neil Lyons calls one, is, no doubt, familiar with that writer's studies of town and country life; therefore he will the more greatly enjoy this excellent little play, which is founded on an interlude in his recent book, "Clara," and which, I think, I have also read in some other publication. On the stage, in the hands of Miss Esmé Hubbard, Mr. Eliot Makeham, and Miss Lilian Mason, "A Penny Bunch" retains much of the vivid charm and the queer picturesque realism of the story. Mr. Henry Seton aids Mr. Lyons in the dramatisation of the episode, which tells how Poppy, who sells violets, and her elderly friend, Miss Moon, who deals in flowers suitable for the 'ome, are both interested in Mr. Alf Beeny—in different ways—and how Miss Moon helps the lovers to get over the little difficulty of telling one another that each in their time has been "in trouble." The charm of the play, as of the written story, lies in the humorous, sympathetic, understanding attitude of the author. But Miss Hubbard makes Poppy even more real and amusing than she appears in the book, and thus a most attractive prelude is provided for the entertaining adaptation of "Le Mariage de Mlle. Beulemans." We hope that the authors may allow us to see many other of the episodes from "Arthur's" and "Clara" on the stage.

EGAN MEW.

Exhibitions at the Grosvenor and Leicester Galleries

NEAR the site of the famous old Grosvenor Gallery, and named after it, fine spacious new galleries have recently been opened, at which the inaugural exhibition of modern pictures is now being held. The catalogue states that "there has been no attempt to make the exhibition anything but representative of the seasonal output of acknowledged and rising artists of this country," and though the result is not very striking as a whole, the exhibition contains, in addition to the one room devoted to the work of Walter Greaves, a number of interesting paintings. These may be seen under most satisfactory conditions, as the catalogue states, especially in the matter of lighting, which is, of course, the chief problem of a picture gallery. The subdued splendour of the decorations, however, does not recommend itself to us as a setting for such work as, for instance, that of Mr. Greaves, and one is tempted to wonder whether it may have been a previous sight of the "conditions" which tempted Mr. Lavery to give, as he does in the catalogue, the names of the six titled ladies to be seen bathing in his "Venice," some of whom appear as mere specks of colour in the distance! This picture and "The Beach, Tangier," are, however, much more interesting than the "Portrait of an Officer" by the same painter. One of the best paintings in this room is a lovely "Evening at Benares," by Mr. W. Rothenstein, seen with a haze hanging over the water, and conveying a remarkable impression of stillness, not wholly dependent upon the stiff uprightness of the figures with their orange and green and red clothes. Not far from this picture is a beautiful portrait —presumably it is a portrait—"Girl in Spotted Frock," by Miss Edyth S. Rackham. It represents a girl in a simple Victorian dress, against a dark background, her head bent forward and her arms folded, intent and serious and full of expression. There is also a lovely little grey, blue, and white study of a lane, "Little Rissington," by Mr. C. J. Holmes, in this room, next to which are some of Mr. S. J. Peploe's brilliant "Tulips." There is work here, too, by Mr. Chowne, Mr. Von Glehn, Mr. Greiffenhagen, two clever pictures by Mr. Philip Connard, and a portrait of Mr. Shannon by himself.

In the Long Gallery, the chief thing is Mr. Orpen's "Blue Hat," a picture full of such beauty as the mention of this painter's name must bring to mind. It is a half-length of a girl with a laughing face and a bit of blue in her hat. A large canvas, "The Celestial Globe," by Mr. W. Strang, hangs at the bottom of the room, and dominates the gallery on account of its size and individuality. It combines pattern with a sort of realism, and is much more attractive than the "Portrait Group" by the same painter, which is commonplace and lacks the decorative quality of the other, and of "The Laughing Girl" and "The Flower." Near Mr. Strang's work, and contrasting strangely with it, is "An Abbé," by Mr. Frank Craig, which in feeling and treatment might have belonged to another age; but it is very good. This and the small gallery also include work by Mr. Harrington Mann, Mr. Buxton Knight, Mr. T. Austen Brown, Mr. Anning Bell, and others, among them being a certain number of water-colours. There is also Mr. Rothenstein's "Romance," a delightful and fantastic thing, which, like Mr. Cayley Robinson's beautiful "Jeu d'enfant" in tempera, and some others, has been previously exhibited. Lastly, there have been added, in a separate small room, Mr. A. Rothenstein's designs for the costumes in "A Winter's Tale," about which much has already been written. They are delightful and full of originality, and it is unnecessary to dwell on their extravagances.

The chief interest of the exhibition, however, belongs to the room in which a number of the paintings by Mr. Greaves, which were not among the collection that attracted so much attention at the Goupil Gallery last year, are now to be seen. It is a wonderful collection, and one forgets to criticise before such expressions of pure beauty as "The Nocturne, Battersea: Opal and Gold," "A Grey Note, Battersea," or "Green and Silver; the River Walk," with their lovely half-vanishing figures, their beauty of still nights and calm water. The fact that Greaves was not the first to paint these things in this special way, but that he did paint them so exquisitely, makes his achievement the more remarkable in one sense, while the fact that he was unknown during Whistler's lifetime should surely increase the honour due to his work.

At the Leicester Galleries, the Hogarth Room, devoted to the work of Mr. George Clausen, makes one of the most interesting one-man exhibitions of the year. It is not easy to write of Mr. Clausen's work, because one would like to say so much more than is possible in the comparatively few lines available. There are paintings here which it is impossible to forget, and one or two which one can only regret should be placed anywhere but with "The Girl at the Gate" in the national collection. "A Little Fair Child," a three-quarter length of a little girl standing in a field, with her hands on the posts of a gate, is one of these. Though, of course, all Mr. Clausen's work has not the completeness and inevitableness of this painting of a child, there is something of its quality, the unselfconscious depth of sight and feeling, the strength of expression, the exclusion of all irrelevances, whether in such paintings as the "Rickyard in Shower" or "Harvest Time," or again in those like "The Three Diggers," in which he is most noticeably the descendant of Millet. The large canvas "Rejoicing after Rain," illustrates in another way one essential aspect of the resemblance of Mr. Clausen's work to that of Millet—his treatment of the relationship of mankind and Nature. In this picture one cannot tell whether the sense of rejoicing is expressed more in the forms of the men and women painted in the foreground, or in the beauty of the clearing sky and the fresh colour of the fields. There are one or two portraits in the collection, and a few pastels, as well as a certain number of water-colour sketches, which, probably executed as studies, were hardly worthy to be included in this exhibition.

The adjoining room at the Leicester Galleries is devoted to Mr. Arthur Rackham—the old, and, as we think, the real Mr. Rackham of "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens," for the excursions into the Ring of the Nibelungen, beautiful as some of the individual drawings were, certainly lacked the spontaneity and freedom which characterises his best work. The present exhibition of illustrations to Æsop's Fables, with their exquisite humour, their sensitive pen-line and design, is a convincing proof that Mr. Rackham's genius has nothing to do with tragedy.

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

ON Monday, young Agar-Robartes told a good story of an Englishman and an Irishman who clubbed together to buy a cow. When the purchase was complete, they tossed up as to who should own each half; the Irishman won, and chose the hindquarters; the Englishman had to take the head and shoulders, but quickly found out that he had the worst of the bargain, for he had to do all the feeding, whilst the Irishman took all the milk. This puts the case of Irish finance into a nutshell, for the Home Rule Bill provides for forty-two members still to sit and vote at Westminster. "Considering we pay the deficit," he continued, "it would be more in accordance with the fitness of things if we sent forty-two members over to Ireland to look after our money and see that it was properly spent." Young Robartes is a Cornish Radical who likes to show his independence by wearing his hat at the back of his head and occasionally having a fling at the Government. He is well reported in the Western Daily Mercury, and farmers throughout the Duchy chuckle and say in the language of Arnold Bennett: "That young Tommy is a card."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Atherley-Jones was another Radical who wagged his head gloomily, and said the number ought to be greatly reduced.

Asquith trotted out the old argument that, after all, Home Rule was only a form of devolution, and Ireland, as a partner in the Empire, ought to have some representation in the Imperial Parliament.

F. E. flatly declared he did not believe the Government ever intended to bring in Home Rule Bills for Scotland and Wales, and the Unionists cheered when they remembered the Premier's promise that the reform of the House of Lords "was a debt of honour which did not brook delay." Government promises were a form of currency that had become debased.

Birrell did not put up any fight at all, and Balfour waltzed round him, pinking him here and there with his rapier. "The Home Rule Bill showed no signs of being part of a homogeneous whole. If that had been the case, why was Ireland given separate Customs and a separate Post Office?"

Were we going to have separate Customs between Wales and England or Scotland and England? "No!" yelled the Liberals. "Very well, then, what becomes of the plea that Home Rule is only an instalment?" But, as I have said times without number, argument is of no use. The big battalions flocked in as half-past ten struck, and the guillotine fell. Only one amendment had been discussed, thirty-five were killed, with the result that in a clause of thirty-two lines only two and a half received any consideration at all.

Wednesday.—Turning over the events of yesterday, I do not think the opposition to the Bill is being as well stage-managed as it should be. Too much time is devoted to one amendment; a few front bench men speak far too long. These speeches do not get properly reported, and we have few divisions. What would be far better would be to have short, sharp criticism and many more speeches of brief duration, and many more divisions on the various amendments. This would keep the Radicals on the run, and the papers would be bound to report the amendments and the divisions. As it is, the Press take little notice of the discussion. This afternoon Austen spoke for an hour on the financial resolutions. It is true he is an ex-Chancellor—but an hour! However, before he was on his feet, one or two interesting things occurred. Banbury asked his question as to whether Stuart Samuel should resign on account of his firm making a profit on the Indian silver. The Prime Minister in reply said the law officers were considering the matter. "Very well," said Banbury, "I'll repeat the question next Monday."

Some time ago the Government appointed a Select Committee to consider the financial relations between England and Ireland. Asquith was asked to publish the names of the Committee, and declined, but said he would publish the evidence if there was a general desire. A petition was got up, but Asquith declared that it was not sufficient, so the pertinacious Godfrey Locker-Lampson got up another signed by 344 members, or more than half the House, and yet Asquith said it was not enough. Remnant, who is a truculent interrupter, bawled out that the Government only had a majority of four last Friday. "Was that a proof of the desire of the House?" Asquith, in the words of the Savoy opera, said: "That had nothing to do with the case."

Herbert Samuel proposed that we should hand over one and a half millions to Ireland, and spoke soft words. It would not be for long, and soon Ireland would be contributing to the Imperial Exchequer, whereupon one Unionist member, in the current slang of the day, said: "I don't think."

Philip Sassoon, the new member for Hythe, made an excellent maiden speech. All maiden speeches are generously called excellent, but this really was above the average, and he gained the goodwill of the House by his modest bearing.

Bonar Law wound up with a slashing speech delivered at a tremendous speed. At present we were pledged to complete land purchase, but he warned the Irish that they could not expect old-age pensions to be paid as well. He was quite willing to pay the Irish deficit so long as she remained a part of the United Kingdom, but if she demanded independence the case was entirely altered.

There is a French saying to the effect that "nothing is more possible than the unforeseen," and it looks as if Welsh Disestablishment will have a more stormy career than Home Rule. On Friday afternoon Asquith came down to move that the Committee stage must be limited to nineteen days.

Alfred Lyttelton in a reasoned amendment declared that "a Bill which during the admitted suspension of the Constitution proposed to disestablish, disendow, and dismember the Church of England in Wales—being the oldest and largest Christian body in the Principality—which is supported by members of the Government as a preliminary to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in England, and has never received the sanction of the country, requires the full and unfettered consideration of this House, and this House declines to apply any restriction to its discussion." The battle was fast and furious all the afternoon. It reminded Mr. Asquith of his pledge that there should be the fullest discussion, and taunted him that, if he did not, he would be dishonouring himself and dishonouring his country.

Little Ormsby-Gore was in a towering passion. "You kick us because we are small. You are bullies in office. The resolution is that of a bully who is a coward. You dare not have discussion." The learned and academic Cripps, usually so placid and judicial, declared that the Bill was a "tyrannical resurrection of mediæval reactionary jealousy and intolerance." Griffith-Boscawen charged Sir Alfred Mond with contributing largely to the party funds for despoiling the Church, although he was regarded to have a larger income than that of the whole of the Church in Wales.

Mond jumped up, and denied the latter, but it was noted that he by implication admitted the former allegation. "Yah, Ap-Mond!" said a Unionist wag.

The Treasury bench was deserted, and then it leaked out that a hastily summoned Cabinet meeting had been called on account of serious news which had just arrived from the Balkans. McKenna came in to explain this, and replied for the Government, but his speech was punctuated by a running fire of comment and interruption from the Opposition, which culminated in the Speaker rebuking Paddy Goulding, who would not sit down, but kept rising to his feet and yelling fierce retorts to McKenna. McKenna asked if this was a sample of the free discussion the Opposition craved. As a matter of fact, I think it is not wise to interrupt McKenna. He does far more harm to his own cause by his statements if they are quietly listened to; but Winterton, Goulding, Remnant, and other backbenchers will never see this. The debate was eventually adjourned at five, and will be continued next Friday.

Like almost everything else in the world, the backbone of the Home Rule Bill is money. On Monday the Speaker sat in the chair, and the report or final stage of the money resolutions was down for discussion; but before that came on Asquith announced that there "were grave doubts" as to whether Stuart Samuel should go or not, and therefore, "according to precedent," he proposed to set up a Select Committee to decide the point. No man is more keen on precedent than the Premier when it suits him. The Opposition jeered.

Then our "Peckham" got up to move an amendment, of which he had given written notice, limiting the expenditure by England on Ireland to £2,500,000. When a young man lives at home, his father is willing to keep him; but if he chooses to set up for himself—well, it is a different thing; he must look out for himself. Banbury was against giving the Irish lad a blank cheque, and so limited it to the sum named. It was an intricate subject, and most people went away to tea, or to write their letters, whilst Herbert Samuel began one of his pooh-poohing speeches: Banbury's motion was so preposterous that he did not take much trouble to refute it.

The keen-eyed little Jerry MacVeagh and the deliberate Thomas Esmonde, who is, or was, an Irish Whip, however, took the trouble to go over to the door and remark to the Whips: "I say, you chaps, aren't you rather short? There seems to be a devil of a lot of the Opposition about! We shall be pleased to put up some men to talk, if you like." But the Whips replied lazily: "No, thanks. We have about forty, and that's quite enough to go on with." So the Irishmen went away doubtful, but comforted. Mike Thompson replied to the Infant, and then, as no one got up, the Speaker put the question at 4.13. The bells started ringing, and members lounged in. Like lightning the news spread that something was wrong. I went to the Government Lobby, and waited until "All out" at 206 was pronounced; I then struggled down to the other end. The Unionists were still pouring through. There was a tense pause; the Government Whips, with their numbers ready, were waiting for the other side. The Bar was densely packed as "Peckham" and dear old Pike forced their way through, wreathed in smiles. They made a bee-line for the right of the table. The House knew at once what this meant. The whole Opposition rose to their feet—they stood on the benches, both above and below the gangway, completely hiding the Irish—and yelled until the roof rang again. For four solid minutes they kept it up; they threw their notice-papers up in the air; they waved their handkerchiefs whilst Illingworth and the other Whip slowly took their places on the unaccustomed left.

"The Ayes to the right are 228; the Noes to the left, 206," said Banbury.

Then the cheering broke out again.

Neither Bonar Law nor Asquith was in the House, but both were hastily sent for. After the Speaker had announced the figures, Bonar Law rose first, evidently with the intention of asking what the Government intended to do. Asquith rose an instant later, and, of course, had precedence. Bonar Law gave way, and Asquith, with ashen face, moved "that the House do now adjourn."

Again the tumult began. As Asquith left the chamber, he must have heard yells of "Good-bye, Asquith!" "Thank God, England is saved!" "Bang goes £400 a year!" and other phrases. I went off to send a wire over to Taunton. The House was up at 4.28 p.m., and, if it arrived at 5, the glad tidings would help to swell the majority I felt sure we should get.

For two hours members hung about the Lobby and Smoking-Room. "It is a paralytic stroke for the Government," said one. "I never knew a Government survive for long after so serious a reverse," said another. "It was a snap," said a third. "Nonsense—your men were earnestly requested to be present at 4, and your whip was double-lined," said a Unionist in the know. "Common form only," was the reply. "Well, it was a pity your men did not take common trouble to attend on the report stage of a money Bill," chimed in another Unionist: and so it went on. The Irish were very angry. Some said "Asquith was riding for a fall." I was sorry for Illingworth. He is a nice fellow, and this is the third reverse he has had; however, as he passed through the smoking-room, in reply to our condolonces, he bravely said: "It's nothing; it will only mean a few days' delay." We shall see.

"Things are jolly rocky on the Continent," said a youthful diplomat. "What will they say if we have a general election now? They will never understand it —they will say we are divided amongst ourselves." "Nonsense," said the more robust member for Hammersmith. "If there is any question of war, we should unite as one man under Asquith, whatever our politics"; and I leave the great day at that.

Every paper last night and every paper on Tuesday morning had the single announcement, "Defeat of the Government," and everybody flocked down to hear what Asquith would do. "They must resign," said the inexperienced. "A defeat on a money Bill on the report stage! It would be unheard of if they didn't!" But Asquith is not bound by precedent if it does not suit him. The House is a law unto itself: he and his merry men were not going to face the country just now and lose £400 a year! Not a bit of it. He had evidently conferred with the Speaker, and had obtained from him an opinion that he could move to rescind the vote; so he gave notice that he intended to do so on Wednesday. In the meantime we should proceed with the interesting subject of the White Slave Traffic. The humanitarians were eager to save the backs of the traffickers from the lash.

Notes and News

Messrs. D. Appleton and Company will have ready in the course of the next few days a little gift-book for the Christmas season, by Robert W. Chambers, entitled "Blue-bird Weather."

"The River Rhymer," a volume of verses by Mr. J. Ashby-Sterry, treating of the Thames, its places, people, and life, from the source to the sea, will be published shortly by Mr. W. J. Ham-Smith.

The large demand for the Right Hon. James Bryce's new work on "South America" exhausted the first large edition soon after publication. The work has been reprinted with all possible dispatch, and it is hoped that further supplies will be available in a week or two.

Although "Zaza" at the Queen's Theatre has admirably introduced Miss Ethel Warwick in her new capacity as actress-manageress, the piece must come off at the end of next week, since Miss Warwick is under contract to produce "Sylvia Greer," a new three-act modern English comedy.

A new and revised edition of "The Government of England," by Dr. A. Lawrence Lowell, President of Harvard University, is announced for immediate publication by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. The work has been brought up to date by the addition of a new chapter on "The House of Lords and the Act of 1911."

Mr. Henry Frowde is about to publish "The Pageant of English Prose," edited, with introduction and notes, by Mr. R. M. Leonard. This is a companion volume to "The Pageant of English Poetry," compiled by the same editor, but larger, consisting of 500 prose passages by 325 different authors, from John de Trevisa (1326) to "Fiona Macleod."

Mr. John Lane announces "Austria, Her People and Their Homelands," by one of the men who know Austria in her most remote provinces, such as the Bukovina. Mr. James Baker, F.R.G.S., is the author of this volume, which is illustrated with forty-eight water-colours by Mr. Donald Maxwell, of the Graphic, and has a map and full index.

Messrs. Hutchinson announce "Twelve Great Passions," by J. A. Brendon. In this book the author has re-told the stories of George III and the fair Quaker, Hannah Lightfoot, which is still more or less a mystery; of Princess Amelia, of Sir Richard and Lady Burton, and others. The book will be handsomely bound and beautifully illustrated.

Messrs. Herbert and Daniel will publish, in time for the Christmas market, a little volume which its author, Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, entitles "Verses and Reverses"; "Lyrics," by Lady Margaret Sackville; "A Posy of Folk Songs," by R. L. Gales; "Songs of God and Man," by Anna Bunston; "The Silver Stair," by Charles Williams; and "Verses," by T. A. Bailey.

Mr. Harrison's new programme at the Haymarket Theatre includes a one-act comedy by Mr. W. J. Locke, entitled "An Adventure of Aristide Pujol," at 8 o'clock. At 8.30 the curtain will rise on Lord Dunsany's play, "The Golden Doom," for which Mr. Joseph Harker has painted the scenery from Mr. S. H. Sime's designs, and at 9 o'clock Mr. Stanley Houghton's comedy in three acts, "The Younger Generation," will be given.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins will publish during the next ten days the two last books upon his autumn list: a book on Embroidery Stitches, at 5s. net, by M. E. Wilkinson, with 200 illustrations, the aim of which is to epitomise the most useful embroidery stitches and add new and original ones that will increase the artistic effect of this particular species of needlecraft; and "Poems to Pavlova," by A. Tulloch Cull, with eight full-page illustrations of Madame Pavlova in her most famous dances, at 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. A. and C. Black will publish during November an important historical and topographical work in three large quarto volumes, entitled "The Annals of Hampstead," by Mr. Thomas J. Barratt. The author has devoted much of the leisure of over thirty-five years to the collection of material. That his industry and research have been well rewarded is evident from these volumes, which contain over 500 illustrations, including 30 facsimile reproductions in colours, 30 photogravures, and 6 valuable maps.

Messrs. Jack are sending out "The People's Books" in rapid succession, and announce a fourth dozen for issue on November 20. From the following list it will be seen that many interesting and novel subjects are treated:—"Geology," by Professor T. G. Bonney, F.R.S.; "Weather Science," by R. G. K. Lempfert, M.A.; "Hypnotism," by A. M. Hutchison, M.D.; "The Baby: A Mother's Book by a Mother," by a University Woman; "Motherhood: A Wife's Handbook," by H. S. Davidson, M.B., F.R.C.S.E.; "Navigation," by W. Hall, R.N., B.A.; "The Church of England," by Rev. Canon Masterman; "The Hope and Mission of the Free Churches," by Rev. Edward Shillito, M.A.

THE EUROPEAN CRISIS.

PUBLIC interest throughout Europe, which until yesterday, as it were, was following breathlessly the irresistible progress of the Bulgarians towards Constantinople, the gradual penetration of the Servians to the Adriatic, and the crowning triumph of Greek arms at Salonika, has now been abruptly diverted to the capitals of the Great Powers, where, before the curtain has been rung down on the closing scenes of the first act in the Balkan drama, the second act is being carefully and deliberately cast. It is, perhaps, only natural that the renewed activities of diplomacy should awaken in the minds of men a fear lest, in the ultimate settlement of a problem that drew Greek and Slav together in league against the Turk, the jealousies of their stronger neighbours may precipitate deadly conflict between the powerful groups which at present maintain the equilibrium of Europe. If, however, we consider the various factors which go to make up the existing situation, we shall find that, although the issue of peace or war is not a little obscure, there are indications that a working compromise will be reached which cannot fail to remove, for a period at least, a general European conflagration.

Leaving Rumania—a country whose policy must be largely determined by the course of events—out of the question, the nations more closely concerned with the destinies of the Balkan peoples are Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia. The interests of the Dual Monarchy and her ally, identical in nature though not in degree, are political and economic; those of Russia, political and ethnological. We need not at this stage consider the political future of Thrace, of Macedonia, or of the Sanjah of Novi Bazar, for it is to Servian aspirations on the Adriatic that the activities of the chancelleries are at present directed. Servia, for centuries past isolated by arbitrary land frontiers, has at last fought and won her way to the sea. But her path lies across the country of the Albanians, the integrity of which both Austria and Italy profess to regard as sacred and inviolable. As an alternative to a port on the Adriatic, the suggestion has been made to Servia that she should seek for an outlet on the Ægean Sea, and so dispose of all possible cause for complaint. The Machiavellian motives underlying this proposal deceive no one, least of all the Servians themselves; for were it carried into effect a sharp wedge would be driven into the solidarity of the League, a solidarity which has alone been responsible for removing the principal cause of disturbance from South-Eastern Europe. The settlement of the Balkan question, if it is to be final, must redress all ills and eradicate every conceivable element of friction.

Thus, before the campaign is at an end, we find Servia faced with the unhappy prospect of being robbed of the fruits of her hard-fought victories. Such a prospect meets with no yielding spirit, either among the army or at Belgrade, and, as was only to be expected, has raised a storm of indignation throughout Russia. It is, in fact, this sympathetic response in the Tsar's dominions—a response that has received far less attention at the hands of the British Press than it really warrants—which lifts the Servian question bodily out of the category of what certain Powers are too prone to designate their spheres of influence. To those who follow closely the political thought of Russia, the unanimity of opinion which characterises the utterances of Press and publicists in their advocacy of the Southern Slavs in general and of the Servian aspirations in particular, offers an unerring guide to the policy that must inevitably be pursued by the St. Petersburg Government. That Austria and Italy, by virtue of their special interests, possess the right to a place of importance at any conference summoned to settle once and for all the vexatious questions arising out of the Balkan problem we do not dispute; but we cannot concede to them so far-reaching a prerogative as that involved in anticipating the deliberations of such a conference by presenting a direct ultimatum to Servia. Yet the alarms of the past few days have arisen from more or less well-founded reports that the Governments of Rome and Vienna, acting in concert, and supported, of course, by the Wilhelmstrasse, are taking steps to protect their interests at the expense of the long-cherished hopes of their valorous but weaker neighbour.

It is only in a contingency such as this that fears can be legitimately expressed that Europe may find herself split into two armed camps, the Triplice and the Entente. For anything in the nature of peremptory harshness exhibited towards Servia at this stage will impel Russia swiftly to her side, and so determine positively the attitude of Great Britain and France, neither of whom can be unmindful of the essential support accorded by Russia throughout the crisis occasioned last autumn by the Agidir incident. And here it may be well to point a moral to a short-sighted school in this country, who are forever bewailing our entanglements on the Continent, and in the Russian net in particular. No sane person will deny that the establishment of a German base on the Atlantic coast of Northern Africa was a question of vital importance to Great Britain. The interests of France throughout Morocco do not enter the domain of controversy. But wherein lay justification for the staunch support accorded both these Powers by Russia? The answer is simple and significant. Although not in any way concerned with Morocco, she remained steadfast and loyal to her allies in the hour of their trial. "Upon one thing I believe the general opinion of Europe to be unanimous—that the victors are not to be robbed of the fruits which have cost them so dear." In this recent utterance of Mr. Asquith is to be found implicitly Great Britain's honourable acknowledgment of the debt of last year, an acknowledgment the logical development of which, in certain eventualities, we need not at this stage dwell upon.

It would be idle to deny that the full scope of Servian ambitions portends danger within the dominions of the Dual Monarchy, for an advanced political party at Belgrade openly advocate the liberation of the Serb communities in the Adriatic provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Vienna has therefore just grounds for framing a policy which shall take into account the larger aspect of what is admittedly a delicate situation. Yet from the very fact that twenty-three millions of the Emperor Franz Joseph's subjects are racial kinsmen of the Balkan Slavs it would be unwise for Austria to proceed to extreme measures. Perhaps the only compromise possible in all the circumstances, one upon which both Belgrade and Vienna have yet to be persuaded, lies not in the abandonment but in the modification of Servia's Adriatic policy. There would still remain, however, the thorny question of Albanian autonomy, a question on which the League are unanimous in their opposition to Italy and Austria. At present the efforts of the Triple Entente in regard to Balkan problems are being seriously employed in the direction of judicial mediation; but should those efforts fail in face of Austro-Italian obduracy, then nothing could prevent Russia from championing the cause of the Servians, and, if necessary, calling upon England and France to fulfil the simple obligations attaching to the Triple Entente—a call that would certainly not remain unanswered.

MOTORING

ALTHOUGH it seemed to be almost universally known that nothing strikingly new in the way of design was to be expected at Olympia this year, the success of the exhibition was assured from the very first day, the attendance being many thousands in excess of previous records. It is also reported that more actual business has been done at the stands this week than at any preceding Show, but this is a matter which it is practically impossible to verify. Exhibitors are notoriously optimistic, and unduly disposed to take it for granted that an inquiry will necessarily materialise into a definite order. Nevertheless, everybody, exhibitors and visitors alike, has seemed in particularly happy mood on this occasion, and it may safely be asserted that the Show of 1912 has been an all round success.

By common consent the chief characteristic of the exhibition, which closes its doors to the public at ten o'clock this (Saturday) night, is the excellence of the bodywork to be seen on the principal stands. This is notably in advance of that shown last year in every respect, and it is difficult to see what room there is still left for improvement, either in elegance and harmony of outline, perfection of finish, or interior accommodation and refinements. With so many handsome and luxurious bodies to be seen on every hand, it is a somewhat invidious task to single out any for special praise, but the concensus of opinion seems to point to the 38·4 Noiseless Napier Royal Saloon as being the finest specimen of motor carriage work in the Show, although so far as the mere colour scheme is concerned, the writer personally prefers the 15·9 h.p. of the same make. The 30 h.p. Sheffield-Simplex has also excited universal admiration for its magnificent bodywork, and in the opinion of many is fully entitled to share the honours of premier position with the Royal Napier.

With regard to the mechanism of the car of 1913, as shown at Olympia, it would be a mistake to assume that there has been no real progress made during the last twelve months, merely because the chassis themselves are, at a superficial glance, essentially the same as those of 1912. As the Motor aptly points out in a special article devoted to showing what is gained by buying a car absolutely up to date, experiments, and consequently improvements, are continuously being carried out by every motor manufacturer and designer, with a view to perfecting the various features of the car which still cause more or less trouble to the owner. Every motorist knows that in most of the cars running to-day there is occasional trouble with such things as clutches, leaky and noisy gear-boxes, sticking valves, rattling joints, inefficient brakes, imperfect ignition, etc., and it is obvious that there is much to be done before these defects are finally removed and the ideal car evolved. To all these faults the up-to-date manufacturer is fully alive, and there is no doubt that he is straining every nerve to eradicate them, and so gain a lead over his equally keen competitors. Thus year by year improvements in important details are embodied in the chassis as the result of the previous twelve months' experience, and the buyer of the latest car of any particular make may be certain that he is getting a better and more efficient article than the model of the previous year. It is to this gradual all-round improvement in detail, and to the progressive elimination of such defects as those indicated, that the motorist must look in future, rather than to any really revolutionary alterations in design or construction.

In the tyre section a notable absentee is the Victor, the tyre which has come into such prominence during the last few months, largely owing to the (unintentional) publicity given to it by the R.A.C. It will be remembered that the Club, after having consented to supervise a competitive trial between the Victor and other representative tyres, suddenly, and without any explanation, withdrew its consent, and threatened, if such a trial were proceeded with unofficially, to ban the Victor from all competitions and all exhibitions, including Olympia. This extraordinary proceeding has naturally led to a vast amount of controversy, the action of the Club having been strongly criticised in many quarters, with the result that the Victor has received a magnificent and continuous advertisement.

As a counter-move to its exclusion from Olympia, the makers announce that they will send a specimen tyre to any private motorist for inspection, without obligation to purchase.

A very large number of people assembled at the Aerodrome on Saturday evening, the 9th inst., to witness the exhibition of illuminated flying that had been postponed from the 5th. It was a perfect night for the display; there was no wind, and the temperature was mild. Had it been one of those bleak, cold nights, which are not restricted to any month in our changeable climate, it is certain that the onlookers would not have shown the great patience they maintained while waiting for the aviators to make their ascent; for, although each flight, as it took place, presented a very pretty spectacle, the interval between the displays was very long, and was not even relieved by the letting off of fireworks. Unless there is any particular reason why one machine should not be ready to start while another is still in motion, we are sure it would add greatly to the enjoyment of the spectators were a less interval allowed. The Aerodrome presented a very decorative appearance, lit up with small lamps, while the flashlights and the lights from the motor-cars added to the brilliance of the scene. We were glad to hear that Mr. Gates, who came down heavily owing to engine trouble, did not sustain any serious injuries.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

NOTHING is likely to be done in the City until the position in the Near East is cleared up. It is perfectly impossible for anyone to prophesy as to the result of the war; whether Russia will be able to control her Slav population, whether Roumania will keep quiet and whether Austria, Germany and Italy mean business or whether they are bluffing, no one knows or can know what will happen. In the meantime cautious people refrain from either buying or selling. Paris is determined to create a new boom if she can and Russia is also full of determination to mark prices up, but neither can control the future. The determination is actually the result of enormous buying on the part of the banks during the last slump.

The death of Lord Furness is a serious blow to the City. He was a bold and acute man of business, one of the greatest men that our industrial England has ever produced. That he made mistakes everyone knows, but his successes were quite phenomenal and achieved in the face of tremendous opposition. He was a loyal friend, a great man in every sense of the word.

One or two new issues have come out. Messrs. F. J. Benson and Company offered a very fine security in the City of Sydney 4 per cent. ten-year debentures. They were over-subscribed without difficulty. The British Orto Tyre and the Guatrache Land were also offered during the week, but neither of them attracted money. The public is shy, it wants big interest, and does not discriminate between an investment and a speculation. One of these days it will find out that you cannot get a security with 5 per cent.

There is still talk about the Chinese Loan. The Stock Exchange has officially declared that it will quote the Crisp Loan, and has therefore taken sides in the squabble. This is very reassuring. On the Continent neither the Bourses of Paris or Berlin would dare officially to quote a loan that had met with the disapproval of the Government. Here in England we are more independent. Indeed, the City resents any interference with its right to lend money to whom it chooses. The more one examines the attitude taken up by Sir Edward Grey the more hopeless does it look. In any other country but England accusations of bribery would be brought against the Foreign Office, but here, although we suspect our Foreign Office officials of stupidity, we are convinced of their rectitude.

MONEY.—As the end of the year approaches so does money becomes tighter. The banks charge the Stock Exchange 5½ per cent., but there was no difficulty in obtaining all the necessary funds. This is not surprising for we have reduced the "bull" account to an almost invisible item. Trade, however, is good, and prices are high; therefore there is no chance of any reduction in rates before the end of the year.

FOREIGNERS.—The Foreign market continues hard. Each day another "bear" buys back his stock, and each day his place is taken by one who has more courage; consequently the prices of all securities affected by the war keep firm. This is a most curious result, and should give people confidence that the trouble will end quickly. Unfortunately the strength of the quotations in the Foreign market is almost entirely due to an artificial shortage. The great banks came in and purchased right at the bottom of the big slump, and they are determined not to unload or weaken the market in any way. Greeks will certainly improve when the war is over, for whatever happens Salonica will become part of Greece. As this is one of the richest districts, and also one of the most populous, Greek finances will benefit. Indeed, it is said that there are so many wealthy Jews in Salonica that it is likely to become the commercial capital of the Near East, and there is a suggestion that a Stock Exchange should be established.

HOME RAILS.—Each week some new stock is taken in hand. During the past few days the bidding has been for Central London. The deferred, which a year ago were 69, are now 82, and the ordinary are quoted at 85. All kinds of tales are going about, and the latest story is that the Underground Electric have decided to acquire the road. This seems feasible. A few days ago, however, it was declared that the rise was due to the fact that the Great Western had interested themselves. A change in the sentiment of the City towards the Home Railway market seems certain. Brokers who a year ago were advising their clients to have nothing to do with Home Rails are now suggesting that they are sound securities. The statement that the Government intend to keep their promise to the railway companies may be responsible for the altered attitude of the City. But the fact that the traffics are good and that expenses have been kept down has probably a great deal more to do with it. I have steadily advised investments in English railways, for I know of nothing that offers a higher yield with so certain a security.

YANKEES.—There is a great deal of nonsense talked about the new President and his power to alter tariffs. Under no circumstances can he move for at least one year, and even then his power is very limited. The President of the United States is neither a tyrant nor even a constitutional monarch. Unless he can use great tact he is merely a cypher. There is no doubt that if the democrats were determined to cut down tariffs, trade in the United States would suffer, but there is no sign that they intend to do anything of the sort, and in any case nothing can happen for eighteen months to two years. All American railways are very cheap. Eries, Union Pacifics, Southerns, and Steels are worth buying by those who have the money to pay for them.

RUBBER.—Very little interest is taken in the rubber market to-day, and there have been no important reports issued since I wrote last week. Djasinga issue their second annual report. This company has 4,464 acres planted with tea, coffee, and rubber. Its net profits amounted to £6,080, which are used in writing down preliminary and underwriting expenses. In spite of the big acreage I do not recommend a purchase of the shares.

OIL.—The only talk in the oil market is about the German attack on the Standard Oil. I think it will be found that the Imperial Company will make terms with the Standard. It can hardly get its oil in any other way. It is no use starting a company to supply the German Empire with oil unless the oil can be bought, and the Standard actually control at least half the oil that goes into Germany. Mexican Eagles have been hard on the news that another gusher had been struck. This one has been capped down. Rather wild tales are going about to the effect that the Mexican Eagle has ten years' oil supply in hand. It is impossible to say how much oil a well will produce. The mere fact that the pressure is great means nothing. I do not wish to throw cold water on the "bulls" of Mexican Eagle, for I think the company has great chances. Nevertheless, it is foolish to lose one's head.

MINES.—The full text of the Goldfields' report has now been issued. It tells us very little, and is very disappointing. The interim report of the Goldfields Rhodesian Development is even more disconcerting. Eldorado Banket appears to be going from bad to worse. The shoot grows smaller on every level, and values dwindle. The Shamva is also a very disappointing mine, and when one remembers that people paid anything between £4 and £5 a share for this property three years ago, and are as far off getting a dividend as they were when the mine was floated. One is not surprised at the hard things that are said in the City about the manner in which Rhodesian properties are handled. Between the first and third levels there has been a shrinkage of 83 feet in the width of the ore bodies. The values appear to me quite unpayable. There is a body of ore on the second level going 6.77 dwts. which might be crushed at a profit. But it is ridiculous to expect a dividend from ore on the prospect level, which only runs 3.8 dwts. I have said before that I think Shamvas definitely over-valued at par. However, Planet Arcturus would appear to be turning out a satisfactory proposition. This is a rich mine, and if it is carefully handled it may return its shareholders their money back. I doubt whether it will do more.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Nitrate reports still continue to make their appearance. But this is a dangerous market for the outsider, and I strongly advise holders to take advantage of the present prices to get rid of their shares. Presumably some of the "bulls" have got tired of holding on to their National Telephones. I think that those who can afford to wait would probably get at least £20 to £30 profit on their deferred shares at present prices. Furness Withy shares have been weak. This was only to be expected. The management of this company is good, and business is splendid. Therefore I think holders can keep their shares.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE TURKISH DEBACLE AND THE NATIONAL RESERVE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—The fate of the National Reserve hangs in the balance. The next few months must decide whether it is to die out—a well-meaning but abortive attempt to keep in touch with the men in the country who have had a military training—or whether it is to be made so great a reality that the country will not allow the military authorities to neglect it, even if they wished to do so. The National Reserve now numbers about 170,000 men. It can be doubled, i.e., brought up to 340,000 men, if all the counties in Britain do as well—and there is no reason why they should not do better—as London, Edinburgh, and Surrey. But if it is doubled, it is as certain as anything human can be that the Government will find the movement too big not to be taken seriously, and they will feel obliged to provide the men on the register with uniforms and rifles—absolute necessaries should a call ever be made upon their patriotism. Numbers alone will force the authorities out of their present attitude of benevolent indifference.

It is because the National Reserve is in this critical situation, and because the overthrow of an ancient military Empire with an army of 400,000 fighting men, within a fortnight, has made the question of National Defence a living issue, that I ask your paper to give its powerful aid towards the work of obtaining the last 170,000 men. The seeking out of the trained men and the getting them to put their names on the register is a work peculiarly appropriate to the Press. Indeed, it can hardly be accomplished without them. When the National Reserve was started in Surrey, the first 700 names were obtained solely through appeals in the county newspapers of all shades of opinion. Again, it was through publicity in the Press that during the past six months the numbers of the National Reserve have been doubled. The inspection of the National Reserve by the King in Hyde Park at the beginning of June last was reported and commented upon in every newspaper in the land, with the result that the National Reserve added some 70,000 men to its numbers. If your paper, in conjunction with others, will now appeal to those of its readers who are eligible to join the National Reserve but who have not yet joined, I feel confident that the names will pour in by the thousand. Remember, there are still tens of thousands of men who have not yet even heard of the Reserve.

To be specific, I want to ask those of your readers who are eligible to send their names and addresses (stating distinctly the county or town in which they live), their ages, and the corps in which they served, to the Spectator Office, London. These replies shall be sorted out and sent to the secretaries of the various Territorial Associations in whose area the men reside. The reason for asking that the names and addresses should be sent to the Spectator and not direct to the Territorial Associations, can easily be explained. If you ask a man to send in his name to the secretary of, say, the Monmouthshire Territorial Association, ten to one he will fail to do so. He will not know the address, and he will also not know where to find it. If, however, he can cut a form out of his paper, fill it in, put it into a halfpenny envelope and address it to the Spectator Office, London, with the letters "N.R." written big on the envelope, he is far more likely to send his name.

As I have said, there are probably thousands of men who still do not know what the National Reserve is. May I explain by quoting the words of the first paragraph of the National Reserve Regulations:—

"The National Reserve, which forms a part of the military organisation, is primarily a register of trained officers and soldiers who, being under no further obligation for military service. . . . . are organised under the auspices of County Associations, and encouraged by the military authorities with a view to increasing the military resources for national defence."

Though registration involves no legal liability, it is of course fully recognised by all the members of the National Reserve that by joining the Reserve men and officers express their willingness in case of great national peril to these islands—that is, invasion—to place themselves at the disposal of the military authorities. Though there is no peace obligation whatever, it is clear that joining the Reserve involves the greatest, sternest, and most binding of obligations in the case of invasion. No one should dream of joining the National Reserve unless he means business—unless he is prepared to risk his life should the soil of this country ever be violated by the armies of a foreign Power. The National Reservist will never be required to serve outside Great Britain. Of that he is absolutely assured. But in the case of war within these islands he will, as I have said, be called on to do a soldier's duty. No man who is not prepared to do this in case of invasion is wanted in the National Reserve. Every trained man who is so prepared must not delay to register his name and address.

The men who are eligible for the National Reserve are ex-soldiers of the regular Army who have passed out of the Reserve, ex-Militiamen, ex-Yeomen, ex-Volunteers, ex-members of analogous Colonial forces, and all ex-soldiers who have seen active service, i.e., who are in possession of a war medal, no matter how short was such service. Ex-sailors and Marines who are not under liability to be called up for further service in the Navy, and ex-members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who have completed not less than four years with the force are also eligible. In fact, every trained man and trained officer is eligible. Here is the Form which I suggest your readers who are eligible should fill in and post as described below :—

NATIONAL RESERVE.

To men with a military or naval training :

Fill in this Form. Cut it out and send it in an unsealed envelope with a halfpenny stamp, addressed as follows :—

N. R.,
"The Spectator," London.

If you prefer it, you can copy out the Form on a post card and address as above.

FORM.

I desire to join the National Reserve.

Name (in full) .....
Address (in full) .....
Age .....
Former Corps .....
War service (if any) .....

If you can let this Form, with a few explanatory words as to who are eligible, remain in your columns for a week or two, the effect will be increased not seven but seventy fold.

Those who are not eligible themselves, but who know men who are, can do a real service to their country by bringing this Form to the notice of men who are eligible.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully, J. ST. LOE STRACHEY.

1, Wellington Street, Strand, London, W.C.

[We are fully in sympathy with this movement and have much pleasure in printing Mr. St. Loe Strachey's letter.—ED. ACADEMY.]

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It will be noticed that "Tom Jones" makes no reference to the extracts from Milton's paraphrases of the Psalms which I quoted, but insists that the lines from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" are not "poor stuff." In this opinion he places himself in direct opposition to all Shakespearean scholars.

The Baconian syllogism is not correctly stated by your correspondent. Baconians are much too clear headed to adopt such a contention. They do say : The Shakespeare works are those of a learned man. Shagspere of Stratford was not a learned man, therefore he was not their author. Or again : Bacon was a learned man, therefore he may have written the works. Both of which syllogisms are sound.

Tom Jones is wrong in saying that the notion that these works are those of a learned man is comparatively of recent date. But he would be correct if he said that the complete abandonment of the contention that they are the product of an unlearned man is of comparatively recent date.

The men and women whose opinions he cites were not exceptionally qualified to form a judgment on the subject. The Hales conversation did not have its origin until nearly 100 years after Shakespeare's death, and if it is true it only proves that Hales either knew little of the classsical authors or less of their works. Davenant's real opinion of Shakespeare may be inferred from the fact that he considered the plays so faulty that he remodelled "Macbeth," "Measure for Measure," "Much Ado About Nothing," and, in conjunction with Dryden, "The Tempest." After Davenant's death, Dryden continued in the evil course "of demolishing these edifices of marble and rebuilding them with bricks." Dryden placed Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher before Shakespeare, and considered Congreve his equal. The opinions of such men ought not to weigh with us.

It seems strange that in the twentieth century it should be necessary to combat the statement that the author of the Shakespeare plays and poems was an unlearned man. It is true that Farmer's Essay was said by Dr. Warton to have settled the question as to the learning of the author for ever. But Farmer's arguments are inconclusive and, in view of our present knowledge, are based on premises which are not merely uncertain, but directly opposed to the facts. "The really crucial tests in the question he either evades or defaces," says Professor Churton Collins. Farmer wrote in 1767. The serious examination of the plays had then barely begun. The first commentator's work was that of Prebendary John Upton, published in 1746. He truly said, "I have often wondered with what kind of reasoning anyone could be so far imposed on as to imagine that Shakespeare had no learning ; when it must at the same time be acknowledged that without learning he cannot be read with any degree of understanding or taste." He further states, "That a contrary opinion is owing partly to Ben Jonson's jealousy and partly to the pride and pertness of dunces, who, under the umbrage of such a name as Shakespeare's, would gladly shelter their own idleness and ignorance." And old John Upton was right, except that Ben Jonson may be acquitted of jealousy, because his words have been misunderstood. Dr. Zachary Grey, the second commentator, or, rather, the third, if Edwards' "Canons of Criticisms" be included, writes : "His (Shakespeare's) knowledge in that respect (the Greek and Latin tongues) cannot reasonably be called in question." "He had a competent skill in the Latin language." Gildon was a vehement asserter of the learning of Shakespeare, and Dr. Sewel followed in his footsteps. Pope said there was "little ground for the common opinion of his want of learning." Theobald,* whose edition of the works was of the highest merit,

* The late Professor Collins writes of Theobald : "It may be said with simple truth that no poet in our own or any language has ever owed so great a debt as Shakespeare owes to this man."

writes that he is "unwilling to allow him so poor a scholar as many have laboured to represent him."

Dr. Dodd supposes Shakespeare's knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongues to be proved and that he was not such a novice in learning and antiquity as some people would pretend.

The truth is that the disputants may be divided into two camps. Those who have not studied his works, but have read the tales which were manufactured to produce copy for the writers during the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, say Shakespeare had no learning. John Denis may be taken as a type of such. He said, "He who allows that Shakespeare had learning, and a familiar acquaintance with the Ancients, ought to be looked upon as a detractor from the Glory of Great Britain." They who have made a study of his works are practically in accord and convinced that the author was a classical scholar, and that his learning was profound. I cannot call to mind the name of one Shakespearean scholar of the first rank who, during the last hundred years, has held that the author was an unlearned man. The author was certainly a master of five languages—Latin, Greek, Spanish, Italian, and French. The late Professor Churton Collins, in his invaluable articles on "Shakespeare as a Classical Scholar," proves beyond the shadow of a doubt Shakespeare's intimate knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, and of the classical works written in them. He points out the remarkable parallels in idioms and in peculiarities of diction and rhythm between the Greek writers and Shakespeare which must be attributed to their influence on him, and he writes: "It is indeed, in the extraordinary analogies—analogies in sources, in particularity of detail and point, and in relative frequency of employment, presented by his metaphors to the metaphors of the Attic tragedians, that we find the most convincing testimony of his familiarity with their writings." So Rowe was in error when, relying on the Hales conversation, he said: "It is without controversy that in his works we scarce find traces of anything that looks like an imitation of the Ancients." As to French, Richard Grant White says: "The author shows his knowledge of even the most delicate peculiarities of the French tongue." As to Spanish, Professor Elze, writing of the description of the language given in "Love's Labour's Lost," says: "Can one who describes the character of a language with such clearness and insight be unacquainted with it?" His knowledge of ancient and modern literature is acknowledged. Charles Knight wrote: "The very earliest writings of Shakespeare are imbued with a spirit of classical antiquity." Stapher, a distinguished French critic, says that some of the plays are "over-cumbered with learning not to say pedantic." Lord Chief Justice Campbell said that the author had "a deep technical knowledge of the law and an easy familiarity with some of the most abstruse proceedings in English jurisprudence." Carlyle wrote: "In the constructing of Shakespeare's dramas there is an understanding manifested equal to that in Bacon's 'Novum Organum.'" Lowell in "Among my Books," says: "The range and accuracy of his knowledge were beyond precedent, or later parallel." The author had travelled in Italy and France, and had an intimate acquaintance with the waterways of the former country now lost sight of. There is not a flaw in his geography. The position is thus summed up in Allibone's Dictionary of Authors:—

> Let it be accepted as a truth past all debate, that among the great ones of the earth Shakespeare stands alone in unapproachable majesty. What was the secret of his power; from whence derived his marvellous insight into human nature under all circumstances, ages and climes; this accurate knowledge of sciences, governments, morals, manners, philosophies, and codes; this exquisite command of language never wielded before or since, by which each character, event or thought is drawn in lines of living light? This, the greatest of all human mysteries which we have received from our fathers, we must transmit, deepened and heightened rather than lessened by our labours, to our children.

Can any appeal on this subject be more penetrating than that of Coleridge? "Ask your own hearts—ask your own common sense—to conceive the possibility of this man being—I say not, the drunken savage of that wretched sciolist, whom Frenchmen, to their shame, have honoured before their elder and better worthies—but the anomalous, the wild, the irregular, genius of our daily criticism! What! Are we to have miracles in sport? or, I speak reverently, does God choose idiots by whom to convey divine truths to man?"

I address to "Tom Jones"—his own words, "To persist in this fiction is not creditable."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Martin says, in his letter in your issue of the 2nd inst., that if I will reply to his demands he will promise not to mention Browning. I can quite believe that, for the simple reason I have not given him the chance. I never wrote to any paper to exploit an epigrammatic conundrum. I merely endeavoured to the best of my ability to reply to the riddle, and apparently made my meaning so plain that Mr. Martin has understood at a glance. I really do not know whether to congratulate myself upon the clearness of my style, or Mr. Martin upon his singular cleverness. I rather fancy, from his letter, he would expect the latter.

When, however, Mr. Martin says that none of your readers takes any interest in his "mental peculiarities," he does himself an injustice. What does he imagine we have read three of his letters, and not short ones, for? Why, he has just occupied upwards of two whole columns of your paper in asking me to produce the evidence of my own investigation of Christian Science. Surely if my views and not his own were what he wanted your readers to rejoice in, he might have been a trifle, dare I say? less verbose. I have read quite a lot of Mr. Martin's letters, but they never gave me the impression that he was like the gentleman in "Ruddigore," is it not? who described himself as "diffidence personified." His epistolary manner reminds one less of Laconia than of Nares' "Life of Burleigh." I know Mr. Martin will murmur "chestnut." I can only excuse myself by saying that there are some things which instinctively suggest chestnuts.

Mr. Martin began by very generously explaining exactly how Christian Scientists mentally arrived at their conclusions. I merely humbly pointed out that it was possible that a Christian Scientist knew the mental process by which he arrived at his conclusions almost as well as Mr. Martin could know it in his behalf. I even went so far as to apologise for believing that I understood my own process of reasoning more clearly than Mr. Martin was likely to arrive at it by any number of "pot-shots." Produce your evidence that your conclusions are justified, he replies, with enchanting irrelevance, in a question it requires 163 lines to ask. It is very accommodating of Mr. Martin to offer me your columns in which to produce the evidence of Christian Science healing, but if it takes him more than two columns to ask for it, how many columns is he going to grant me in which to supply it? I am afraid it might be another case, if I may indulge in another chestnut, of the galley slave and Guicciardini.

Yours truly,

FREDERICK DIXON.

STRINDBERG'S WORK.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—If I am not intrusive, I venture to suggest that reviewers do not acquaint themselves with all the facts about Strindberg. "The Confessions of a Fool" and "Legends" are only two small segments of a vast curve traced by his mind in its progress. His last stage was not that of a broken-down neurotic, but of a man who had entirely recovered moral and mental equilibrium. This is evidenced by his latest important work, the Blue Books (1906-7), well described by Mr. Austin Harrison in the current English Review. It should be remembered that the "Legends" were written as far back as 1898, and the "Confessions of a Fool" in 1886. Yours, etc.,

Notes of the Week

WE are not quite sure whether Mr. Lowther will be disposed for long to continue in the position of Speaker of the House of Commons. There are many considerations which may weigh with him leading to a decision to vacate the office. Much of his surroundings must in the present day be eminently uncongenial to a man of the Speaker's temperament and training. We do not think the notice put down by Mr. Martin, the learned member for East St. Pancras, will cause Mr. Lowther much uneasiness, but Mr. Asquith has not dealt very nicely with the occupant of the Chair. In introducing his revised version of the Home Rule financial resolution, the Prime Minister declared in his opening sentences that nothing would induce him to question the authority of a decision of the Speaker; but in the concluding sentences of the same speech he proceeded to do this very thing. There is no reason why Mr. Lowther should continue in a position which can only be tolerable when deference and courtesy are extended to the occupant of it. We are sorry for Mr. Cave's sake to hear his name coupled with the possible vacancy. No man better qualified to preside over the House of Commons, as it used to be, could possibly be pointed to; but, things being as they are, we much hope that the learned and much-esteemed member for the Kingston Division of Surrey will reserve his great powers in order to re-establish the reputation and authority of the great administrative office for which he is clearly marked out.

We have received the first annual report of the Committee of the Kingston and District Sea Training Brig. The scheme was definitely taken in hand in the autumn of last year, and in that short period has, owing to local enthusiasm and generous grants, become an accomplished fact. The Duke of Bedford, the Drapers' Company, the Corporation of London and the Merchant Taylors' Company have given generous support to the local endeavour. The Committee at the outset worked in the face of some discouragement; the scheme in some quarters was described as useless and superfluous. The Navy, it was said, was not in need of personnel, and the Committee would fail to get their boys taken into the Mercantile Marine. The Committee proceeded calmly with their task, and have made arrangements which will falsify all the evil prophecies which laisser aller suggested. The "Steadfast," an oak-built vessel of 100 tons burden, formerly the sea-going tender to the "Exmouth," will shortly be at her moorings off the Kingston and Surbiton promenade, and, handsome in appearance, she will also be fully equipped to give the best practical training to boys, who will in due course be passed on to the "Warspite."

We are extremely glad to observe that our friends and contributors Mr. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett and Mr. "Herbert Seabury" have, distant as they are at the seat of war, scented with unerring instinct the calumnies which the less reputable section of the Radical press and of the Radical platform orators would be launching against the hitherto-defeated but eminently gallant Turkish soldier. They know that when the supply of news is short, atrocities are always put on the market. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett in his graphic telegrams has borne eloquent testimony to the conduct of the Turkish soldiery. There are few defeated armies which would not have reason to be proud if such passages as these could be truthfully written of them:—

> No one can doubt that the men are brave after seeing them strolling about under shrapnel fire at Lule Burgas, as calmly as if they were saying their prayers. They are also the most gentle and well-behaved troops in the world, and no other army in retreat would have shown so much forbearance.

And again:—

> I am a Christian, and King Ferdinand has proclaimed a Holy War; yet the starving soldiers shared their last crusts of bread with me. The Christian villagers were left in peaceful possession of their property, and I saw soldiers who had eaten nothing for five days pass flocks of sheep, geese, and chickens untouched.

Evidence in support could be multiplied, and yet there are those in this country who claim a monopoly of righteousness, but who, as we think, are equally devoid of shame as of conscience, who apparently revel in assimilating and reproducing gruesome gossip to defame defeated troops whose virtues they, in similar circumstances, would not be likely to emulate.

The Choice

WHEN all my life's delights are shed,
And fades from me my latest sun,
Wreathe violets about my head,
And lay me where still waters run.

A white and marble tomb prepare,
Carven with emblems of desire—
A faun, a nymph with floating hair,
A Cupid with an unstrung lyre.

There to the tree's shade, at high noon,
Let shepherds come to talk and sing;
And maidens, to a fluted tune,
Wind and unwind their dancing ring.

And when the glow-worms light the grass,
And stars are flickering in the dew,
My shade about those fields shall pass,
Where I was an Arcadian too.

W. P. R. KERR.

The Idealist

IN a thoroughly practical world, where effort, unless successful, is generally ignored, where dreaming is regarded as a species of insanity, and where love is gravely dissected by the scientists in the hope that eventually it may prove to be some curious form of chemical which can be treated with solutions, precipitated, and analysed with a view to placing it on the market in carefully measured and regulated quantities, it may seem superfluous to talk about beauty. Beauty is a disturbing element in the doctrine of the materialist; like the surd in mathematics, it is there, it has to be reckoned with, but it can never be exactly defined; and your true materialist has a lively horror of things that cannot be exactly defined. Give him a row of pigeon-holes wherein he may neatly secure his opinions and discoveries, and he is happy; unfortunately he cannot often be really happy, since he is always finding that there is a great deal more in the universe than can thus be snugly labelled. Self-sacrifice, for instance, and beauty, and mystery, are three troublesome things "left over," and he hardly knows what to do with them.

We lose patience with people who are for ever striving to define beauty, whether they be poets or philosophers—though with the poets we admit some friendly feeling, since sometimes in the effort to define it they produce it; the only occasion, probably, when the analyst becomes the creator of the very subject that is baffling him. Why not acknowledge freely that there exist qualities that cannot possibly be defined? We can well imagine the persevering lexicographer faltering when he comes to the word. "A pleasing combination of qualities in a person or object," says one; "a particular grace or excellence." "The appearance and properties in any person or thing that please and delight the eye," says another rotund voice; "those qualities in a thing that delight the mind or any of the senses"; thus confessing, in the most abject way, that all the wisdom of the schools is a poor thing when it attempts to encage and limit the transcendental. For ourselves, we should rather suggest—not define—beauty as the sign of the spiritual set upon the material world, whereby he who runs may read that the infinite is not to be measured by earth, by the circlings of a little brown planet round a rather small and insignificant star. It is the light, invisible in itself, yet giving evidence of its splendid presence by colours and strange glooms. To explain it is impossible. We do not add to our dignity by endeavouring to explain the thrill of a sunset as the result of "a pleasing combination of qualities" in the atmosphere and the clouds, or by trying to interpret the appeal of a rose by admiring the "particular grace or excellence" of its chemical constituents—interesting though these researches may be.

If we regard beauty as the sign of the spiritual set upon the material world—a sign, let us note in passing, that may be debased or wilfully misinterpreted—then the universality of the craving for beauty, for beautiful things, becomes significant in the extreme. We begin to understand many mysteries; poesy lays soft hands upon us, and touches blind eyes to sight. We begin to see the necessity of the symbol in a life that is so limited in its comprehensions and expressions; to realise that the symbol, the visible presentation, may be the key to inner meanings which are akin to the divine. The spirit "leaping and shining like a mountain water" does not irradiate the earth-bound, but it may draw its nourishment from things of earth rightly seen, and it may gleam as brightly from the eyes of a child with a bunch of wild-flowers as from those of one more learned who finds hints and suggestions of a world beyond his knowledge in the repeated miracle of the spring. If the craving for beauty be strangled, we have the ascetic; if it be unduly pursued, we have the hedonist; both are the outcome of a perverse outlook on life, both perched on opposing pinnacles of selfish wisdom that crumble and slip at the ringing blast of the trumpets of reality; and, paradoxically, the realist in this case may be a thorough idealist. His perception is the keener by reason of its added spiritual intensity; he has two viewpoints—as it were an earth and a heaven, and thereby achieves a vision far more accurate in its perspective and memories far more lasting and active. He may be more sensitive, and, if his faith is shaken, he is forlorn in his misery because of the very happiness he has known; but we may safely say that he is more secure in his faith, as a rule, than his brother of Flatland. For he has arrived at his state through deep waters and hard weather, by many dangerous straits and shallows, and is so much the more fitted and strengthened to hold fast in his harbourage. That the haven is temporary, a mere resting-place in a voyage that is but just begun, matters little; so far he has come safely, his riding-lights are bright; and when the mists that gather at evening disperse in the dawn which he knows must come, he will put forth with good cheer into the fresh, mysterious morning.

Language and Character—I

By PROFESSOR HERBERT STRONG.

MANY of us are interested in Philology, though many of us do not apply that learned term to our reflections on the subject. But the fact remains that, as often as we seek the origin and history of a term or phrase, as often as we reflect on the propriety of using one word rather than another to express our meaning, nay, as often as we ask ourselves whether we are writing correct grammar, we are calling the science of Philology to our aid. Now, modern Philologists are turning their attention chiefly to the special branch of their science which we call Phonetics—i.e., the changes in sound which pass upon language, whether such changes occur in the mother-tongue or in the course of the parting off of divers languages from the parent stem. This science, important as it is for classification of the families of language, is one which must be left to specialists; but there is an aspect of the science of language which is of interest, and within the understanding of any reader who is familiar with any language besides his own, viz., the particular way in which the language spoken by any nation reflects the national character. Different writers have shown how true this reflection is in the case of particular languages, among whom I might mention Wedewer and Geiger and Abel; but there is room for a competent linguist to compose a most interesting treatise which should embrace other than European tongues.

Whether thought is possible without language is a disputed question: but it is at least certain, for all practical purposes, that, for human beings at least, the instrument whereby thought works is no other than language. Language is as much the natural product of the human mind as leaves and fruits are of plants; we can alter language to a certain extent by the influence of Academies or of American Presidents, just as we can improve plants by grafting or transplanting, but the fact remains that language takes its origin independently of human will, and that even after the influence of culture has been brought to bear upon it, it develops not in accordance with man's will. In its structure, in its metaphors, in particular shades of significance assigned to words which formerly bore a different meaning, in its loan-words, in its rhythm, and its cadences, language reflects more or less perfectly the changing thoughts of the greater part of the nations. It is, generally speaking, safe to say that nations speaking a language which has no word to express any given object or conception, lack the possession of such objects or conception. It is also true that words which are used to express general ideas, conceptions, abstractions, etc., will serve as a guide to show how a nation arrives at and endeavours to express such ideas: "a stone" is a stone the whole world over, but "justice" is a very different quality as conceived by a black slave and by his master.

The grammatical structure of the sentences exhibits the methods whereby the individuals in a nation group their thoughts. Grammar, no doubt, ought to be moulded by logicians: but the people are not logicians; they can succeed in making their meaning plain without the aid of Aristotle or Whately. Consequently the grammatical structure of a language represents the order of their thought and the relative importance attached by them to subject and object. Just as the lack of a name for an object or conception seems to imply its absence in the mind of the speakers, so does the German maxim hold good, "Liebe Sachen haben viele Namen." In Sanskrit the number of words referring to philosophy and religion is so numerous as to suggest that those who spoke that language must have been immersed in things spiritual, that the priests must have been much interested in transcendental subjects: "They let the thundering legions pass, and turned to thought again."

Greek again offers a rich store of words for philosophy, art, and science: in fact, the terms belonging to these departments of knowledge have been borrowed by all the civilised world from that fine language. English nautical terms are largely borrowed by our neighbours, and have largely entered into our national vocabulary, as in phrases like "a fair-weather friend," "a good berth," "a sheet in the wind," "the devil to pay and no pitch hot"—the devil in this case is nothing more malicious than a certain rope which demands pitch to stiffen it.

Then turn we to Latin. We should guess the speakers of this language to be before all things an agricultural people, who, when not employed in agricultural pursuits, were engaged in war and in building a system of law. The origin of many of their common words seems to point to this conclusion. Such are delirare, "to plough crooked," then "to be mad"; tribulare, "to thrash corn," then "to trouble"; emolumentum (molere), "the proceeds of corn ground," hence "any gain"; seculum, "the season for sowing" (serere), like "saison" in French, transferred from meaning a date of a couple of months to one of a century. Many Roman proper names denote original connection with Mother Earth, such as Cicero, "the Chick-pea man"; Lentulus, "Mr. Haricot"; Piso, "Mr. Pease"; Caepio, "Mr. Onions"; Dorso, perhaps "the furrow-maker"; and many others. Take a few of the Latin metaphors, and they will make good the assertion of Cicero: "Scutum, gladium, galeam, nostri milites non plus numerant quam humeros, lacertos, manus: arma enim membra milites esse ducunt." Spoliare, "to strip an enemy of his arms," then "to despoil"; intervallum, "the space between two valli or stakes used in the defence of a camp," then "any space"; princeps, probably "the first taker or snatcher of the spoils of victory," then "the foremost." Many other instances might be cited. Roman law has imposed much of its system and of its nomenclature on the civilised world, and it is significant that the first task set to the Roman boy was to learn by heart the laws of the twelve tables, as that of the Greek boy was to learn Homer. Our own English language, besides nautical words, has given to the world a variety of commercial and political terms and expressions for sport. The French has lent us terms expressive of social life and refinement: German is strong in philosophical and metaphysical expressions. Loan-words, then, afford us valuable material for the formation of conclusions alike as to the character of the nation which lends them and of that which borrows them. Thus the Romance languages borrowed many terms from the Old German: these have mainly reference to war and warlike achievements, whence we might with reason conclude that the power which destroyed Varus and his legions was a mighty fighting race.

The very word "guerre" itself comes from O.H. German "werra," our "war": and many other words might be cited, such as "herberge," "champion," "heaume," "escrime," "dard," "heurter," "lansquenet." The Italians have given us our terms for music, and also many terms of the Stock Exchange, including the word "bank." To take a few illustrations of the light shed by the national language upon national character, let us consider some features of French, German, and English. The Frenchman is clear, pointed, and precise: hence his emphatic words for denial: "ne pas," "ne point." He is impulsive, restless, active-minded: hence many usages as faire faire, "to get done"; "il fait chaud," "froid," "faire une perte"; even faire la popotte, "to lounge about"; and many other similar expressions.

But he is before all things the product of social life, and loves all that can make life attractive and free from monotony: hence his vocabulary is exceptionally rich in expressions for intercourse. Think of the numerous French words to express wit: "pointe," "saillie," "trait d'esprit," "mots à double entente," etc.; of "persiflage" and "espièglerie"; while for talking and gossiping we have "causer," "jaser," "babiller," "jaboter," "hâbler," "bavarder," "caqueter," "dégoiser," "jaspiner," "deviser." The German is a thinker, a philosopher, something of a mystic, hence he owns a number of words significant of different modes of apprehension, as "wahrnehmung," "vorstellung," "begriff," "idee," "verstand," "vernunft," which have in his language acquired shades of meaning difficult to render either into French or English. Corresponding to these, the Frenchman has words like "esprit," "raison," "entendement," "idée," "perception," "notion," words which are more precise, but shallower in their contents. "Esprit" is the French equivalent for "geist"; but it conveys to our minds something delicate and pointed, like the language of a Parisian belle, while "geist" suggests to us the fruit of mature and profound reflection.

The Doom of the Turkish Army

IF Europe generally—the Europe which knows Turkey only through its newspapers—stands amazed at the débacle of the Ottoman Army, one continuous flight down to the last heroic stand in the red hour of Chatalja, what of those who have known the Turkish soldier in his zenith at home? To argue that his morale has changed, that the rank and file of the regulars are different in spirit or physique from the heroes of Plevna, is to confess ignorance of the unchanging East. No; the soldier is the same; it is his Government and his contractors who have betrayed him, and he lies to-day stark on the frozen battlefields, a pathetic figure of one who might, with his last breath, have prayed for salvation from his friends. The Young Turks, and more particularly the Committee of Union and Progress, came into their heritage with the goodwill of the Powers, and those of us who were with them in their hour of trial and in the rejoicings which followed can recall the misgivings with which at the time we watched the clean sweeping of the new broom.

Apart, however, from the dismal truth that the Committee has in some respects miserably failed of its purpose, and in others even betrayed its sacred trust for personal gain, the Augean stables were not a harder problem than the rubbish heap of the old régime. By deposing the Padishah, moreover, and removing his sacred person from the capital, the revolutionaries destroyed the one abiding symbol which, whatever may have been his political crimes, roused his soldiery to a frenzy of valour. With their new Sultan but a figurehead, they went, grim regulars as well as raw levies, into the fight with half-hearted indifference, and it needed the last ditch of Chatalja to reawaken the old fighting spirit that once all but broke through the walls of Vienna. Above most of his neighbours—and this, as events have proved during the past few weeks, is saying a good deal—the Turk is a fighting animal. Not his worst enemies ever charged him with cowardice in action. If he has been kept on the run during the recent operations—and it may be that the unending series of illustrations in the Press, photographic or purely imaginary, depicting those wretched lines of fleeing bullock waggons, have told but half-truths—the fault has rested with those responsible for the organisation of the army. He has been betrayed, even as our own men were betrayed in the Crimea. Contractors grow fat, and widows and orphans are left to mourn their unburied dead. Such is the way of war. True, the Turk fights with bravery rather than with brains, but, given a chance, he fights till he drops.

When I was last in Constantinople, during and after the "Affair of April" in 1909, General Von der Goltz was loud in praise of the material on which he had to work, and Enver Bey, then a popular hero, whom I frequently met at a restaurant that we patronised daily, assured me that the German estimate of the army was in no way exaggerated. At the same time, the personnel of that army had undeniably deteriorated during the long reign of Abd-ul-Hamid. In the heyday of his power, with Germany for his friend and the other Powers tolerant, he cared chiefly for the safety of his own person, and would not even permit his artillery to practise with ball cartridge for fear lest Yildiz should be made its target. Few of his non-commissioned officers could read. I well remember how, on the occasion of the present Sultan's investiture by the Tchelebi of Konia in the Eyub Mosque, one well-known newspaper correspondent managed to gain admittance to the official enclosure, near the Adrianople Gate, by boldly presenting to the officer on guard one of the police passes with which, with the city in a state of siege, we had been provided for use in the streets after sunset.

When Von der Goltz, last in a long succession of foreign instructors that began with M. de Bonneval, officially known as Achmet Pacha, took the organisation of the Supreme Military Council and General Staff in hand, he found a desperate state of affairs in the burlesque system of promotion then in vogue. The Sultan used in those days to bestow rank on a principle suggestive of Gilbertian opera. Little cadets at the Galata Serai, fourteen-year-old sons of favourites, were accorded the standing of captain, major, or colonel, and, on leaving school, passed into the army with their rank; while, so reluctant was the Sultan to see his favourite officers superannuated, white-haired captains of three-score-and-ten were no uncommon sight at the Friday Selamlik.

The rout of the Turkish Army at the very gates of Byzantium is not so much the aftermath of all this mismanagement as the result of betrayal from within. The redif (or territorials) may have been weak, but the nizam (standing army) was probably as fine fighting material as ever at the outbreak of hostilities. It has been demoralised by lack of equipment. It has perished by the greed and political ambition of the new occupants of the Sublime Porte. When I last saw that venerable building, it showed a breach made by a cannon-ball from the insurgent upholders of the old régime. Had that breach been followed up by a clean sweep, the Turkish Army would have come victorious out of the campaign. As it is, Ichabod!

Three Irish Poets*

WHAT is sometimes called the Irish revival, but what is more truly a revival of English poetry by Irish poets, has entered on a new phase, in drama and in poetry. We have had occasion in these pages to note that the newer generation of dramatists at the Abbey Theatre have turned away from the inspirations of beauty that moved those who first lit that torch with whose flame Europe is concerned, to pursue a realism, or actualism, that would in the early days not greatly have stirred the beginners. We have also referred to the fact that the natural result of this has been a dissipation of the wider and profounder artistic interest. One may demur at it, but the fact remains. The great being of man is more perpetually concerned with beauty and splendour than with a reproduction of the surroundings of the conditions of his days or a whimsical treatment. Or, to quote from Mr. Stephens, the poet should be able to say—

> I tore the shackles from my feet,
> The bandage from my straining eye,
> I spread my wings above the street
> And soared upon the sky.
> I knew the stars for friends, and knew
> The sun and moon more happy grew
> To see me flying by.

The same relinquishing of beauty, despite Mr. Stephens' stanza, is to a lesser degree to be noticed among the younger poets. In Mr. Stephens' own work, with all its revel and abandon, it is there. It is excellent to be able to say, through Tomâs Cam when he was grumpy—

> I would not debate with learned men
> Of how, and what, and why and when;
> I'd train my tongue to a linnet's song,
> I'd learn the words that couldn't go wrong.

Though it is worth remembering that that same linnet would not have concluded a song with the lines—

> Yesterday he gripped her tight
> And cut her throat—and serve her right!

It might or might not have been an excellent thing to do, but in Mr. Stephens' poem it certainly was not. In Mr. O'Sullivan's song, purer if less spontaneous in the sense of possessing less devilment, the same realism threads through it like a sullied homespun with the finer weaving. His songs are beautiful, some of them exquisitely beautiful, but there is always the memory in them of other things that are very far from beautiful. Sitting beside a lake side in winter the incomparable beauty of the scene is marred for him—

> Because a heron wild with hunger screamed
> By that old dún across the frozen lake.

It is perhaps not difficult to see why this is so in one and the other. It is all part of the utterly disgusting way in which modern days treat the poets; starving them and uplifting immoral financiers, and thus condemning their boasted civilisation in the minds of the decent of thought. Of the three poets before us it is only Mr. Cousins who escapes the soilure of modern life with its crude realism; and he does so by escaping to old mythologies without making us feel that they are much more to him than tales out of books.

Indeed, if the poets are not failing as the dramatists are failing, it is just because they are poets and because the dramatists no longer see the necessity for a dramatist to be a poet first and foremost. If the banner is apt to droop, nevertheless it is still in their hands. It is only that they have forgotten that their other hand should hold a good, clean, straight sword, such a sword as Francis Thompson had, as Shelley had, as Shakespeare had when he wrote "King Lear," as Æschylus had. The defence and creation of beauty is ever a battle, though sometimes the battle is a starker business than it is at others; and it will not do if half the issue be avoided by letting ugliness encroach where beauty should be supreme. Nor is this at all to say that beauty is only of one order; that it is not a various and passing wonderful texture.

One of the first results of such a relinquishing naturally is that the poet's clearness of vision is dimmed. A curious example of this is to be found in a poem of Seumas O'Sullivan. He sings—

> Bundle the gods away:
> Richer than Danaän gold,
> The whisper of leaves in the rain,
> The secrets the wet hills hold.

But it is the leaves in the rain and the great wet hills that are the gods. Or, rather, the gods and they are so indissolubly bound together that one cannot bundle the one away without bundling the other away. It is just this that is the difference between Mr. O'Sullivan and Mr. Cousins. One will not let us see the gods through the wet leaves, and the other will not let us see the wet leaves in the gods. Mr. Stephens is of Mr. O'Sullivan's inclination, although he disguises his position by an irresponsibility and gaiety that is altogether winning. He has justly turned from the dreams of long ago, but it seems that he has forgotten that the dreams of long ago may have had something that is not less urgent now as then. Indeed, he himself sings—

> And yet the dreams of long ago had got
> A colour my awakening forgot.

Yet, when all this has been said, the supreme fact remains that all of us, reviewed and reviewer alike, are young men seeking to find the world and all that in it is for ourselves, and the young man who has found his wisdom has probably found it wrong, has certainly found it little, and his hour will soon be over. And in each of these poets there is the memory that the poet should be the pioneer—not necessarily to find new country, but surely to find the old country for himself, and to see it from his own approach. We do not think that they will long let themselves be caught in mere decoration of life. The curse of much modern art, and especially pictorial art, is that it makes no effort to attack the central being of life, being content, fantastically or otherwise, merely to decorate its exterior. The trace of this, in one way or another, is to be found in each of the three poets whose books are before us, but the deeper things beat there too, and they will beat themselves out.

For this reason, driven to the invidious choice of expressing a preference, we have turned more often to Mr. O'Sullivan for that joy in re-reading that declares how well a poet has won us. Some of the matter in his volume has appeared before in his earlier volumes. He is a fastidious workman. None of his poems is of any great length; he is more anxious to catch the fleeting fairy-lights of poetry than to sing the greater songs. And he catches these lights; he catches them in quite indisputable poetry. His "Poems" is a book that will make frequent travels down from the shelf of its repose. Mr. Cousins' book is chiefly comprised of the poem that gives it its name. He tells the tale well, and with poetic colour, only he fails to make it significant to the perpetual heart of man. It is too much a mere tale; it too much adorns a tapestry and not the being of life. By this we do not mean that it has not a meaning imposed upon it, far from that indeed; an imposed meaning and a spiritual significance are happily two very different things. Mr. Stephens is the gayest and most irresponsible of them all. As we have said, his irresponsibility is more than a little inclined to be crude. His Hill of Vision is more often a Mount of Derision, though sometimes he is to be discovered on the slopes of the authentic hill. But each of the three volumes has a very manifest place in the new outburst of poetry that is coming upon us.

Artists

UNLESS he is a painter—we do not mean a house-decorator, but a person who works on canvas, or paper, or copper-plate—beware of the gentleman who calls himself an artist. In nine cases out of ten, charlatan will be a better description.

Of course, we would not restrict the word to its vulgarest use, quite apart from the fact that there are plenty of painters who are not artists. But to call yourself an artist is to make a claim upon virtue, and right-minded people prefer that their honours be not self-bestowed. Potentially, anyone who seeks expression through a medium is an artist; but it is one thing to write, or act, or paint pictures, or model in clay, or play the fiddle, and, more often than not, quite another to make of craft a fine art.

Really the word artist is one that is gaining in dignity. If the writings of men like Blake and Shelley and Nietzsche and Yeats have much meaning for us, we are jealous to be worthy of the name of artist, as men in bygone days were to be called saints. It is the last word of praise. But those little coteries of people, who seek, by eccentric behaviour and silly extravagance, to draw the name upon themselves from the vulgar, only bring the word into reproach. They read little and think less, fearing lest the divine afflatus which fills their heads be dispersed by the little hammer of sound reason. Never having experienced true sentiment, they despise honest feeling as sentimentality, and simulate love with a Byronic parade of passion. They learn their craft with less skill than do conjurers, and spend their lives trying to pass themselves off upon the ignorant as something other than, in their heart of hearts—if they possess such an organ—they know themselves to be. They reach their nirvana when they are fully persuaded that their vapid drivellings are written at the dictation of a divine Muse.

In a scientific age these wretched poseurs thrive. Their very distance from life is as bird-lime to the open-mouthed herd that mistakes astonishment for discovery. And they have their reward. It is the reputation of a rocket. A glance back over the past ten years will show a long list of forgotten names inscribed, in real Egyptian gold, on the roll of sensation by the finger of that courtesan, Notoriety. And the ostentatious lady is still writing.

These are they who arrogate to themselves the high dignity of being artists. But the splendour of the word, since Blake added to its meaning, proves a seduction to better men. Writers possessing a little imagination, and a correspondingly timid hold upon life, grow curious about the way in which works of art are made. They have enough personal experience to make the subject interesting to themselves. A passing fancy gleams, and they give their little expression to it. Then, instead of profiting by their experience and thrusting out their energy, they retire into themselves to find out exactly how the little miracle happened. Gradually they become more concerned about the psychology of experience than anything else. The means interest them so much that they lose sight of the end. They are so avid of ideal perfection that they use words with a microscope. With their pockets full of matches, they are always waiting for fire from heaven. Their attitude becomes more and more distrustful, until they finally "dry up," thoroughly embittered, to waste much time in belittling the efforts of the half-successful.

Contrasted with the timid precious ones are the writers to whom the word artist is anathema. They are—by your leave, or without it—navvies, or tramps, or sailors, or experienced linen-drapers, or bath-chair men—something very real, very redolent of the soil, very brave, and very anti-social. They do not cultivate the art of literature. They write. Their motto seems to be, "Slap it on with a big brush, so that the blind can see." They have observed life so well that they know by a man's appearance the exact amount of his washing bill, or perhaps everything else. Commonplace is their mistress. But because art sees all things in proportion, and because they have merged their personalities in a mass of material until the sense of values has been lost, they are not really artists. They are usually bad photographers, and need not walk in fear of being anathematised.

All the same, the real artist has always found life interesting. But the primary condition in the making of a real artist is that he find his own life interesting. That is his true material. Everything must bear a personal relationship to him. It is only what has passed through the fire of his own imagination that yields refined gold. If he is a novelist, his novels are not what the dictionary calls fiction—"conventionally accepted falsehood"—they are his interpretations of certain phases of life. They are the records of his spiritual adventures. The real artist is little concerned with the impression his work makes. Truth is his ideal. Understanding is his pursuit. Experiencing delight, he is anxious to share it. Seeing unity in diversity, he creates an image of his own vision. He is proud to be called an artist, for the name signifies to him one who esteems things in their true values, and is able, through his craft, faithfully to record his steps toward his ideal.

Marianne and Her Enemies

Republican France, 1870-1912: Her Presidents, Statesmen, Policy, Vicissitudes and Social Life. By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE (ERNEST ALFRED VIZETELLY). With Nine Portraits. (Holden and Hardingham. 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. VIZETELLY has composed a work that should rank with the best that have appeared on the thorny subject of modern France. He has no need to force a sympathy that many circumstances have conspired to foster, and at the same time he has been able to keep a sufficient measure of detachment for his judgments to claim attention both in the land which he has served and in that which he has only observed. This detachment, paradoxically enough, while keeping him for many purposes outside the arena where France asserts her claims as a nation, only partially extends to French internal politics: Mr. Vizetelly combines two capacities, that of the foreigner in France and that of the fervent friend of the "bloc," or the Republican Concentration, or whatever the newest phrase is. The result is by no means hurtful to his authority; rather we are disposed to judge that his work has gained by his partisanship; he is so intent on demonstrating the excellence of the cause he proclaims that he cannot endure the semblance of a falsehood or a misconstruction; consequently he is scrupulously just to the opponents of his ideas. Thus he is at pains to indicate in a footnote that M. de Cassagnac and the Soleil at first favoured a more exhaustive inquiry into the Dreyfus case. The good faith Mr. Vizetelly claims in his preface is manifest throughout his book.

We are not saying that we agree with the author in every particular; on the whole, we find ourselves disagreeing with him rather too frequently for our complete peace of mind. But that is because Mr. Vizetelly's bugbear, like Gambetta's, is Clericalism, while ours—possibly as the result of a somewhat abnormal experience of French conditions—is Anticlericalism. But from the translator of "Vérité" and the "Conquête de Plassans" organised Christianity must expect some hard knocks, and the attack is, at all events, straightforward and honest. The recurring phrase about "stepping straight out of the Middle Ages" is perhaps a good enough rope to hang clerical dogs with, but we cannot approve the form in which the predominance of Catholicism and lukewarm Republicanism in the navy are explained:—

> The seaman is usually more inclined to religion than is the landsman, and until recent years no real attempt was ever made in the French service to combat the superstitions engendered largely by the dangers of the seaman's calling.

We find it difficult to believe that the Republican ideal includes the official preaching of "la libre pensée."

The great question of Republicanism as the ideal polity for France is well and shrewdly answered by Mr. Vizetelly. At the outset it was, according to Thiers, merely "le gouvernement qui nous divise le moins." At various stages in its career the Third Republic has only shone by comparison with its possible alternatives; the enemies of the Republic were so divided as to make any radical change of government almost inconceivable; in the great public scandals of the period, such as that of the Panama Company, the opponents of the régime have been involved quite as freely as its supporters, and Boulangism was not an attractive business. But in the end the Republic has come to be a great deal more than a mere negation; especially under M. Poincaré, whose administration is just within the scope of this book, the Republic stands for a fruitful and national idea, for service and sacrifice. We have known Frenchmen incapable of distinguishing between France and the Republic. This is no doubt an exaggeration—for the matter of that we have known Englishmen who consider that the idea of loyalty has no applicability to a republic—but there is no doubt that the Third Republic is now a really representative government. To those who would put party and "forms of government" above patriotism Mr. Vizetelly records the fine answer of the Duc d'Aumale, who presided at the trial of Bazaine:—

> "There was nothing left," he (Bazaine) said at one moment, referring to the position of the country after the fall of the Empire, whereupon d'Aumale gravely retorted, "There was France."

Mr. Vizetelly is, if anything, more severe for the extreme left than for the extreme right. He is an authority on Anarchism, whose manifestations he discusses at some length. He considers the Commune, > on the part of those who fomented it, one of the greatest crimes that history has been called upon to record.

For one thing, it nearly killed the Third Republic in its cradle. Then the negotiations that took place between the Germans and the Communards were extremely discreditable to both parties. The startling development of Socialism during the last decade or so Mr. Vizetelly leaves on one side—it is the most important lacuna in his book. The future is, we admit, rather more than uncertain, but we should have thought that the ministries of MM. Millerand and Viviani and the premiership of M. Briand called for some comment; and the career of M. Jaurès, one of the most striking personalities in French politics, seems to us to be rather too lightly dismissed.

Two points made by Mr. Vizetelly and bearing on modern problems have struck us as particularly good. He thinks that the two decisive reasons for Italy's adhesion to the Triple Alliance were the French policy at the Vatican and the Tunis adventure. Then he places the spread of alcoholism in France to the account of the siege of 1870, when the scarcity of food was compensated by an abundance of drink. Among his general conclusions we find that he considers that the French peasant is less prosperous than he has been, or rather that he saves less money than formerly.

No book on such a big subject could reasonably pretend to completeness. We have pointed out what we ourselves consider the lacunæ in the present work, but when any reader has made all the reservations that occur to him he will still find an immense amount to interest and instruct him. Mr. Vizetelly has had an eye and an ear for everything. He has mixed in every society, and has reproduced, with the inwardness of every movement, what is in many moods a great deal more interesting, the externals of the actors in it. Grévy's billiards, Faure's marksmanship, the girth of Bazaine and Pélissier—not him of the Apollo—are all deemed worthy of notice. The ramifications of ancient houses, whose dissociation from public life has long been a weakness to the Third Republic, the early careers of his heroes, the position of the various claimants to the throne, all these are excellently discussed. The popular songs are given, sometimes in extenso, and the Offenbach successes and other theatrical events fall naturally into their places in a singularly human narrative. We cannot resist the mention of the banker Lognon, who, on his marriage and at the request of his wife, adopted the name of Charlemagne as a substitute for his own less romantic one.

Mr. Vizetelly has achieved what we once believed impossible, and what we sometimes relapse into again believing impossible—he has two nationalities. It is perhaps only possible for a journalist who is a foreign correspondent; a diplomatist is, or should be, essentially a unipatriot, and most other exiles are either fiercely in love with their own country, or have conceived an exclusive and unholy passion for some other. But Mr. Vizetelly, whose zeal for France is unquestionable as against other countries, is altogether on the side of his own country when the debate is between her and her nearest neighbour. That is why, in spite of the repeated appearances of the head of Charles I—that is, Major Dreyfus—and the priests in his pages, he has written a true and admirable account of modern France.

A Philosopher in His Library

Among My Books. By FREDERIC HARRISON. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

HERE is a book of a type all too rare in England. Ostensibly a series of "Centenaries, Reviews, and Memoirs," it is really, for the most part, an informal talk about books and bookmen. We have known Mr. Harrison in a variety of characters; as the strenuous protagonist of Positivism, the grave and balanced historian, the acute and accomplished critic. Here we find him in a milder mood. The day's work is done, and the author, from the depths of an easy chair and before the glow of a comfortable fire, talks to us of the things that interest him most. He is under no sense of constraint. He invites us to share his enthusiasms. He confesses to his prejudices and limitations. Always the scholar, he is exquisitely urbane, discursive, entertaining.

Mr. Harrison has devoted a considerable portion of a long and strenuous life to the reading of books. He is, he tells us, devoting the remainder of it to the re-reading of the best of them. He knows which books are worth preserving, and which may safely be confined to the dustbin of forgetfulness. He is no pedant. He knows his classics as few modern writers know them. He is steeped in Homer, in Virgil, in Æschylus, in Horace, in Dante, and in Calderon. And, though he can quote from the original, he is content to read in translations. For commentaries he has no use, and the wisdom of the wise he rules out of court as an unnecessary impertinence. But to the books themselves he returns again and again. And to the book-lover he proffers this wise advice: "Read your old books again, those you have forgotten, those you never cut—but read them in some pleasant and portable form."

He has, of course, his preferences; nor does he always—being in something of a relaxed mood—attempt to hold the balance as between one author and another. A sane, if a devoted, Shakespearean, he is not greatly drawn to the Elizabethan tragedy writers. His criticisms on Marlowe, Massinger and Beaumont and Fletcher, are full of good sense.

> Of course (he writes) I admire as much as any man the red-hot passion and superb music of Marlowe, that Cæsar Borgia of our poets. No man with an ear can be deaf to the triumphal march of Marlowe's "mighty line." His "Hero and Leander," his poetic pieces, are another thing. He was indeed a great poet, or a great poet manqué. But his terrific plays—even "Faustus," the only one I could often read without pain—are as tragedies the splendid failure of an abnormal and precocious genius. Their Gargantuan megalomania, their ferocious egotism, their inhuman brutalities, to my taste, ruin even their pompous rhetoric and semi-delirious imagination.

Perhaps Mr. Harrison does something less than justice to the unquestioned genius of Marlowe. Perhaps the trumpet of revolt is sounded with too shrill an insistence. But how valuable is such a judgment as a corrective to the over-praise of Lamb or the unbalanced and uncritical adulation of Swinburne! That phrase, too—"The Cæsar Borgia of our poets"—how it fixes and defines—better than whole reams of formal criticism—the place of that flaming star in the planetary heaven of English poetry!

No reader of this volume can fail to be struck by the wide range of Mr. Harrison's interests. From a causerie on general literature, ranging from Goldsmith to Horace and James Smith, he turns to a discussion of the Homeric problem. He is a traditionalist in the matter of Homer, rejecting—not without a touch of scorn—the theory of a multiple origin of the Iliad advanced by such writers as Professor Murray and Mr. Walter Leaf. Here he finds himself on the same side as Mr. Gladstone—a writer with whom he could have had but little else in common. "Before I can believe that the Epic was concocted by an unknown series of poets," he writes, "I would rather believe that the Faerie Queene was a hotch-potch founded on the Saxon Chronicle, and 'worked over' age by age by Layamon, Langland, Lydgate, Chaucer, Malory, and Wiat." It is but seldom, however, that Mr. Harrison strikes this high pontifical note.

Then there are papers on Tennyson, on Westminster Abbey, on Charles Eliot Norton, on Chatham, on the London Library—to name but a few items in Mr. Harrison's feast of good things. Finally, Mr. Harrison lets us into a secret which we hasten to give away. He shall tell the story himself:—

> Mr. Kegan Paul, an old friend of mine, and once closely in touch with our Positivist body, took much interest in the new edition of the "Imitation," which he was commissioned by Cardinal Newman, of the Oratory, to publish. Kegan Paul came to me one day and asked me if I would undertake the English translation for the Cardinal. I naturally hesitated, saying that his Eminence would hardly care to put it in my hands. "I have already consulted him," said Kegan Paul, "and he is quite willing to have you as a translator—adding that he would himself see that the theology was sound, and all that he wanted was an accurate translation in perfectly pure English." I confess my modesty shrank from such a test of my literary resources, and I declined the responsibility. But I have always remembered it as one of the most graceful compliments which I ever received since I could hold a pen.

It was, no doubt. And one can only regret that that English translation was never undertaken.

This is a book written by one of the greatest of English bookmen for the lover of books. To such an one we commend it without hesitation or reserve. Open it where he may, he will not fail of his reward.

Mental Deficiency

The First Signs of Insanity: Their Prevention and Treatment. By BERNARD HOLLANDER, M.D. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE ACADEMY of July 16, 1910, contained a review of "Hypnotism and Suggestion" by Dr. Hollander, and in the present work the author has gone a step further in giving his researches on a successive stage of a subject on which he is undoubtedly a great authority.

The first chapter of the book is entitled, "When is a Person Insane?" and the gist of the matter is that in the earlier stages many cases might be cured if suitable care and treatment were provided. This is so, but the duty of doing this lies on the relatives of the person who is living on the borderland. A patient is only certified insane when his conduct becomes unsafe to himself or to others.

As the writer says, insanity does not come as a thunderbolt out of the sky. There is, therefore, no excuse for persons having reasonable means to neglect or not to care for these first symptoms, and if they fail in their duty, they should not complain if their friends or relatives have to be treated by the law as it is in force to-day.

Disorders of the animal passions, of the social affections, of the intellect are dealt with, and throughout the book there are very full cross references which add much to its value. A chapter is devoted to hereditary disposition to insanity, and the writer says: "Opinions vary as to the relative importance of heredity and education in the production of adult qualities. By heredity being understood all those qualities and capabilities which exist at the moment of birth, and by education all those external influences which are brought to bear upon the child from the commencement of his life. Some people credit education with powers that are altogether beyond it, ascribing to it all the qualities whether good or bad possessed by the adult, others, like the writer, consider heredity to be the more potent factor—and later, the conclusion of almost every man who has written about mental unsoundness is that heredity is by far the most frequent and most potent predisposing cause of insanity. Without it there would be very little unsoundness of mind in the world."

The logical outcome of this is that it is the duty of persons of either sex who have a mental taint not to continue the chain, but to abstain from marriage, and this duty is not merely a personal one, but is due to society at large. Touching this question, it will be interesting to note the fate of the Bill introduced by Mr. McKenna in the House of Commons, known as the Mental Deficiency Bill, carried in the House by a majority of 223, and now in the Committee stage.

The remedy suggested is segregation and the deprivation of the opportunity of procreating children. Of course there will be much outcry on the part of others than the feeble-minded against such an interference with personal liberty, but surely in this case the end will justify the means, and the suggestion of such an Act is an outcome of modern civilisation and the welfare of the many against the restraint of the animal passions of the few.

Treating of the increase in insanity we read: "One of the reasons why uncivilised people are less prone to insanity may be that they lead a simpler life. They are not subjected to political or religious storms, and have no refined pleasures of life, but are given to a natural mode of living."

Civilisation favours the occurrence of insanity through the enormous growth of population of great cities; with the resultant evil influences, hygienically and morally, the increase of a mentally and physically degenerate proletariat, pauperism, predominating factory life, lack of marriage, the increasing intellectually and morally destructive craze for riches and luxury, and the greater struggle for existence.

Men and women live in crowded cities under unnatural conditions, and perfect mental or moral development cannot be the rule so much as in healthier surroundings of village or country life. In these latter, too, the average mediocre intellect can find its medium in which it can safely thrive, while it would be much more likely to succumb if transplanted into the hurry and bustle and the fierce struggle for existence of city life.

Let us add a few words on the much vexed question of inebriety, or more shortly, drink, as a cause of insanity. Dr. Hollander's dictum on this is: "Many lunacy specialists hold the opinion that insanity is largely due to drink, ignoring the two dominant facts that insanity is on the increase and drink is not. My experience has taught me that the number of insane owing to intemperance is comparatively small, but that the defective self-control of persons inclined to insanity often leads to drink, and even a glass or two in such tainted persons may produce the appearance of drunkenness." Alcoholic drink in moderation may do no harm to the healthy, but it is "rank poison" to unstable brains and brains that have been injured or are diseased. To sum up, to no class of persons is intemperance more dangerous than to those inheriting an unstable nervous system.

Our own personal knowledge of perhaps a dozen cases of this kind confirms every word of the author's opinion—and we agree thoroughly with him that "the State gives the right to sell all sorts of drink amongst the poor. The State, therefore, should do its best to protect the poor from its influence by the earlier closing of public-houses, and by insisting on the absolute purity of the drink supplied."

It is, of course, impossible to go through this work fully in the limits of a review, and we must leave the student to do this, but we have a word or two to say on the concluding chapter, "Insanity and the Law."

Dr. Hollander believes in a born criminal, and we at present agree with him after some experience as a visiting justice of a large prison. There is a typical criminal who is born in crime, born into crime, and whose vocation is crime, by a physical and psychical proclivity—not amenable to moral treatment, as shown by the absence of all remorse. The difference between the madman and the criminal is that the one cannot and the other will not exercise self-control.

In our view there is nothing to complain of under the present system of treatment. Many think that if a person charged with a crime is insane, or on the borderline, he should be dealt with in quite a different way from an ordinary criminal; should, in fact, be segregated at once, and not punished for a crime he did not know he was committing. We are not writing of cases of murder, where the evidence of insanity may be pronounced and distinct, and where as a rule the prisoner is committed to await His Majesty's pleasure—in other words, sent to an asylum for life, but of minor cases where the author and others seem to think hardship is done by sending such a one to an ordinary prison.

A modern prison is not labelled like the entrance to Dante's Inferno, "Abandon hope," etc. It is a filter bed for dealing with the persons sent there. A report from the doctor of the prison where the prisoner may have been under remand, accompanies him, and on his arrival to serve out a sentence every possible care is taken to ascertain his mental condition. If circumstances warrant it he is sent to the hospital, either with other prisoners, or in a separate observation cell, and if his state of mind does not justify his detention in prison, where, of course, it would be impossible to carry out a proper course of treatment, he is examined by two doctors and two justices, and sent away to an asylum. There is, therefore, no cause for thinking that a mentally defective person convicted of a crime against society suffers in any way under the present system. His food, his labour, his health, are all carefully regulated according to his requirements and physical and mental needs, and he is much better off than in a workhouse infirmary. Further, if a man charged with an offence is apparently of unsound mind, many magistrates—especially in London—remand him to such a prison as Brixton that observation may be kept and a report made on him before he is further dealt with. If the report indicates that he is of unsound mind, he is treated as a pauper lunatic.

The difficulty again of trying at the same time whether a man is guilty of a crime and also whether he is quite responsible for his actions, is obviously too great. Recently a case came before us where a man was charged at Quarter Sessions with fraudulent bankruptcy. He had been through the ordeal of the preliminary hearing when he was committed for trial, made a speech from the dock on his trial, stating quite lucidly that he had no intention of defrauding his creditors by what he did, but was found guilty by the jury and sentenced to four months' imprisonment in the second division. When we saw him after he had arrived to serve his sentence it was reported that he had been praying openly in his cell, and on our asking him why he had done this he stated that he had been praying to God to help him in his trouble, and he was quite satisfied with the result, for he had only been sentenced to four months' imprisonment, whereas he expected twelve. He was found unfit to be treated as an ordinary prisoner, and was accordingly sent away for proper treatment. This is only one of many similar cases which go to show that under the present system every care is taken and no hardship done.

In conclusion, we thank Dr. Hollander for a very valuable contribution to the knowledge of this most difficult subject, although it leaves a dominant impression that everyone is more or less insane. If its perusal by ordinary practitioners results in only a few cases being dealt with and cured before the unfortunates bring lasting trouble on themselves by doing some injury to their own persons or to society at large, we are sure Dr. Hollander will consider himself amply repaid for the labour he must have taken in writing this book.

His complaint of the want of facilities to ordinary students to study the disease in the asylums where it is treated, rests, of course, with the managers of the various institutions, the subject being, on his own showing, such a vast one that it must evidently be left to specialists to be dealt with if any success in treatment is to be obtained.

Since writing the above, we understand that there is in the press the report of an exhaustive statistical inquiry, conducted under the supervision of Dr. Karl Pearson, into the physical and mental characteristics of criminals, which may alter some of our opinions.

The Problem of Infant Protection

The Elements of Child Protection. By SIGMUND ENGEL. Translated from the German by DR. EDEN PAUL. (George Allen and Co. 15s. net.)

THE problem of child-protection is one of the most vital confronting the social economist and the legislator at the present day. Dr. Sigmund Engel's book is a notable contribution towards the literature of the subject, chiefly by reason of its lucid and dispassionate analysis of the causes which render child-protection necessary in the modern state, and of the practical acquaintance displayed in its pages with the difficulties which beset the path of reform. Though much is done more remains to be done. The learned author is at small pains to conceal his leaning towards reorganisation of the social fabric upon a socialistic basis, but he never lets his personal views upon such matters interfere with his treatment of present facts from the standpoint of existing theories regarding them, and the means available towards the particular end desired.

Such vexed questions as that of State control over the procreation of children, and the punishment of juvenile offenders, are fully discussed. The causes of infant mortality, numerous as they are, are enumerated; but the suggested remedies are, as is inevitable, confined to generalisations. With regard to education the author's view is that the child must be educated in accordance with the needs of its own individuality. In our own country the provisions made towards attaining such a desirable object have been vastly extended and improved during recent years. We are unable to follow Dr. Engel when he tells us that education is "a postulate of social life alone," and that education "has no bearing upon the life of persons living in complete isolation." The number of the latter is so small as to be negligible, but it remains true that education tends towards individualism, not towards gregariousness.

Again, in spite of the author's socialistic tendencies, we are a little surprised to find him bluntly and dogmatically asserting that "the chief cause of poverty today is unquestionably capitalism." A little later he tells us that "the true child-protection, the child-protection of the future, will take the form of the destruction of capitalism." His higher instincts apparently led him to forget the proposition which we have just quoted when he came to deal with the question of the regulation of women and child labour; for under that heading he informs us, as is the fact, that "manufacturing industry does not come to a standstill because, in consequence of regulation, certain processes previously performed by women and children have now to be carried out by machines or by men. On the contrary, as a result of this, the industry becomes more vigorous and more efficient."

Throughout the work Dr. Engel insists upon the superiority of preventive over curative measures. Indeed, the motto of his whole teaching might well be the single word "prophylaxis." How thoroughly we have learnt the lesson in this country may be realised in any police court in the kingdom upon any day of the week. Indeed, so far as the administration of justice in this realm is concerned the ancient notion of retribution has practically disappeared from the penal system.

Whatever may be our visions of the future we agree whole-heartedly with Dr. Engel that when once children have been born we are bound, even from the point of view of self-interest, to do the best we can for them. As a lucid and comprehensive treatise upon the subject we recommend this work to all those of our readers who are interested therein.

John Hungerford Pollen. By ANNE POLLEN. (John Murray. 15s. net.)

THIS is an excellent biography, well edited, with more discrimination and commendable discretion than is usual in such works. The Rev. John Hungerford Pollen was a Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and Senior Proctor in the early fifties of the last century. His life divides itself into two parts, the periods before and after his secession to the Roman Catholic Church in 1852. He came of an old Wiltshire family, and on his mother's side was descended from Pepys.

The first part of his life is largely concerned with the early storms and controversies of the Tractarian Movement. He wrote a little book about the troubles of S. Saviour's, Leeds. Many people to-day, if unacquainted with the history of that time, would find it difficult to believe in the existence of such amazing prejudice and cruel persecution of hard-working, good men. A calm and unbiased view, after sixty years have passed, suggests the reflection that as Wesleyans were driven out of the Church in an early day, so many Tractarians were driven out then for holding principles now admitted to be quite compatible with the teaching of the Church of England. After his secession, John Hungerford Pollen came to the conclusion that he had no vocation for the Roman priesthood. So he turned his attention to art, and studied in Italy. Returning home, he became Professor of Fine Arts in the Roman Catholic University of Dublin, where one of his first important works was the decoration of the University Church, the Basilica of SS. Peter and Paul.

In 1858, during the Long Vacation, William Morris, Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and others decorated the Oxford Union Debating Hall. To Pollen was assigned "King Arthur receiving his sword Excalibur from the Lady of the Lake." But as everybody knows, these beautiful paintings, owing to the state of the walls, perished many years ago. Pollen now settled in London to his profession of decorative artist and architect, and during the rest of his long life accomplished a vast amount of beautiful work, some of the finest in great houses, Kilkenny Castle, Blickling Hall, Ingestre Hall, Clontra, co. Dublin, and St. George's Hall, Liverpool. In 1863 he became Assistant Keeper of the South Kensington, now the Victoria and Albert Museum, and, many years later, private secretary to the first Marquis of Ripon. He was a man of marked personality; as Sir George Birdwood wrote, "It is everything that his biographer should realise that, great as John Hungerford Pollen was in his public and official life, he was greater in himself."

Vancouver to the Coronation: A Four Months' Holiday Trip. By J. J. MILLER. Illustrated. (Watts and Co. 5s. net.)

THIS book contains an account of a trip from Vancouver which had for its chief aim the witnessing of the Coronation of King George V. The matter, the author tells us, has already appeared in the form of letters in the Vancouver World. At the first glimpse the book would decidedly appear of greater interest to the overseas visitor than to the Londoner, since photographs such as those of the Tower of London, Hampton Court, and the Albert Memorial are only too common on this side of the water, and it would seem a little difficult to find anything new to say in the description of such places. Nevertheless, there is a freshness and a breeziness in Mr. Miller's account of his travels and in his praise and criticisms of the ways of the mother country which afford pleasant reading. The same may be said concerning those portions of the book which deal with Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Paris, and Waterloo. Doubtless some critics may complain that the author has dealt with many matters which are trivial; but the pleasant frankness of his work must rob the most virulent of his severity.

Dogs and Their Masters. Compiled by MARION CHAPPELL. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 5s. net.)

MANY books have been written about the dog, and Mr. Chappell adds yet another to the number. The present volume is an anthology of prose and verse in praise of man's most faithful friend; but, in addition to a great variety of extracts from the works of well-known authors, it also contains signed contributions from prominent dog-lovers not hitherto published. The illustrations, some of which are in colour, form a special feature of the book. Among them is a wire-haired terrier by Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A., now published for the first time; Sir Henry Irving's "Fussy"; the author's collie, "Brush"; and two groups of typical dogs' heads.

Mr. Chappell has gone to many sources for his material, and has not hesitated to draw freely on both reality and invention, with the result that he has collected many gems together concerning our canine pets which are sure to prove welcome to every dog-lover.

The following is by that graceful versifier, the late Mortimer Collins:—

He lies in the soft earth under the grass,
Where they who love him often pass.
And his grave is under a tall young lime,
In whose boughs the pale-green hop-flowers climb;
But his spirit—where does his spirit rest?
It was God who made him—God knows best.

George Eliot was a great lover of dogs. In "The Mill on the Floss" she makes Bob Jakin say:—

"Lord, it's a fine thing to hev a dumb brute fond on you; it'll stick to you, and makes no jaw."

Which is more than can be said of many bipeds.

At one time it was the custom for collie dogs to accompany their masters to church, and the churchwardens were provided with "dogs' tongs" to keep them in order. Specimens of these instruments are still to be seen in churches in Wales, Herefordshire, etc. As recently as 1856, a "dog-whipper" was appointed to Exeter Cathedral, and in an old church near Petersfield "dog-rails" are still in existence, placed between the communion rails, evidently for the purpose of preventing dogs from entering the chancel. The dog is placed at the feet of women in monuments to symbolise affection and fidelity. Many of the Crusaders were represented with their feet on a dog, to show that they followed the standard of the Lord as faithfully as a dog follows the footsteps of his master. The volume embodies quite a rich and varied collection of canine lore.

Lord Ripon in India. (An Historical Reminiscence). By NRISINHA CHANDRA BANERJEE. (Training Academy, Monghyr. 6 annas.)

IF there ever was a man fundamentally more responsible than another for the recent unrest in India it was Lord Ripon, who pushed forward the natives and belittled his own countrymen, contrary to all advice, tradition, and precedent. Lord Ripon's Viceroyalty (1880-1884) was the parting of the ways. He is remembered for his policy of local self-government—lokil sluff, as the natives called it—which he foisted upon India; for the Ilbert Bill—for the trial of Europeans by native magistrates—in which he had to accept a compromise tantamount to a defeat; for his repeal of Lytton's Vernacular Press Act, which in recent years has been repassed in a milder form; and for the general tenor of his anti-English administration. So far as he was unacceptable to the Europeans, he was beloved by the natives. The author believes that "the name of Lord Ripon shall be best inscribed in the scrolls of immortality as the inspired redeemer of our country, 'the Prophet-King of Anglo-Indian History,'" and again, "shall descend down the distant posterity as the great Regenerator of India." It is truly stated that Lord Ripon "always associated himself on the popular side," that is, against the governing class, he being the head of the Government. This booklet, a maiden undertaking, wanders over a wide field, from English politics to Indian events, from Gladstone to Mr. Keir Hardie, who is termed a man of very refined taste and vast literary qualifications, and "was for some time in India, and it is expected that he had studied well the Indian condition of life," from which the reader can estimate its worth. Mr. Banerjee is evidently well pleased with his booklet, as "no attempts have been made here to play any mischievous prank." His mistakes in names and spelling are innumerable, but are not worth cataloguing. Lord Ripon's position in Indian history will not be improved by these sketchy reminiscences of a partisan.

Following the Drum. By HORACE WYNDHAM. Illustrated. (Andrew Melrose. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. WYNDHAM describes seven years of life with the colours very minutely, and at the same time accurately. He served for that period in the ranks of an infantry regiment, and, having gained experience of various home stations, together with some little knowledge of garrison life in Gibraltar, Malta, and Egypt, purchased his discharge at Capetown to avoid five years as a reservist.

To one who knows nothing of military life, the book cannot fail to prove interesting, for it was evidently written before the author had time to forget the minute details of an existence that is totally distinct from life outside the barrack gate. One who has had experience of the miniature world in which the army lives apart will, however, realise that this record is incomplete. As an instance, Mr. Wyndham refers to the defaulters' call as the "angel's whisper," in which he is undoubtedly correct, but he makes no mention of the far more popular term for that hated call, "Paddy Doyle," while of "jankers" for "days to barracks" there is never a mention. No vocabulary of military slang can lay claim to completeness unless these two terms are included.

In his estimate of officers and non-commissioned officers, Mr. Wyndham is accurate to a degree, and his description of barrack-room life is photographic. His stories are not so fortunate, for they are all ancient, and he has ventured to give some specimens of retorts made by privates to officers which must surely be—as any soldier will recognise at once—fabrications; they could not possibly have happened.

Still, it is a breezy, entertaining, and largely truthful record, its weakest point being the work of the illustrator. His pictures suffer from the fact that he knows little or nothing of the inside life of the Army, and thus was unable adequately to portray that which Mr. Wyndham has described with a facility born only of experience.

bably this "grandeur," this violent energy, that has led to this play receiving such an enormous amount of attention outside England, for by this quality it is unique in the history of literature. In France its attraction may be due to the love for the exotic, in Spain we would suppose that it wins sympathy through its more direct appeal to national taste and characteristics. Señor Par has made his translation into the Catalan language, of which he speaks with strong filial affection. The many difficulties of translation have made necessary very copious notes, and old Catalan words have themselves sometimes to be explained. The translator is well equipped for his task, both through his exertions and attainments, and through his acquaintances, among whom we will mention the late Dr. Furnivall. The chapters on textual criticism, on the sources of the play, on the Shakespearean theatre, and so forth, are admirable in their completeness. The only lacuna we have observed is a comparative neglect of the part of Garrick as a factor in Shakespearean history.

South America. Painted by A. S. FORREST. Described by W. H. KOEBEL. (A. and C. Black. 20s. net.)

THE prominence gained by the South American continent during the last fifteen years well warrants its inclusion as the theme of one of Messrs. Black's excellent colour-books, especially when the writer of the descriptive letterpress is one who knows his subject so thoroughly as does Mr. W. H. Koebel. A hundred years ago, he points out, came the first dawn of modern life in South America; within the last thirty years the period of growth began; and even fifteen years ago "the horseman, the guitar, and the serenade" were characteristics of Buenos Aires—a city now preparing for the advent of "tubes," transformed beyond belief architecturally, resounding with motor-cars, and abounding with telephones. If, sentimentally, we regard the change as not all to the good, we are compelled to accept the fact that commercially it is an enormous success.

Other parts of the huge continent, not so continually before the public eye—and the public pocket—as the Argentine, are interestingly treated by Mr. Koebel and his collaborator. Paraguay, for instance, its human and its insect life, and the dreaminess of Asuncion, form an attractive theme for a chapter; the account of the Belvidere is capital. Obviously, in a book of this size there is no room for a detailed account of the history of each province, its conquerors and their campaigns, but some hints are given which should send the student searching for more. The illustrations vary in quality, but for the most part aid the text very well in explaining the charm of this quarter of the world which is now taking its place in the march of civilisation.

The Light Side of London. By E. B. D'AUVERGNE. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

THE eight sketches which form this volume show that Mr. d'Auvergne is exceptionally well acquainted with far more phases of the lighter side of London life than the average Londoner ever encounters or even hears of. But though he writes in a light vein, his book does not consist solely of the amusements and frivolities of the great city. He gives us, also, glimpses of its darker side, and draws attention to some of its still festering sores. There are many lively personal anecdotes and experiences scattered throughout the volume, which are very amusing reading, and the reader's enjoyment is further enhanced by the two dozen mostly humorous illustrations it contains. The West End, with Piccadilly Circus Station, "the Clapham Junction of Cytherea"; the City, "the jolliest part of London"; the Suburbs, with "the Monkeys' Parade" and "the Suburban Pub"; Bohemia and "the Flirtatious Londoner"; Sunday in London, and the "Londoner's Fairs," and 'Appy 'Ampstead, with many other of the multiple sights and activities of the vast metropolis are described in Mr. d'Auvergne's entertaining work in a way no one else could describe them.

Ballads Weird and Wonderful. With 25 Drawings by VERNON HILL. (John Lane. 21s. net.)

THE ballad is perhaps the best vehicle of any for the "weird and wonderful," and it was a good idea to have some of the most uncanny rhymes illustrated by an artist who possesses a knack of capturing a curiously uncanny effect in his designs. Exaggeration, of course, plays a large part in these pictures, and there is some truth in the assertion which has been made that Mr. Hill owes much to Blake; often his notions of anatomy, as here expressed, suggest Blake's disproportionate drawing of the human form. In a rather strained preface Mr. R. B. Chope says: "Certainly I shall be astounded if these wonderful drawings are not recognised as a triumph of modern art." Certainly we shall be astounded if they are; but they undoubtedly have succeeded in adding to the nightmarish impression left upon the reader by these old ballads; and that, we suppose, was their chief aim.

Fiction

Hocken and Hunken: A Tale of Troy. By "Q." (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.)

CAPTAIN CAI HOCKEN plans to have some excellent times with his companion, Captain 'Bias Hunken, when they both retire from seafaring life and settle down on the Cornish coast. But a coy widow wills it otherwise, and endeavours, more or less successfully, to flirt with each of the two seamen in turn, and occasionally with both of them at the same time. This affords an opportunity for a great deal of humour, of which Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch takes ample advantage. None of the parties concerned is seriously in love, but the thought of rivalry adds zest to the combat, and when the lovers charter the same man to write the all-important letter to Mrs. Bosenna, the lady of their choice, and both letters are delivered together, it is easy to imagine that a few complications are likely to ensue. Mrs. Bowdler, the captain's housekeeper, who had seen better days, must surely be a distant connection of Mrs. Gamp, and has her most amusing interludes as the relations between the two men become somewhat strained, owing to their mutual desire to attract and please the same woman. The various townsmen, too, add their share of fun by their quaint sayings, but it is left to Palmerston, the "boots" of the "establishment," as Mrs. Bowdler persists in calling the seamen's modest dwelling, and Fancy, the precocious girl he admires, to supply one of the best chapters of the book. Those people who have any acquaintance with Fowey will recognise many of the places described, while those who have been fortunate enough to view a regatta, either from the quay or from one of the points which overlook the harbour, will understand what a very pretty spectacle this represents. The time of the present book is as far back as the late Queen's Jubilee, so we may hope that Sir Arthur will give us a further account of Troy and its inhabitants before very long.

Mary in the Market. Mr. H. MAXWELL. (John Long. 6s.)

SOME parts of this book give one the impression that Mr. Maxwell could, if he chose, write a much better story than he has accomplished in "Mary in the Market." The character of Aunt Millicent, for instance, is very well drawn, and conveys to the reader an accurate idea of the charitable maiden lady in her narrow sphere. Mary herself is fairly life-like until we come to the long, detailed description of her many charms and the fascination of her person. Then it is quite apparent that such a creature never could have existed on the face of this sinful earth. "Her return from a day's hunting was like a cavalcade of knights escorting their sovereign through a dangerous pass. . . . Her appearance in a ballroom was as if she were a magnet, and all the men were made of steel. Her entrance into church was synchronous with an extraordinary augmentation of the congregation. . . . Once when she went skating . . . the press of people about her was so great that the ice cracked and she was immersed. . . . Mary enjoyed a halcyon happiness." And so on for several pages. The plot, too, is well worn; there must be something of more than ordinary interest when it has partly to rest on the old trick of loss of memory and ensuing complications. We hope that in his next book Mr. Maxwell will give more attention to developing the characters of ordinary individuals—even if they be only solitary old ladies—and less to extraordinary situations and impossible people.

mit it for review. In this instance Mr. Andrew Melrose informs all and sundry that "the play upon which this novel is based is at present the sensation of New York, where it is nightly drawing crowded houses." As to this we know nothing; but as the book under review might conceivably make a very good play, it is quite plausible to believe that the successful play referred to was the why and the wherefore of this remarkable novel. In this instance, therefore, we are pleased to recognise that the publisher has not overstepped the mark, as so many others only too often do. And when he goes on to say that the book "deals with very simple but very human materials, and offers the suggestion that spirits of departed friends may be able to return to earth and work beneficently, although unseen, on behalf of their loved ones," we raise no objection, for the plot is constructed on this basis.

Mr. Belasco has written a story around the occult, after the spiritualist's own heart, and even those sceptics who pooh-pooh everything pertaining to the supernatural will, nevertheless, find much in it to interest them. The ordinary reader cannot fail to be delighted with his charming tale of true love triumphant through the medium of a ghost. Peter Grimm, a delightful old Dutchman, makes a compact with McPherson, a gruff but kind-hearted old Scotch doctor, to the effect that the one who dies first shall come back and communicate with the other, if he can. Soon after, Peter dies, and in accordance with his promise does come back. He is, of course, invisible, and in spite of all his efforts he finds it utterly impossible to communicate with McPherson or anyone else; all he can do is to suggest. Being dead, his eyes are opened to things he could not see or even suspect when alive. To his dismay, he finds matters in his own family to be very different from what he believed they were in his lifetime. What he thought right was wrong, and vice versa, so he sets about putting his house in order. To this purpose he hovers about the old home, and, though his presence is not seen, it is felt, and all the time he is directing the actions of the other characters, though they are unconscious of it, to such good effect that even the wicked nephew repents and all ends well.

"Twelfth Night" at the Savoy

MR. GRANVILLE BARKER will reap the result of his pioneer work, in all probability, by finding his present production of Shakespeare a success, in estimation and otherwise. Critics will doubtless claim that he has profited by their instruction, and turned to good use their advice, whereas he has not considerably altered his original conception. The same thing said twice is generally heard—and sagely heard—on its second saying. It is true, of course, that he has adjusted his proposals to the criticism awakened by the "Winter's Tale." Mr. Albert Rothenstein has not, for example, been entrusted with the invention of the costumes. That has been committed, with the decoration of the play, to Mr. Norman Wilkinson; and the result is that, instead of costumes that are fantastic, we have costumes that are picturesque. It is, in our judgment, a change for the better, inasmuch as it interfered less with the inner power of the play. But the essential conception remained the same, and it is this that attracts our attention.

In his work as a producer Mr. Barker has always studied to make effective pictures. The action of a play, to him, is more or less that of a kaleidoscope, one picture dissolving into another, and so on into a third. How far this obstructs the real force of an action is its own question. To a certain, perhaps to a large, degree it must prevail: though when it comes to a deliberate grouping of characters in certain colour effects, one is bound to say that the pictures are artificial and inclined to be stilted. Its use, in fact, must depend on the play itself: which sounds a truism, but is not so simple as it might appear. One of the most interesting things about Shakespearean drama is the intelligent attention it arouses in blind men. The plays carry their own atmosphere and colour, that recreate themselves in the imagination, so that the world of action is born again there, having never, in fact, lived anywhere else. "Twelfth Night," for example, does this. But if such a blind man were given his sight in the middle of Mr. Barker's performance, would he, on opening his eyes, find his inner vision reproduced in the outer reality? Or would he—a far more important matter, since no two visions would agree in detail, however they might agree in general semblance—see an outer picture so simple and suggestive that he would be able to place his vision on it without any violent contradiction?

We think not. With all its interest and significance, it cannot be said that Mr. Barker's production is faithful in this best sense. Very properly he holds to his extended fore-stage, and builds his inner stage so that it can serve for virtually all the purposes of the play. But that "building" means that, at the rear of the stage, two long stairways run down each side, meeting on a platform at the centre beneath a pillared cupola. A few more steps lead to the floor of the stage, whereon, right and left, stand two clipped yew-trees, cut out of wood, with no attempt at realism, like large play-toys out of a doll's house. Everything is dazzling white except the pillars and the cupola, which are pink. In this setting Olivia holds her court, and Malvolio is fooled. It is a picture that strikes and assaults, and we are very sure that white and pink are not the colours impressed on anyone's imagination by a reading of the play. Moreover, whatever the "Twelfth Night" as a play may be, it is not "doll's-house-y."

So with the Toby scenes. They manifestly demand space and breadth for the midnight revelry to swing about in. But Barker sets a small room within the stage that, with its table, is barely large enough to hold its four people. It is draped with rich tapestries, and lit by two candelabra. But poor Sir Toby is terribly confined, and, in consequence, he is very unhappily subdued. And a subdued Sir Toby is a tragedy. It is against the atmosphere of the play. Given his proper fling, he would have wrecked that wee room in five minutes. No doubt, the cause was the perpetual setting for the outer scene, within which the room had to be placed; but we cannot help thinking that simple curtains for both scenes would less have clashed with the business that was enacted in them. The total effect might have been less picturesque, but that does not mean that it would not have been more effective.

Yet, however much one may disagree with Mr. Barker's method of breaking away from a petrifying actualism, for the revolt itself there can be nothing but sympathy. The changes in quality between the present production and that of the "Winter's Tale" are enough to show that he is taking his way carefully; and if we feel that in springing away from actualism he has sprung too far—in fact, into a mere picturesqueness that is almost as stultifying—it is part of the penalty of revolt. Yet in the course of the journey he has recovered for us the beauty and rhythm of Shakespeare's lines, and that cannot be a subject for too much thanks. They were spoken as they should be—swiftly and with a rhythmic cadence—though their linear construction was not always observed.

The acting was of a high order. Mr. Henry Ainley as Malvolio resisted all temptations merely to caricature the part. The whole meaning of the part is that the set gravity of the steward is only proved to be egregious when Maria has turned him inside out by the letter, and Mr. Ainley, in keeping him in his own unexaggerated self till that moment, showed fine restraint and justice. Mr. Arthur Wontner as Orsino rendered well the music of his lines, and made him a picturesque and dignified figure withal. Mr. Leon Quartermaine as Sir Andrew Aguecheek a little over-emphasised him as an exquisite, but struck the essential part of his contrast to Sir Toby Belch. As this fat knight Mr. Arthur Whitby was excellent. With all his roystering, one never forgot that Sir Toby was Olivia's kinsman, and a man of authority. As Olivia herself Evelyn Millard was gracious and dignified, a proper pair to Orsino; and Miss Leah Bateman Hunter as Maria was good, though she lacked the natural spontaneity of the character. At first Miss Lillah McCarthy seemed to be making Viola too jerky and forced; but this passed away later, and the real Viola emerged well conceived and rendered. Given his point of view, as every artist may claim his point of view, in the performance Mr. Barker was admirable. "Twelfth Night" should attract good audiences to the Savoy.

"Instinct" at the Duke of York's Theatre

WE trust the powerful acting of Mr. Aubrey Smith will be as greatly appreciated by the public as it is by us. But who knows? There are five or six plays from the United States running at the largest London theatres just now, all with plots more or less well and truly laid, all with admirable actors, all, no doubt, doing excellent business, and yet, and yet we are not altogether satisfied. Something away, and how much more we might enjoy them. That is what we feel about "Instinct," made American by Mr. Penrhyn Stanlaws from the French of M. Henry Kistemaeckers, and made quite English by Mr. Aubrey Smith, Miss Lilian Braithwaite, Miss Muriel Beaumont, and Mr. Norman McKeown. The ladies' beautiful dresses are by other ladies with foreign titles; the scene is Long Island, New York; and the furniture of Dr. Bradford Mandover's house is seventeenth and eighteenth century English rather than what they call, in America, "colonial"; so, you see, we are widely cosmopolitan on this occasion. The things we mainly wish away are the rather stiff nature of the conversation of the first act, the quantity of it, and the slowness of the pace at which it was taken on the first night. This tedious method may be as M. Kistemaeckers wishes, for it is equally apparent and trying in his other Englished play at the St. James's.

However, the trifling languors of the opening soon pass, and the situation becomes enthralling and exciting—very exciting, indeed, if only one could believe in the characters. A clever and successful surgeon has a beautiful wife, to whom he does not pay very great attention. The beautiful wife has for neighbour an invalid, highly romantic poet, to whom she offers the solace of her frequent companionship. Her husband's brother and her poet's servant suspect, and not without good cause, that the poet is her lover, and after some scenes of doubt and delicacy the husband is aroused to passionate resentment.

By an arrangement of highly artificial circumstances a position that seems as like guilt as may be is arrived at. The poet is dying at night in Mrs. Mandover's room. The physician, who is Mandover's brother, cannot help him; the husband alone can carry out an operation which may save his life. Bradford Mandover, the surgeon, after the great scene of the play, follows the instinct of the trained professional man, and, notwithstanding his passionate hatred and horror of what he is supposed to believe to be his wife's action, goes to the rescue of the man considered to be his wife's lover—after saying he will let him die a thousand times. Really, Mrs. Mandover has only a maternal affection for her poet; but, owing to this affair being a three-act play, she cannot say so until the powerful scene of the third act is over and the audience has duly received a shock and a thrill—a faint cold thrills through the house; M. Kistemaeckers has made his effect, and the play is over.

For the one strong scene much must be forgiven. As to the acting, Miss Braithwaite as the misunderstood and misleading wife brought the charm of her personality to fill up the rather awkward gaps left by the author, just as Miss Muriel Beaumont lent her beauty and grace to make the best of the peculiar friend Mrs. Mandover employs to arrange her appointments with the poet. That gentleman would have been difficult to represent, but the trouble is avoided by his being kept off the stage altogether. Mr. Aubrey Smith as the surgeon has never played with so much force and skill; he is excellent in every moment of the play—so much so, indeed, that he sometimes almost makes us believe in it. Unfortunately he cannot always be before us, and, when he is not, the make-believe of the plot gets the upper hand and we are just a little regretful and bored. Still, there is always the great affair in the third act, and that sort of thing used to be enough to draw London, and perhaps still is.

After "Instinct," Miss Irene Vanbrugh in "Rosalind" comes as a pure fresh draught of delight. M. Kistemaeckers' machine-made piece of work is, at least, a more welcome prelude to that of Mr. Barrie than the two short plays which have departed to make room for "Instinct."

EGAN MEW.

Some New French Plays

A PLAY of M. Paul Hervieu is always a great literary event, for he is undoubtedly considered one of the keenest and most subtle playwrights, and it is natural that the worldings whom he dissects and portrays should be interested to see themselves as depicted by him. No detail escapes his acute and ironical psychology, be it painful, ridiculous, or sad.

"Bagatelle," which the Comédie Française gave for the first time on October 28, caused at the répétition générale quite a sensation. It is certainly one of M. Hervieu's finest works; in it the strength and elevation of thought so apparent in some of his preceding plays is combined with a light, graceful bantering which is most agreeable. This double quality is the dominant tone of the whole play, for the drama breaks out suddenly, and we find that all those subtle insinuations, those gay and frivolous remarks, those cynical observations were so many starting points from which evolves a really cruel situation.

Madame Orlonia has passed the age of taking an active part in the comedy and tragedy of love. Nevertheless, her chief interest in life is to follow the intrigues, flirtations, and passions of her younger friends; she even goes so far as to aid and abet the development of such love-affairs. In her castle of Bagatelle she has gathered for the summer some young society women, both free and fair, and some bachelors; she has also invited Florence de Raon and her husband Gilbert, who, although married for twelve years, are old-fashioned enough to be still devoted to each other. Florence is delighted to be Madame Orlonia's guest when she discovers that her bosom-friend Micheline is also staying at Bagatelle. As for Gilbert, he is very happy to meet his old chum Jincour, for whom he professes an almost brotherly affection. However, these four people are no sooner settled here when unhappiness and unrest seem to lie in wait for them.

Gilbert, whom everybody—and especially his wife—believes to be a model husband, pursues Micheline, who consents to give him a rendez-vous. Florence, however, has overheard their conversation. She is overwhelmed by the pain the double treason of her husband and friend causes her, and has been oppressed by the atmosphere of sensuality and vice which pervades Madame Orlonia's domain. And, moreover, her husband's friend, Jincour, seems also to have been influenced by the frivolous, feverish desire for pleasure reigning at Bagatelle. He makes love to Florence in spite of her energetic refusals to listen to him. But, on the discovery of her husband's proposed treason, Florence resolves to revenge herself. She allows Jincour to declare his love, and she gives him an appointment in the same room in which Gilbert and Micheline are to meet.

The third act is the culminating point of this drama. Florence surprises her husband and Micheline. To revenge herself, she declares to Gilbert that Jincour, in whose loyalty he trusted absolutely, and for whom he professed the tenderest of affections, has promised to meet her in this very room. Gilbert refuses to believe her, but at that moment Jincour arrives. And the four friends stand in silence, face to face, overcome by the ruin of their friendship. However, Florence pardons her husband his proposed faithlessness, and even gives Micheline to understand that she may eventually forgive her, much later, when what actually appears to her as so serious may seem to her a mere "bagatelle."

M. Hervieu has succeeded fairly well in the extremely difficult task of passing insensibly from comedy to tragedy. After the frivolous bantering of the first act, we find ourselves face to face with people in despair for having been traitors to their love and to their friendship. Moreover, M. Hervieu has given his play a fine and unforeseen ending. For, instead of the expected tears, recriminations, and violence, the concluding scene of "Bagatelle" is one of emotion and melancholy, emanating from the almost dumb resignation of these people, victims of their weakness and of their folly. In fact, the author has rarely expressed so intensely the eternal conflict reigning between the worldly conventions of civilisation and the primitive instincts which dominate or have dominated at some time or other even the most high-minded and refined men and women.

The cast is, on the whole, excellent, the Comédie Française having placed several of its most brilliant members at M. Hervieu's disposal. Mme. Bartet has surpassed herself once more in the character of Florence, which she has modelled with that perfection which is hers by right; Micheline is personated by Mlle. Berthe Cerny, who has expressed with the utmost delicacy, but also with the greatest intensity, the sensibility of a young, beautiful, and solitary woman. And Mlles. Marie Leconte and Marcelle Geniat were both charmingly spirituelles, and especially marvellously dressed in two minor parts.

The rôle of Gilbert de Raon was held by Albert Lambert fils, the classical hero par excellence. We will allow that it was even rather a shock to behold him making love in modern clothes! One could not help looking for his sword! However, M. Albert Lambert fils has tried to make up what he lacked of modern sensibility by much vehemence and evident sincerity, and this is a very laudable effort. As for M. Grand, he was quite remarkable in the rôle of Jincour, and never has his fine sober talent won more merited applause. MARC LOGE.

Music

TO the music-lover who arrives in London at such a season as the present, after a prolonged wandering from city to city on the Continent, it must seem as if all the daughters of Music, save one, had been let loose in the streets, and were crying and struggling to make their invitations heard. With every sort of persuasive beguilement they bid the public to the enjoyment of their charms. The more dignified, those who are sure of themselves and their powers of attraction, merely announce that they are ready to receive company on such and such days; but others, those of less certain fascination, cajole, flaunt, puff, wheedle, brag, insist, in such a manner that it were no wonder if a bewildered public should bid the whole pack of them begone, and refuse to set foot in their halls of entertainment. There is something almost indelicate in this marketing of the musical houris. At every turn of the street one is confronted by an affiche which implores the public to come to a piano recital, or a violin, or a chamber concert, or an orchestral, a twelve-o'clock-in-the-morning, or a ten-o'clock-in-the-evening. The front page of some not inconsiderable newspapers is hardly wide enough to exhibit all the advertisements of these profferers of musical pleasure, together with the lengthy testimonies to the success they have met with elsewhere. And on Saturday the very Temples of Religion enter into the lists, and announce their Anthems, their Voluntaries, their Te Deums, till we have come to abhor the name of "Harwood in A flat" and "Gounod in C minor." In other cities where much music is made, they manage to do without all this parade of invitation, yet are the concert-rooms better filled than is often the case with ours. Indeed, the complaint of the visitor is rather that he does not always know what musical delights may be offering themselves; that he learns too late how he might have heard Mme. Leatherlungs, or Herr Strumpanthumpf, the Lapland Quartett, or the new chef d'orchestre from Morocco, only he did not know that they were going to perform. In one newspaper, perhaps, there is a brief list of forthcoming musical events, but everybody does not know which among the hundred streets this particular one may be.

A rare advertisement on some hoarding or kiosk may catch the eye, or it may not. We remember a great disappointment in Paris when we learnt too late of a wonderful choral evening of Bach in a noble church. To one of the organisers of this event we afterwards made a complaint. "But here we do not find it necessary to advertise," said he, "everybody who takes an interest in music knows what is going to be done, and when. Our difficulty is to find seats for all who wish to be present at our concerts." We have sometimes thought that the prodigal use of musical advertisement in London defeats its object. The really devoted music-lovers here, as in Paris, manage to know what there is of interest going on. The great mass of society which delights in beautiful music but does not belong definitely to any coterie of the musical world, never thinks of looking at the advertisements, because there are too many; it would be hopeless, they think, to try and keep up with them. "What! is Paderewski going to play next week? How do you know? Why have we heard nothing about it?" How very common such questions were shortly before Tuesday last! Or it may be, "Do you know anything about these wonderful players from Poland who are being talked about? The Russian Embassy seems to think they are wonderful!" "Why, ma'am," we reply, "they have been here before, have given many concerts with splendid success; their advertisements have appeared in every paper, on every sandwichman's back; you might have gone to their concerts had you chosen!" "Is it true that Muriel Foster sang in Bechstein Hall last week? We would have sacrificed everything to have heard her again. Why were we not told about it?" And so on, and so on. If you would only keep your eyes open, dear Madam, you could never be ignorant of the musical joys that are daily being offered you in London.

But there is one of Music's daughters—in Italy and in France they think her the most desirable of all the family—whose voice is silent in London, while all her sisters are so eager to be heard. Her name is Opera. In the humblest towns of Italy she has opened her court for the long evenings of winter. In Germany she flings wide her doors, and the most serious, the learned, the philosophers, delight to enter in. Arriving recently in Paris we found three opera houses offering us entertainment. One gave "Louise," another the new work of St. Saens, "Deianira," and the third announced the "Magic Flute." With what joy did we not hasten to this delightful third house, for when can we hear that exquisite music of Mozart in England? Every seat was filled; the audience manifested the greatest delight; and though the performance (except for M. Fugère's Papageno) was not so good as one we heard a year or two since at the Opéra Comique, it was honest, careful, and very pleasant. We did not pay more than eight francs for our stall, and we wondered whether the time will ever come in London when so cheap a delight will be possible. We should like to think it will, but are not very sanguine about it. Much was said and written—alas! in vain—about the advisability of making the Kingsway Opera House into a home for national opera. But Londoners do not really love opera or want opera. They would soon have it if they did. The tradition is that opera is a rare and exceptional form of amusement, a something connected necessarily with high prices and evening clothes and diamonds and "fashion." The ordinary bourgeois who is quite prepared to patronise the play from time to time, does not think of the opera as a place to which he might go in the same easy way as to the theatre.

He knows very little of any but a very few popular operas, and would not care to risk spending his money on what might turn out to be dull. When he goes to the play it is because he knows that the piece has already attracted thousands of the people who spend their money freely, and he is fairly sure that he will enjoy himself. He must be trained to like opera, to know about the composers, and what their work is likely to be. Would it not be the best plan for the promoters of national opera to begin their work on a more modest scale than that which such a house as that in Kingsway would make necessary? People would the sooner get used to regard opera as a normal, everyday kind of entertainment, on the same level as a play, if they could hear it in a theatre of the usual size. Do not most of us understand music more readily and easily when we are close to it in the friendly atmosphere of a drawing-room than when we hear it from a distance in the formality of a big concert-room? Surely this is the case. And is it not then probable that the inexperienced will find themselves more at home, more on comfortable terms with themselves and the opera, if they hear it in a house of moderate size, from which elements of grandeur and stiffness and fashion have been banished? We should like to think of a national opera house to which people not dressed in evening clothes could go without shame, where the prices should not be higher than those at the Paris Gaiété-Lyrique, where the singers and players should be well drilled artists who do not aspire to be "stars," where one could hear the opera of Gluck and Mozart and Weber and Verdi and Smetana and Humperdinck and Grètry and Offenbach with occasional revivals of Monteverde and Pergolesi and Cimerosa and Galuppi. What a long list of delightful operas for a winter's evening we could make out! Wagner we would leave to Covent Garden.

The Magazines

QUITE one of the most striking articles in the magazines this month is by Mr. Austin Harrison on August Strindberg in the English Review. As a summary of his achievement, taking its criticism in the course of biography and description, it is decidedly the best among the few estimates of Strindberg's work. Moreover, Mr. Harrison lays his finger on the sore place of nearly all these high Northerners. "The dreariness of winter," he says, "the great forests, the distances between village and village, the loneliness, and again the long, white, neurasthenic nights of summer, conduce, no doubt, to the introspective nature of the Scandinavians, nearly all of whom are given to a little Troll-cry, and a playful affinity with the supernatural." That is finely and justly said. Mr. Gerald Villiers-Stuart has a story not less striking in its way, entitled "The Tragedy of a Spirit." It is well devised and well executed. Whatever we may think of its inherent philosophy, based on the idea that sacrifice means extinction instead of realisation of being, we must welcome work of this kind, with its implicit further scope. Mr. P. P. Howe deals with knowledge—if with more than a due modicum of pessimism and startlingly large capitals—with "Malthus and the Publishing Trade." The title explains itself, and the article should be read—by the heroic of disposition. The unfortunate omission in all such articles, however, is that they cut immediately at the work that intends nobly, and leave an open field to the cheap and nasty. The power to subsist, in terms of the publishing trade, clearly omits "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," and definitely includes "The Way the Poor Girl Went Wrong" or "The Bad Girl's First Turning," with gentler or grosser variants of the theme. That, unhappily, is the logical bent of Mr. Howe's article.

In the Fortnightly Mr. George Moore writes about "Une Rencontre au Salon," in the chaste and deliberate style which he has grown into these latter times, and which he has made the expression of an extraordinarily pellucid beauty. On the other hand, too, we have that self-consciously superior abstraction on matters of pictorial and decōrative art. So that we have a fairly typical George Moore: except that he finds himself better—that is to say, more satisfactorily—at length than in a little space. Mr. S. M. Ellis deals with "George Meredith's Childhood," but does not add much to our knowledge. Also, he repeats a fair portion of his article on George Meredith's relations in the Fortnightly some time back. Mr. Charles Woods' article on "The Reorganised Turkish Army" reads somewhat sarcastically in the light of recent events. Mr. Israel Zangwill writes wittily and cogently on "The Awkward Age of the Woman's Movement." There are many touches in it in which the word wit fulfils both its ancient and present meanings; he tells us that the hunger-strike has "placed the Government on the horns of an Irish bull."

In the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Kiddersley, in writing to refute Dr. Elizabeth Sloan's plea for the State Inspection of Convents, deals authoritatively with many aspects of it, but seems to miss the essential point. The point is not quite that "adult women . . . having a high ideal are not to be allowed to choose a mode of life which is neither seditious nor injurious to others," but that the possibility exists that some of those who so choose may wish to revoke their decision at some later time, and may conceivably be hindered from so doing. Mr. Wadham Peacock writes with knowledge on "Nicholas of Montenegro and the Czardom of the Serbs" in an interesting article. And on another aspect of the war Mr. Mitra treats with equal authority and interest, "England, India, and the Balkan War." But unquestionably the most interesting in the present number is by Mr. Wilfrid Ward on "A Ghost of the Living." It is a very remarkable story of dual appearance that he tells, and one that seems inexplicable by any psychical rule. That the apparition of one living person should meet any living person is no very new thing. But that each should see the other at the same place under precisely similar circumstances at different times, and later reproach the other for having passed without speaking, then to discover that a length of time interposed between the two occurrences, is a very remarkable thing. It is for the record of such occurrences that one buys magazines to keep. There is a dearth of articles of literary interest, Mr. Gribble's "Boswell's Dutch Flirtation" being chiefly a matter of careful quotation, scarcely coming under that title.

It is surely not easy at this time of day to write with any freshness on John Synge, yet Mr. Gerald Lowther has done so in the Oxford and Cambridge Review. To be sure, he treads unwarily, and not always with understanding. For example, to mean that Synge's emotion does not spring from a healthy acceptation of life is one thing, but to declare that "Synge, in short, lacks feeling" is quite another. It is simply inaccurate. The same magazine, in its editorial, gives us a just plea for the work of the Abbey Theatre. Nevertheless, it is true that all its new and recent work is just that stark realism that originally its directors protested so strongly against. The things of beauty it gives us are all too much confined to the work of its founders, who themselves have ceased writing new work. It is not a healthy outlook. In his "New Theory of the Drama" Prof. Hugo Dinger does not so much give us a new theory as express an old theory better. There is much to think over in his essay: much to disagree with, much to hail joyously. But he begins on a bad premiss in saying that "According to tradition, dramatic art belongs to the category of poetic art, and is considered a minor art of poetry." Those who may consider it so can be neglected. On the contrary, dramatic art, when it is not crude actualism, is considered the highest form of poetry.

However much one may disagree with what is said there, the editorial in Blackwood's is always readable; and this month it is especially so. Such subjects as the late production of "The Winter's Tale," the Post-Impressionists, and Meredith's Letters are handled in turn, and always with an emphatic opinion. The present number, also, is full of good stories, though one misses the reflective side of literature. In the Cornhill Mr. William Watson has a poem entitled "Dublin Bay," which is simple and easy in its music. Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall writes a good story called "His Honour's Pleasure" in the same number; and Major MacMunn has an appreciation of "The Poetry of Sir Alfred Lyall."

The Church Quarterly opens with a very interesting article on the influence of Celtic Art in England, in which the writer strongly supports the view that this influence is to be traced alone to Irish monks and ecclesiastical interchange between England and Ireland. Mr. Hibbert, of Denstone College, gives a good account of the archæology of Croxden Abbey in Staffordshire. The sub-warden of St. Deiniol's Library, Hawarden, writes of the influence of St. Basil as affecting the whole history of monasticism. He was, in fact, the father of Eastern monasticism. Prebendary Yorke Fausset gives an appreciation of the Christian philosophy of Rudolf Eucken of Jena, who deserves to be, and hereafter will be, better known among English Christians. A good number concludes with an important résumé of the present position in the law of the Church as affected by the recent decision in the well-known Bannister-Thompson case. There are the usual excellent short notices of current books.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

WHEN Asquith is in a tight corner he has a kind of brazen effrontery by which he hopes, with the help of big battalions, to bluff things out; and it was with cool cynicism he came down on Wednesday to move his resolution to rescind the fatal vote which had been given on Monday afternoon. He was cutting right across all Parliamentary practice. The Rule that a decision come to in one session cannot again be considered in the same session would have been destroyed, and many another precedent which the wisdom of our ancestors had put in the Order Book, not for one party, but for the proper carrying on of debate, would have been swept away. The accumulated experience of centuries would have gone like a flash. In practice one Government never reverses the legislation of its predecessor, no matter how much it may have fought against it when in opposition. It is obvious that this is the only common-sense view to take, otherwise we should spend all our time undoing each other's work. But this is what Asquith now proposed to do. We knew perfectly well that the Government could never allow the Banbury vote to stand, and there were several ways open to the Prime Minister in which to effect this purpose, but they meant a little delay if the forms of the House were to be preserved. It was the penalty of defeat, and this was the price Asquith was not prepared to pay. Why should he, with his obedient horde? He intended to cut the Gordian knot in his own fashion, and we were determined, come what might, he should not do so.

The House was packed, and the Peers' gallery was also full. The air was charged with electricity, and sparks commenced to crackle and play in the dim November afternoon, which foretold the coming storm. After many questions and points of order had been raised, the Speaker said very, very gravely, "I can find no precedent for this course," but he added in effect it was not for him to say them "Nay."

Asquith had carefully prepared his speech. It was idle to suppose a snap division should be allowed to stand when the normal majority was well over 100. Rules were all very well, but Parliament was made for man, not man for Parliament; and he then went on to quote Balfour's famous defence in answer to a snap division in 1905. (I remember quite well what a case of adamant A. J. B. seemed to have built up when he finished.)

Bonar Law replied. He did not, as I expected he would, point out how all the circumstances of the 1905 case were entirely different, but contented himself by quoting Asquith's reply on that occasion. Both sides laughed at the humour of it, but only for a moment. Bonar Law became fiercer, and made use with deadly effect of a quotation from the Daily News "that Mr. Asquith had struck a blow worthy of old Cromwell himself." The Liberals did not quite like the lawless proceedings of the Protector in the Long Parliament compared with their own Government in this particular connection. Bonar Law finally wound up by moving that the House do now adjourn to consider the matter.

Now, the Unionists had decided to give a good hearing to Asquith and also to Law, but they were not going to allow a general debate upon the matter. They intended to teach the majority a lesson. So, when Robert Harcourt, with his glass in his eye, got up, he was greeted with yells of "Adjourn!" He stood to his guns for some time, until the quick-witted Lloyd George saw what the cookery-books call "another way." Harcourt sat down, no one got up, and the division was at once called, and resulted in a victory for the Government, the House declining to adjourn by 104.

Lloyd George had taken the wind out of the sails of the Opposition with dramatic suddenness. Personally I should have allowed the rescinding motion to have been put at once, and had a row on that; but the Unionist leaders thought otherwise. The ever-ready Banbury sprang into the breach with a reasoned amendment that it was an affront to evade by the present methods the recorded proceedings of the House. James Craig followed. The Government were determined to be quiet. "What are we here for?" roared Sir Edward Carson. Nothing occurred. It seemed as if the whole House was at boiling-point. It would simmer down again. Suddenly something happened. Sir William Bull got up in the middle of a fine speech by Ernest Pollock, and said, "I am tired of this," and at the top of a powerful voice shouted "Traitor!" It must have been a deep sense of injury and injustice to have forced a quiet, generally good-tempered solicitor like Sir William Bull to use suddenly so unparliamentary an expression. He must have known—indeed, he admitted afterwards that he knew it was unparliamentary, but it successfully set light to the gunpowder.

Dick Challoner, Haddock, one of the Craigs, and several more joined in the cry, but Bull's voice was loudest. With the greatest determination he stood up and defied the Speaker. He addressed him as "Sir" and spoke respectfully, but continued to bawl "Traitor!" "We have been treated abominably!" he declared. The Speaker requested him to withdraw from the House, which he did, accompanied by the deputy Serjeant-at-Arms and the new inspector of police.

After that, pandemonium reigned. The Opposition called out "Adjourn! adjourn!" with monotonous regularity. Ronald M'Neill, rising like a tower, demanded that Rufus Isaacs should sit down. The Speaker declared that "grave disorder had arisen," and adjourned the House for an hour. Everybody went to dinner, and at the end of the hour both sides determinedly faced each other. Men's blood was at fever-heat, whilst both Front Benches studiously affected an indifferent attitude. Our Back Benches would listen to no one. They were determined nothing should be done; they expected wholesale suspensions, but the Speaker declared that, so long as they behaved in a parliamentary manner—and there are parliamentary as well as unparliamentary cries—he could not stop it. At length he adjourned the House until the morrow, and the Opposition cheered themselves hoarse with what voices they had left.

The members did not leave the House when the Speaker did. The Government supporters waited for Asquith, who seemed loth to move; and Churchill was active in leading the cheers for his leader. Suddenly, in an access of rage, Ronald M'Neill threw a volume of the Rules of Procedure at him, which struck him on the cheek. He was very angry, but left the chamber with his friends. Poor old Bill Crooks tried to lighten matters by starting "Auld Lang Syne," but it was a dismal failure. Compliments were exchanged. "The gentlemanly party!" sneered the Government. "Rats!" retorted the Opposition. I can see no way out of a renewal of the disturbance in a worse form on the morrow unless Asquith gives up his high-handed method of depriving the Opposition of the fruits of their victory by destroying the ancient rules of that House of which he is leader and guardian. . . .

I wrote gloomily last night. A night's reflection sobered both sides. The common-sense of the race reasserted itself. I am not at all surprised at foreigners not understanding us. A renewal of the row seemed inevitable, and yet it never came off. Two or three incidents, small in themselves, helped to clear the air.

Winterton at question time wanted members fined or their salary docked for non-attendance, and Kellaway produced roars of laughter by proving that Winterton himself had been none too regular.

Mark Lockwood made a facetious reply that a certain official "was only a railway official in the sense that a member who ate cheese was a cheesemonger." All very trivial, but to men with nerves on edge it helped to put the House in a better temper.

Then Ronald M'Neill, in a manly speech, apologised to Winston, and Winston made a really charming reply. This helped the matter a little further. We were gradually crawling on to thicker ice. The Speaker rose. He admitted his intervention was unusual, but, then, the circumstances were unusual. He was in the position of moderator. Nobody desired a repetition of yesterday's scenes. He humbly but firmly advised a further adjournment.

Asquith guardedly agreed. Without saying what would be the result of his deliberations, he moved an adjournment until Monday. Bonar Law readily concurred, and the adjournment would have been agreed to at once, but for the fact that the "Mad Hatter" wanted to say a few words. However, the Speaker suavely barged him off, and, but for a few cries of "No, no!"

from the Labour benches, the motion was carried nem. con.

Mr. Asquith is beginning to learn that a short cut is not always expedient.

Bitterly as I am opposed to Mr. Asquith and his politics, I could not help admiring him as he faced the music on Monday. The House was again crowded—the Opposition hostilely quiet. Asquith last week had attempted the rôle of Cromwell and had failed, and he had to eat that unpleasant humble pie. One of his virtues is that he is sometimes able by force of will not to show where he is hit; he accomplished it this afternoon—there was no cringing or apology; indeed, a stranger in the gallery who had not heard the proceedings of the previous week would never have believed he was doing anything disagreeable. He spoke with his old straightforward directness. He described the recent events with a colourless accuracy in which there was no word with which the Opposition could find fault. He paid a handsome tribute to Fred Banbury, and then unfolded his new thesis. The Government's financial plan was to be withdrawn; by this means Banbury's victorious amendment fell to the ground. A fresh scheme was then described, with new limits, by which the Government will get what they want—by more complicated means, it is true—so long as they are not defeated; and this is not likely at present.

The Opposition does not mind this—it is fair fighting; therefore, when the Speaker put the resolution that the old financial resolution be withdrawn, no one got up to oppose—Bonar Law sat still, and the Ayes had it.

Chiozza Money tried to break a lance with the Speaker over his ruling last Wednesday, but returned baffled. If Chiozza or the egregious Mr. Leif Jones wanted to question his ruling, he coldly but blandly suggested that they had better proceed in the usual way by bringing forward a motion condemning his conduct before the House.

Save for a ground swell, which I will refer to directly, things settled down on Tuesday in the usual humdrum way. There was an interesting debate, in which the Radicals fought for Protection for Ireland, and the Unionists derided their inconsistency and showed how impossible it would be for the scheme to work. Lloyd George is never at his best when dealing with complicated figures or questions of tariff, and he was mercilessly cut to pieces by Bonar Law, who made one interesting statement in retort. By the way, Bonar Law is getting very much more ready in debate, and is able to make impromptu speeches with greater ease and comfort than he did a few months ago. In reply to a gibe, he said he would be always glad to see Free Trade extended, and would be delighted if Germany and France would turn Free Traders. This is the position that Tariff Reformers have always taken up, although we have not heard it lately. Godfrey Locker-Lampson made a very good speech teeming with facts, but delivered it in a dull monotone, by which it lost half its value.

Now for the ground swell. The Radicals are very angry with the Speaker, and Joe Martin, of St. Pancras, has put down a motion censuring the Speaker. It is so long that it might be a verbatim report of Chiozza-Money's speech. It will remain two or three days on the paper, and then it will disappear. It is the last mutter of the storm that has shaken the Government to its foundations.

Notes and News

The Drama Society will present Mr. Edmund Gosse's translation into English of Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler" at Clavier Hall, Hanover Square, on Tuesday afternoon, November 26.

Sir Ray Lankester will produce directly a second series of his papers entitled "Science from an Easy Chair." The volume will be largely illustrated. Messrs. Adlard and Son, Bartholomew Close, are the publishers.

"Our Alty," by M. E. Francis (Mrs. Francis Blundell), author of "The Tender Passion," etc., is the title of a new novel which Messrs. John Long are publishing. Mrs. Blundell here returns to rural Lancashire, where many of her readers deem her at her best.

The Year Book Press will issue, early in December, a new work entitled "The Laws which Govern the Course and Destinies of Religions." The work is by an author who at present desires to remain anonymous, and the treatment is on historical and practical, not dogmatic lines.

Mr. John Lane publishes this week "Austria, her People and their Homelands," by James Baker, F.R.G.S., with 48 water-colour illustrations by Donald Maxwell, at 21s. net; and "The Van Eycks and their Art," by W. H. Weale, with the co-operation of Maurice Brockwell, at 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. will publish immediately an elaborately illustrated "History of Old Sheffield Plate," by Mr. Frederick Bradbury, who has for many years been intimately associated with the industry. The work includes all those matters which are of so much interest to collectors and dealers, and contains no fewer than 3,000 reproductions of specimens, names of makers, and marks.

Readers and admirers of the literary work of Lord Dunsany, who stands at the front of the writers who employ the parable form amongst the younger masters of prose, and of the weird art of Mr. Sime, whose genius so aptly fits his designs to the fancy of Lord Dunsany, will be glad to know that a second edition of "The Gods of Pegana" has been published by, and may be procured from, the Pegana Press, at 86, Newman Street, London, W.

Messrs. Williams and Norgate have much pleasure in announcing that his Majesty the King has honoured the Right Hon. Robert Farquharson in accepting his new volume entitled "The House of Commons from Within."

A large demand was created for this author's previous volume, entitled "In and Out of Parliament," but the immediate demand on publication for this companion volume bids fair to far exceed the interest in the earlier volume.

Mr. Heinemann publishes this week a book of travel, entitled "In the Shadow of the Bush," by Mr. P. Amaury Talbot. Mr. Talbot has recently carried out some most interesting explorations in Northern Nigeria, traversing the country between the bend of the Cross River and the German Cameroons on behalf of the British Government. He has also collected much detail about the natives, and discovered many new species of flowers. Other books just ready are a new edition of "Father and Son," by Mr. Edmund Gosse, and a re-issue of Mrs. William Sharp's "Life of William Sharp."

The "Triple Bill" at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square, consisting of exhibitions by Mr. George Clausen, R.A., Mr. Arthur Rackham, and the late Phil May is followed to-day, November 23, by a triple bill of no less interest. Mr. Edmund Dulac will show his recent water-colour drawings illustrating the poems of Edgar Allan Poe; the second exhibition will be a collection of water-colours of "Harbours and Towns," by Mr. Terrick Williams, R.I.; and, lastly, a series of paintings in tempera and water-colour, illustrating the life of the Virgin Mary, by Mr. R. Anning Bell, R.W.S.

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE PEACE OF EUROPE.

THE optimism with which the European situation was regarded last week has been succeeded by a wave of pessimism. A calm consideration of the crisis, however, will inevitably lead to the conclusion that there is little justification for this remarkable change in the diplomatic barometer. As a matter of fact, the situation is neither better nor worse than it was at the moment when Austria-Hungary first made known her intention of barring Servia's way to the Adriatic. The Belgrade Government then lost no time in disclosing its attitude. M. Pasitch, the Prime Minister, in an interview, emphatically declared that an outlet to the Adriatic was a matter of life and death for his country. Thus a deadlock was instantly created, and nothing has happened since in the direction of conciliation.

An unfortunate incident at Prizrend is responsible for the news that the situation has recently become acute. Servia, suspecting that the Austrian Consul at this place was actively in sympathy with the Albanians, made representations at Vienna, with the object of having him removed from his post. Austria replied that, before taking so drastic a step, she would conduct an impartial inquiry into the case. Since then, it is alleged, Servia, pleading military considerations, has allowed no communication to pass between the Consul and his Government, and the fears entertained as to his safety were only dispelled on receipt in Vienna of a picture postcard briefly announcing his continued existence. Austrian public opinion has naturally been aroused by the incident, and the Government has formulated demands for satisfaction which are generally believed to bear the nature of an ultimatum.

It is difficult to see how Servia can sensibly maintain her embargo. So arbitrary an action as that of preventing communication between a Consul and his Government raises an issue of great delicacy; in short, it is an affront of a kind that closely affects the honour and pride of Austria. In such a case there can be little room for diplomacy, and, unless Servia is entirely unconcerned with European public opinion, she will lose no time in giving, with as good grace as possible, the satisfaction required by Austria. The incident is to be attributed to the extension of the Servian military régime. Experience teaches that soldiers of all nations, when on active service, are prone to exert their authority with but little consideration for the task of diplomacy. In Albania, however, it is clear that the Servian Army is treading on very dangerous ground, and, as the Austrian Government definitely declared that in no circumstances would it allow this region to come under the domination of Belgrade, it might logically have been supposed that they would threaten instant reprisal were any attempt made to interfere with the functions of their representative.

Doubtless the Servian diplomatists will lose no time in undoing the clumsy work of their soldiers. For in the real crisis that is shaping they will need all the sympathy they can command. Towards this crisis events are moving rapidly. The Servian and Montenegrin armies are already in sight of the sea, and before many days have passed Europe will be faced with an awkward fact accomplished—an occupation of the Adriatic seaboard. In not forcing the issue while the great conflict is pending, Austria is exhibiting wise restraint. But the consular incident, if nothing else, is symptomatic of the ill-feeling which the deadlock on the larger question has generated. That both sides to the dispute are uncompromisingly holding to their point of view need give no ground for immediate alarm.

Nor is there any cause for depression in the naval and military preparations to which the Powers, without exception, are resorting. Nowhere is it denied that the peace of Europe is about to be subjected to a severe strain. It is to meet crises of this kind that the great armies and navies are supported, so that little surprise should be occasioned when, in view of lowering clouds, military activity is redoubled. It may be said, however, without reservation, that at the present moment the factors making for peace outweigh those which point to war. The feeling is shared alike by the Powers of the Triple Entente and of the Triple Alliance that a general European conflict for the sake of satisfying Servian ambitions is unthinkable. At the same time Great Britain, Russia, and France hold to the opinion that any attempt to deprive the Balkan States of the legitimate fruits of their dearly won victory should be frustrated. It must be apparent to all clear-thinking minds that the difficulty is one capable of solution—solution on the lines of just compromise. We agree with M. Pasitch that access to the Adriatic is a matter of life and death for Servia. Her just aspirations in this direction, however, can certainly be satisfied without the absorption of Albania, and without, what is of supreme consequence, the plunging of Europe into a conflagration which will concern, not the future of one small kingdom, but the fate of many peoples and many empires. No question that has ever engaged the Chancelleries of Europe has been more capable of common-sense adjustment than is the case with this Servian dispute. Austria recognises that her neighbour requires access to the sea. Naturally she would like to see the Servian route directed towards the Ægean Sea, or, at least, over highways and to ports where Servian influence was restricted. Servia, on the other hand, cannot fail to recognise that the Dual Empire possesses vital interests in the Adriatic, and that elsewhere she has already made sacrifices to accord with the military achievements of the Allies. War in a difficulty that admits so plainly of compromise could only mean that the statesmen of Europe had taken leave of their senses.

MOTORING

DURING 1912 the racing honours in this country have been almost equally divided between the Vauxhall and the Sunbeam cars, each of which has broken world's records several times within the last few months, and established figures which seemed likely to remain indefinitely. In fact, so numerous have been the successful attacks on existing records by these two cars that on hearing of fresh achievements on the track one expects to find, almost as a matter of course, that they have to be credited to either one or the other. The latest record, however, and the most sensational of all, has been secured by a car which is practically unknown as a competitor at Brooklands—the Talbot. On Saturday morning, a 25-h.p. racer of this make, driven by Mr. Percy Lambert, created four new records for its class—namely, those for the half-mile, the kilometre, the mile, and the lap—the amazing speed (for a small-engined car) of 113 miles an hour being attained over the first-mentioned distance.

The chronicling of fresh speed records at Brooklands must be getting a trifle monotonous to the ordinary reader, who does not see the object of it all. He may quite reasonably ask: What is the good of these strenuous attempts on the part of designers and manufacturers to evolve cars capable of such prodigious speeds, when practically any modern car, even the smallest, can easily travel at twice the rate of speed allowed by law? There are few indications that unlimited speed will ever be allowed on the roads of this country, or even that the existing limit will be materially extended, in the near future, at any rate. What, then, is the raison d'être of the car which can cover a hundred miles an hour or more? The answer is that it is largely owing to the building of such cars that the present-day motor vehicle, as used by the ordinary motorist, owes its efficiency. In the successful racing car the object of the designers is, of course, to attain the highest possible combination of strength, efficiency, and lightness, by which alone the maximum of speed can be developed, and the unceasing experiments and continuous efforts in this direction have led to the evolution of the light, powerful, and reliable motor-car of to-day. Those makers, therefore, who spend large sums of money and devote much time and thought to the production of record-breaking racers deserve every encouragement from the private motorist, for the certain result is the incorporation in the standard selling models of the improvements suggested by racing experience.

Now that the Show is over, the main feature of which was the leap right to the front of the splendid Sheffield-Simplex car, which was sold out, after attracting extraordinary interest, the principal topic in the motoring world relates to the petrol position. The price of the spirit is maintained at 1s. 7d., and there are rumours, apparently emanating from authoritative sources, that early in the new year it will have reached the almost prohibitive figure of 2s. In that event it is very certain that many private motorists will no longer think it worth while to run their cars. There has been a good deal of attention directed recently to benzole, and one of the most important and responsible of the organs of the motor Press, the Motor, is exceedingly optimistic as to the future possibilities of this spirit. But, so far as the ordinary motorist is concerned, the immediate prospects are not at all satisfactory. However excellent a motor fuel benzole may be, it is practically unattainable at present, and, if there should be any general demand for it, there is little doubt that its market price, which is already almost equal to that of petrol, would soon be on a level with that of the latter. To render the prospect still more discouraging, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just intimated, in reply to a question in the House of Commons, that the manufacture of British motor spirit will not be encouraged by exemption from the duty levied on the imported article.

The recently published balance-sheet of Belsize Motors, Ltd., of Manchester, constitutes an effective reply to the oft-repeated statement that there is no money—for the British manufacturer—in the small, cheap car. Last year the net profit of the business was £30,068, while for the financial year of 1912 it is returned as £34,444, which allows of a dividend of 12 per cent. per annum for the latter half-year. This is a better result even than appears at first sight, inasmuch as provision has had to be made for exceptionally heavy expenses entailed by important changes in the method of production, the result of a tour of investigation in America undertaken a year ago by some of the principals of the company. It is evident that there is money in the small car, provided its manufacture and sale be conducted on the right lines.

THE Stock Exchange is waiting for business, but none will come until the trouble in the Near East has ended. Why should people buy shares when at any moment Austria may declare war against Servia? Then no one knows what would happen. Russia might be compelled to defend the Slavs. Germany would join Austria and the position of France and England would be difficult. The only thing that makes for peace is the fact that the Austrian Banks are involved in all kinds of industrial undertakings that they have very little money, and that they have taken deposits from big and little all over the Empire. They are not in a position to stand a run. We find much the same thing in Russia. Twenty-three bankers combined to squeeze the Paris "bears." Huge blocks of stock were lifted off the market and the price of all Russian Industrials was raised artificially. Then the Banks found that the operation had cost more money than they had expected, and they went to the State Bank, which made advances against the shares. Thus the Government of Russia is pledged to a peace policy by reason of its huge "bull" commitments. In Germany no such foolish plunge was made, but the great banks are heavily involved in many big industrial undertakings, and though Germany is rich she is not anxious to bear the strain of war—she is indeed unprepared. France is always prepared. She lends the world money and her wealth is vast. Here in England we have all the money we need. We have not over-speculated. We have made large fortunes in trade which we have carefully invested. We are actually almost as rich as France. Neymarck, in the Matin, shows how far superior is the Triple Entente to the Triple Alliance. Indeed, the proportion is as 50 is to 80. Money rules the world. Therefore the great financiers believe in peace. The real danger lies in the uncontrollable passion of the Slav race—a passion which disregards finance and feeds only upon its hatred of the Turk and its almost equal hatred of the Austrian.

MONEY might soon fall back to four per cent. again once peace was settled. But no great bank dare risk advances for any long period, and as a result there is an abundance of cash for short loans and very little for three months' bills. Germany pretended she had all she needed, but the bluff could not be sustained, and in the end she had to raise her rate. Egypt appears to be financing herself with some ease. Her crop, though good, is no better than last year, and the strain of finding ten millions has not hurt anyone because actually no such sum has been or will be needed. Indeed, Egypt has been buying securities. She saved a great portion of her last year's profits. They have come in useful at a critical moment.

CONSOLS have really given us one of the few cheerful moments of our past week. Various stories are told to account for the rise. But the simple explanation is that half the gamblers in the Stock Exchange sold short, and this made the market firm. The Government has bought a little, but not much. And no one was anxious to sell under 75, for no one needed money. The big banks were not sellers and as the gilt-edged market has been spared large loans for some time past large buying orders accumulated. We may sneer at Consols, but we must never forget that they are as good as cash either as collateral or actual money. Big buying took place on the last fall, also big and foolish selling. Hence the recent rise, which I think will continue.

HOME RAILS looked like going up. But the "bulls" got nervous and the dealers marked down prices on Tuesday. I can see no reason for the fall. Traffics are excellent. The long-talked of Bill must pass. This is a certainty. Therefore, next year should be better than this, for the rise in rates will counteract any falling-off in trade—if such should come. The Great Western shows remarkable results—so does the North Eastern. But the largest proportional increase in Traffics comes to the Great Central—also the most profitable increase. This line makes little out of its passengers, but its goods traffics are lucrative. Nearly the whole of its large increases are in goods. The preference shares, which fared so badly in the first half of the year, will regain their lost position and are cheap to-day.

YANKEE RAILS do not respond to the improvement in Traffics. As these compare with the bad results of last year they are not so good as they look. But all the railroad men in the States consider that 1913 will be a splendid year. The main trade of the railway must be the carrying of the crops. These are splendid. The "bears" say that the new President will upset trade and disorganise manufacturers by attacks upon the tariff. I do not see this. He cannot do anything for a year at least. Those who know him say that he is a level-headed man who sees quite clearly that it will be impossible to destroy in a few weeks the result of years of work. Tariffs may be re-arranged; they will not be destroyed, and if the tariff is altered to help the farmer then the prosperity of the United States will be helped and the Democrat not injured; for the farmer is the mainstay of the country.

RUBBER.—A few reports have come out. They have not roused any feeling. Mr. Addinsell has floated a modest little block of land amongst his friends. But these are not the days for new rubber companies. Neither are they the days in which to buy rubber shares. Prices are low, but they are not low enough to tempt a would-be purchaser. Yields look good, but we must remember that almost all the companies will have to put up with a loss of 6d. a pound on their average sales for the year. This is a serious matter, and increased crops will not compensate. The Hevea Trust report reminds me that this company controls about 2,000 acres of good rubber and that at present prices this land stands in at about £20 an acre. Those who do not mind the uncalled liability of 5s. a share might do worse than buy a few of these shares. They run a risk that the company will not have enough money to carry its scheme through. That is all.

OIL shares look hard as compared with the other markets. But I suspect this hardness does not come from too much buying, but from too eager selling. Mr. Barnett has at last agreed to finance the Maikop Amalgamation, and will find £60,000 for the four concerns. I hope he will succeed in making them valuable. Mr. McGarvey will be chairman. I cannot see much prospect for the reconstruction, but the shareholders are let off very lightly. Red Sea will hold its meetings in a few weeks, but the "B" shares in the Anglo-Egyptian will not be distributed till next year.

MINES remain deadly dull. Broken Hill North has done well, and Zincs also look good. The price of the base metal keeps hard, and all the Broken Hill group should hold their own. I see that Latilla has taken in hand the Henderson Reconstruction. I presume shareholders must go in or lose everything. But they can only do it as a gamble—the assets are not worth discussion. It is said that Great Boulder has purchased a new mine which has 1,750,000 tons of ore giving 10s. a ton net profit.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are the steadiest things in the House. The investor is always in the market here. Electric Lights are good and will go even higher. Telephone Deferred look cheap. Argentine Rails are being pushed up by the Farquhar crowd, who would appear again to have begun a gamble in Brazil Rails. The Underground scheme is good and will help the ordinary shares of the Underground Electric. RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Mr. Dixon's letter in your issue of the 16th may mean that he is beginning to see the absurdity of putting forward material arguments as a justification for the acceptance of a spiritual doctrine. I believe that in the 14th century the Christian Science attitude was quite common. "This or that religion has caused or promises to cause, such and such material effects: therefore, we will accept it as a spiritual doctrine." It is, however, probable that the 14th century man differed from the modern Christian Scientist in one important respect: he would probably have jumped at the chance of producing all the material evidence he could get in support of his material arguments. The modern Christian Scientist goes one better than his mediæval prototype. He bases his belief in his religion on material grounds, just as his spiritual ancestor did: and at the same time he persists in pretending to believe that there are no such things as microscopes or stethoscopes or thermometers or x-rays any more than there were in the 14th century. Such people can at least claim credit for being thorough-going in their mediævalism.

It is no doubt possible to look on Christian Science either as a religion or as a patent medicine. If it is to be looked upon as a religion, then all these appeals to the effects it has produced on the health of its adherents are surely quite out of place: if it is to be looked upon as a patent medicine, then it is surely the duty of those who offer it to the public to bring forward as much proof of its efficacy as they can. Christian Scientists say that the "inharmony" of tuberculosis or depsomania can be overcome by Christion Science, the implication being that the physical condition of the patient can be changed. But as long as they refuse to produce any evidence of the thing ever having been done, they have, I think, no cause to feel aggrieved or amused at being classed with other purveyors of secret and untested remedies.

Mr. Dixon now seems to have two reasons for hesitating to produce his evidence: (1) the irrelevance of the suggestion that he should do so, and (2) his doubt as to how many of your columns I can offer him for the purpose. Considering that he began this correspondence by saying that he became a Christian Scientist as a result of the observation of cases in which it had done good, I cannot imagine anything more relevant than the suggestion that he say what the evidence consisted of. Does Mr. Dixon really look on the suggestion as irrelevant? His assumed belief that I am in a position to offer him space in the columns of THE ACADEMY is no doubt part of the joke. He cannot really believe it, nor can he really mean your readers to believe that he is dependent on your good will or mine for opportunities of laying his case before the public. You, Sir, would, I think, be doing a public service in offering Mr. Dixon all the space he can fill with evidence regarding the cases of Christian Science treatment which he has observed. The production of such evidence in such a journal as yours is what many people have been wishing for for years past. Mr. Dixon says he has accumulated a vast mass of such evidence. Can he not be induced to give your readers a chance of finding out what sort of evidence it is? I am, Sir, yours, etc., T. G. MARTIN.

November 17, 1912.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The ingenious cryptograhic evidence given by Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence in his "Bacon is Shakespeare," 1910, which reveals an admission by Francis Bacon that he was the author of the immortal plays, is, of course, a fallacy. This may be said also of the equally ingenious Biliteral Cypher invented by Mrs. Elizabeth Wells Gallup in 1899, from which Sir Edwin quotes an interpretation as follows: "Francis of Verulam is the author of all the plays heretofore published by Marlowe, Greene, Peele, Shakespeare, and the two-and-twenty now published for the first time, some are alter'd, to continue his history. F. St. A." In the "Monthly Review," February, 1902, Andrew Lang exposed this romantic cypher and said: "When I first saw Mrs. Gallup's book, I noticed that, if she correctly interpreted the cypher, Bacon must have been a lunatic." Sir Edwin mentions a copy of Bacon's complete works in Latin, 1665, in which copy the printing is throughout in two founts of type; this, he says, is purposely arranged, so that Bacon could reveal to posterity, by cryptic evidence, that he was the author of the plays: that the revelation was to be made in the year 1910, and sure enough, through studying those two founts, at that very time the great secret was revealed to Sir Edwin. But the type from two founts is the very basis of the Biliteral Cypher in Mrs. Gallup's book, 1899, so Sir Edwin was anticipated by eleven years. Now the cypher founded upon two founts was shown by Father Thurston, S.J., to be unworkable (see the "Monthly Review" for January, 1902). Sir Edwin states that the preface in the folio, 1623, was not written by Heminge and Condell. The reply to this is that among the commendatory verses in the same folio is a contribution by L. Digges, which begins thus:—

> Shakes-peare at length thy pious fellowes give
> The world thy works: thy works, by which out-live
> Thy tombe, thy Name must when that stone is rent,
> And Time dissolves thy Stratford Monument, etc.

These lines alone support what Heminge and Condell have written; they also connect Shakespeare with Stratford. I ask, would William Shakespeare have been buried in the chancel of the parish church at Stratford and a monument erected to his memory, if he were the "illiterate clown who," according to Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, "could not write his name." The Stratford monument, and the folio 1623, affords sufficient evidence to show how the friends and associates of the silent Shakespeare loved and honoured him. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

London, E.C. TOM JONES.

"TACITAE" AND "SILENTIA" IN AENEID II, 255.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Many thanks (or "thanks many," another point of grammar for the consideration of your correspondents) to Mr. H. C. Minchin for his interesting reply under this heading. Yet I did not think the torch on the leading vessel to have been lit for purposes of exploration, but as a signal to the other ships for starting. They were anchored off Tenedos, which is distant at least five miles from the coast of Troas; therefore Sinon could hardly have seen the "flammas" of line 256; and Helen was not on board the fleet, but in Troy itself.

Oxford, October 31, 1912. EDWARD S. DODGSON.

P.S.—Mr. Minchin informs me that he was thinking of the words "flammam media ipsa tenebat ingentem et summa ex arce vocabat" in Aeneid VI, 518 and 519. But it is clear that those lines refer to a different torch. Vergil of course used his poetical licence, and was not writing like a mathematician, or a modern war-correspondent. Now that a new Hellenic fleet, under a Danish Prince, means to hold Tenedos, it will be possible to learn by experiment if from the mound of Hissarlik, so well described by Dr. Walter Leaf in "Troy: A Study in Homeric Geography," one could perceive in the darkness a lighted torch held up on the strand of that romantic isle. The distance between the two points seems to be eight miles.—E. S. D.

GARROTTING AND THE LASH.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—May I point out that you are in error when you state that garrotting was "entirely suppressed" by the lash? As an occasional crime, garrotting has never been entirely suppressed; what was suppressed was the famous outbreak which took place in London in 1862. This, however, as has been officially certified, was put down by the ordinary law, several months before the Flogging Act of 1863 was passed.

Again, when you speak of "robberies with violence occurring every day," you are evidently unaware that for nearly fifty years this crime has been punishable with flogging. If, at the end of half a century, an offence which has had this sovereign remedy prescribed for it is of daily occurrence, I cannot think that the fact indicates that the lash is the best of deterrents. Yours, etc.,

HENRY S. SALT.

Humanitarian League, 53, Chancery Lane, W.C.,
November 13th.

[We dispute the accuracy of the first paragraph of our correspondent's letter. As to the second paragraph, it is our duty in our own district to commit cases of robbery with violence, and we believe that we should be fairly occupied with such cases, except for the wholesome fear of the lash.—Ed. ACADEMY.]

THE RIGHT TO WORK.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—I did not join in the letter of the 11th inst. from my colleagues of the Committee for Promoting the Formation of Societies of Free Workers because I wished to make a special response to their appeal. I agree that if the work of organising the free workers is to be effective it should be done thoroughly and at once. I am, therefore, anxious that the response to the appeal should be such as to enable the Committee to rent offices and engage a secretarial staff forthwith. To that end I am willing to give a donation of £50 if the £1,000 asked for is subscribed.

In my letter to you of November 15th, 1911, I called attention to the satisfactory character of the report of the Royal Commission on the Railway Strike, for the Commissioners said: "Men have the right to determine their engagement by giving a lawful notice, but in the exercise of their freedom in this respect they should not, in our opinion, be permitted to incite or coerce by threats or any form of intimidation men who desire to give their labour."

This was encouraging, and if the view of the Commissioners be upheld we may yet claim that our country is

A land of settled government,
A land of just and old renown,
Where Freedom slowly broadens down,
From precedent to precedent.

And if the workers of the country be organised into a really National Free Workers Society, it will so remain.

I am, yours sincerely, DYSART.

Notes of the Week

THAT rather erratic planet, Mr. George Lansbury, finds himself once more without an orbit, owing, according to some authorities, to the perturbations caused by his too near approach to another body in the political heavens—a body, however, which we should hesitate to call "heavenly"—the militant women's suffrage party. We have not noticed much lamentation or wringing of hands over his defeat at the Bow and Bromley election on Tuesday last; even the foremost Radical papers are very half-hearted in their sympathy, which is not a cause for wonder when we remember that the Liberal and Radical Association advised their supporters to abstain from voting. We doubt, however, if that advice affected the poll by more than a couple of hundred votes; the real reason for the result lies deeper than this, although Mr. Lloyd George's "friend Lansbury" has alienated the sympathy of most level-headed men by his behaviour in the past. The effect of Mr. Lloyd George's prefrences in the way of "friends" and measures is beginning to be felt throughout the country, and the spectacle of "a number of local Liberals" cheering lustily the defeat of the Socialist-cum-Labour-cum-Women's Suffrage candidate is worth considering. The conversion of a Socialist majority of 863 into a Unionist majority of 751 is a significant indication of what will happen in other constituencies when the present Government has become but an unfragrant memory.

We commented, some weeks ago, on the maltreatment of the English language by the use of such words as "kinemacolor," "cinema-theatre," and "cinema-de-luxe"—words with practically no trace of legitimate English about them. Since then we have read serious proposals to give London a "Cinemart," a "Cinema-topera House," a "Playcineum," an "Omnitheatre," and—horrible suggestion!—a "Vaucindra," which, the proud creator indicates, is composed of "the initial syllables of vaudeville, cinema, and drama." We have also noticed lately, among that mysterious race which lives by praising other people's wares—the Press agents—a tendency to employ the word "feature" as a verb; "we are featuring the refreshment department in a manner which we feel sure will meet with approval," is the kind of statement which should always find its level in the ranks of the unemployed. The picture of John Bull, with his wife on his arm, entering the portals of "The Playcineum," and murmuring, "How well, my dear, they feature the refreshments in this place!" is not a pretty one.

How far astray some good folk can go in their desire that the inhabitants of this planet should live irreproachably and shine as examples of correctness to their neighbours is shown by the recent protest of an American paper against dancing. The writer of the article concerned has discovered that "dancing has rarely ever (sic) been free from low animalism"; that it is "essentially a moral hazard"; and that "dancing is and has been a universal menace to virtue and decency throughout every city and community where it is participated in—an open door through which a great multitude of young people go to moral, spiritual, and physical death." Dear, dear! Where has this sadly perturbed person been living? Was he ever a child, and did he never dance for sheer exhilaration on a spring morning? Let us banish the wicked waltz, frown down the dignified but detestable minuet, ostracise the dainty gavotte, and hanker no more after the sweet folk-dances of the countryside. We suspect the writer of possessing a wooden leg, of wearing green glasses, of eating nut steaks, and of owning a stony heart.

Madame Latour, who has been lecturing at the Grafton Galleries on "Le Shopping en France et en Angleterre," has some quaint ideas as to the way in which Englishmen spend their time. "Englishmen," she says, "are always running in to their 'court' tailors, 'court' glovers, 'court' hatters, and so on; they are paying nothing but 'court' visits all day." And although the linen sent to our laundries by young French exquisites comes back whiter than when it is sent to a home laundry, it is "ruined in a few weeks," while in France, according to Madame Latour, "we keep things in perfect condition for as long as twenty-five years." Here, we must say, she distinctly scores; we rarely come across a dress shirt, for example, "in perfect condition" which we purchased in the year 1887, to say nothing of collars and handkerchiefs.

The Patriot

THERE is an empire in his splendid glance,
A thought avowed of conscious kinglihood,
As one who sees, and labours to make good,
A promise and a purpose. Dalliance
Allures him vainly; yet a high romance
Instructs his knightly soul and fires his blood
At call of battle. Honour is his food,
Justice his sword, and Truth his cognisance.

Nor will he stay till that desiréd end
Be consummate for which he deems him born;
But, fearless, sets his face toward the steep,
That when the hour approaches he may send
The clarion blast of Freedom's winded horn
Athwart the silent citadels of sleep.

The Cynic

IF ever some wise searcher of the nooks and crannies of the human mind should turn his attention particularly to the various little anomalies that puzzle us in our social life, he may possibly discover why cynicism is popular while the cynic himself is unpopular. Anyone can understand why the cynic—the man who obtained his name because he snarled like an ill-tempered dog—should not bring with him a seraphic exaltation of welcome; but it is not so easy to comprehend why the habit of cynicism, of curling the lip in a contemptuous fashion, should affect so many people as being rather "smart"; nor, again—and here is a contrast within a contrast—can we easily see why the cynic should be taken seriously and looked up to as quite a superior person, albeit unpleasant.

The cheapest and most accessible form of fame is that of the destructive critic, who delights in pulling down houses that he could not build, who perceives a fault eagerly, but has no remedy, who sneers at the game he cannot play. To this large family the cynic belongs. His reputation is safe, because no one knows the value of silence better than he. Let others praise; he will stand aside with scornful eye and arms akimbo, descending to no detailed censure, gaining a dreary kind of happiness from the admiring glances of the crowd—yet doomed, in spite of this contradictory admiration, to be unpopular. For no normal, healthy man cares for him or his ways; probably because around him always lingers a faint, impalpable indication of not "playing fair." If he is immune from criticism when in company with those he feels he can impress, he is by no means immune from suspicion.

Other people sometimes have to suffer from his misdeeds. We have heard Dr. Samuel Johnson called a cynic, as though loquacity and a passionate outspokenness constituted cynicism; authors given to the use of irony and sarcasm, too, are often falsely termed cynical. It seems to be not clearly understood that, while the ordinary sane man may employ these edged tools, they are merely a small part of his equipment. Irony and sarcasm are a phase; cynicism is a habit of mind. The exponent of irony may be a humorist; the genuine cynic is a misanthrope. He is never better pleased than when things go wrong. His favourite themes are the vanity of love and the fleeting nature of joy, and he claims to be completely level-headed and disillusioned, while, as a matter of fact, he labours continually under the notion that life is not worth living—the most preposterous illusion of all.

He has been called an "intellectual dandy," but a surer name for him would be an intellectual myope. With the whole canvas before him, he loses the general effect, and, carefully scrutinising one corner, brings into play his devastating smile of pity. The problem often occurring to the detached observer is, how did the cynic arrive at his unique point of view? Over what stony route has he travelled, with eyes unlifted? There must have been a time when he, too, thrust aside the weeds and stooped to gather the flowers in the fields by the way; when he sang as he walked, and gave a cheery greeting instead of muttering a malediction as he met other wayfarers. Even though we allow that he possessed a naturally morbid temperament, no man is a cynic from boyhood—a few months of school life will purify him from that tendency, as a rule. Disappointment, of course, plays a large part in the state at which he has chosen to stay while his fellows progress—for we may admit that we all are tempted at some time or another to adopt the grey robe of cynicism; it is so easy to put on. But the smaller the mind, the greater the havoc failure or chagrin will make with it, and we are forced to the conclusion that the consistently cynical person is afflicted, as we hinted, with a limited and blurred mental outlook. Fogginess is his normal condition.

The danger of this disease is that it comes on very gradually and insidiously. No one ever blossomed—or wilted—into a complete cynic in a day or a week; it is a process of years, begun, perhaps, by a sudden blow to some cherished hope. Here comes in the test of the stuff a man is made of, the quality of his thought. The small sneer, the marking of bitter passages in novels written by would-be smart people, the fading of desire, the death of ideals, the achievement at last of that gloomiest vale of cynicism—the desire to chill ambition and emotion in others; thus the ghastly work advances beyond the stage when a friendly word would arrest it. From this blight the wiser man is saved by his conviction that to slip and to recover means a step forward, even if he limps for awhile; he knows, also, that, though obstacles to happiness be many, to weight himself with anger and resentment is to handicap himself thrice heavily in the race.

Two Futurist Manifestos

SOME years ago, during the spacious times of Abdul Hamid, there appeared in Punch a cartoon which represented a minister of that regretted potentate handing to his master a document, with the inquiry: "Would your Majesty like to see the latest thing in ultimata?" If the late Sultan was in the unique position of being able to feel blasé in the matter of ultimata, the reading public will soon be in a condition to sympathise with him, for the Futurist Press, having found its range, is now bombarding it with manifestos. Not that the two documents before us—"Manifeste de la Sculpture Futuriste" and "Manifeste de la Femme Futuriste"—are precisely "the latest thing" in manifestos; but the former bombshell, though launched in April, has, doubtless through some mistake in the timing, only recently reached our shores, and has had, therefore, to yield in impressiveness to the "Manifeste Technique de la Littérature Futuriste," and to the sensational "Supplément." As to the "Femme Futuriste," we know that it was in March, 1912, that she completed her negotiations for the lease of one of M. Marinetti's ribs, but her subsequent career is wrapt for us in a mystery that defies research. However, she has arrived, and let us welcome her as well as her sister, the Galatea of M. Boccioni's futurist sculpture. If in our endeavour to be worthy of the occasion, we have allowed our metaphors to get too close together, we are simply in the futurist tradition, and offer no apologies to any "passéiste" purist.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of these two manifestos is that neither of them is signed "F. T. Marinetti." Not very long ago we were in danger of believing that there was only one futurist, and that his name was precisely F. T. Marinetti; the other names cited in the programmes of revolt appeared about as convincing as "Peter Gurney," "'Arry 'Awke," or even "Old Uncle Tom Cobley." But here we have "Valentine de Saint-Point," authoress of veritable poems that we have read, and "Umberto Boccioni, peintre et sculpteur," whose creations we have not seen, but fain would see, in order to understand what on earth his manifesto is about. We know now also of one futurist poet, who has written poems bearing the stamp of genius, even for the most inveterate "passéiste," like ourselves; the name by which he chooses to be called is "Luciano Folgore."

It is strange that the "Few-tourist" movement—we cannot help ourselves, but it is a pun that tells the whole truth, as puns sometimes will, in a few letters—should have given birth to such a family of eccentrics. The essence of Futurism, as M. Marinetti himself, when cornered by a journalist, confessed, is the assertion of Italian nationality against the patronising excursionist and against the Austrian landlord of Trieste. It has ended by making rules for all the provinces of life and art. Let us take the "Femme Futuriste"—"Place aux dames!"—first. We will be sparing of comment. "Il est absurde de diviser l'humanité en femmes et en hommes"—a common mistake! There are only "féminité" and "masculinité." "Ce qui manque le plus aux femmes. . . . c'est la virilité." In times like these "c'est la brute qu'il faut proposer pour modèle." "Assez des femmes" who love their children or tend the wounded. Mistrust the suffragists, who would bring "aucun des désordres souhaités par les Futuristes, mais, au contraire, un excès d'ordre." Women must trust to their instincts and intuitions—"que la Femme"—note the capital F—"que la Femme retrouve sa cruauté et sa violence qui font qu'elle s'acharne sur les vaincus, parce qu'ils sont des vaincus"—surely a feminine instinct. "Femmes, redevenez sublimement injustes, comme toutes les forces de la nature." No more morality! It is all in the interests of the race. "A l'humanité vous devez des héros. Donnez-les lui."

All this is intelligible, verbally at any rate. The manifesto of the painters was also intelligible, as far as it went. But M. Boccioni's manifesto, what shall we say of that?—"nous n'en avons pas compris un traître mot." "Compénétration des plans"—in sculpture—"sculpture d'ambiance"—"ouvrons la figure comme une fenêtre et et enfermons en elle le milieu où elle vit." "Le style du mouvement"—we understand that—it is to be obtained by inserting mechanism in various parts of the figure. But of the statuary in which "nous verrons par exemple la roue d'un moteur sortir de l'aisselle d'un mécanicien, la ligne d'une table trancher la tête d'un homme qui lit, et son livre lui sectionner l'estomac avec l'éventail de ses pages tranchantes" there is nothing to be said till we can see the thing itself. There will be so much "ambiance," we imagine, that the only "ambiance" we understand—the power of walking round a statue—will be impossible. At all events, the futurist doctrine of a fusion of the arts will have been advanced a stage. The important point is that "il n'y a de vrai que la création." That is what is wrong with Rodin; he cannot be a sincere artist, because Michael-Angelo and Donatello had somewhat similar moods and inspirations; he has "created" nothing; he would have been better employed inventing a new way of peeling an orange—one, for instance, in which the "ambiance" of the orange would be retained by an "intersection of planes," that is, by ensuring a combination of peel and pulp in every mouthful.

Turkey's Treasure House

By R. J. TURNER.

WITH the allies at the gates of Constantinople, one may be pardoned for giving a thought to the fate of that marvellous collection of jewels and curios nestling in a corner of the old Blachern Palace, known as the Treasury.

Here in all conscience is loot enough [redacted] a triumphal entry into the ancient city of Constantine, and to make the mouths water of the Bulgarian or Servian hosts who may be permitted to cross the threshold of the treasure chamber. Failing a guarantee against spoliation, it is exceedingly doubtful whether this immensely valuable and unique collection will be allowed to remain at Top Kapou. More likely it will follow in the train of the Sultan, its natural guardian, to the ancient capital of Broussa. In the time of Abdul Hamid, access to this veritable Cave of Abdullah was difficult to obtain. Ambassadorial intercession in the case of Europeans was necessary, and not always successful. Since the advent of Mahmoud and the Young Turk, viewing privileges have been extended, but the signature of the Grand Vizier is still necessary to ensure the unlocking of the famous portals.

The procedure for a private view is quite an affair. After passing the sentries at the gate of the old palace, and reporting one's arrival in the courtyard, a stately procession of befezzed and frock-coated officials, headed by a venerable Bede, issues from a side building. The guard comes to attention. Before the huge key is inserted in the lock, the seal of the door is broken by the venerable one and carefully borne away. A distinct effort is required to turn the lock. The door opens only to reveal another barrier which is as solemnly unlocked. The black-coated procession flows in, and takes up strategic positions in the chamber now open to view. Under the keen scrutiny of fifteen or twenty pairs of eyes distributed all over the room, the difficulties of annexation become apparent.

The most striking object that meets the eye is the famous jewelled throne of one of the Sultan's ancestors. This, as well as a smaller throne in the same glass case, is thickly encrusted with pearls, diamonds, and rubies. It would be difficult to estimate the number of stones, some of which are of a fair size, but there must be many thousands, and the effect on the walnut-coloured wood is barbaric in the extreme. Its value is estimated at from one to two millions sterling. Here and there one sees a vacant setting, whence the stone has disappeared, probably passing into the possession of some nimble-fingered eunuch favourite of the Sultan. Ranged round the room in cases is a long line of figures of Sultans in their jewelled robes and turbans. Some of the vestments are literally stiff with precious stones, while to fasten the aigrette of the turban a stupendous emerald or ruby is invariably utilised. An idea of the size of the ordinary run of the stones may be grasped by looking at half a small-sized hen's egg placed on end.

The scabbard of each warrior's scimitar is elaborately encrusted with similar stones, with a specially large one on the top of the hilt. The collection of swords is magnificent, but it is when one comes to study the daggers that one realises the huge fortunes embedded in such weapons. In some cases the entire haft is composed of one stone—an emerald or a ruby, as the case may be—that is to say, a mass of colour about three inches long and one and a half inches thick. Displayed separately are some huge uncut but polished rubies and emeralds, quite as large, to use a homely expression, as an ordinary cake of toilet soap. Whether such abnormal gems are of "the purest ray serene" one cannot vouch for, but the whole effect is to recall the jewelled valley of Sinbad the Sailor and his Roc, or the more material properties of the pantomime. Rumour has it that occasionally, when funds were very low, old Abdul would withdraw a choice specimen or two, which would find their way to Paris. All credit to the Young Turks that, amid occasions of great stress, they have steadfastly declined to take toll of their country's ancient treasures.

Still steadily outflanked by the black-coated brigade, another room discloses a magnificent collection of coins from the Romans onward, while other cases contain brooches, earrings, and ornaments bejewelled beyond the dreams of avarice. So stunned is one by the sense of size and barbaric splendour of the gems that one would not feel at all surprised to be told that the coloured lamps, varying in size from an orange to a melon, suspended from the ceiling, are single jewels of unheard-of value.

In a prominent position are the orders conferred upon Mejid, Abdul's predecessor, by the sovereigns of the world, and a goodly show they make. One does not fail to notice the highest order of English chivalry, the Garter, reposing in its velvet-lined case, granted in Queen Victoria's days to "our good brother" on the Bosphorus.

Mingled with curios from the Farther East, ivories, bronzes, and carvings in ebony, are clocks—clocks of every kind and description, though one failed to note a specimen of the stately grandfather.

Preceded and followed by the shuffling band of brothers, we ascend to a gallery and more rooms; more relics of departed padishahs and caliphs, more emblazoned costumes and bejewelled swords and daggers, and a most appalling collection of paintings. Crowded with crude canvasses of subjects of the tea-tray variety, one is forced to the conclusion that "art for art's sake" was not one of the mottoes of bygone Sultans, and that their artistic advisers were not above suspicion.

Carefully shepherded downstairs and outside, we witness the re-sealing of the great door, with the guard at the slope. As an additional courtesy, we are shown over some of the pleasant rooms of the palace, from the windows of which one gets the most magnificent view in Constantinople of the Marmora and Bosphorus. Then, having quaffed the famous coffee and partaken of the luscious rose-leaf jam, we return the salaams of the remnant of the black brotherhood, find our araba, and make a dashing return to Pera, as becomes those who have feasted their eyes upon the most extraordinary treasure house in the world.

Decadent Aristocracy

The Decline of Aristocracy. By ARTHUR PONSONBY, M.P. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE writer of this querulous diatribe seems to be possessed with that neurotic mental unrest which characterises the attitude of the modern reformer towards every phase of social and political life. In the laboratories of such psychological chemists, all actions, reasons, motives, intentions, scruples, and lack of scruples are painfully weighed, analysed, and separated, till life becomes a miserable and disintegrated spectacle, and suicide might appear to be a joyful relief. Fortunately, however, these dismal analyses—comparable to a nun's exercise of conscience—have as little effect on a normal healthy mind as a doctor's lecture on microbes or diseases. Mr. Ponsonby's spectral humour is to be found in the appalling seriousness with which he takes, first, himself, and, secondly, the society to which he belongs. As we have no wish to be personal, the first we can pass over as the common failing—or road to success—of philanthropists, faddists, and reformers generally.

For the second—well, it is easy to write on degeneracy. Witness the cheerful books of Max Nordau and Kraft-Ebing. But the usual mistake made by the dreary pessimist is to argue from the few to the many. This seems to be the pitfall into which Mr. Ponsonby has descended. He declaims against the idle, leisured, and ill-educated aristocrat, but he carefully avoids any attempt to estimate the probable number of aristocratic idlers. In proportion to the number of workers, we suggest that the percentage would not be alarming, certainly not sufficient to upset the nerves of a common-sense reformer, and in any case much less dangerous to the community from a sociological standpoint than the idle in the lower strata of society.

To condemn a whole class because some are drones is a futile proceeding. The decline of aristocracy is a comforting and pleasant theme for the revolutionary Socialist, who rejoices that the ancient power politically has disappeared. If so, why waste time in writing about it? A more useful subject would be the rise of a modern and very degenerate aristocracy based on money, far more menacing than the gentlemen of the ancien régime. It is fair to say that Mr. Ponsonby "devoutly hopes that the advent of a plutocracy is only a nightmare." Others are sufficiently awake—even at their devotions—to see that it is no dream, but as solid a fact as a burglar under the bed. If examples of "idle rich" are wanted, may they not be found among the sons of "self-made" millionaires, or of six-figure men? But Mr. Ponsonby is plainly obsessed with an incongruous vendetta against "gentlemen" of a social position, which has given them, and to a considerable extent still gives them, political influence.

We propose, then, to examine in detail some of his theses. He starts off with the assumption that "the basis of aristocratic government is the negation of liberty, and this is the underlying cause of its ultimate failure." Doubtless this is true of the ancient aristocracies. But passing by the fact that under aristocratic government the freedom of England was largely built up, this view involves the assumption that democracy spells liberty. By liberty we mean "the assurance that every man shall be protected in doing what he believes his duty, against the influence of authority and majorities, custom and opinion."

Now, the greatest evil of democracy is the tyranny of the majority. Democracy may become the deadly enemy of liberty, if founded on the illiberal and tyrannical basis that "minorities must suffer," seeing that it is a fundamental principle of republican government that the minority have indisputable and inalienable rights, that the majority are not everything and the minority nothing, that the people may not do what they please. Democracy, in the exercise of a new-found power, may overreach itself and elect new tyrants, whom it is actually paying, at once to flatter and coerce.

Even if we grant that aristocratic government chastised the people with whips, socialistic and democratic government may chastise with scorpions. The whole trend of Socialism to-day points to the coming of a more severe and greater struggle for freedom than has yet been seen in English history. We may accept the fact that the political power of the old hereditary aristocracy has inevitably declined. But we may also believe in the prophecy of Nietzsche that the struggle with Socialism will create a new aristocracy out of the great middle class "which may forget Socialism like a disease that has been overcome." When the present dominant power of capitalists, merchants, and financiers is reduced by socialistic progressive taxation, the new aristocracy may ally itself with the old, and overwhelm the danger to freedom, involved alike in plutocracy and democracy. In this alliance we see a Phœnix-like rise of the old to a new position, for we cannot endorse Mr. Ponsonby's allegation that "there are great signs of deterioration."

There has probably never been a time when the aristocracy as a class—eliminating exceptions which for purposes of class hatred are loudly exploited by unscrupulous agitators—showed greater evidence of the sense of the responsibility of social service. We are told that "there is an increasing impatience against the existence of a class that merely vegetates, lives off the fat of the land, and squanders, according to their whim and fancy, the wealth that others have toiled to create." This is descending very low in cheap invective—to the level of a demagogue's pamphlet—and quite unworthy of serious writing. Again, "Conservatism is an upper-class characteristic," which is an amazing statement, in a country where the balance of parties is so evenly divided. It will not bear a moment's examination, and, indeed, is not worth it. Mr. Ponsonby wastes a considerable amount of energy in a puerile, if rather comic, diatribe against the use of the term "gentleman" in the sense accepted by gentlemen, and against titles, coats-of-arms and crests. While we readily admit that his summary of the characteristics of a gentleman is excellent, and just such as we should expect from a true gentleman, he forgets or omits to notice that a gentleman will recognise that those characteristics may be and are found in any and every class. For all that, as Froude pointed out, "No power can make me ask my hairdresser to dinner," and we may add that a true gentleman would not put his tradesman into so false and uncomfortable a position.

It is also forgotten that, if there are nature's gentlemen, there are also nature's "bounders" in every class. But no class deductions can be drawn from the existence of either in any class. Much as the author may object to the restriction of the word gentleman "to those alone who bear a particular aristocratic cachet," there is a well-understood sense in which it is bound to be so restricted. Such restriction in no way interferes with the existence of nature's gentlemen in any class. The word "bounder" may be restricted to those who bear a particular vulgar cachet, but that restriction does not interfere with the position of honest, respected English working men, who are not such fools as to wish to be considered gentlemen, and who laugh in their sleeves when the fawning Parliamentary candidate has his circular addressed to them as "Esquires." Caste distinctions are the author's bête-noire. But for the abolition of caste we may wait till the millennium. And who are so careful of caste distinctions as the many classes below the caste of gentlemen? Does the writer of this book realise, for example, the relations which exist between farmers and their labourers? It is not, as he would have us suppose, a case of the caste of gentlemen versus the rest of the community, but of the existence of innumerable castes, among which may be found far stronger and more insurmountable class prejudices than between gentlemen and all the other castes put together. And although these are due to very natural causes, and perfectly intelligible, there is between them little or none of that fierce class hatred which is now being ingeniously fostered for political purposes on the one hand or from a very silly sentimentalism on the other. Mr. Ponsonby on titles, orders, coats-of-arms, crests, et hoc genus omne, is simply amusing, and we may leave him to poke his serio-comic fun at these harmless trappings of social symbolism.

The latter half of his book is taken up with educational criticism, largely of the defects of our Public School system. That there are defects few educationists would deny, and some of the author's criticisms are trenchant, while others merely suggest improvement in the way of levelling down. For here again he is obsessed by a distorted view of class prejudice. He pictures "strangers, more especially when they come from across the Atlantic, who are ready to pronounce our public schools ideal. 'That is what makes the English gentleman what he is!' they will exclaim." "They are right, and that is precisely the very essence of our complaint," says Mr. Ponsonby.

In another place we read the unwarrantable statement that "it is in spite of and not because of this (Public School) training that any are able to distinguish themselves in after life." Objection is made to the smartness of dress of the modern Public School boy. Nothing is said of the desirable improvement in the dress of the English working man. Mr. Ponsonby's sentimental feelings are much hurt and shocked because the prize for English poetry at a large Public School was recently given to a boy who wrote verses containing this "deplorable sentiment":—

> England, narrow seas divide thee
> From the foe:
> Guard the waves lest ill betide thee,
> Lest the foe that lurks beside thee
> Lay thee low.

This very simple expression of the importance of national defence he describes as "the vulgar clap-trap of Jingoism or a bloated and arrogant form of Imperialism." This is the sort of critic who wishes "to see removed the grounds for the condemnation, disparagement, and contempt which are being levelled against the Public School system as it now exists."

Mr. Ponsonby is slightly nervous lest he may be accused of engendering class-hatred. We have read his work through with care, and feel bound to record our deliberate conviction that, whether intentional or not, this is the main tendency of his writings. Social and political sentimentalism sometimes mistakes the necessary artificialism of life for "stern realities." It is this unconscious attitude which makes his book so humorous, although there is not one spark of real humour from beginning to end. It is much too solemn for anything so human. P. A. M. SULLIVAN.

Sir Howard Vincent.

The Life of Sir Howard Vincent. By S. H. JEYES. Concluded by F. D. How. Illustrated. (George Allen and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

THERE are certain men who never completely succeed in Parliament. They seem to get athwart it in some strange way, and never realise their laudable ambitions, and yet they have a great many qualities that make for success. I am referring to men like Roebuck and Bernal Osborne in the last generation and to G. C. Trout Bartley, Albert Rollitt, Gibson Bowles, and Howard Vincent in this. Dilke and Randolph Churchill were in a different class, and whilst one had his career crippled by a domestic scandal, the other rose higher, but resigned in a fit of temper and egotism. Perhaps the last word explains everything. An irritated Cabinet Minister once said of Howard Vincent, "He wants holding down by the coat-tails." However, I am positively certain that if Howard Vincent could read this biography he would be intensely interested in it. He would have read it through and through, made notes and corrections here and there, and laughed heartily at all the good-natured caricatures in it that are culled from Punch and the Westminster Gazette.

He would have liked the binding and the cover, with his own bold signature on it, and although here and there he would have winced at the way his actions are described, he was so just-minded a man that he would have said, "This is a fair account of my life's work," for he was deeply interested in himself and his own character.

Intensely in earnest, painstaking, industrious, and with an unlimited fund of energy, he never succeeded in getting the British public to take him quite seriously. His appearance, perhaps, was against him. Although a soldier of the Line, he gave one the impression that he was a Cavalryman; with his haw-haw manner and heavy moustache, he reminded one of the Crimean swell in "Caste." Again, he was very versatile, taking up numberless causes, and the public always mistrusts a versatile man. Deep down in their hearts they think he cannot be thorough in so many things. "If he only knew a little law, he would have known a little of everything," was a gibe that was cast at Brougham, and I cannot help thinking that Vincent's very versatility kept him back.

Of an ancient, if not illustrious, family, he had to make his own way in the world, and from his earliest years it was plain that he meant to get on. Born in one of those country rectories which have produced so many valiant sons of the Empire, he was sent to Westminster; but the school life was found to be too rough for him, and his parents had the courage and good sense to withdraw him. From his earliest years he suffered from a distressing cough, which, on and off, he retained during the whole of his life. He went abroad, studied French and German, eventually entered Sandhurst, and joined the Welsh Fusiliers. The amount of soldiering in those days did not satisfy his active mind, and at the outbreak of war in 1870 he had to become a war correspondent for the Daily Telegraph, which was the Daily Mail of those days. He appears to have seen Thornton Leigh Hunt, who was then a sub-editor, and would have been appointed, but the War Office not unnaturally refused to allow officers on full pay to leave England.

His first political ambitions were decidedly Liberal; but a voyage round the world quickly cured him, and, like most converts, he became a Tory of Tories. He next read for the Bar, and became a member of the Divorce Court. If he had thought of it, and had found time, he would, no doubt, have become a doctor with equal ease, in case it might be useful—in fact, he once said that everyone ought to change his profession once every five years.

In 1877 the Detective Department at Scotland Yard was overhauled. A Committee sat to consider how it should be brought up to date. Vincent dashed over to Paris, and brought back a splendid report on foreign systems. It so impressed the Committee that they gave him the new post of Director of Criminal Investigation. Vincent was now in his element, and the chapters dealing with his adventures in those stormy times are the best in the book. They are delightfully told, and those of us who knew and loved him, even if we occasionally laughed at him, can see Vincent's character peeping out at every turn. His fussiness over Gladstone—who was as insensible to fear as Arthur Balfour, and loathed "police protection"—is most artlessly told.

By the way, the biography does not mention an amusing ruse which was put down to Howard Vincent's ingenuity at the time, although I think it is hinted at on page 115. I give it with all reserve. It is said that Scotland Yard once intimated to an M.P. that they proposed to give him police protection. He was highly flattered, but very indignant, frightened, and relieved when he subsequently discovered that, owing to a slight resemblance to Gladstone, he had been used to decoy the Fenians away from the real Simon Pure!

His clever arrest of Thomas Mooney in 1881 and the story of that memorable night when the news arrived that Cavendish and Burke had been murdered are most dramatic; whilst the way in which he succeeded in getting reforms in details carried out is Howard Vincent to the life. His marriage placed him in a position to devote himself entirely to public causes, and the rest of the book deals with his political career. He retired from the police in 1884, and shortly after was returned as M.P. for Central Sheffield, for which he sat for the rest of his life.

The thoroughness he displayed in other things exactly suited a business city like Sheffield. He always answered letters by return of post; he saw everybody who called at the House; he wrote for the local Press, and was a model member. His name was ever in the papers. A new cause, a difficulty, a correspondence, anything—Howard Vincent was to the fore. He became a convinced Fair Trader, as it was called then, and in season and out undoubtedly helped to sow the seed of the policy which Chamberlain afterwards made his own.

Intensely proud of his country and her great destinies, he designed a map of the world showing how great the British Empire really was. He took up Volunteering, and made the Queen's Westminsters one of the crack corps of the kingdom. I think he started with Dr. Cantlie—Sun Yat Sen's friend—the Volunteer Medical Service Corps. Every great hospital had a company, but his zeal was so great that he insisted on the Working Men's College and the Birkbeck students having a company too. Class jealousies arose, but Howard Vincent was immensely pleased when the working-class corps gained the prize for efficiency over the heads of the professional students. He never could understand class distinctions when patriotism was in question.

He made two mistakes which were somewhat unfairly used against him. In 1888 he joined the L.C.C., and became chief of the Fire Brigade. At a review of that body in 1889 by the Prince of Wales his beloved Queen's Westminsters were on duty, and he, their colonel, had the mortification of seeing the crowd break through to the Royal carriage. It was only the public love and loyalty, but Howard Vincent's face that day was a sight not easily forgotten. He, the policeman, the soldier, the organiser, the chief of the Brigade, fails in the presence of his future Sovereign! Vincent behaved frankly and splendidly, and we believe the Prince, who always liked him, was not only not annoyed but much amused at his evident mortification.

The other mistake was with regard to the Merchandise Marks Act. He was the father of the Act, and by it foreign articles had to be stamped with the place of origin. This had a most unexpected result. "Made in Germany" was found to be an excellent advertisement for German goods. People said he ought to have insisted that all foreign goods should be marked "Foreign made" and all British goods "British made."

It is impossible in a short review like this to mention all the subjects he took up besides Colonial Preference. He wrote handbooks on all kinds of subjects, countless articles for the Press, and he lived to see the Public Trustee Act a success, but not the tremendous success it is at the present time, and the further sūccess it is likely to be. Not even ill-health could keep him away from South Africa when the Boer War broke out, and, although, owing to this, he did not get a command, he saw a good deal of the fighting unattached.

To go back a little, Lord Salisbury gave him a K.C.M.G. in 1889, nominally in connection with the Anarchist Conference he attended at Rome on behalf of the Government; but we cannot say we think Howard Vincent was over-rewarded for his useful services to the State, on which he had spent time, money, energy, health, and life itself.

Owing to his sunny nature, his life was happy beyond that of most of us. If I had been able to send a wreath, I should have written:—

Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Life's crown well won.
Now comes rest.

The expression is hackneyed now, but it sums up the life of Howard Vincent more truthfully than it does in the majority of cases in which it is used

A loving hand has evidently superintended the work, yet it does not suffer from undue eulogy. It is a worthy memorial of a man gho gave the Empire of his best. The Index is a very poor one, and the pages ought to have had at the top of them the year they deal with, and Vincent's age at the time.

Le dernier des Aiglons

(By "LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE.")

The Empress Eugénie and Her Circle. By DR. E. BARTHEZ. Translated by Bernard Miall. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE title given to this book is somewhat misleading, for the author has less to say of the Empress Eugénie than of her son, that bright young Prince Impérial, who, after his father's downfall and death, had of all the Pretenders to the French Crown, the greatest chances of ultimate success, but who died, as we all know, in South Africa, struck down in his fresh manhood by seventeen assegai-wounds, all of which he received in front, as befitted one bearing the great name of Napoleon. Dr. Barthez was not altogether unknown to us. He belonged to a family which contributed several important works to the literature of medical science, and, as we took occasion to mention in a work of ours, "The Court of the Tuileries," which, having been frequently reprinted, may nowadays be tolerably well known, he was appointed Physician-in-Ordinary to the Prince Impérial at the latter's birth, the stipend allotted to him being the extremely modest one of £320 per annum. It is true that the medical staff attached to the Imperial Court was numerous, including as it did, in addition to Drs. Conneau and Corvisart, four physicians and surgeons in ordinary to the Emperor and Empress, four others for attendance on the household, six honorary medical advisers, a dispenser, and so forth. Conneau received £1,200, Corvisart £800 a year, but none of the others enjoyed larger emoluments than those which were assigned to Dr. Barthez for watching over the precious health of the Heir of France. The doctor was certainly lodged and boarded at the Tuileries, or wherever his young charge might be staying, for he accompanied him everywhere, but, after all, he appears to have had very little to do, for the boy usually enjoyed remarkably good health, and, whenever he contracted any petty juvenile ailment, that masterful woman, his English nurse, Miss Shaw, often doctored him according to her own lights, without allowing Dr. Barthez to intervene.

Nevertheless, this book—which comprises a collection of some fifty letters written by the doctor to his wife and daughters—is a notable contribution to the biography of the young Prince, concerning whom we have been lately promised a work of greater magnitude from the pen of M. Augustin Filon, who was his tutor from 1867 to 1875. The letters of Dr. Barthez, be it said, begin in July, 1856, and end in October, 1865. In the course of them he repeatedly praises the Prince's disposition, but complains of the indiscreet treatment carried out by Miss Shaw, who constantly gave the child drugs, and made him eat such indigestible meat as pork, even when he was ailing. The boy was scarcely a precocious child, and his mother, the Empress, seemed to think him backward, evincing, so Dr. Barthez tells us, a very impatient desire to see him grow up. As for Napoleon III, he found his son's teething very protracted, and argued on dentistry with the doctor, expressing, on one occasion, his surprise that nature did not of itself replace the teeth we lost, even as it replaced the antlers shed by the deer in the Park of St. Cloud. Barthez thereupon had to point out the difference in the nature of teeth and horns.

But the doctor's letters to his family by no means deal exclusively with the childhood of the Prince, who may be called the Last of the Eaglets—though we once heard Baroness Adolphe de Rothschild call Prince Victor Bonaparte an eaglet also—"that is," said she, "an eaglet who does nothing but moult." There are many glimpses of Napoleon III and the Empress Eugénie in these same epistles. All who wish to acquire a real idea of the Emperor's person, such as the many official portraits of him do not convey, should read the shrewd account of it which Dr. Barthez gives us—the little frame, the diminutive legs, the long face and abnormally large head, the eyes occasionally lighting up with a kindly smile, and at other times staring fixedly and vacantly, and the peculiar habit of inclining now to the left and now to the right, in such wise that the Imperial figure usually appeared to be anything but straight and upright. While, however, the doctor dilates on the Emperor's physical imperfections, and occasionally mentions his amatory failings, he repeatedly does justice to his good points, his natural kind-heartedness, and his solicitude for the country over which he ruled. We pointed out in our "Court of the Tuileries" that Napoleon III was by no means destitute of humour, and M. Barthez gives sundry specimens of the Imperial wit, as when, for instance, his Majesty referred to a painting of a hunting scene as being "all dogs' tails and French horns, which could not be distinguished from one another, as they were all equally curly."

Of the Empress Eugénie's little foibles the doctor writes indulgently, as is fit, for none of them was serious; the only part of her career open to criticism being her intervention in politics, which, as we know, bore bad fruit. For the rest, the amusements of the Empress were no more reprehensible than were those of Marie Antoinette, whom she declared to be her type. They were even far less costly, and France, instead of inclining to ruin under the Second Empire—as was the case in Marie Antoinette's Trianon days—enjoyed the greatest financial prosperity, and could well afford the luxury of a Court. It was the foreign policy of the Empire which led to its downfall; but let it not be forgotten that the huge war indemnity exacted by Germany was largely paid out of the money which people had been able to save and put by in the palmy Imperial years when there was work for one and all.

To return to the Empress, Dr. Barthez frequently refers to her good looks in her younger days. "Her bosom is beautifully placed and modelled," he writes, "but she displays it a little too much and too frequently." At one time he found her much too pale, but he adds that in moments of emotion a flush came to her face and endowed her with delightful loveliness. On one point he could not agree with her: that was with respect to bull-fights, in which she saw nothing amiss, having witnessed them in Spain, once a week, as a rule, from her earliest childhood until she had grown up. The doctor's remarks on this subject are the more curious when one remembers that the Empress indignantly put down rabbit-coursing in France, as she regarded it as rank cruelty.

M. Barthez tells us, also, some interesting anecdotes of the Empress's ladies. The reader must not imagine that the "Mme. de M.," with whom he indulged in a mild flirtation was the Princess de Metternich. The lady he refers to was probably the Countess de Montebello, or possibly the Baroness de Malaret. As for the doctor's "Mme. de B.," she, without doubt, was that excellent Lady of Honour and model wife, the Duchess de Bassano; whilst his "Mme. de la P." was, of course, the Countess de la Poëze, née de la Roche-Lambert. Apropos of the Princess de Metternich, whom we just mentioned, the doctor was surprised to find that she was "not a crazy grisette singing risky songs, but a most accomplished great lady, serious in her manner and wrapped up in her home and children. Here, again, was an instance that appearances are deceitful, and that one must not judge of character by the behaviour of a moment." We fully endorse that "appreciation" of the "wittiest woman of her age," who, although she passed at times from "grave to gay," was by no means such a frivolous creature as ill-informed writers have sometimes asserted.

A few famous men flit here and there across the pages of the Barthez letters. We catch sight of Sir Anthony Panizzi, Prosper Mérimée, and Prince Bismarck. The last-named, who is humorously represented as being very much in love with Mme. de la Bédoyère, really visited Biarritz for a very different purpose than that of love-making. It was there that he completely outmanœuvred and fooled the French Emperor, there that he prepared the war of 1866 which was to drive Austria out of Germany and clear the way for that second campaign which was to wrest Alsace-Lorraine from France. Truly did Mérimée say that "Monsieur Bismarck was a dangerous man," but he made that remark apropos of the Countess de la Bédoyère, not imagining that the Prussian statesman might also be dangerous for France. Here we must take leave of Dr. Barthez's frank, unaffected, yet often sprightly letters. They throw many interesting little side-lights on the historical personages with whom they deal. As for Mr. Bernard Miall's translation, it could not be bettered. Several of the many portraits illustrating the volume will certainly appeal to those who are interested in the history of the Second Empire.

Nature's Nursery Tales. By the REV. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Illustrated. (Charles H. Kelly. 3s. 6d.)

OF primordial man it has been truly written:—

> See him from Nature rising slow to Art!
> To copy Instinct then was Reason's part;
> Thus then to Man the voice of Nature spake:
> "Go, from the Creatures thy instruction take."

And man has done so throughout the ages with very great advantage to himself. "Nature is free to all," and even the wise Solomon did not disdain to be a great observer of her works. He not only knew "the way of a man with a maid," but also "the way of an eagle in the air," which shows that he did not overlook the subject of flying. And there were many other creatures, both large and small, whose ways he claimed to be acquainted with. After all, man is perhaps most indebted to the insects. Have not the bees and the ants taught him thrift and the governing of a community? And though Mrs. Spider generally devours her husband at the close of the honeymoon and then takes another, which is militant suffragettism with a vengeance, was it not the water variety of the species which first gave man the idea of the diving-bell?

"On Nature's Trail" is an attempt by Mr. St. Mars to do for the wild life of this country what Mr. Kipling has done for that of India, and Mr. E. T. Seton and Mr. C. G. W. Roberts for that of America and Canada, and that he has admirably succeeded every reader of the book who loves to study the ways of wild creatures will candidly admit. In these tales, which originally appeared in serial form, Mr. St. Mars displays an extraordinary knowledge of beasts and birds, showing that he must have studied nature at first hand; and he also possesses a remarkable gift for picturing what he has seen. There are sixteen stories in all, dealing with almost every phase of the wild life of these islands, generally, it is true, with the cruel side of existence in the woods and mountains, where the battle of the survival of the fittest is being waged incessantly. But, whether comic or tragic, his stories are so realistic and fascinating that they invariably grip the reader's interest. The seven page plates by Mr. Aris are extremely lifelike, and form a pleasing embellishment to a most interesting work. "People of the Wild," by the same author, is a similar volume to the other, but a less pretentious one. It consists of seven stories, with a coloured frontispiece and a large number of small illustrations in the text. The stories are on the same lines as those in the previous work noticed, and equally interesting, and still further show what a keenly enthusiastic observer of wild life Mr. St. Mars must be. But we are somewhat at a loss to understand why two books dealing with the same subject should be issued by an author in the same publishing season. The explanation may be that the latter volume had first of all paid a visit to the land of the bald-headed eagle, as, although professedly printed in England, we fancy we have detected in its pages some monstrosities in spelling peculiar to the U.S.A.

In "Les Ravageurs" the veteran naturalist M. J. H. Fabre gives an account of the insects which are harmful to agriculture. The narrative is in the form of "talks" between Maître Paul, who from the knowledge he displays must be M. Fabre himself, and his two nephews. The lads have each a little plot of ground to cultivate, and as the ravagers make their appearance, which they ever inevitably do, the uncle is consulted, and he tells the boys how to deal with the successive situations, at the same time giving them the life history of each one of the obnoxious insects whose attacks they have to resist and provide against. From his wonderful accounts of the loves and combats of various insects, M. Fabre, besides being pensioned and decorated by the Government of his country, has acquired from the multitude of his admiring readers the proud title of the "Insects' Homer," and this little book of his, though written in a style intended for young people, will at the same time be immensely useful to farmers, market gardeners, and horticulturists in general. It is illustrated with some very good page plates and a few smaller ones. "Nature's Nursery Tales" is written for quite young people, for whom it is admirably adapted. It is illustrated with over three-score photographs direct from nature, and the moral of it all seems to be, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise"; which is undoubtedly excellent advice. And when you come to consider, after many vicissitudes, such as those of the prodigal son, you will find that she (the ant) has sanatoria galore, and medical and surgical assistance free, and no stamps to lick!

Shorter Reviews

The Democratic Mistake. By ARTHUR GEORGE SEDGWICK. (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.00 net.)

THESE lectures, originally delivered before the University of Harvard in 1909, are not without a certain topical interest. America has, during the last few weeks, passed through the throes of a Presidential election. The result is more significant than surprising. The star of Demos is once more in the ascendant, and a considerable impetus has been given to the extension of "popular" legislation. What "popular" legislation is meaning at the present time, and may come to mean in the future, will be found set forth in these pages.

Mr. Sedgwick is a calm and dispassionate observer of the political situation. He does not appear to hold a brief for any particular theory of government, believing, perhaps, with Pope that "whate'er is best administered is best." But he perceives—what has, indeed, long been patent to European eyes—that democracy in America stands convicted of gross mistakes, if not of final failure and ultimate collapse. The multiplication of officials has resulted in the "machine"—that is to say, in the increase of corruption and in the destruction of any real responsibility, either on the part of the legislature or on that of the electors. "If the machine is to be destroyed," he concludes, "it can only be through the introduction of responsible government in its place, and this can only be done by retracing our steps and abandoning the attempt to obtain responsibility through frequent elections and short terms and the multiplication of offices." These are wise and weighty words, and we commend them to the careful consideration of the American elector. He may have occasion to ponder them during the course of the next few years.

Lords and Ladies of the Italian Lakes. By EDGCUMBE STALEY. Illustrated. (John Long. 12s. 6d. net.)

THERE can be no doubt that Mr. Staley knows his Northern Italy and loves it, and he is for those reasons

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

well qualified to write such a book as the present one. In doing so he has kept two objects before him, or perhaps we should say that the scheme which he has adopted is a combination of two objects. In the first place he has set out to write a sort of guide book to the region of the Italian Lakes, and at the same time he has essayed to add to the very considerable recent literature of a biographical memoir nature. Satisfactorily to combine these two objects was difficult, perhaps impossible, and if Mr. Staley has failed to make a complete success of the book he cannot altogether be blamed on that account. He has written a chatty, gossipping volume of stories about castles and cottages, cities and villages, and of the people who inhabited them when life was, or at least appears to have been, far more interesting and romantic than it is to-day, but he never seems to say sufficient about any one individual, and all that he says leaves no lasting impression. Even the illustrations with which Mr. Staley has not been niggardly, have much the same effect. They fall short of the expectations they at first arouse. In many cases one feels definitely the absence from the reproductions of the original colours. Moreover, there is an impression that Mr. Staley has not made the most of his opportunities. As to his style, this can best be judged from the following passage:—

"Lecco is the will-o'-the-wisp among North Italian lakes; not, indeed, that she aqueously is here and there and everywhere, but her name betokens her character—the coin of echo, the acme of daintiness, the blush of temptation—in short, Diana of the Gods! Artemis of mythology was sister of Apollo, goddess of the chase, and protectress of the young and suffering. Her lover, Endymion, she kissed in sleep, and the loves of this well-matched pair illustrate the association of Lecco and the Brianza. By inversion of the metaphor—the pleasure-grounds of the 'Verdant Land' enshrine the sportive deity, whilst she looks out languishingly upon the mirror-face of the beautiful sloop-dowered lake. Diana is the fascinating inspiratrix of the Brianza. The Lake of Lecco is her death; a bevy of bewitching Bacchantes encircle her with crystal-emerald lakelet.." And so on with similar rhapsodisings.

Présences (Poèmes—Ire Série). By P. J. JOUVE. (Georges Crès and Co. Paris.)

IF it be possible to imagine a French Matthew Arnold, with a leaning towards optimism, we think that M. Jouve would fit the description. His mental attitude is a permanent surprise before the immeasurable forces, spiritual and material, of the universe, and his method is a very Arnoldian "vers libre," with occasional touches of a not unpleasant roughness. We will quote a typical passage:—

Rêve qui veut naître
Dans les yeux violents
Et les bouches closes . . . .
Dans le fleuve mû
Par les ponts mouvants . . . .
Dans l'appel des trains
Vers le souvenir . . . .
Dans l'ascension
D'escaliers humains
Où l'on entend rire. . . . .

Nous serons longtemps exilés d'ici,
Du tendre jardin pépiant et vert,
Longtemps exilés de cette paix molle
Qui a le goût sucré de notre nuit.

M. Jouve has chosen a fine title, which suits well with his superb transcendentalism; his poems of childhood, which have nothing of the "berceuse" about them, but are rather hymns before battle, reveal his whole mind. Here, if anywhere, is for him

A Presence which is not to be put by.

Lyrical these poems are not, in the strict sense of the word, but there are moments of pure lyricism—this, for instance:—

Ma vie, votre vie . . . .
Ma main, votre main . . . .
O douceur de l'homme,
Chante un son humain.

Edinburgh. By R. L. STEVENSON. With 24 Illustrations in colour by JAMES HERON. (Seeley, Service and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

The House of Life; A Rogue's Memoirs; Bensoniana; Simplicity and Tolstoy; The "Watteau" Series of Choice Little Books. (A. L. Humphreys. 2s. 6d. net each.)

ALTHOUGH there are many people, great readers all, who protest that for them "the word's the thing," and that it matters naught to them what form a book takes so long as they have the imperishable thought, we must confess that a handsome dress adds to the temptation to read. There is a pride of shabbiness for which we feel no sympathy, just as there is an ostentation of luxury which repels. The volumes under notice seem to strike a graceful medium between these two extremes. Stevenson's beautiful analysis of Edinburgh is welcome again, and Mr. Heron's pictures give quite the correct atmosphere—rather calm and subdued in tone, as befits a city "beaten upon by all the winds that blow, drenched with rain, buried in cold sea-fogs out of the east, and powdered with snow as it comes flying southward from the Highland hills." Perhaps R. L. S. was a little hard on the Northern metropolis when he wrote that; at any rate, here are his words in a handsome setting for all who wish a book that is handsome within as well as without.

Rossetti's "House of Life" lends itself peculiarly to delicate treatment in the way of illustration and format, and Mr. A. L. Humphreys has done well to include it among the first few volumes of his charming "Watteau Series." The series is modelled upon the most exquisite productions of the masters of book ornament of the eighteenth century in France, and the work of some famous artists adorns these pages in miniature. The effect is often extremely dainty and beautiful. Other issues to hand are four essays by Mr. G. K. Chesterton, opening with one on Tolstoy; selections from the novels of Mr. E. F. Benson—epigrams and bons mots which gain an added keenness from their setting; and, best of all, perhaps, three of Mr. Birrell's most attractive little essays under the general title of the first, "A Rogue's Memoirs." Nobody can chat in more lively fashion on men and books than Mr. Birrell, when he is in good form, and it is a pleasure to read him in this handy and novel guise. Among other numbers in this series we note Blake's "Songs of Innocence" and Mrs. Browning's Sonnets.

Fiction

Bright Shame. By KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

WE like Mr. Snowden best in his earlier novels. We miss here the fine, keen, brilliant irony of "The "Life Class" and "The Forbidden Theatre." This is avowedly a novel with a purpose. It is, perhaps, none the worse for that, but Mr. Snowden rather forces the note didactic, and, as if the story itself were not sufficient, concludes with what he calls a "rationale." In an age when so much of fiction is devoted to explanations there is every excuse to be made, but Mr. Snowden is worthy of better things. We have great fears for his future. For the last three or four years he has been accumulating theories—a harmless occupation enough; but Mr. Snowden is beginning to find a use for them.

"Art," says the artist in this volume, "includes morals." There is plenty of morality in this novel—of a kind. It is not the kind that one meets with in suburban drawing-rooms, 'tis true. Here is the story: A young Yorkshireman—the scene is inevitably laid in Yorkshire—falls in love, kisses, and runs away, leaving no permanent trace behind. The woman meanwhile gives birth to a son whom, when she is dying, she bequeaths to the boy's own uncle—a respectable Nonconformist, with the faith of an early Puritan and the soul of a shrivelled pea. In course of time the father returns to England, where he is confronted with his own son, of whose existence he has been up to that time unaware. His general demeanour in the face of that discovery constitutes for Mr. Snowden—as for the reader—the chief interest of the novel.

It is a dramatic situation, admirably treated. But why not have left it at that? Why should Mr. Snowden need to dot his "i's" and cross his "t's" so meticulously in the concluding chapter? Why on earth bring in Socialism and free love and the equality of the sexes, as though the book were, after all, merely a Fabian tract in disguise? Mr. Snowden alone knows. We, who know not Mr. Snowden, can but deplore. We can honestly say that the character-study of Ruth Tempest is as fine a piece of work as Mr. Snowden has done, while his theories fail to entertain us. And entertainment rather than moral instruction is the function of the novelist.

The Unbearable Bassington. By H. H. MUNRO ("SAKI"). (John Lane. 6s.)

IF there were a little more of Bassington in this very entertaining novel probably readers would be better pleased, for Comus, the wayward son of Francesca Bassington, is one of the most delightful and original characters in recent fiction. He upsets all his mother's pet schemes for his advancement, for his marriage, and for her own welfare, with the utmost coolness, and the story of his escapades is told with so much spirit and wit that the attention never flags for a moment. Mr. Munro is an adept at the epigram, neatly sandwiched between incidents or sparkling in a conversation. For example, we can hardly resist being tickled by the statement that "The art of public life consists to a great extent of knowing exactly where to stop and going a bit further," or by the excellent satire contained in the assertion that "Ada Spelvexit was one of those naturally stagnant souls who take infinite pleasure in what are called 'movements.'" The book is clever right through, and free from that boredom which arises from laborious attempts at humour. This happy result is, of course, precisely what we should expect from "Saki."

The Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina. By JEANNE MAGOUN. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 2s. net.)

THE story that Miss Magoun has to tell is very slender in form; a girl's betrayal and desertion are not new themes on which to base a novel. In the present instance our sympathies are with the woman, for she is young and inexperienced, and has no mother to advise her. The man is a fascinating scoundrel, who indulges in a quantity of nonsensical talk with regard to being "superior" to the morals decent people observe. It is pleasing to note that the author, without labouring a moral, recognises right from wrong, and does not endeavour to elevate inclination to a god, after the approved manner of much modern fiction.

The Weaving of the Shuttle. By C. HOLMES CAUTLEY. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

MICHAEL ESHOLT, master of Barsland Mills, is a man of moderate wealth but great ambition. He intends his only son, Stephen, to marry Bertha Wade, the daughter of a large yarn merchant, whose orders keep most of the spindles going at Barsland Mills. Complications are caused by Stephen falling in love with Zillah, the daughter of Michael's foreman. The fathers quarrel over this and become deadly enemies. Thias Tempest the foreman, sets up a mill of his own and ruins Michael's trade, but is eventually ruined himself. A double love tale runs through the book, and the strong characters of the two mill owners form the background of an interesting story.

The Theatre

A Triple Bill at the Haymarket: "The Younger Generation"

IT must have been difficult work for Mr. Frederick Harrison to decide on a form of entertainment to follow the long and surprisingly successful "Bunty." But he has been bold and happy in his selection. "The Younger Generation," by Mr. Stanley Houghton, possesses all the qualities necessary to fill the Haymarket for a long while to come. It fits in with the present reversion of taste to the candid domestic style of play; it clearly and admirably sets forth such simple story as it contains, and it is acted with a quiet vigour and sincerity which does immense credit to our stage.

One is reminded—at a distance and very pleasantly—of "Milestones" in that three generations bring their clashing ideals to bear upon each other; but in the present play an evening and the following Sunday morning and afternoon are all the hours we are asked to envision. In this period of time James Henry Kennion, a middle-aged, middle-class Manchester father—most skilfully played by Mr. Stanley Drewitt—is made to see the folly of his own mother's treatment of her family and the futility of his particular method of treating his grown-up children. It is all done very smoothly and after a fashion that completely holds the interest. The picture is one of a delightfully self-satisfied group of provincial people, equally egotistic whichever happens to be their generation or age. The two attractive sons, Reggie Kennion (Mr. J. V. Bryant) and Arthur Kennion (Mr. J. Woodall-Birde) and the pretty daughter Grace (Miss Caroline Bayley) are in their way just as wrong-headed and ignorant as the two elder generations that harry them. Again a little while, and these brave and attractive young people will be just as troublesome to the coming race as their parents are to them.

It is rather an old story that no two generations can take the same point of view. Ibsen's younger generation knocking at the door was not invented by him; the sound has echoed through the ages, although man has not always had ears to hear. But Mr. Houghton recognises, as a wise sociologist should, that in each generation there are exceptions to the somewhat dull average. And he presents us in the Tom Kennion, brother of James Henry, with this useful type. Tom managed to break away from the home life of his youth, and eventually prospered in some business in Hamburg. Not very romantic, but highly utilitarian—especially to the action of the play—for he returns to visit his brother just as that gentleman discovers that all his children lie to him, and that he is obliged to lie to them. As they are all very good, honest people really, this is a painful situation, and requires all the good nature and wisdom which Tom can bring to round matters off and give Grace her lover, Arthur his freedom, and Reggie a chance of better things. As Mr. Nigel Playfair takes the part of Tom, or rather seems to be the real Tom himself, it will be understood that the three acts end in fairly favourable circumstances. Of course, it is made pretty clear that the antagonisms of the various generations remain—that must be an everlasting trouble—but it is also shown that such characters as Tom exist, and can calm the clashing elements and link up the broken chain between age and middle age and youth.

We are very grateful to Mr. Houghton for having pointed to this truth once more, and for having made so amusing a play of his subject. As we have said, the acting, the staging, and the producing are, in their way, perfection. Mrs. Crowe as the grandmother, with Spartan views in regard to the treatment of children—of about twenty years—rang bitterly true. Mr. Norman Page and Mr. Luke Forster gave us two perfect studies of commonplace town councillors. Every part, indeed, was admirably played; the cast shows us a younger generation knocking with perfect assurance at the doors of fame. But also it shows us Mrs. Crowe, whose experience goes back so many years, in absolute unison with present-day methods, although she represents a Victorian grandmother. The result is a most engaging comedy in modern manners.

"An Adventure of Aristide Pujol"

WE have all been so much and so often entertained by Mr. W. J. Locke that this little comedy was sure of the warmest welcome, even if it had chanced to fall below the high standard he has taught us to expect. The story of the sham Corot, which the good Mr. Smith intends M. Pujol, as a baron, shall sell for some thousands to the Hon. Harry Ralston, is a gay and pure delight. The plot is too neat to be given away in a criticism. Everyone who enjoys Mr. Locke's graceful fun must be in time at the Haymarket to see Mr. Leon M. Lion's stage version of Aristide Pujol, its blitheness, its aplomb, its cynical humour. And all the other people of the little play are excellently enacted, from the wicked, or as he is called "kind," Mr. Smith, of Mr. Fewlass Llewellyn, to his future son-in-law and to-be victim, Harry Ralston, of Mr. Woodall-Birde—who, by the way, shines quite differently in Mr. Houghton's play. The comedy is gay and lively from beginning to end. Seldom has a first piece so fully delighted an audience.

"The Golden Doom"

THE fantastic story of the kingdom of Zericon, "some while before the fall of Babylon," comes very pleasantly between the little comedy and the longer one of Mr. Houghton. The beautiful and rhythmic words of Lord Dunsany are sustained and made more telling by the delicate music of Mr. Norman O'Neill and the straightforward and convincing acting of Mr. Hargreaves as the king, of Mr. Lyall Swete as his chamberlain, and the other accomplished actors of the cast. The only actress here is Eileen Esler, as the "Girl" who invents a couplet which the "Boy" (Eric Rae) writes on the iron doorway of the king. The boy has come there to pray the stars to give him a hoop. The prophets of the stars, however, happen to be displeased with the king, and they read into the simple lines of the girl, and the added one of the boy, a passage of doom for the head of the State. Thus, to appease the gods, the king lays down his head-band of gold and his sceptre, and the boy, when he comes at night to look for a hoop, finds a golden one and a golden stick. The prophets tell that the gods of the stars have accepted the king's submission, and the golden doom is averted.

Lord Dunsany wisely does not let us know what happens when the boy is found with his hoop and stick. Why should he? His intention has been to create a fragment of beauty, a picture of subtle irony, a delightful pageant of some far-off, forgotten Eastern kingdom. With the aid of a finely imagined scene from a design by Mr. S. H. Sime, his illusion is made complete, and while the clever actors recite his poetic and effective language one is translated into a mystic world far beyond these shadows, to a splendid period some while before you, brave reader, were a king in Babylon, and I was in London a, more or less, Christian slave. By the way, a clever critic, who is usually profoundly just and perfectly catholic in his taste, has taken the trouble in this connection to be amusing and absurd. In the Sunday Times he says that Thackeray would no doubt give us another "Book of Snobs" à propos of such works as that of Lord Dunsany.

Delicious as parts of that book by "One of Themselves" are, there is really not the slightest chance that "The Golden Doom" would spur Thackeray to write again in what was his early manner. He was far too sane and witty, far too honest and just, to make an attack upon a just and honest endeavour. This critic must know very little of the intimate W. M. T., as shown us by the author's own letters, his daughter's biographical notes, and his novels—which are often more intensely biographical—if he supposes that Thackeray was inclined to be more severe on the work of an aristocrat than that of, say, a cheesemonger's agent. There are many snobs who sneer at titles, as there are those who laugh at the commoner; there are a few snobs, such as ourselves, who are not affected by ephemerals and see beauty in other conceptions than that of perfection.

"Sylvia Greer" at the Queen's

THIS is by way of being a retrospective review—a grey rose or two laid on the urn that contains the ashes of a well-justified hope. Greatly to our regret, we see an official note that, owing to "the unanimous condemnation of 'Sylvia Greer' by the Press," the play will be withdrawn. Had I been allowed to see the dress rehearsal, as I tried to do, there would have been one meticulous dissentient to this consensus of stupidity, for the author of "Irene Wycherley" has given us a brilliant, amusing, and broadly conceived play. The splendid company, too, which interprets his characters with courage and skill could hardly be approached in cleverness by any of the several gifted groups of actors now playing in town. For once, I suppose, the public have followed the Press and stayed away from the Queen's. I can hardly imagine that the misapplied vituperation of the other critics would really have affected the gifted lady now in management. Had the real public once seen "Sylvia Greer," the fame of the comedy would have spread, and what is now, alas! a succès manqué would have been a well-deserved victory. It is too late now to tell of the delicate and natural and subtle lines on which the play runs; we reserve that pleasure for a revival which, we trust, will be soon.

All that is left is to compliment Miss Ethel Warwick on her fine performance as Sylvia. The author has made the character one of the most difficult and telling and true in modern plays, and the actress has not spared her wit to get every psychic and physical atom of the attractive and unfortunate heroine over the footlights. Hitherto she has never played anything so worthy of her gifts, nor has she before even attempted to manifest them with such complete boldness and assurance. Æsthetically, we disliked her "Zaza" in every way.

That the same actress can give us the soul of so intensely modern and vital and asserting a woman as Sylvia is a revelation of power, and, by reason of its wonderful completeness, a work of consummate art. It is also a splendid compliment to the play. That it and the acting should have been sneered at by my fellow-critics is one more disgrace to all of us. "Sylvia Greer" is an actor-making play. Mr. Lowne has seldom given us so absolutely novel a character. Mr. Guy Standing has never approached life so closely, nor with such whole-hearted freedom. Mr. Reginald Owen was perfectly lifelike as Captain Harte, but the same may be said of all the excellent cast. Mr. Heath Haviland, with only a few lines as Carmody, made one feel the strength of the life-blood which flows through the play; Miss Alice Mansfield, who has done so many things splendidly, never gave us a more complete and perfect picture than her mother of Harte. But all were good and all were wasted. "Sylvia Greer" is too like life, and its unanimous treatment by the Press is too typical of this land of bitter shadows and mock sentiment to permit one to express oneself fully in praise of the play and the actors, or in regard—shall one say?—of this unanimous condemnation of them by the Press.

Music

FOR variety of interest and excellence of performance the concert music in London during the last week or two would be difficult to beat in any city of the world. Some of the most transcendent artists have been here, and there has been much pleasant and profitable work done, also, by musicians whose fame is not as yet cried upon the house-tops of all nations, but who exercise a valuable and agreeable influence in their more restricted spheres. Among the pianists, both M. Paderewski and Mr. Harold Bauer have been playing "at the top of their form," each giving us something that no other living pianist can give. It has often been said of late years that M. Paderewski's style, in public performance, at any rate, had undergone a change, in the direction of increased severity; that he has been less prodigal of the expression of that spirit of romance which so completely distinguished him from all other players, even from so great a man as Rubinstein. There have been occasions when we have had to subscribe to this opinion. We have been conscious of a certain sternness in his interpretation. He has not condescended always to the delicious arts of fascination of which he is so supreme a master, but has kept himself aloof, as it were, solving musical problems for himself rather than for his audience. But when he played recently at Queen's Hall, it was the Paderewski of former days that the intoxicated audience heard; it was the Shelley of the pianoforte rather than the Browning, the poet whose power of expressing beautiful thought by means of beautiful sounds seems as limitless as the variety of his range of language.

Paderewski seldom or never plays the best-known piece in quite the same way. We have heard him play Chopin's Sonata with the Funeral March a great number of times, but when he played it the other day we heard effects of rubato, of accent, of tone, which he had not shown us before. So with the "Carneval" of Schumann, which was played with a freedom, a variety, that made one ask, "Is this a new composition which we have never yet heard?" Yet we knew all the time that the music was being played with the most perfect regard for the composer's intention, but also with a temper so responsive to the quick-changing moods of the music that it seemed as if a new voice was speaking to us in Schumann's language. Since the Russians first danced the "Carneval" before us, we have never been able to think of it without them, longing for their graceful movements, their whimsical miming, until Paderewski played it again. Then did our thoughts never rove at all to Covent Garden. The vision of Karsavina and Nijinski was effectually banished. It was Schumann, and Schumann only, his love, his hope, his happiness, his fun, his grief, his perplexity, that we had pictured to us while Paderewski was playing. It may be, as someone, a very competent critic, said to us, that in his playing of Liszt's arrangement of Isolde's "Liebestod" he showed most marvellously what he can do with a piano; it is true he made us forget that voice and orchestra should combine to sing that song; but for us it was in the "Carneval" that we chiefly recognised that the spirit of the Romance of all time was being distilled and poured into our soul. Here we are listening to Paderewski in his finest mood, the unique, the incomparable artist who can scatter over the music a million diamond touches of fancy only possible to the fingers of one endowed with what is indisputably genius.

We were unfortunately prevented from hearing Mr. Harold Bauer's so originally conceived programme of Bach and Beethoven, but we heard him play Beethoven's G major Concerto at the concert of the Philharmonic Society, which subsequently honoured itself by giving him its gold medal, and we heard his second recital. We propose to do nothing so stupid as to elaborate a comparison between the merit and methods of Paderewski and Bauer. It would be no more reasonable to put two such painters as Giorgione and Velasquez into a balance and weigh them. But we will venture to say that, not forgetting the other pianists, who also can afford us exquisite pleasure, we are sure that, if we could not hear Paderewski, we would choose to hear Bauer, and vice versâ. You have but to look at Mr. Bauer's programme to know that he is one of the rarer artists among the music-makers. For Bechstein Hall his scheme was faultless. An early Sonata of Mozart, a piece of innocent loveliness that suggests some happy, beautiful child going out at dawn into the woods of spring to gather primroses. The Sonata in B minor of Chopin, which carries us into the whirl of hot-blooded life and love, aspiring, happy, dreaming, the passion of love transformed, in the last movement, into the passion of patriotism. Then we had Schumann's "Davidsbündler Tanze," an early work, and one which is seldom heard. When Schumann sent his "Etudes Symphoniques" to Moscheles, he wrote, "They were composed three years ago, and I like some of them still." Surely he would still like some of these Davidsbündler dances; but if he cut a few of them out, perhaps we should not regret it. In truth, there are des longueurs; and though Mr. Bauer succeeded in holding our attention, and we felt that the music afforded precisely the right contrast needed between Chopin and César Franck, the series of little pieces might have appeared monotonous to some hearers. In Franck's noble "Prelude Aria and Finale" Mr. Bauer was splendid—there is no other word. He does not obey the metronomic direction too rigidly, but he obeys the spirit of the music as few other pianists can, and he makes one forget that very often. Franck forgot that he was not writing for the organ. Such is his art of playing the melody on the solo manual, and filling in the counterpoint on the choir!

A little cult has sprung up, it would seem, for the playing in public of duets for two pianofortes. If these are to be perfectly given, it is necessary that the tone of one instrument should harmonise agreeably with that of the other, though we would not insist upon both being by the same maker. Then, also, the two pianists should be twins in their filial regard for the composer whose work they are to interpret, and they should rehearse together day and night until every inequality has been smoothed away. When that magnificent pianist, Mme. Carreño, played Mozart's famous Sonata in D major with Mr. Backhaus at Queen's Hall, these conditions were not satisfied. The tones of the instruments did not blend together, and, to say nothing of divergences in the more subtle questions of phrasing, one pianist—we will not say which—too frequently finished the phrase after the other had come to a close. The steeds which were to draw Mozart's chariot on this occasion were, in truth, unevenly matched. But it must be admitted that Mozart is probably the most difficult of all composers to play perfectly. In his apparent simplicity a great danger lies hid. We could point to Mr. Bauer's playing of the little sonata as a perfect realisation of what Mozart-playing should be. And we had hoped that Herr Heinbach would give us the Symphony in G minor in some memorable fashion at one of the London Symphony Orchestra's concerts. But he did not. He made it as trim and neat as could be, but that is only the beginning, when you play Mozart. A dressmaker can dress out a mannikin with the utmost neatness. We want flesh and blood beneath the robes, and for Mozart the figure must be of rare loveliness. It should be the beauty of Miss Linley. Beethoven, perhaps, would more closely suggest the grandeur of Mrs. Siddons. Steinbach's too rigid insistance on the outside form of the music resulted in a performance that had indeed the cold beauty of a statue by Canova, but it had not even so much of life as one recognises in the Venus de Medicis.

That fine musician, Mr. Dohnanyi, has been playing for the Classical Concert Society, and producing there some of his chamber compositions. His playing was, and is, virile, poetical, satisfying. He never played like a virtuoso; he is still less like one now; and in Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" the unco' critical could have pointed out a good many rough places. But these did not matter to us, when we were being refreshed by the fine vigour and musical understanding which so far outweighed them. Miss May Mukle was admirable as Dohnanyi's partner in his very attractive Sonata for Pianoforte and Violoncello. Among other givers of chamber concerts, the St. Petersburg String Quartett has been here, playing with extreme beauty of tone and all their former excellence of ensemble. An entire programme of Russian music was very interesting, but the Quartetts of Roudolph and Taneiew (in C major), finely constructed as they are, did not leave a very deep impression behind them.

The Picture Habit

IT is only a little over twenty-one years since a clever business man first perceived that there was a large public waiting for a magazine with a picture on every page. The idea is so obvious nowadays that it is hard to imagine how, at any time, it could have been very remote; but although it is not difficult to satisfy a known want, it requires an uncommon amount of penetration and resource to divine a latent desire and to hit on the exact stimulant necessary to make it manifest. The few who can do it command their own price for their services. So Sir George Newnes achieved the prosperity due to the discoverer of the important fact that the way to the great heart of the British public lies anywhere except through its brains. "Keep Household Words imaginative" was the repeated injunction of Dickens to Wills; the Strand Magazine, on the other hand, strove earnestly to avoid imagination. Its merit was to be easy. If Sherlock Holmes sat down in a chair Sidney Paget showed him doing it; if he got up again another illustration made that clear also. During its earlier years, in deference to prejudices then existing in favour of more solid literary nutriment, Grant Allen was allowed to explain away the wonders of science, and Mr. Raymond Blathwayt interviewed celebrities at home amongst their photographs. But these concessions were abandoned after a decent trial, and the Strand Magazine went on from strength to strength, until it encountered the opposition of rivals even more obvious and popular than itself.

There is a multitude of able minds constantly at work to discover new outlets for successful ideas, and it was plainly inevitable that somebody should soon do for fact what Sir George Newnes had done for fiction. The Illustrated London News suggested a possible direction, and recent progress in photographic reproduction made it practicable. The advent of the daily picture paper marked a further development of the original scheme. Hitherto the illustrations had been, nominally at least, subordinate to the text, but now the ally became the master, and the letterpress sank to the level of a commentary on the half-tone blocks. The latest step has been taken by the cinematograph, which almost dispenses with the aid of language altogether.

Of all possible forms of entertainment the picture theatre makes the least demand upon the intelligence of its audience. It explains everything to the eye and leaves nothing for the mind. It is catholic in its range and immediate in its appeal. It turns Homer into a pageant for the illiterate, and presents Hamlet without a shred of his philosophy. Mercifully, however, it inclines to small things rather than to great. It prefers acrobats and mountebanks to art and metaphysics; it shows sardines more often than whales; but whether the sardines are being captured by natives off the coast of Sicily, which is Interest, or being eaten by a French buffoon in Paris, which is Comedy, they are made equally acceptable to the most sluggish and unprepared of intellects.

Nobody, of course, debases the moral currency except on principle, and the authors of this state of things were ready with their defence. They held that the persons who bought their papers and attended their entertainments had hitherto read nothing and gone nowhere; that a vast class of people previously cut off from the general movement of the world by lack of a capacity for sustained attention, was now being allured by pleasant side paths into the broad highway of literature and thought; and that, in short, the Strand Magazine was better than stagnation, and the picture theatre than the public-house. In so far as this argument is true, it is valid, and it has much truth; but it is not the whole truth. The small gain has been accomplished only at the expense of a very real and palpable loss. The public mind has been directed downwards. When people can choose between amusements they will generally select the most blatant. The opera is superseded by the music-hall just as good money is driven out of circulation by bad. Journals directed by the advertising manager and theatres controlled from the box office are daily supplanting their artistic predecessors. It is through no mere accident that melodrama is being played in the Lyceum, or that the house in which the Bancrofts first showed London how English comedy might be touched with French refinement is now the home of "Kinemacolor." We have asked for smooth things, and we have got them.

"The results are before us." There is hardly one form of literature or art that has not suffered from this taste for the methods of the hippodrome. We expect to have even our reasoning done for us in pictures. Our thinkers refute erroneous opinions by caricaturing the people who hold them. "One imagines a stout bald-headed man leading an austere life in a Norfolk jacket. . . ." This is the style we have learned to understand and enjoy. We feel that the three unmeaning dots are intensely subtle and significant and conclusive. We realise that the ideas of a bald-headed man must be absurd, and that a life spent in a Norfolk jacket must be devoid of interest, continuity, and import. We forget, as we are meant to forget, that fine thoughts may come from ridiculous beings just as easily as ignoble ethics from a popular novelist. To hint the contrary in a thumb-nail sketch is neither art nor literature; it is the argument of the gamin, the repartee of the Mile-End Road. But it is the natural and inevitable outcome of our preference for the things which are seen and temporal to the things which are unseen and eternal. F. C. M.

Foreign Reviews

LE MERCURE DE FRANCE.

October 16.—M. Paul Escoube contributes a long study, or rather rhapsody, on Jules Laforgue. M. C. Régismanset deprecates the interference of French humanitarian politicians in Algerian affairs. M. G. Vidalencq writes about William Morris and the Kelmscott Press, and M. E. Seillière tells the amazing story of Barbe Blomberg, probable mother, in spite of her own taunting allegation, of Don John of Austria. M. Davray considers that the "Germany and the German Emperor" of Mr. Perris, discussed recently in THE ACADEMY, is so good as to suggest the need of a French book on similar lines; he is also delighted with Mr. Whitman's "German Memories"; finally he gives copious extracts from Mr. Belloc's essay on translation in THE ACADEMY of September 7.

November 1.—M. Escoube finishes his study of Laforgue; the second article is more detailed and interesting. M. Fernand Baldenne summarises the feelings of the Japanese on the news of General Nogi's suicide; he quotes from his will one of his reasons for the step—the loss of a standard in 1877, and he adds some new touches: Nogi regretted that his death would make it impossible for him to discharge certain honorary duties, and on the day of the tragedy he composed two poems. M. Marcel Mirtil gives a very vivid picture of Montenegro, and M. Maynial shows how Louis Bouilhet used for his poems material from Flaubert's notes. M. Davray finds Lady Lyttelton's correspondence "beaucoup plus intéressant qu'un roman." That diverting story "L'Illustre Famille," with its clever illustrations, is concluded in this number.

LA REVUE.

October 1.—A particularly good number; we can do little more than enumerate the items. M. Chuquet gives some odds and ends of documents that were too late for his "Guerre de Russie"; the most interesting are concerned with the health of Napoleon and with the grumbles of Chasseloup-Laubat, a leading engineer officer, who wished Smolensk to be the furthest point in the expedition. M. Faguet's theme is Mr. Bernard Shaw, to whom he is not very indulgent, though he calls him "le plus grand satirique, à l'heure actuelle, des deux mondes." Dr. Laumonier discusses the medical properties of colours, M. Nicolas Ségur, the philosophy of M. Bergson, and M. d'Albola literature and nationalism in Italy—with not a word about the Futurists! M. de Banzemont gives the translation of an excellent piece of Chinese comedy, worthy of Molière, and Mme. Léonie Siénicka reproduces some wonderful specimens of songs made and sung by Russian convicts.

October 15.—M. Camille Mauclair discusses the morality and the influence on art of picture-dealers. M. Louis exhibits the strength of German Socialism, and believes in it as a great force making for peace. M. Faguet, à propos of recent books, passes in review "les petites religions" of France, from the "Culte de la Raison" downwards. M. du Bled gives a number of the best lampoons on the Academy and the Academicians. "Un diplomate" sketches Italian policy during the last half-century, justifying Signor Tittoni, and continuing the discussion of Franco-Italian relations that has for some time been going on in the Revue. Some of "Cim's" literary "howlers" are particularly good—"Vingt mille Autrichiens mordirent la poussière," after "il avait plu toute la journée" (from Thiers)—"La propriété reste debout, assise sur la justice," etc.—"Protéger le porc, c'est nous protéger nous-mêmes" (from a Belgian orator). "Dessins inédits" of Alfred Roll are reproduced, with an essay by M. J. Tild.

LA REVUE BLEUE.

October 5.—M. Le Chatelier gives the text of a panislamic manifesto that, under a German postmark, has found its way into various parts of Africa. He also gives a sketch of the career of a panislamic agitator at Tangier: "Of Algerian origin, and at first a Mussulman, he was picked up at Tangier twenty years ago by a German Jew who had become an American Protestant and now baptised this son of the soil and sent him to Germany"; there he married a German, and came back with an appointment under the tobacco monopoly. The Berlioz letters reveal the composer as an admirer of English musical conditions. A translation of Wyspianski's "Protésilas et Laodamie" is begun. M. Schuré talks of Signora Evelyn and Piero della Francesca. A second instalment of M. Charles Bernard's "Sur les Chemins d'Assise" keeps us among the Apennines, the saints, and the painters. M. Feugère begins the history of a tiresome sceptic with redeeming features—the Abbé Raynal.

October 12.—More Wyspianski, Raynal, and Berlioz; the last-named is seen at his best, though he "écorcheur peu" Shakespeare in quotations from the libretto of his "scène volée à Shakespeare et virgilianisée"; at times he shows a very pretty wit. M. Flat praises M. Hervieu; M. L. Maury serves up Mr. Gosse. M. Paul Louis approves of the opportunism of the "C. G. T." M. A. Maurel's article, misnamed "De Florence à Naples," deals exclusively with Montepulciano, M. Jacques Lux develops Mr. Bernard Muddiman's judgment, expressed in THE ACADEMY, that Marc Lescarbot was the modern Herodotus.

October 19.—M. Paul Bonnefon publishes an interesting letter of Bonald to an Austrian diplomatist on the Decazes ministry. M. Maury is by no means complimentary to Jules Favre, à propos of a biography by M. Reclus; he calls him a "rhéteur d'assises," a "maître d'erreurs," a "dieu de la phrase gonflée de vent," and many other endearing names. M. Dresch discusses Fontane's very independent views, expressed between 1871 and 1876 on the question of Alsace. M. Joachim Merlant shows, in the light of newly discovered correspondence, how Mme. Hanska garbled Balzac's letters to her before submitting them for publication.

L'ACTION NATIONALE.

The October number is almost entirely devoted, except for the usual topical comments, a few short ordinary articles, and some clever ironical criticisms by General Lebas of various books on the next Franco-Prussian war, written in many cases by civilians, to Proportional Representation. In the first place, there is a symposium—if this word be applicable to a company whose round-table manners suggest rather the eventual amenities of the "Society upon the Stanislow," and afterwards there is a well-written, impartial review of the history of the movement. We find it difficult to understand the warmth of the pleading on both sides; we suppose the explanation is that the French people, like Neville Beauchamp, "likes a bone in its mouth." The obvious criticism—that the "R.P." is a harmless quack nostrum that will leave everything where it was before—does not seem to be made by anyone; it would destroy the pleasure of all those who are "spoiling for a fight," such as the present arrangement of French politics has made it difficult to get. M. Ponsot, indeed, says that the "R.P." is merely a passing fashion, but he expects disastrous results from it. With the Radical Party the whole thing has become a question of "cui bono?"—they feel that any rearrangement might be fatal to them: this is the explanation of M. Ponsot's bitterness. On the other hand, M. Ferdinand Buisson, also a Radical, is an "Erpéiste," with a sort of "ruat cœlum" attitude. M. Sembat's defence of the movement is extremely able; the "R.P." means party discipline and order; the irresponsibility of changing ministers will be checked; the level of parliamentary competence will be raised, not by the inclusion of intellectuals, but by the necessity to "savoir son métier." For the reasons for these prognostications we must refer the reader to the article; we are not sure we should get them right. M. Lachapelle says the "R.P." is merely a step towards administrative reform. M. Lafferre believes that justice is a powerful ally of that more important social force—order; while M. Ponsot seems to give the objections to the reform in a nutshell when he says, "A quoi bon voter" ("cui bono?" again), "si on peut détourner les suffrages de leur véritable destination?"

REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTERATURE.

October 5.—Mainly a historical number. Among the works criticised are Dr. Strich's book on Princess Palatine Elisabeth, who came to the Court of Louis XIV as Duchess of Orleans, the fourth volume of M. Pirenne's big history of Belgium, and Professor Martin Hume's work on Philip IV, in its French translation: the author's indulgence for the king is censured, but the social side of the book is highly praised. M. F. Maury's "Nos Hommes d'Etat," lately noticed in THE ACADEMY, is also appreciated.

October 12.—M. Labande displays great versatility as principal contributor. Among the historical books he notices is M. Kurth's "Cité de Liège au Moyen Age"; among the works on art is M. Brutails' "Vieilles Eglises de la Gironde." As in the previous number, a book by M. Lucien Febvre on the Franche-Comté is reviewed. M. d'Eichthal is severe for M. Brouilhet's "Précis d'Economie Politique."

October 19.—M. Maspero is greatly interested in the "Opfertanz des Ægyptischen Königs" of Herr Kees, as dealing with a subject that he had wished undertaken by himself or one of his pupils. M. Roustan criticises a little book by M. Faguet and a big one by Herr von Aster on the History of Philosophy.

October 26.—M. Maspero notices the publication by Herr Gradenwitz and others of a curious document whose fragments had been dispersed over half Europe, and examines controversially Freiherr von Bissing's new dissertation of the Egyptian ka. M. de Labriolle eulogises M. Monceaux's work on Donatism, whose fourth volume has just appeared.

The Royal Society of British Artists

THE exhibition of pictures now on view at the Suffolk Street Galleries is decidedly above the average. If there is nothing, or very little, of outside genius, there is at all events a great deal of honest work, and not a few of the pictures show a real feeling for Nature, a sympathy with, and insight into her moods.

Portraits and figure-studies are rather fewer than usual, and their average merit is not high, though there is some honest and painstaking work. Best of all, however, the proportion of mere eccentricity has been kept lower than we have seen it for some years past, though there are still one or two pictures which ought not to have been admitted. Landscape is a strong point, and something of the current pessimism of the age is reflected in the still evening effects in which the artists appear to find the most satisfactory medium of self-expression, in preference to the joyous dawning lights, the brilliancy of high noon, and "the gay mid-summer pomps" which delight the artists of a more genial age. The mood of the present age would seem to be that which finds expression in "In Memoriam":—

> Sad Hesper o'er the buried sun,
> And ready thou to die with him,
> Thou watchest all things ever dim
> And dimmer and a glory done.

But this need give us no cause for despair. The darkest hour is that which precedes the dawn, and it may be that this chastened spirit of humility in place of the blatant assurance of the Victorian era is the prelude to a new birth in art, as the corrupt politics of mediæval Italy brought forth the glories of the Renaissance.

Mr. Hely Smith is responsible for some very nice coast and landscape studies—unambitious but thorough—as well as some other pictures; that of "Berneval Cliffs" is a capital piece of work, which bears long inspection. Other pictures by the same artist which leave a pleasant memory are "Hard at Work," a fine study of grey and sullen waters, and "Cloud Shadows," a bold piece of landscape broadly painted. We have marked, too, "The Shallow River," a quiet and restful piece of work, and "Smoke," a very clever study of modern shipping. Sir Alfred East will be remembered for his brilliant study entitled "Autumn in Gloucestershire," in which the vivid autumn gold is laid on with the firmness of a master-hand, without any hint of crudity. There is some fine sunlight in Mr. Claude Barry's "June Morning in a Picardy Farmyard"; and Mr. Philip Gilchrist's "Morning Mists," painted perhaps from the flats stretching away from Rye, is another careful and pleasant picture. Admirers of Mr. Graham Robertson will hardly care to remember him by "The Day-dream" or "Monna Vanna," both of which seem to us to reproduce his mannerisms rather than his inspiration. A very pretty study by Mr. W. H. J. Boot is that of "Ickenham Church," truthful enough, but hardly suggestive of a district which the builder is now marking down for "development." In somewhat marked contrast, but equally good in execution, and more striking, perhaps, as a subject, is the same painter's "Pilgrimage Church of the Madonna del Sasso, Locarno," a fine picture of a church and conventual buildings crowning the heights overlooking a still lake among blue mountains. A beautiful study of wet meadows is Mr. Muirhead's "Flooded Valley of the Ouse." Mr. Alfred Hartley has an excellent large-scale landscape, bold in execution and truthful in feeling, "In Cornwall"; and the most ambitious picture in the same room is also one of the best, "The Light Above," by Mr. L. B. Bruhl, showing a Breton coast scene, with peasants clustered round a crucifix on a stone pier under a stormy night, and everything about them moist and shining. There is a touch of melodrama, perhaps, in the effect aimed at, but it is none the less vivid and striking. Another picture which deserves mention in the same room is the clever night study of "The Lightship," by Louis Grier.

The exhibition contains some good landscapes by Mr. A. C. Gould, who has a wonderfully striking and truthful style, appreciative, though without touching any very great deeps of feeling. Among them we mention especially "A Somerset Valley." A beautiful study of marsh land is Mr. Robert Morley's "Where Wild Fowl Call," and the same artist gives a very pretty picture "The Towers of Bayeux," which impresses by its quiet truthfulness. Mr. Morley has also scored one of the successes of the exhibition in "Devoted," a clever study of a sleeping child in bed with a wire-haired terrier lying on a chair beside her, the light through the lattice window falling on the bed, and the sleeping figure is particularly well managed. Mr. Horace Middleton contributes a pretty picture of children bathing in "The Little Diver"—the figure of the elder girl poised for the dive is admirable in its suppleness and grace. Of the portraits we are unable to speak so highly, but two certainly compel attention—that by Mr. P. A. Laszlo de Lombos of his mother, and that by Mr. Schofield, of Mrs. Stocks, the aviator—a delightful composition full of kindly characterisation, with even a touch of humour, and graceful in design and particularly harmonious in colour also. And we cannot close this notice without a brief word of praise to the spirited and very clever statuette by Mr. Paul Montford—"Startled," which is instinct with life and movement.

The Booksellers' Provident Institution

ON Monday evening, the Booksellers' Provident Institution gave their third annual Bohemian concert in the Crown Room of the Holborn Restaurant. It is unnecessary to go into the objects of this Institution; they are now well known for the great benefits they confer upon their members. Mr. T. Fisher Unwin was in the chair, and was enthusiastically received when he rose to say a few words to those present. He touched upon the necessity for union and support among those interested in the endeavours of the workers for the cause, and added that no Government schemes need in any way interfere with the independent working of such societies as theirs. Mr. Longman replied to Mr. Unwin and expressed his pleasure at seeing so many present, and hoped that the association would continue to prosper.

Many artistes contributed to a musical programme, with which the evening concluded. Mr. O. D. Binger gave two 'cello solos; there were also many songs, both sentimental and humorous, among which special mention must be made of those contributed by Miss Maggie Hennessey and Miss Margaret Pierce. The character sketch by Mr. Charles E. Nott was also exceedingly well done. Judging by the expressions on the faces of those present, we think that it is safe to state that the whole company had spent a most enjoyable evening.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

"HARD pounding, gentlemen," observed the Duke of Wellington to his tired squares as they resisted the onslaught of the French cavalry all through that long Sunday afternoon at Waterloo. "Let us see who can pound the hardest."

The Opposition has been pounding away at the uninteresting and complicated question of the finance of the Home Rule Bill. Again and again they have raked the Government with arguments that have been irresistible and with questions that cannot be answered. And a curious thing is happening which will come into greater prominence shortly.

The people of Ireland, many of them genuine Home Rulers from birth and conviction, are beginning to have doubts if their leaders are not making a grave mistake; they are beginning to think that the elder brother is careless and generous to a younger brother when they are both under one roof; but, if the younger brother decides to set up for himself, he is inclined to review the whole position and make a much stricter bargain.

I had a chat to-day with a very intelligent commercial traveller who travels all over Ireland from Cork to Derry, and he stated that wherever he went he found serious misgivings on the turn things are taking. The pounding of the Opposition is having its effect; people are beginning to see that you cannot coerce a nation into what it considers an unfair bargain. It looks as if the reign of the Radical is coming to an end. Even if Home Rule is passed, how will the Unionists act when they come in? They cannot be kept out for ever, and it is perfectly certain they will not allow a great many things to continue which the Irishman has always taken as a matter of course. My friend did not say that the working classes thought this at present, but the more thoughtful sections of the community are beginning to doubt whether they have not "put their money on the wrong horse." The peasant proprietor is contented now; he is beginning to think it will be as well to be satisfied with what he has, lest a worse thing befall him.

On Wednesday the new financial resolutions were again considered. For one perilous half-hour Herbert Samuel had to speak against time, for the Whips in a panic discovered that they were "short" again. If we could only have forced a division, then the fate of the Home Rule Bill and the Government would have been settled for ever.

Balfour made one of his telling speeches. "If we have forced on Ireland legislation that is too expensive, it is a pity that we did not have Home Rule before Old Age Pensions and the Insurance Bill," said he. "Hear, hear!" said Lloyd George. "Well," said Mr. Balfour, in his silkiest tones, "if this had been done, we should have escaped this charge which is going to fall on the British taxpayer—money which, according to the Chancellor, Ireland ought not to receive. If these fiscal arrangements are too costly, let Old Age Pensions and Insurance come to an end, and let Ireland, like any other part of the Empire that is independent, live on her own resources."

Now you see why my commercial traveller's friends in Ireland are becoming a little bit uneasy.

Sir John Simon denied that the Customs control could be manœuvred to provide protection for Irish industries against England; but he was too 'cute to give the guarantee Mr. Balfour immediately pressed for. Birrell made a mountebank speech. "Home Rule is the most popular measure we have," he declared stoutly. "If that is the case," interjected "Worthy" Evans, "what a character you have given other measures!"

Thursday.—Petitions are usually thrust into a capacious bag which hangs on a nail at the back of the Speaker's canopy. It is a tradition that, if you approve of the petition, you put it in neatly folded; if you disagree with it—although it is your duty to present it—you twist it up into a ball. You have the right to present it formally by giving notice, and are then called upon by the Speaker. You rise in your place and briefly describe the petition, saying what it is about, the number of signatures, and as many other details as the Speaker will allow. Every day, for weeks past, the Opposition have been formally presenting petitions against the Welsh Church Spoliation Bill in this way, and it annoys the Government very much indeed. It takes up quite ten minutes of valuable time, and the papers report the apparently inexhaustible stream. Upstairs, in the petition department, people are put on to scrutinise the petitions and see if they are bogus ones; but nothing has come of this industry as yet.

We then went on to the financial clauses again. Worthington Evans wanted a definite sum to be settled—"Come, would Ireland pay one-thirtieth of the Imperial expenses?"—and moved an amendment to that effect. William Moore was terribly rude. "I would rather no money came from England to Ireland. It will all go to a new Tammany Hall in Dublin." Stephen Gwynne, the Nationalist, made a good speech, and spoke sincerely. He hoped the time would come when Ireland would be able to afford to pay its share and throw in a Dreadnought or two; but Banbury was incredulous. The amendment was defeated, modest as it was. Then we tried to get at it in another way. Hewins moved that at least the House of Commons should retain some control over the amount spent. "Oh, that's all right!" said Samuel; "the Joint Exchequer Board will see to that." Bonar Law pinned him down. What were "Irish Services"? "There is a clause in the Bill which provides for an authority to adjudicate on the actions of the Board," said Samuel.

"Indeed! Where is it?" said Balfour. And then the Government Bench had an animated game of Hunt the Slipper. Secretaries leaned over, draughtsmen under the Gallery signalled, Rufus ran through the copy of the Bill, everybody searched, but all to no purpose. The Government had to confess, as Betsy Prig opined, "there was no sich clause." The Opposition roared at the obvious discomfiture of what Mr. Balfour called this "galaxy of learning." "Why, they don't know their own silly Bill!" But, after all, what did it matter? The battalions came in, and the closure came down. Croydon water occupied the rest of the evening.

On Friday many Radicals were away at their annual conference, which takes place this year at Nottingham; so the bill of fare was carefully designed to prevent "misadventures," as defeats are beginning to be called. Nobody believes for one moment that any personal blame or scandal attaches to Stuart Samuel for his firm's dealings in Indian silver. He is a man of the highest character; but the fact remains that, while he was a member of the House, his firm did make some profit out of a Government contract. The Gibbs did the same in our time. No one doubted their integrity, but they retired at once; and the Jewish Chronicle, which is quite a non-party organ, earnestly advised Stuart to do the same. For some reason he did not take this course. Some people boldly say the Government won't let him. There are by-elections pending, and, if there is another in Whitechapel and it be lost, it would be another nail in the Government coffin. So they have appointed a Committee, and this afternoon we discussed it. The Government declare Samuel has not admitted his disqualification, and, even if he had, the rule does not apply to Indian contracts. Balcarres very rarely speaks. As Chief Whip he is not expected to, and he did not when he was a junior. I think he hates speaking, but, when he does, he impresses one uncommonly. He said the Government had put themselves in a majority on the Committee, and its decision must be on party lines. The country would have far more confidence in the decision of a Judge of the High Court. He taunted the Government with the inability to get a definite opinion from Rufus Isaacs. That was one of the drawbacks of making the Attorney-General a member of the Cabinet. He had lost his independence. He was no longer the legal father of the Cabinet. He was the junior and subordinate partner of the firm. It reminded one of the time when Labby called Grant Lawson the triangle.

Lloyd George quoted the Jameson Raid Commission as being set up by a Government, and said that a possible appeal to the House of Lords would mean immense delay. Bob Cecil thought the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council would be a better tribunal; but finally, after many speeches, the motion was agreed to without a division. If the Government choose to take that course—well, the responsibility was with them, and the country will judge.

The patient and persistent "pounding" is beginning to have its effect. The Government originally proposed to allow the Irish to do as they liked with the Customs duties, to keep them as they are, to reduce them or to raise them, but some Free Trade Liberals have become seriously alarmed at the opportunities for Protection that this will inevitably open up. The Opposition have shown this all too clearly. Hearing of this, the Government put down an amendment to prevent Ireland lowering the duties, although she could still raise them.

The Unionists, however, were first in the field: Hayes Fisher on Monday had the first amendment on the paper, which cut the ground from under their feet. It was far wider than the Government liked, for it allowed a wide discussion which lasted all the evening. The effect of it was to prohibit the Irish from adding, reducing, or even discontinuing any Imperial tax affecting Ireland—in fact, taking away their fiscal autonomy.

John Redmond found it was time to interfere. It was alleged there were 72—or "more," as one Liberal put it—in a state of open revolt. Something had to be done; he did not believe the recalcitrants would go so far as to wreck the Bill if the Government had stood firm, but on the whole he approved of their yielding. Driven to it, he declared that there was no chance of reduction of taxation in Ireland for a generation at least. The Nationalists would not think of such a thing until the deficit had been wiped off.

Carson was very rude. "Anything to get the Bill through!" he cried. "You rely on the 42 left in the English Parliament to get more when you want it!" Samuel was mildly surprised. "Why do you object? We are willing to do the very thing you want us to do." "Rubbish!" said Carson. "You are doing it because you are obliged to."

James Craig did not much care what happened; all he wanted to make clear for the hundredth time was that loyalist Ulster did not intend to pay a single penny to any taxation imposed by an Irish Parliament under any conditions whatever. The latter would have to finance itself from the three other provinces, and "God help them!" he added, amid cheers and laughter. Hayes Fisher's amendment was ruled out by 117, but the Opposition have made a serious inroad into the Bill. They have broken through the dyke, and the next few days may see it widen.

Mr. Tom Taylor, of Bolton, declared that he could not speak, but that he could vote. Well, he had plenty of experience on Tuesday. The degradation of Parliament was even more complete. From 7.30 to 9.45 we kept marching round and round like squirrels in a cage, and at 10.30 the guillotine fell again, and we tramped on until 12.40. In the hour between most members went to dinner, leaving a few to discuss five whole clauses as best they might. "Oh, that will come up on clause 17, 18, or 19!" as the case might be, said the Chairman of Committee in the earlier stages. What was the use of that when Clauses 17 to 21, by the action of the Government, were confined to an hour. Samuel said there was not the slightest danger of Protection in Ireland at 7.29 p.m. The remaining minute gave Bonar Law time to quote a single sentence from a speech by young Redmond, in which he declared Ireland did not want protection against France or Germany, but against England. At 10.15 the news of Blair's win at Bow came through.

Norman Craig, with his hat on, asked whether it was not possible to improve the instrument known as the guillotine, so as to closure with one blow the series of amendments, in order that members who were prohibited from the opportunity of speech might be relieved of the necessity of prolonged pedestrian exercise, and so that the solemn farce of divisions without discussion would not be overdone; but the Chairman took no notice, and the dreary farce went on. This (Wednesday) morning I see that even the Radical Chronicle protests against proceedings so unjust.

Notes and News

This week Messrs. Chatto and Windus will publish Volumes XXI—XXV of the Swanston edition of Stevenson's works. These volumes complete the edition, which is already at a premium.

The Countess of Strafford is publishing through Mr. Elliot Stock a revised and enlarged edition of her "Selection of Texts from the Tauchnitz Edition of the New Testament." with parallel readings from the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Alexandrian Codices.

Mr. John Lane has just published "The Love Dream." The author of this novel is a Portuguese viscount—not unknown in the world of diplomacy—who prefers to conceal his identity under the pseudonym of "George Vane." The book was written in the English language, and most of the scenes are laid in a country house in England.

One of this week's Christmas booklets, "Religion and Fairyland," by E. M. Jewson (the Happy Publishing Co., 133, Salisbury Square, E.C., 1s. net), is the second in the series of books written, printed, and published by women, in which this firm specialises. The text is a fanciful issue in which Jack and the Beanstalk and Peter Pan are found in juxtaposition to the saints of all ages.

On Monday afternoon, December 2, the English Folk Dance Society will give a demonstration at the Savoy Theatre, which has been secured for the purpose through the courtesy of the proprietors and Mr. Granville Barker. The programme will include Morris, Sword, and Country Dances, and Folk Songs, all of which will be performed by members of the Society.

Messrs. Black are about to issue a popular edition de luxe of "Bacon's Essays," edited by Sydney Humphries. The text used is that of 1673 collated with the last issued by Bacon in 1625, known as the Fourth. It will contain a photogravure frontispiece of a contemporary portrait of Bacon; the title-page, initial letters, and the cover have been specially designed by Mr. A. A. Turbayne.

Mr. C. T. Courtney Lewis has recently completed the Baxter Print Handbook, 1912-13, invaluable for collectors. The price is 6s. net, but subscribers to the earlier works by Mr. Lewis ("George Baxter, his Life and Work" and "The Picture Printer of the Nineteenth Century") may buy it for 3s. 6d. net. It is published by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Ltd. The great feature of the book is the record of the variations in the prices paid for prints and of their present market values.

The principal articles in the Round Table for December will deal with Arbitration and War, the Balkan Crisis, Old and New Ways in India, and Australian Banking. Under the headings on the various countries the following questions, among others, will be discussed: United Kingdom—Different Aspects of the Home Rule Bill; Canada—the Naval Proposals, Railway Rates, and French in the Schools; Australia—Strikes and Legislation, Political Parties and Current Politics, and Universal Military Training.

"The Oxford Book of Victorian Verse," chosen and edited by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, will be published at the end of this month by the Oxford University Press. Poems which adorned "The Oxford Book of English Verse (1250-1900)" have not been excluded from the new anthology; otherwise the editor, as he says, would have condemned himself to the second-rate and to clearing the ground for an "Oxford Book of the Worst Poetry." The forthcoming collection will be uniform with the other volumes of the Oxford series.

"Stage Copyright: At Home and Abroad," by Bernard Weller, author of "How to Protect a Play," and a considerable body of writings on copyright and copyright reform, will be published within the next few days from The Stage Offices. This work differs from the ordinary handbook intended chiefly for the use of lawyers. The aim has been to combine a full analysis of the new Law of Copyright with an exposition based on a knowledge of the working conditions of the stage, and so to furnish authors, managers, artists, and all others affected with a comprehensive and practical guide.

The Library Assistants' Association held its second meeting of the present session at the rooms of the Library Association, Bloomsbury Square, on November 13, when papers by Mr. W. G. Fry, of Bournemouth, Mr. A. C. Piper, of Brighton, and Mr. N. Treliving, of Leeds, were read before a fair muster of members and friends. Messrs. Fry and Piper dealt in an exhaustive manner with the methods at present in vogue by means of which our public libraries are made accessible for borrowing purposes. Mr. Treliving's paper consisted of a survey of the question of the library and the cheap series of new books and reprints which flood the market. An interesting discussion followed.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION.

DURING the past few days several important developments have occurred of a nature calculated to intensify the strain already existing in regard to the international situation. In the last issue of THE ACADEMY we remarked that public opinion in this country would be prepared to endorse the Servian claim for a commercial outlet on the Adriatic, but that it would not support the larger aims of the Belgrade Government. We added that "no question that has ever engaged the Chancellories of Europe has been more capable of common-sense adjustment than is the case with this Servian dispute." Since then M. Pashitch, the Servian Prime Minister, has spoken, and it must be confessed that his language is not that of compromise. He declares that it is essential for the development of Servia's economic independence that she should possess a coast line on the Adriatic of about thirty miles, extending from Alessio to Durazzo.

This coast-line would be joined to what was formerly Old Servia—the conquered Turkish villayet of Kosovo—by the territory bounded by a line from Allesio to Djakova in the north, and by a line from Durazzo to Ochrida Lake in the south. M. Pashitch is no novice in the ways of diplomacy. With characteristic shrewdness he is doubtless asking for much in order that he may get anything at all. There is every reason to believe that Servia would be satisfied with what has been picturesquely termed a little window on the Adriatic. But up to the present Austro-Hungary opposes an uncompromising veto. The situation has become suddenly serious, because of the general belief that a settlement of the issue one way or the other cannot long be delayed, and because of the military measures which both Russia and Austria are taking, with a view to affording to the imminent discussions of diplomacy the tangible support of armies in array.

A semi official communiqué published in Berlin makes it clear that Germany has accepted the stand adopted by Mr. Asquith in his Guildhall speech: that the Albanian question is only to be settled in connection with other issues arising out of the war in the Near East. That declaration, so far as it goes, is re-assuring. But the mode of procedure to be followed in order to bring about an international discussion remains to be decided, Dr. Dillon, telegraphing from Vienna on Wednesday, observed that:— > the Powers will wait until peace is concluded between the Balkan belligerents, and will then proceed to revise the treaty and amend its provisions, in so far as they may seem calculated to damage their interests. This procedure can be worked to the speediest issue if it is confined to the Powers directly concerned. When these preliminary labours are over there is no reason why the resulting arrangements should not be sanctioned by an international tribunal, which, although it will then be little more than a European registry office, may assume the name of a conference. Proposals affecting financial interests, railways, and other technical matters would, of course, be discussed by an assembly of competent authorities, to which the name of conference may also be given.

It seems, then, inevitable that before long Austria and Russia will confront each other over the Servian question.

An examination of their separate points of view only confirms the belief that the difficulty is one which is capable of common-sense solution. In a section of the English Press there is a regrettable tendency to take sides against our own partner in the Triple Entente—Russia. In one influential journal we notice a somewhat hysterical appeal to the St. Petersburg Government to issue a categorical and formal declaration that under no circumstances will Russia go to war to secure an Adriatic port for Servia. The Russian Government will do nothing of the kind, and for the plain reason that such a declaration would be contrary to its intention. The interests of fair-play, no less than of peace, would be better served were an appeal addressed to Austria to make it known that, while opposing the larger ambitions of Servia, she would be prepared to compromise upon the Adriatic question; in short, to express her willingness to concede the "little window."

Then it is pointed out in Austria's favour that she has raised no objection to the conquest of the Sanjak of Novibazar, and that she has abandoned her dream of expansion towards Salonika. Both these concessions, while serving a useful end in the play of diplomacy, only tend to obscure the main issue. To permit Servia the acquisition of the Sanjak of Novibazar, and at the same time deny her reasonable access to the Adriatic, savours very much of hypocrisy; on the other hand, to relinquish visionary pretensions in the direction of Salonika—pretensions which no single Power upheld—in the hope that such an exhibition of magnanimity would establish a claim to something real, suggests almost childlike faith in the world's gullibility. That Austria has a legitimate right to insist upon respect for her interests in the Adriatic cannot be denied. It will be found when the proper time comes that both Russia and Servia accept this view. But before there can be any immediate prospect of a settlement the Vienna Government must recognise that the interests of Austria can be adequately safeguarded without resort to measures tending to throttle the economic independence of her neighbour. There is no longer any doubt that the feeling in Russia on the question is intense; and the belief that the Government has not adopted sufficiently vigorous measures readily finds popular acceptance.

Naturally M. Sazonoff, whose attitude throughout the crisis has been punctiliously correct, has no intention of surrendering to Austria; and the emphasis which the semi-official communiqué places upon the peaceful intentions of the Government doubtless aims at calming public opinion and at the same time affording Austria necéssary assurances that diplomacy is not being driven before the storm of popular clamour. As the liberator and protector of the Serbs, Russia will not be unmindful of her duty. Whatever solution of the problem may eventually be decided upon, she will certainly not again submit to the humiliation that she experienced in 1909 over Bosnia-Herzegovina. It is in her strength and determination that we find the most potent factor making for peace. That, in spite of all hints to the contrary, she will have the loyal support of her friends, Great Britain and France, is a foregone conclusion. The real issue is not, as some newspapers would have us believe, the question of a few Servian wharves on the Adriatic.

The balance of power in Europe, with its direct bearing upon the safety of the British Empire, is at stake. Were the partners of the Triple Entente, in face of the solidarity of the Triple Alliance, to have regard merely for their own immediate and individual interests, then the compact would be rendered valueless, and no other alternative could face Great Britain save return to splendid and perilous isolation. We refused, together with Russia, to allow France to be coerced over Morocco; if we fail to uphold this precedent now that Russia requires our support, the day will not be far distant when the Triple Alliance—a combination we are clearly not prepared to meet alone—will attempt to intimidate us with the sight of shining armour.

MOTORING

THERE is no doubt that we are on the eve of a very big boom in a type of car which is comparatively new to the motoring community, namely, the so-called "cycle-car." A better name might possibly be found for it, as both in appearance and construction it has more points in common with the ordinary car than with the cycle, either pedal-pushed or self-propelled. It is, in fact, a motor car in miniature, and some such word as "motorette" would describe it more accurately. However that may be, the new vehicle has an immense future before it, and the extraordinary amount of attention it is now arousing is unparalleled in the case of any other new departure since the self-propelled vehicle made its first appearance.

The two great points of advantage possessed by the cycle-car over the ordinary light motor car are: lower initial cost and smaller running expenses. The prices of the forty or so different makes now on show at Olympia range from 70 guineas to 130 guineas, as against, say, 150 to 250 guineas for the two-seater motor car of reputable make. In the matter of upkeep the cycle-car scores immensely over its rival, for while it will easily do from 40 to 60 miles to the gallon of petrol, the owner of the ordinary car, however small, which will average 30 m.p.g., must count himself a lucky man. In view of the present high price of petrol, it is easy to see why the man in the street finds the economical cycle-car so attractive a proposition. But even economy in fuel consumption is a secondary consideration compared with economy in tyres, in which respect the cycle-car shows to still greater advantage. Owing to the lightness of its construction, the expenses in this direction, both in initial cost and in upkeep, is relatively very small. Again, as regards speed, the cycle-car has the advantage over the car of ordinary type; for practically every one of the makes now on the market can be guaranteed to do 40 miles an hour on the road with ease, which should be fast enough for anybody. There remains for consideration the questions of ease of manipulation, reliability, comfort, and durability. With regard to the first-mentioned point, it may be said at once that the cycle-car is much easier to drive than the ordinary car, and for this reason it is very popular with those of a non-mechanical turn of mind, and with ladies especially. Its reliability and durability have still to be proved, but it may be mentioned that one of the best-known of them recently ran for seven consecutive hours at an average speed of 37 miles per hour without developing any weaknesses. The one drawback attaching to the present types of cycle-cars as compared with the ordinary car is their limited passenger accommodation. There are one or two capable of holding two besides the driver, but the great majority are either one- or two-seaters. When the cycle-car carrying three or four in comfort makes its appearance, its already great possibilities will be still further extended.

Mr. Thomas Farrow, the well-known "people's banker," has invented and patented a device called the "Faro-meter," which seems calculated to do much towards diminishing the dangers of the streets. It consists of a mechanical apparatus which automatically registers the speed at which a motor vehicle is travelling, on the same principle presumably as the speedometer, and also displays the mileage per hour in prominent figures on the front of the vehicle. When the speed limit is being exceeded a loud gong sounds continuously, and danger signals are displayed. Thus both the driver and everybody else are aware at all times of the exact speed at which they are travelling, which is obviously a great desideratum. The driver of a motor bus, in particular, should welcome the "Faro-meter." At present he has no means of knowing how fast he is going—the ordinary speedometer being too delicate an instrument to withstand the vibration of a heavy motor vehicle, and he is frequently fined for quite unintentional infringements of the legal limit. We are not sure that the new device will appeal so favourably to the private motorist, who is not always anxious that his speed should be patent to everybody, but if, as is stated, the "Faro-meter" has been tested and passed by Scotland Yard, and if it is equally adaptable for use on every type of motor vehicle, it would hardly be surprising to hear that the authorities had determined to insist upon its universal adoption.

entertained Mr. S. F. Edge to dinner at the R.A.C., and presented him with a handsome silver salver in commemoration of his retirement from the industry in which he has played so prominent a part. There was naturally some curiosity displayed as to the future intentions of the famous motorist, but it was not gratified, Mr. Edge's reply being simply that up to the present he had formed no definite plans of any kind. The general impression seems to be that he has political ambitions, but what the authority for this is we do not know. In any case it is safe to assume that a man of his remarkable force and individuality will not long remain quiescent.

THE battle between the "bulls" and the "bears" still continues—or, perhaps I should say, between the rumours—for candidly I do not think that there are many speculators left in Europe. We enjoy a perpetual see-saw—armies are mobilised, fleets are moved, Ministers' denials increase in acerbity, but of business there is none. Neither will there be any until peace is declared. No one is going to risk his money as long as war is in sight. The great bankers all over Europe hold the securities. They are one and all working for peace. Their influence is enormous. But they were unable to control the Balkan States. Will they be equally powerless to control Russia? The Grand Dukes are supposed to be big "bulls" of stocks, and all my information leads me to believe that Russia does not want war—will not move a finger to help the Balkan States to go beyond what Europe as a whole has agreed shall be their reward. Clearly Austria has all to lose and little to gain by a war. Therefore on the whole the odds are in favour of peace. The real danger lies in the so persistently public declarations of Bercholdt and Sazonoff that they insist upon peace. Diplomatists seldom speak the truth. Yet in London many promoters are testing the temper of the public. The most curious new issue is the Sperling Utilities Improvement offer of six per cent. Preference. Actually these same shares were being sold in New York and purchasers were given a handsome bonus in common stock. The Yankee propectus frankly admitted that the businesses were too speculative for the Cities Services or any of the other Doherty companies to take up, and that therefore they had been put into a sort of prospecting company—which might, if it found the franchises valuable, resell to Cities Services. But the London prospectus simply offers the shares at 86, and says not a word as to the highly speculative nature of the share. Apparently many shares were placed prior to the issue here, and common stock sold, not given away. This is bluff of a very brave character—the good point about the issue is that Doherty and Co. are very successful, and that they have continually made good many very doubtful enterprises.

Horatio Bottomley intends trying to place some shares in the South African Oil venture. But naturally they are only a pure gamble. Bottomley is not fortunate in his Joint Stock ventures, however amusing he may be as a journalist. The Genoa Waterworks Debentures could please no careful person. Not only was the issue price too high, but the profit to be made on the promotion was excessive—£76,000 is too much to take out of such a small concern in which profits are only estimated. The two Canadian issues did not go. The City of New Westminster is borrowing too freely, and the Province of Alberta Four Per Cent. Bond was not cheap enough.

The full details of the Speyer deal are now published, and appear excellent. Everybody should be pleased. The Central London shareholders get four per cent. certain; City and South London are saved from disaster, and may receive an increased dividend when the line is enlarged; Metropolitan Electric Tramways escapes a severe fight with the L.G.O., and takes the management of the London United—a tramway system that has gone from bad to worse. It can now run its fleet of 300 Daimler 'buses to feed the whole service. It can also get traffic from the L.G.O. which will no longer compete. Underground Electric exchange a huge block of valueless and non-dividend paying stock for £560,000 shares in the new company, upon which it should get a 2 per cent. dividend. This will put Underground Ordinary in sight of a dividend. It makes the Six Per Cent. Income Bonds an excellent lock-up.

MONEY must remain dear. The settlement in Berlin, the demand for money in the United States, in Egypt and in the Near East, will keep rates very high. Even if peace is arranged I see no chance of cheap money, as the development of Bulgaria, Servia, Greece and Montenegro will call for huge sums of money. These countries are fertile, and given good government will need capital. Indeed, Servian promoters are hard at work already both in London and Paris, placing their schemes before those with money to invest.

FOREIGNERS.—The Banks support their special stocks. The Government also buy heavily whenever the public is scared. Therefore there is little chance of any fall as long as there is no chance of the war spreading. Those who are sure that we shall get peace might gamble in Hungarian Rentes—the yield is high. But such a purchase is only a gamble on the chance.

HOME RAILS look cheaper every week. We have now had 21 weeks of splendid traffics. The companies have never done so well. They are promised an immediate increase in rates. They have already put up their passenger fares. I believe that most of the companies will pay an increased dividend on the present half-year. Great Western, one of our most progressive lines, should acquire the Metropolitan, and thus be enabled to run its Maidenhead trains right through to the City. It should buy the Mersey Railway, and thus get into Liverpool. Both these self-evident propositions should have been accomplished years ago. We see by the management of the District how energy and quick services pay. The Great Western has the chance of its hitherto sleepy lifetime. Unless it is clever and quick the Great Central, or, perchance, the Midland, will step in and bag the Met., and the L. and Y.R. the Mersey Railway.

YANKEES are being bought quietly by the clever bankers. They see that the United States is progressing, that it has a big year in front of it, and that all the railways will do well. So they buy Unions. This railway could pay off its common stock at present prices if it chose to sell its land interests. It will easily pay its 10 per cent. for many years to come, and at to-day's prices the yield is magnificent. Readings are talked of as very cheap, and Southern Common seem the best lock-up.

RUBBER may not fall any lower, but the public think it will and they do not buy the shares. Frankly, most rubber shares are quite high enough. Bukit Kajang report is good, but the market has discounted the increased yield for the present year, and anyone who buys to-day is only buying a chance. This is not good enough. We must see another ten or fifteen per cent. fall in market quotations before I can say "buy."

OIL.—Mexican Eagle show a large increase in profits, which comes not because the company has sold more oil, but because it has got more oil in stock. It is now waiting more ships, more pipe lines, and perhaps the contract with the new German Imperial Oil Company. The Oil Trust of Galicia has turned out Hicks. Maisel will now reopen his famous Opeg well. The shares have been pooled and are to be put up. The company will work under an agreement with the Premier Oil and Pipe. Ural Caspian have settled their dispute with the Government and now hold 1,100,000 acres. Everyone asks how long the price of oil will hold. It is clearly rigged.

MINES.—Lord Harris has declared for "selective" mining, a euphemism for picking the eyes out of a property. I agree. We don't go into mining except to get rich quickly. Why should these mines go on year after year paying huge salaries to engineers and directors, erecting huge mills, and wasting the shareholders' money when they could all be gutted in two or three years and big sums of money saved? The old-fashioned system is preposterous. I am glad to see that Lord Harris has at last turned round. But the new system will mean a re-arrangement of values. We shall not pay as much for our shares. For example, the Mount Elliott is picking out the eyes and the report now out shows only fifteen months' life. Therefore the shares are stupidly overvalued to-day.

MISCELLANEOUS.—They say that the National Telephone shareholders will soon be put out of their misery. The Government has come to terms, and I am told that a compromise has been agreed upon. I have before said that £190 was the price at which the Deferred would work out, and I expect that we shall soon see this confirmed.

CORRESPONDENCE

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—We are not warranted in forming any other conclusion than that William Shakespeare, of Stratford, and of the Globe Theatre, Southwark, was the veritable author of the plays published in folio, 1623, with his name on the title-page. Mr. W. T. Smedley disputes this on the assumption that the author must have been a classical scholar, hence his proposition that Bacon may have been the author. Mr. Smedley next asserts that the author was a master of the Latin, Greek, Spanish, Italian, and French languages. He further asserts that the late Professor Churton Collins proves beyond doubt Shakespeare's intimate knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages. It is true that the professor gives in his "Studies in Shakespeare" several "parallels in reflection, sentiment, and expression" from the ancient poets and from Shakespeare; but note what he says on page 63: "I do not cite them as positive proof of imitation or of reminiscence on the part of Shakespeare. They may be mere coincidences." And again, on page 69: "There is, of course, not one of these parallels which, if taken separately, might not be mere coincidence." In this very book, "Studies in Shakespeare," Professor Churton Collins has a word to say on the "Bacon-Shakespeare Mania": "It is not so much by its absurdity as by the absence of everything which could give any colour to that absurdity that the Bacon-Shakespeare myth holds a unique place among literary follies. Its supporters have no pretensions to be considered even as sophists. Their systematic substitution of inferences for facts and of hypotheses for proofs, their perverted analogies, their blunders and their misrepresentations, their impudent fictions, and their prodigious ignorance of the very rudiments of the literature with which they are concerned could not for one moment impose on anyone who, with competent knowledge and a candid and open mind, had taken the trouble to investigate the subject."—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

THE RIGHT TO WORK.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Since our letter to you of September 24, considerable progress has been made with the organisation of the workmen who desire to maintain their personal liberty in the matter of their employment. The National Society of Free Workers, we then foreshadowed, has now been formed, and already branches are established in many towns; indeed, the work has gone on at a pace which now calls for an office and a secretarial staff.

The object of the movement is to establish a self-supporting society which will give complete protection against the tyranny of the new Socialistic Trade Unionism. It is obvious that the work of organising such a society must be undertaken by a special body, such as the Committee for Promoting the Formation of Societies of Free Workers, on whose behalf we write.

The work to be done will involve a large expenditure, and if it is to be done effectually it should be done quickly, so that before the close of 1913 there shall be in existence a National Society, not only self-supporting, but powerful enough to prevent any repetition of the tyranny which accompanied recent strikes.

At least £1,000 is required for renting offices and engaging a secretarial staff, etc. We therefore venture to appeal to your readers to help in raising this fund. Cheques made payable to the Free Workers' Committee, crossed "Barclay and Co., Ltd.," may be sent to the Chairman, Mr. Mark H. Judge, 7, Pall Mall, S.W.

There has been a most unexpected rebuff in the refusal of the Treasury to allow the Society to be registered under the Friendly Societies Act of 1896. It is very difficult to understand this action on the part of the Treasury, and a public meeting was held at the Whitehall Rooms on the 22nd instant, to consider what steps should be taken to secure for the Society that legal status to which it is obviously entitled, its friendly and benevolent objects being as follows:—

(1) To maintain the principles of personal liberty and personal responsibility by providing members with legal assistance in cases of injury by accident, if molested when in the exercise of their right to work, and in cases of trouble or difficulty in connection with their employment.

(2) To establish a benevolent fund.

(3) To establish an orphan fund.

We are, yours faithfully.

THE DOMESTIC SERVANTS' INSURANCE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—This morning, two well-dressed men called, requesting my maid to produce her Insurance Card, professing the reason to be that some cards had been filled in in pencil. This she did, believing the men to be from the National Health Insurance. Finding her card was from Lady St. Helier's Society (The Domestic Servants' Insurance Society) they then tried to make her sign some paper and pay 3d. They said they were from the Prudential Assurance Company.

The same thing happened only a fortnight since with my other maid, who shut the door in their faces (company not stated).

Is it legal for private people to be annoyed in this way, and for foolish young servants to be persuaded to sign and pay what they do not understand?

I enclose my card, and if you will publish this, it may save other girls from being taken in by men of this class.
Yours truly, "INDIGNANT."

CONFLICTS OF USAGE IN THE PRONOUN.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Under the above title, Mr. Thomas R. Lounsbury, Emeritus Professor of English in the Yale University, published in the November issue of "Harper's Monthly Magazine" a very interesting article. I may say that I agree with him on most of the points that are treated in this article. As this gentleman refers also to Milton's two verses:—

"Which when Beelzebub perceived, 'than whom' Satan except, none higher sat," etc.—

in which he takes exception to the relative "whom" as being incorrect, I beg to repeat what I said in THE ACADEMY of May 25, 1912:—

> "In the sentence quoted from Milton, I think that 'than' is but a conjunction. Let us now restore the ellipses: Beelzebub—none, except Satan, sat higher 'than' (he, that Beelzebub of), 'whom' (I speak).
> With the help of parsing, we have:—
> (a) 'than'—a conjunction,
> (b) 'whom'—a relative pronoun, 3rd ps., m.g., obj. case, governed by the preposition 'of' understood."

Since writing the above, I have come across the following sentence, in Mr. Collins's "Man and Wife" (p. 93, chapter ix: THE INN, 2nd page): "A more thoroughly independent person that this Miss Inchbare (of whom I speak) was not to be found on the face of the hotel-keeping earth."

I now beg to put this question to English linguists in general, and to Mr. Lounsbury in particular: Is not such a sentence but the development of: Miss Inchbare, "than whom" a more thoroughly independent person was not to be found on the face of the hotel-keeping earth?
I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

ADOLPHE BERNON.

"TACITÆ" AND "SILENTIA" IN AENEID II, 255.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Why should Mr. Hodgson, whom I thank for his courteous rejoinder, suppose that the ships were "anchored off Tenedos" at the moment when the flame split the darkness of that moonless night? "And already the Argive fleet," says Vergil, "was on its way (ibat) from Tenedos, when the royal vessel suddenly shot forth the signal flame." As to the other point, I have myself seen in the less clear atmosphere of England a beacon ablaze at eight miles distance; and since Vergil uses "flamma" in the plural, we are at liberty to think that several torches were employed. It appears to me quite in accordance with the text and with experience to conclude that the blaze was kindled for Sinon's information.
I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

THE WIRRAL DIVISION OF CHESHIRE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—It has just been stated in several newspapers that Sir William Hesketh Lever, who has recently purchased Stafford House, St. James's, "was the former Member for Birkenhead." But that is an entire mistake. On three different occasions (in 1892, 1894, and 1895) Sir W. H. Lever contested Birkenhead in the Liberal interest, but was each time defeated. He represented the Wirral Division of Cheshire from January, 1905, until January, 1910.
Yours very obediently,

Notes of the Week

WE should like to pay a tribute to the very intelligent articles which Mr. Harold Spender is contributing to the Daily News and Leader on the Eastern question. But we must take exception to one paragraph, which appeared in the issue of November 26, or if we do not take exception to it we must point out that anyone but a partisan would have perceived that the argument is capable of a ricochet action. The passage to which we refer is as follows:—

> But if Austria-Hungary, taking advantage of Servian preoccupation with the Turkish war, were to pour her troops across the Servian frontier, the situation would enter on a much more serious phase. For such an action at such a moment would be an outrage to the conscience and humanity of the whole civilised world.

We think, without adopting the attitude of a partisan, that it is permissible to suggest that the Balkan League in launching their forces against the Ottoman Empire at the moment when it was engaged in combating the burglarious attack of Italy was in effect "an outrage to the conscience and humanity of the whole civilised world," assuming that the civilised world is in the habit of inconveniencing itself with the uncomfortable appanage of a conscience.

Having welcomed the motor-'bus as an aid to locomotion, and possibly to digestion if employed discreetly after lunch, the public is beginning to find it rather a nuisance. It splashes the pedestrian with greasy mud until he longs for the dear old days of the hansom, when a splash was but a spot, and not a jet from thick tyres pressed by a weight of tons. It collides occasionally, as must all things whose movements are limited by lines of houses, and anything less in size than a tram is smashed badly; even thick iron electric-light standards seem as matches when the motor-'bus attempts to push by them. With some satisfaction we notice that a course of lectures for the driver has been arranged by the premier company concerned; he is to be thoroughly instructed in the best methods of avoiding the artistic person who strolls into the middle of the street to admire the architectural scenery, and he will be shown, by means of moving pictures, how to escape a collision that seems imminent. If only they would show him how to steer round puddles in rainy weather, our gratitude would be increased.

"There ought not to be one firm," writes a discontented lady to a contemporary, "who dare refuse to accept and print a good book"; and she assures her readers that she is acquainted with a novelist who has written a book "which far surpasses H. G. Wells' 'Marriage,'" but, alas! no publisher will take it. Mr. Wells himself would be the first to admit that many yet unpublished novels might "far surpass" his own; but the question is, who is to be the judge of what constitutes a "good book"? It all depends on the point of view; each publisher has his own ideas on the subject, and, since we live in a commercial age, it must be acknowledged that good books are often a weary time before they begin to pay expenses. Mr. Herbert Jenkins, who is one of the select band of publishers who are also literary men, has taken up this lady's challenge in a most friendly way in the current T.P.'s Weekly, and offers, under certain very fair conditions, to submit the immortal but unborn work to three well-known readers. We shall be interested to see what happens, especially as one of the conditions is that every word said or written on the matter is liable to appear in print. The disappointed author is always a bitter cynic, and is generally convinced that the business of publishing is merely a polite kind of burglary—robbery without violence.

A gentleman has been writing to a contemporary controverting a statement to the effect that "our poets are few and their output of work is small." He points out that sixty-five "books of poetry" were received by a certain review within three months—we believe that THE ACADEMY can beat that record easily, by the way—and draws the inference that "modern English poets place at least 264 books, many of them containing good poetry, in the hands of the public every year." His error is obvious to anyone whose duty or pleasure it is to read critically these volumes; a few of them contain good poetry, many of them contain very moderate verse, most of them are negligible from a critical standpoint, and a few of them contain doggerel that is simply pathetic, written by people who never had, and never will have, the remotest idea of what poetry is or means. The winnowing process is easy, and the golden grain that is left is very scanty.

"And you must love him ere to you
He will seem worthy of your love."

UNNOTICED you will ever be
In that unseemly place,
Where noise is deemed melody
And pride a sign of grace.
You will not ever shine amid
The great unfeeling herd,
For them the evening star is hid:
The shy song of a bird.

They wonder at your emptiness,
The busy, clamorous fools,
And seek to quench their thirstiness
At sun-dried stagnant pools;
They search the arid desert sand
And watch the sky above
For this that lies so near at hand:
The deep well of your love.

Ah, Sweet, I cannot teach them how
To find the way to you;
The cloud to touch the hill must bow,
The earth must love the dew;
The red, red rose its fragrance gives
Only to senses keen:
They only know where beauty lives
Who love, and thus have seen.

Is Christendom Satiated?

"But if it be a sin to covet honour
I am the most offending soul alive."

WE take some credit for the sane line which we adopted when Italy commenced her felonious raid upon Ottoman territory. No one, not even Mr. Garvin, gave us the slightest support at that time. Six columns from this accomplished writer, if he could have compressed his views into such a small compass, would have been quite useful at the beginning of the trouble.

The Italian brigandage, of course, whetted the appetite of the insignificant powers in the Balkans. They formed a league to rob the Turkish Empire of territory to which at least the Turks had a perfectly valid possessory title. Very much to the surprise of every person of intelligence these small nations have actually fought, and we give them all credit for the bravery which they have displayed. Mr. Bernard Shaw must certainly revise the views which, with his usual omniscience, he put forward in his play, "Arms and the Man," and the sanctioned parody of it, "The Chocolate Soldier."

A league of thieves is entitled to respect so long as the thieves do not fall out and give themselves away, but that is just the situation which we have now to deal with.

'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more!
So coldly sweet, so deadly fair
We start, for soul is wanting there.

The Greek nation, very much to its own surprise, has found out that it can fight against Turkish territorials. The revelation is positively amazing to Europe in general. We, who are saturated with the traditions of ancient Greece, are only too glad to observe that the modern Greek, clothed in a kind of travesty of a kilt, can emulate the deeds of those who are wrongly described as his ancestors, and who are content to wear a helmet and very little besides.

What was the excuse for the present aggression upon the Ottoman Empire? It was that the Turk was unfit to remain in Europe. He was not a fit associate for the murderers of Servia, the usurers of Greece, or the harmless, unnecessary Bulgarian. And what is the sordid spectacle which is now presented to our view? These people who initiated a new crusade are quarrelling over the spoils which they believe are within their grasp —possibly wrongly believe are within their grasp.

The great powers for whom one should express nothing less than contempt, if not loathing, are now coming forward in their immemorial character of carrion birds. Their Christian clients have actually won, at the expense of much blood and treasure, something valuable. The great powers, true to their nature, must be in at the death. They hoped to save their faces by robbing the Turk, an act which is generally agreed to be a perfectly legitimate operation, but now that the puny league have despoiled the Turk of his property, the great powers must have a conference to decide how they shall deprive the league of the fruits of their victory.

As far as appearances can be trusted, a great European conflict will be necessary to decide this question. Herr von Bethman-Holweg has delivered a decidedly provocative speech in the face of Russia. If our information is at all correct, Russia is not going to turn the other cheek to Germany again. If we are right also in our estimate of the position of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and the various races which it comprises, we think that war on the Eastern problem would lead to the dissolution of the dual monarchy. We rather suspect that that view is held in Berlin, and that the German Chancellor has rattled his sabre to prevent such a catastrophe as we have referred to.

Clearly German prestige has suffered a great eclipse. The strategy of Von der Goltz and the cannon of Herr Krupp have been proved to be equally faulty. Friendly as we are to Germany, we do not wish to pursue this line of argument, and we should desire to take this opportunity of offering a very sincere tribute to the attitude of the German Emperor, who with vast means of aggression at his disposal has never been tempted to make use of them. We can only hope and trust that the same level-headed and benevolent policy will prevail with the master of many legions to curb the war party which in his country, as in every other country, is powerful, from driving German policy from the sane lines which are demonstrably necessary to the welfare and the progress of the German people, and the tranquillity of the European hegemony.

Our Village Carolling

THERE was a time, not so very long ago, when at Christmastide the city was enclosed, after eight o'clock in the evening, by a circumference of carols. Voices (occasionally a trifle thin) piped out impartially "The Mistletoe Bough" and "Christians, Awake," while bands in concord—and discord—blew their uneven wintry way through a repertoire which seemed rather limited if the listener were so situated as to hear four or five consecutive performances at various points. As ever happens at Christmastide, however, most people were anxious to take the will for the deed; the singers were exhilarated, and the players inspired by sundry pence and pleasantries. But to-day, if we except the intermittent wandering minstrel and the youngsters who shout a breathless stave on the doorsteps, the suburbs are comparatively silent.

The Christmas carol has forsaken the town, having found the country more congenial, and the reason is that in the first place the proverbial Christmas weather generally delays its appearance until the middle of January; secondly, that the "carol-service" introduced during the last few years by most churches and chapels presents a convenient means of keeping the spirit uplifted and the body dry at the same time. It is hard work singing in a thick fog or a penetrating drizzle, with icy feet, a vista of two or three disconsolate hours before the fireside is reached, and the prospect of a severe cold; whereas everybody knows that a snow-covered landscape is irresistible—it simply invites carols and hilarity, and causes a perfect recklessness of problematic chills. Since, then, snow refuses to come at Christmas—in London, at any rate—humanity rebels and refuses to carol out of doors in town.

In our village "down-along" things are different. We have a way of our own with music; we are not particular, for example, as to a composer's intentions; if he wrote his quartette for four voices, as presumably he did, and we choose to sing it with five or six or seven, who shall say us nay? Is Timothy Clunker, our big blacksmith, with his voice like a rushing mighty wind, to be left out in the cold just because this "up-country" gentleman of anthems hadn't heard of him? And must Mis' Polgarrick up to post-office, who brought the house down with her rendering of "What Are the Wild Waves Saying?" at our last concert, stand meekly by because there wasn't room in the piece for another contralto? Certainly not; the more the merrier, say we, where harmony is concerned; and so, when we go carolling, we go in force and do the thing properly. And here I may say that we are not to be disdained by folks from foreign parts even in the matter of composers; we have an organist who writes real new tunes, and last year he produced a carol specially for us—for our village, called by its name, and printed in London. We sang it indefatigably all over the place; we practised it in private with one finger, on harmonium, piano, and spinet; we whistled it at our daily tasks. On the first out-door performance it "went" surprisingly well, considering that Mr. Clunker doesn't read music and sings by the position of the notes in the clef—up a bit if they are near the top, down a bit if they seek the bottom. This nocturnal perambulation was a favourable opportunity for springing it on the populace; sandwiched nonchalantly between two familiar carols, you see, it cannot be suspect. Nobody would dream that we had only practised it for six weeks.

Other motives for carol-singing, however, are not lacking. Hot coffee, for instance, at certain points of our round can be safely prophesied. Our names will appear in the next issue of the local paper; a base incitement, this, but we are frail mortals, and the glory of print with us is rare. More altruistic reasons, too, can be found. Poor old Mis' Lucy, bent with the weight of eighty years, alone in her cottage up the hill, will postpone her bedtime for our coming; we give her an extra hearty measure, and feel a thrill of pure delight when she draws up her blind and shows her crooked silhouette at the tiny window. We have a parcel for her, tied on our little four-wheeler of an organ, and it is almost a toss-up which gives Mis' Lucy the more happiness, our music or the contents of that amorphous package. Without being analytical, we are glad to know that she would sorely miss either. Then there is jolly Farmer Quiller up at the Manor—ten to one he will come down the garden and roar out a carol with us, just to show that his lungs are in good order and his heart in the right place; it is worth while coming, to hear him!

And so we make the circle of our snug village, with the bass undertones of the sea never out of hearing, and with the light of our swinging lantern at one moment a yellow spot on the road, the next instant darting off into space among the stars—or the raindrops, as the case may be. But then we don't mind a shower or two, down our way, when we go forth a-carolling!

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

Language and Character—II

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT STRONG.

THE German beats the Frenchman in his rich store of words expressive of deep feeling. In English, words can hardly express the emotions which have gathered round such expressions as "Gemüth," "Sehnsucht," "Wonne," "Wehmuth," "Tiefsinn," "Heim," "Heimath," "Heimweh," "Innig," "Innigkeit." We English, too, possess many words which it would be hard to translate into any Romance tongue, such as home, homeliness, dreary, woebegone, self-conscious, forlorn, conceited, humour, and many others. The fact that the Teutonic nations possess a store of words referring to mental conditions not easily defined renders their tongues specially suitable for poetry, in which a certain mysticism is inherent. A German critic has remarked that we English possess a number of words expressive of anger in its different stages, such as wrath, irascibility, passion, rage, excitability, fury, outrage, fierceness, grimness, animosity, resentment, heart-burning, temper; we also possess a number of slang-words for the same kinds of strong feeling: and slang is merely the copper coinage of language, the linguistic currency of the people. A somewhat painful illustration of this is seen in the large vocabulary in our language to express drunkenness, once at least our national vice; indeed, one might make a regular barometer, or rather thermometer, of terms in which we express this unfortunate national habit, from the exhilaration excited by a daily allowance of a glass of port to the state of ecstasy which inspired Tam o' Shanter; such as "festive," "a little on," "a sheet in the wind," "two sheets in the wind," "squiffy," "groggy," "as drunk as a lord," "blind drunk," and numerous others known to non-teetotalers.

That we are a political nation may be gathered from our numerous words expressive of political parties and the nicknames given to them. Our language, too, is extraordinarily rich in words having reference to religion and its rights and ceremonies. We have given the language of the Turf to all Europe: words like jockey, handicap, sport, are common to all nations. The Germans, indeed, I understand, in their anxiety to keep their mother tongue pure, have adopted, to express the golfer's term, the "tee," the word "weitschlagöhe": we should not find time for such expressions, for we love brevity, thereby exhibiting an impatience of waste of time and of energy.

It is possible, too, to trace by an examination of its language not merely the character of a nation's thought, but of its past history and occupations. Of course, Christianity had a mighty influence on our language, not only by its addition of ecclesiastical terms, but by investing with a new significance words existing in the language, such as grace, redemption, humility, salvation, and many others. To a Greek of classical times the word "tapeinôsis" would have meant a grovelling vice unworthy of a free man; Christianity regarded it as an excellent virtue. Sometimes, too, language recalls the memory of arts and pastimes which have long fallen into disuse, as, for instance, the general practice of archery. There was in Queen Elizabeth's time a book written by one Asham, entitled "Toxophilus, a Treatise on Archery," which contains hundreds of technical terms. This pursuit was, I am sorry to say, more familiar in olden times to the youth of our country than is the use of the rifle at present. It has given proof of its former popularity in the family names of Bowyer, Archer, and Fletcher; the latter name comes from the French "flèche." I possess a treatise by an enthusiastic toxophilite intended to prove that Shakespeare was an archer, the proof lying in the number of words occurring in his plays connected with archery, though his large mental grasp has caused him to be taken for a veterinary surgeon, a Catholic, a Protestant, and for many other things.

The pursuit of hawking or falconry, which was followed in the Middle Ages with particular zest, especially in England and in France, largely coloured the language of the Elizabethan age. For instance, in the Shakespearean "Come, seeling night," the word "seeling" (sceller) denotes the closing up the eyes of a falcon to tame her. The word "hagard" signifies a hedge-bred wild falcon. The French word "niais" means properly a young nest-hawk: and as youth and folly are nearly connected in the minds of those who have left their youth behind, the word came to bear its meaning of "silly." In French, the metaphors taken from falconry are even more numerous than in English, as, for instance, "faire rendre gorge," the full expression being "faire rendre gorge au faucon," i.e., to make the falcon disgorge. Thus, again, in the phrase, "c'est une personne bien déleurée," the metaphor is taken from a falcon which will not allow herself to be attracted by the lure, and is used in the sense of "he won't be caught napping."

Again, the style of a nation's language reflects its character not less than its vocabulary. This is well exemplified in the case of Latin, for the Latin language was for the most part addressed to cultivated audiences, and the speakers did not feel that they were under the necessity of addressing an audience which looked anxiously for another instalment of a novel costing fourpence-halfpenny or even four shillings and sixpence. Hence we find the periods in the Latin sentence proceeding in orderly succession, virile, disciplined, even as the march of the Roman soldiers. The outstanding feature is obedience to authority; where we should say our ancestors thought, the Romans said "voluerunt." The main characteristic of the Latin sentence is its subordination. We find this subordination expressed by the introduction of subordinate sentences by relatives, by participles, by the ablative absolute. It is likewise expressed by the strict and careful sequence of tenses, seen more particularly in the "oratio obliqua," in which sentence follows sentence under the strict control of a single governing verb, like the "manipuli" drilled by a "tribunus militum," himself subordinated to the great "legatus." And when we reflect as well on the strong and well-marked accent in Latin, and on the stress laid upon the verb, which crowned and dominated the period at its close, we can understand what Heinrich Heine meant by his assertion: "The language of the Romans can never belie its origin; it is a language in which Generals might issue words of command, Administrators couch their decrees, and Judges in the courts of law pronounce their verdicts."

REVIEWS

Disraeli

By SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

(First Notice.)

The Life of Benjamin Disraeli Earl of Beaconsfield. By WILLIAM FLAVELLE MONYPENNY. Volume II, 1837-1846, with portraits and illustrations. (John Murray. 12s. net.)

"WE were none of us fools," said one of his most brilliant contemporaries, "and each man talked his best; but we all agreed that the cleverest fellow in the party was the young Jew in the green velvet trousers."

The second volume of this fascinating biography opens with the year Queen Victoria came to the throne, when Disraeli was thirty-four years of age. What strikes one first is the ease with which Disraeli seems to have entered the highest society. Algernon West, writing of fourteen years later, says: "Society was so small that Lady Palmerston used to write in her own hand invitations to her parties." It was still smaller in 1837, and much more exclusive: yet this young middle-class Jew, against whose nationality in those days there was a prejudice that it is difficult in this generation to understand, appears to have been on "surname terms"—it would have been "Christian name" terms now!—with the greatest in the land. The secret of it is explained in the quotation above; people were fascinated with the brilliancy of his conversation and the novelty of his views.

The third letter to his sister in the present volume with very little alteration might have been written at the beginning of any session within recent years—the undignified scramble of M.P.'s when summoned to the Lords! "The rush was terrific: Abercromby himself nearly thrown down and trampled upon, and his mace-bearer banging the members' heads with his gorgeous weapon, and cracking skulls with impunity. I was fortunate to escape, however, and able to ensure an entry." James Hope, in his "1900 Parliament," describes a similar scene; all through the book one is struck with the fact of how little Parliament has altered. The times were more leisurely and less businesslike. "Unfortunately, as generally happens on long Committee nights, there was scarcely a reporter in the gallery," could scarcely be written now.

This first chapter deals with his entry into the House of Commons and his maiden speech. Instead of studying to conciliate prejudice, he set himself to provoke and defy it. The story of his failure is ably told:—

> I am not at all surprised at the reception I have experienced—I have begun several times many things and I have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me.

As the Times said on the occasion of his death: "To think this and say it next day would have been nothing. To say so, not so much in the petulance of temper as with the calm earnestness of conviction, at a moment when most men would have been crushed helplessly under the load of ridicule, and stung beyond power of reflection by the disappointment of cherished hopes, gave evidence of unexampled strength of will and presence of mind, and of the overweening self-confidence it went so far to justify"; and this feeling is fully described in his own words to his sister Sarah. I have often thought that F. E. Smith's maiden effort was delivered on similar lines, but with more success.

I think Mr. Monypenny has not dealt sufficiently with Disraeli's financial struggles. When one thinks what elections cost in those days, and how comparatively little help he received, it is amazing to find how lightly he appears to have borne an enormous load of debt. A bachelor, mixing in society and dressing as he did, could not have lived on a small income. There are a thousand and one expenses for which one can never get credit; yet he appears in the book to have sailed on as easily as his later hero Endymion did under circumstances far easier. Imprisonment for debt was a common calamity in those days. Who were the people who financed him? Some of his notes-of-hand enrich autograph-hunters' collections, and at the age of twenty-one he owed several thousands of pounds. He did not make much by his books. He only received £200 for "Vivian Grey," and he was not ultimately free from debt until he became Chancellor of the Exchequer. How he did it and why private financial worry did not kill him as it did so many other politicians we could name remains a mystery. And yet all through his long career, when every action was under the microscopes of powerful and unscrupulous enemies, never a breath of scandal was uttered against him. His nature was too inherently great to stoop to relieve himself by knowledge obtained as a public man.

His enemies naturally said he married for money when he proposed to the well-to-do widow of his old friend, Wyndham Lewis. She was twelve years his senior. And the world generally thinks that it was a mariage de convenance. The story is freely told, and clears away this misconception. Disraeli writes in a letter during their first and last quarrel (1839):—

> By heavens, as far as worldly interests are concerned, your alliance could not benefit me. All that Society can offer is at my command. . . . I can live as I have lived without disgrace until the inevitable progress of events gives me that independence which is all I require.

The story of his quarrel with Peel is also frankly dealt with. The famous letter is given in which he humbly asked for office, and Peel's reply is set out. Peel really wanted to give Disraeli a place in his Government, but it was Stanley who on account of a private and temporary quarrel turned the Minister against him. If it did nothing else—and it does a great deal—this second volume clears Disraeli's name of these two incidents in his career which to my mind have always required elucidation.

Disraeli's creation of the political novel, and the birth of the Young England party, its principles and its aims, which was the grandfather of the Tory Democracy of to-day, are set out with masterly clearness.

Disraeli had not received an orthodox education. When his contemporaries were at public schools or matriculating at the universities, he was out in the world battling his way upward, and but for his amazing industry and self-culture he could never have written the books he did. He read widely; he travelled; his own genius did the rest.

English literature owes a debt of gratitude to Peel—or to Stanley, if to Stanley it is more appropriately due; their exclusion of Disraeli from office in 1841 led to "Coningsby" and "Sybil," and the creation of the political novel. It would not be fair in a review to give details of Mr. Monypenny's descriptions and criticisms of the novels; they are scrupulously fair and most interesting, and many characters are authoritatively identified.

Since the above was written, Mr. Monypenny has passed away, to the deep regret of his fellow-countrymen. Perhaps later on I may be allowed to deal with the character and career of this brilliant and industrious writer, but I cannot close the present article without expressing the universal opinion that his untimely death is a loss to literature; we gain only a small mean of comfort by knowing that if not finished, he had sketched out his scheme of this Life so that another hand may be able to conclude it in the way he would have liked; for I am informed he has left all his notes in order. I once urged Coningsby Disraeli to write his uncle's Life. He has plenty of ability and a style not unlike that of his distinguished relative.

The Heart of Russia

Moscow. Painted by F. DE HAENEN. Described by H. M. GROVE. (A. and C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS artistic and beautiful book, one of a series of sumptuously illustrated works on the great capitals of Europe, should be read by every person who intends visiting the ancient capital of Muscovy. Though the historical portion is somewhat weak and uninteresting for such an important subject, the author shows a sympathetic insight into the Russian character, and, probably owing to his knowledge of India and its people, is able to describe the peculiar semi-Oriental habits and characteristics of the Muscovites with a fidelity seldom found among English writers. The striking resemblance of many of the Muscovites to the Pathans and other inhabitants of Northern India is clearly shown; also the similarity of the Russian tongue to the Aryan dialects.

As regards the historical portion of this work, a little more care would have rendered it far more valuable and thrilling; for the history of this ancient city of monasteries, churches and cathedrals is one of the most interesting and sanguinary in Europe. The terrible onslaughts of the Tartars, on one of which occasions 80,000 people were slaughtered, according to independent foreign accounts, are dismissed in a few lines, which give no adequate idea of these calamities. The great plague and famine of 1601, which carried off half a million people in Moscow alone, are not even mentioned.

The description of the Kremlin gives but a faint idea of its grandeur and terrible associations. In the chapter devoted to this remarkable citadel or acropolis, the writer says:—"The cathedral is connected with the palace by a covered passage by which the old kings and queens entered the building." The titles of "King" and "Queen" were unknown in Muscovy; the rulers of the various grand Duchies were called Dukes, Grand Dukes, and Princes, until the days of Ivan the Terrible, who took upon himself the title of Tsar, after marrying the daughter of the Byzantine Emperor. The use of such French phrases as "Notre Dame de Iberia," "Place Rouge," and "Chancellerie" are to be regretted in an English work. But notwithstanding these small blemishes, the book, written in a bright and natural vein, gives a good impression of the life in Moscow, especially of the upper and middle classes. The proverbial hospitality, sociability, and good nature of the Muscovites are well described, as well as the curious and quaint customs of the millionaire merchants and such of the nobility who care to reside in the old capital, which, since its destruction by the French in 1812, has lost much of its political and aristocratic peculiarities. According to the author, Napoleon's soldiers attempted to blow up many of the most interesting places in Moscow, and these were only saved from destruction by the timely arrival of the Cossacks.

The work is to be commended, not only on account of its superior illustrations, but for the good idea it gives of the enormous wealth of the Russian monasteries, one of which, the "Sergei Troitsk," contributed a million sterling towards the expenses of the Russo-Turkish war, whilst the Novsky monastery, near Petersburg, lent the Tsar Nicholas half a million sterling towards the cost of the Crimean campaign.

The writer draws attention to the lawlessness and carelessness of the Russians of all classes, and describes how they defy the city police whenever they are able to resist their authority. It seems, on reading these statements, that the assertion that "the Slav peoples have a natural inclination for anarchy" is only too true. This inclination for lawlessness and going "agin the Government" is admirably pointed out in the chapter on "Social and other Characteristics." The section on the students and the trouble they give their parents and the authorities is also exceedingly interesting; for it clearly shows why so many young people become Nihilists and revolutionists. The practice of letting children have their own way, of allowing them to rule their parents, naturally brings them into conflict with the authorities as soon as they grow up and enter the universities and higher schools where such ideas are not tolerated.

The author in the following pregnant sentence points out the real reason for the existing latent hostility to England, and the causes which may ultimately bring the largest land and sea powers in the world into conflict:—"Whenever they (the Russians) are attempting to secure an outlet to open water there invariably appears a Britisher waving a flag, wanting to know where Russia is going to, and pointing out that she has no right to go there"! This remark is only too true. Russia with her vast territory must have more outlets to the sea, and so long as she does not endanger England's power on the North Sea and the Persian Gulf, it would seem unwise to oppose her.

On the whole this work is written in a friendly spirit towards Russia; it should be read by all those who wish to see only the bright side of that country, and who do not wish to rack their brains by a deep study of the subject.

Lectures and Essays of William Robertson Smith. Edited by J. S. BLACK and G. CHRYSTAL. (A. and C. Black. 10s. net.)

WILLIAM ROBERTSON SMITH in the last century was the herald of Modernism, of what is now called the Higher Criticism. His articles on the Bible and on "Hebrew Language and Literature" in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" led to a strange persecution, and, after a weary trial, to his ultimate expulsion from the chair of the Professorship of Hebrew at Aberdeen. But the loss to the Free Church was a gain to the "Encyclopædia," of which he was at once appointed editor. He migrated to Cambridge, where the closing years of his brief though distinguished career were passed. He was a Fellow of Christ's College and Librarian to the University, and in 1883 he was elected to the Lord Almoner's Readership in Arabic. He was also a member of the Revision Committee of the English Bible. He died in 1894, at the early age of forty-eight. His biography is well written and most carefully edited, though the long chapters and details of the Scotch ecclesiastical controversy are perhaps a little dull, except to readers north of the Tweed. The volume of essays is remarkably good, and shows the width of his scholarship and his great erudition. Like other theologians—notably Salmon of Trinity College, Dublin—he was an abstruse mathematician, and wrote on such subjects as Electricity, and the Metaphysics of the Fluxional Calculus.

As a scholar of Arabic, he made two journeys to Arabia, and adopted the plan of Sir Richard Burton in donning the Arab dress; and the biography, which is well illustrated, has a striking picture of "Abdullah Effendi."

After his visit to the Hejâz, he went with Burton from Cairo to Fayyum to the Nitrian Lakes in search of manuscripts. Besides the "Journey in the Hejâz," he wrote a book on Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, and with Professor de Goeje re-edited Wright's Grammar of the Arabic Language.

The bibliography of his writings, essays, reviews, and lectures occupies several pages. It is interesting to us to record his connection with THE ACADEMY, to which he was a contributor from the year 1873 until his death. His first review on Ewald's "Biblical Theology" was "the occasion of his acquaintance with Professor Cheyne, with whom he afterwards established most friendly and intimate relations." The very last article he wrote before his death appeared in THE ACADEMY for November 6, 1893. It was on "the interpretation of a Semitic inscription on a small hematite weight which had recently been discovered on the site of the ancient city of Samaria," a matter which aroused considerable controversy between himself and Professors Sayce and Driver. Years afterwards, M. Clermont-Ganneau said that he accepted Professor Robertson-Smith's interpretation.

L'Enfant du Temple

(By "LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE.")

The Last Legitimate King of France. By PHŒBE ALLEN. Illustrated. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 12s. 6d. net.)

Louis XVII and other Papers. By PHILIP TREHERNE. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

HERE are two books, one dealing wholly, and the other in part with the "mystery" surrounding the fate of the second son of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, the lad who, according to official accounts, died in captivity during the Revolution, but who, according to others, including the writers of the volumes before us, escaped from detention and survived in the person of a certain Naundorff. Unfortunately, neither of these works is of the slightest historical value so far as the Louis XVII question is concerned. Mr. Treherne's book certainly contains some interesting and informing papers, notably those on Barbey d'Aurevilly and Casanova, at Dux, but his account of the Dauphin mystery is quite superficial. As for the contents of Miss (or Mrs.) Allen's handsomely produced volume we have had them all before—in the French language—and they are simply a long series of ex parte statements in favour of the claims of Naundorff and his descendants to the crown of France.

Neither of our authors seems to be in the slightest degree acquainted with the results of contemporary research. Neither of them attempts to reply to the great array of French scholars who, during the last two or three years, have dissected, demolished, and pulverised the claims of the Naundorff family. Both Miss Allen and Mr. Treherne mention the committee of the French Senate which, in June, 1910, examined a petition of one of the original Naundorff's grandsons; both of them also mention the report in favour of that petition which was prepared by Baron Boissy d'Anglas, then Senator of the Ardèche; but neither states what was the Senate's decision, nor records M. Boissy d'Anglas's pitiful dégringolade from the position of an historical authority. In spite of the Baron's report the evidence against the Naundorffs was so strong, so convincing, that the Senate by an almost unanimous vote—there were only three dissentients—rejected the petition. As for M. Boissy d'Anglas personally, the Société de l'Histoire de la Révolution, over which that distinguished scholar, M. Aulard presides, denounced him roundly for his travesty of facts, and he was constrained to resign his membership.

There may still be some controversy as to whether the boyish Louis XVII did or did not escape detention, but, however that may be, it is quite clear that he did not survive in the person of Naundorff, any more than he survived under such names as Guérinière, Hervagault, Bruneau, Richemont, alias Hébert, Ligny de Luxembourg, or Eleazar Williams, to mention just a few of the impostors who subsequently claimed to be the "Child of the Temple." Mr. Treherne rightly points out that "if Naundorff's birth certificate were forthcoming there would be an end to all his claims." The absence of such a certificate is, of course, one of the great Naundorffist arguments; but are Mr. Treherne and Miss Allen prepared to disprove the statements of M. Georges de Meynadier that "Naundorff" was merely a false appellation, and that this claimant to French royalty was really named Karl Benjamin Werg, and was born at Hallé on the Saal, on May 3, 1777? It seems to us that neither of our authors can have any knowledge of the sledge-hammer blow to the Naundorff pretensions which M. de Meynadier first dealt them in the columns of the Journal des Débats on March 25, 1911.

Both Miss Allen and Mr. Treherne follow the old grooves, the old beaten track. Their authorities are Modeste Gruau, a petty advocate, who styled himself Gruau de la Barre, and even called himself a count, "de par le roi Naundorff"; Foulon, a Belgian by birth, who added "de Vaulx" to his patronymic, and for literary purposes assumed the nom de guerre of Henri Provins; together with a certain Otto Friedrichs, of German origin. Those three have been the chief exponents of the Naundorff theory, which has never been supported by any one French historical scholar of any standing As for Herr Friedrichs, grave charges of juggling with Naundorff's contradictory declarations at Brandenburg (1825) and at Crossen (1831) have been brought against him by M. Laurentie, and have remained unanswered.

The only anti-Naundorffists of any account against whom Miss Allen occasionally tilts are Alcide de Beauchesne, whose book on Louis XVII was published in 1852, and Régis Chantelauze, whose studies on the same subject appeared in 1884 and 1887. Now, both Beauchesne and Chantelauze may have erred in some respects; but in reference to the former one may well say that the study of history has been absolutely revolutionised in France since his time; whilst as regards the latter it has made most remarkable progress since he passed away in 1888. Why, then, does Miss Allen confine herself to picking out faults in authors of what is virtually a past age? Why has she not attempted to answer all the critics of to-day—George Lenotre, Gustave Bord, Frédéric Masson, Henri Monin, Georges Montorgueil, Arthur Loth, Pierre Louys, Louis de Beaufront, the Viscount de Reiset, Ernest Daudet, Alfred Bégis, the Baron de Maricourt, and many others, who in addition to M. de Monteyer, have knocked nail after nail into the coffin of the Naundorff pretensions during the last few years? Why should books published in 1912 give no hint whatever of the recent fruits of research in French State, departmental, and municipal archives? Even the library of Cahors has disclosed documents proving how impudently Naundorff tried to swindle M. Albouys, a magistrate of that town, who honestly inclined to the opinion that the Dauphin had escaped from the Temple and was still alive, although—this should be noted—not a single one of the many false Princes was ever able to give an explicit account of his escape, the date when it occurred, or the friends by whom it was facilitated. As for Werg, alias Naundorff, he at first declared that he had escaped from Paris with his father, and spent ten years with him after the Revolution (Naundorff's Brandenburg Declaration, 1825). If that were so, he could not possibly have been the son of Louis XVI.

We are ready to admit that the present grandchildren of this Arthur Orton of French history urge their claims in good faith, for they have been brought up to believe the legend of their ancestry. Some of them are now-a-days in business as wine merchants at Lunel, in the South of France, and issue pamphlets extolling the merits of Muscat de Lunel—which, as a matter of fact, is very good wine indeed, and therefore needs no bush, though in proclaiming its virtues the Naundorff family delight to embellish their effusions with the Fleurs-de-Lys and the Sacred Heart. Their petition to the French Senate in 1910 was, we may add, resented by the Dutch branch of their "House," a formal protest against it being issued from Oosterbeck, in Holland, by a gentleman who signed himself "Henri de Bourbon, Prince of France."

We regret that we cannot commend what Miss Allen and Mr. Treherne have written on the subject of Louis XVII. But we will add that there is certainly room for an up-to-date book on the question, one embodying all the new information which has become available of recent years. Should any literary reader of THE ACADEMY propose to undertake such a work, we would particularly recommend him to study "Le Rapport de M. Boissy d'Anglas, commenté et réfuté par François Laurentie" (Paris, Emile Paul, 1911), a work valuable both for its sound criticism and the many bibliographical references which it supplies.

Shorter Reviews

The Mines of Isaiah Re-Explored. By the REV. T. K. CHEYNE, D.Litt. (A. and C. Black, 5s. net.)

DR. CHEYNE, in this his latest contribution to the literature of the Higher Criticism, sets out to modify many of the preconceived notions regarding the return from the Exile under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah, and incidentally of other matters. The learned Professor claims to show in the present volume that the Liberator by whom the return of the exiles was permitted was not the Persian King, Cyrus, but a North Arabian ruler and adventurer named Koresh. The Jews moreover, he contends, were not monotheists, but worshipped a company of gods under the leadership of Yahweh, and all their statesmanship after the Return was devoted towards the creation of a federation of Judæa and other neighbouring States under the supreme rule of the aforesaid Koresh, and under the spiritual influence of Yahweh. There is much else in this volume to provoke controversy, and, as is to be expected in any work that comes from the pen of the present author, Jerahmeel is much to the fore. Whether Dr. Cheyne's views will ever obtain general acceptance it is for a future generation to decide. In the meanwhile the author promises in his next volume an attempt to recover the earliest historical and geographical tradition of the Old Testament writers.

An Australian Native's Standpoint. By W. J. SOWDEN. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)

IN addition to the prominent part which he has played in public affairs, Mr. Sowden is the editor of the Adelaide Register. He is thus peculiarly well qualified to speak on behalf of the Australian-born members of the British Empire. The contents of his book are for the most part made up of speeches and addresses delivered both in Australia and London—a type of matter which does not always reproduce favourably in book form, but which in this case is eminently successful. For in terse and vigorous language the author paints the virility of Australia, and the unswerving loyalty to the Empire which is bound up with the independent ideas proper to a new land. The Australian pleads for no favours; he takes a just pride in himself and in his land, and would have both appreciated at their proper value by the mother country. There is no doubt that this sane and vigorous work will do much towards clearing up many of the minor misunderstandings which have existed in the past—misunderstandings which in time might swell unduly in importance, and which no one resents more than Mr. Sowden. As the author explains, the policy of the land "down under" is not "Australia for the Australians," but "The Australians for Australia." Mr. Sowden is at times cordial, at times trenchant, but always convincing. We wish his book all the success it deserves.

Photograms of the Year 1912. Edited by F. J. MORTIMER. (Hazell, Watson and Viney. 2s. 6d. net.)

AS the annual review of the world's pictorial photographic work, "Photograms of the Year," is a very useful as well as a very fine production. The articles, dealing with photography in all its branches and in many parts of the world, alone would make the book worthy of consideration; but when to them are added very fine specimens of the artists' work, the appeal of the volume is sure to be very much greater. Several of the reproductions are familiar to those who have visited the London exhibitions during the past year. To them are known the sunshine and shade effects of Mr. A. H. Blake, the striking sea pieces of Mr. F. J. Mortimer, the Dutch works of Mme. d'Ora, and many others too numerous to mention. An intimation at the end of the book informs intending contributors that August 1, 1913, is the latest date on which work intended for inclusion in next year's issue can be considered.

Exeter. Pictured by ERNEST HASLEHUST. Described by SIDNEY HEATH. (Blackie and Son. 2s. net each.)

MESSRS. BLACKIE AND SON have with the volumes before us issued two more of their popular colour series. These books, as is now well known, provide in a chatty popular form a short description of the districts with which they deal, and contain also several coloured illustrations. While not wishing in any way to disparage the latter, it appears to us that the colours are much better and the representation is clearer in buildings such as Anne Boleyn's Gateway and Rougemont Castle, than they are, for instance, in Countess Weir and the Long Walk—the latter in fact gives but a very faint idea of the beauty of that portion of the grounds of Hampton Court. We also think that any work on Hampton Court is incomplete without an illustration of Bushey Park. With these exceptions the books should be very acceptable as guides to the various places dealt with.

Parsifal, or the Legend of the Holy Grail retold from Antient Sources, with Acknowledgment to the "Parsifal" of Richard Wagner. By T. W. ROLLESTON. Presented by WILLY POGANY. (Harrap and Co. 15s. net.)

EVEN the most captious critic must admit, we imagine, that this is one of the finest gift-books of the season; for taste and general attractiveness of appearance it is a credit in every way to the firm which issues it. The artist has, of course, no need of any introduction; Pogány's work is by now well known for its delicacy of fancy; as to the writer or adapter, he has presented the famous legend in a happily conceived form. This sumptuous volume is one which will be treasured by all its possessors.

Fiction

The Street Called Straight. By the Author of "The Inner Shrine." (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

THE situation which supplies the motive of "The Street Called Straight" is a decidedly interesting one. Henry Guion, an American solicitor, has been gambling recklessly—and unsuccessfully. His speculations have involved the loss of certain moneys, of which he was merely the trustee. At the time when this book opens, the game is up. Guion is faced with the certain prospect of detection and imprisonment. To add to the tragedy of the situation, his daughter is about to be married to an English Army officer of good family. She, poor girl, is entirely innocent of the calamity which is about to overwhelm both her father and herself. Suddenly the whole aspect of things is changed. A casual acquaintance—one Peter Davenant—comes forward unexpectedly with the offer of the money. This man had at one time the temerity to fall in love with Olivia Guion, who had snubbed him unmercifully—it is the one ungrateful thing that she had ever done, for she is a very perfect heroine. Should Guion, or should he not, accept the money? That is the problem of the book. Ultimately, after much pain and self-sacrifice to more than one of the characters, a way out of the difficulty is found, and the Street called Straight does indeed lead to the House called Beautiful. The author's character-drawing is firm and finished. Rupert Ashley, in his way, is a masterpiece, but even he must give place to Rodney Temple, the gentle and quizzical old antiquarian who plays a part in this story similar to that played by Pippa in "Pippa Passes"—with this difference, however, that Temple is not altogether unconscious of his influence. For his sake alone, the book is well worth reading. And, on any account, "The Street Called Straight" is a novel that it would be unwise to miss.

Things That Pass. By ALICE E. ROBBINS. (Andrew Melrose. 6s. net.)

"EVERY death is but another birth," wrote Lucretius, and Miss Robbins takes his words as a text on which to base a quiet, yet a forceful lesson. This book tells of the doings and sayings of three generations; it leads us on through the simple happenings of country life; birth, marriage, and death follow on each other, and birth again. So void of ultra-significant events is the story, and yet so well is the interest of ordinary happenings maintained, that we are led on from chapter to chapter in expectant fashion, and left at the end rather puzzled until we realise that the author has accomplished her aim, shown the continuity of being—the linked sequence which renders it impossible for one to say that here a certain influence began, or there a story ended. There is neither beginning nor end, but an unending story whose moral is, as Mary West finds on this book's last page, that God is very good.

The story is told with great delicacy rather than with force. If the author had set out to prove that life is made up of little things rather than that it is endless, she could not have succeeded better, for here are no abnormal passions and emotions, but simple and very real people absorbed in simple and very real interests. There is a slight tendency to moralising which Miss Robbins would do well to keep in hand—though it never becomes unduly obtrusive in this book—and in the earlier chapters a markedly colloquial style to which some readers may object. These, however, are minor ills, and on the whole the clean, refreshing atmosphere of the book renders it a welcome change from highly spiced sex problems, and too frequent essays in morbid sensationalism, of which Miss Robbins' work is the exact antithesis.

The Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol. By WM. J. LOCKE. Illustrated by ALEC BALL. (John Lane. 6s.)

ARISTIDE PUJOL is a creation of genius worthy to rank with his immortal compatriot, Tartarin de Tarascon, in sunny Provence. For the most unabashed effrontery Mr. Locke's Provençal would be hard to beat. In fact, he is as inimitable as Daudet's slayer of lions. His adventures are termed "joyous," and so indeed they are; but occasionally there is something more than merriment, a deep emotional note, as, for instance, in the "Adventure of the Foundling." Mr. Alec Ball has entered fully into the spirit of the stories, and his illustrations are delightful; while Mr. Locke's occasional excursions into French, which enhance the necessary local colour, are the crême de la crême of the most spirituelle of languages. One of the adventures, that of the "Kind Mr. Smith," has been recently successfully dramatised, and forms a lively curtain raiser at the Haymarket Theatre.

Christmas Books

TWO very notable books issued by Messrs. Blackie and Son this year are "Conquests of Engineering" and "Wood and What We Make of It," by Cyril Hall, 3s. 6d. each. These books treat of the wonderful achievements that have been wrought by human enterprise in various parts of the world. There are more than thirty illustrations in each volume; these show up clearly the many details contained in the construction of the masterpieces of engineering and the methods employed in transferring timber from its home in the forest to the huge dockyards and workshops of the nations. It is quite easy to believe the authors of "The Boys' Book of Aeroplanes" (Grant Richards, 6s.), when they say that they have vastly enjoyed writing their account of this history of flight. While setting before their readers the great accomplishments of the pioneers of flight—a considerable space is devoted to the attempts of the Wright Brothers—Messrs. T. O'B. Hubbard, C. C. Turner, and E. W. Twining, have also pointed out what still remains to be done to perfect the art.

French battles are responsible for "Under the Flag of France: A Tale of Bertrand du Guesclin," by David Ker (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d.), founded on the records of the old French Chroniclers, "The Lord of Marney: A Tale of the Days of St. Louis of France," by G. I. Whitman (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), and "The Red Hussar," by Reginald Horsley (W. and R. Chambers, 3s. 6d.), which is a graphic account of the Franco-Prussian War. The border referred to in "Boys of the Border," by George R. Bennett (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d.), is that between Wales and England at the time of Henry II, and the story consists of the adventures of two boys who defended their father and his lands against a foreign usurper. "The Captain of the King's Guard," by Commander E. H. Currey (W. and R. Chambers, 5s.), treats of the visit of Prince Charles and the Duke of Buckingham to the Spanish Court at the time when it was proposed that a marriage should be brought about between the English Prince and the Infanta. "Kidnapped by Moors," by Captain F. S. Brereton (Blackie and Son, 6s.), and "Captured at Tripoli," by Percy F. Westerman (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), are both adventurous stories of Northern Africa. "Rattlesnake Ranch," by Robert Leighton (C. Arthur Pearson, 2s. 6d.), details adventures with Redskins, and "A Boy of the Dominion," by Captain F. S. Brereton (Blackie and Son, 5s.), is a tale of Canadian immigration, and treats of the hardships undergone by young immigrants in that country. "The Lighthouse" and "Deep Down," by R. M. Ballantyne (Blackie and Son, 2s. each), are adventurous stories, one dealing with Scotland, and the other with Cornish mines. These two books are very well got up at the price and form companion volumes. "My Tightest Corner" (C. Arthur Pearson, 2s. net) consists of personal narratives related by men engaged in public service, and is one of the books included in the Scout Library. "Martin Spade," by Violet T. Kirke (S.P.C.K., 1s 6d.), is a story of smuggling in the eighteenth century.

Some old favourites appear again in reprints: "Gulliver's Travels" (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), Henty's

"Through Three Campaigns," and "True to the Old Flag" (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d. each), "Robinson Crusoe" (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), Captain F. S. Brereton's "In the King's Service" (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d.), and "A Book of Golden Deeds," by Charlotte M. Yonge (Blackie and Son, 1s.).

"What the Other Children Do," by Elizabeth Grierson (A. and C. Black, 2s. 6d. net), is an exceedingly interesting little book that every child should read, for while putting before them the schemes for the relief and help of their poorer brethren, it is done in such a bright and simple way that it cannot fail to attract its young readers, and it should also produce in them an active interest in philanthropy.

Miss Marchant's books for girls are well known, and to say that "The Younger Sister" (Blackie and Son, 5s.), equals any of her former work—as undoubtedly it does—is to pay her the highest compliment. The story of the girl who was always treated as a useless nonentity by her energetic elder sisters, and how she found her true vocation, is thoroughly well written, and if a few of the characters are somewhat conventional, the principal figures are vividly and naturally drawn.

Although the charm of "Twin Sisters," by Miss Mulholland (Blackie and Son, 6s.), is very considerable, it would, we think, be greatly enhanced if many of her minor characters were a little more natural; but, on the whole, the book is charming, and should interest all healthy-minded girls.

In "A Pair of Schoolgirls," by Angela Brazil (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), the interest centres round two girls very different in character and disposition; while in "Cora's School Chums," by May Baldwin (W. and R. Chambers, 3s. 6d.), we have a description of a headstrong girl who spends part of her early life in South Africa. "Peggy from Kerry," by L. T. Meade (W. and R. Chambers, 5s.), is an Irish story of a feud existing between two girls, one of whom was found to have cheated at school. "The Discretion of Decima," by Maude Leeson (Blackie and Son, 5s.), unfolds the family reminiscences of a bright English girl of sixteen. "Angélique," by Constance Elizabeth Maud (Duckworth and Co., 6s.), is dedicated to "all 'p'tits choux,' English and French." The style in which this book is written is to be commended; for interspersed with the text are many easy French expressions, very useful for a child to know. "Jim's Children," by Theodora Wilson Wilson (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), is a tale of town, country, and canal; while "Our Friend Jim," by Geraldine Mockler (Blackie and Son, 1s. 6d.), is a story suitable for younger children.

'Oh, you nasty, cross old wretch!'

Legends, Rhymes and Stories

THE adventures of a rebellious and yet winsome child form the subject of "Naughty Sophia," by Winifred Letts (Grant Richards, 6s.). The book is in the form of a story told by a small elfin man to Margaret, a restless little mortal who could not keep still for many minutes at a time. The narrative is pleasant and fantastic, and treats of weird and wonderful things interesting to little folk with imaginative minds. "Santa Claus and How he Came Again," by Elspeth (Sherratt and Hughes, 2s. 6d. net), is disappointing so far as the illustrations are concerned; they are not at all natural and detract greatly from the story, for children expect the pictures to tell them as much as the words themselves. In "Uncle Remus and the Little Boy," by Joel Chandler Harris (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net), we have all the marvellous adventures of Brer Rabbit, cunningly illustrated by J. M. Condé. Two stories, reprinted from Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Wonder-Books for Boys and Girls," are contained in "The Paradise of Children" and "The Three Golden Apples" (Constable and Co., 1s. net.). These stories introduce to children some of the heroes of ancient Greece, and are nicely illustrated by Patten Wilson. Miss Alice M. Brown contributes some pretty verses, and Miss Isabel Bonus some dainty black and white sketches to "The Moon Boat" (F. and E. Stoneham, 2s. 6d. net).

It is not quite easy to decide under which heading it is best to classify "The Four Gardens," by "Handasyde" (Wm. Heinemann, 6s. net). There is a ghost in the first story, and a child's diary forms the principal interest in it. A child also takes matters very much into her own hands in "The Rich Man's Garden"—the last of the series. For the rest the book consists of accounts of the four different gardens told in a pleasant vein with many allusions to Bacon and the poets. Sent on its way with a fine introduction by G. K. Chesterton and some excellent drawings by Arthur Rackham, the edition of "Æsop's Fables," issued by Mr. Heinemann (6s. net), bids fair to be a very popular one.

Little Songs of Long Ago.
Our Old Nursery Rhymes. Original Tunes Harmonised by ALFRED MOFFAT. Illustrated by H. WILLEBEEK LE MAIR. (Augener, Ltd. 5s. net. each.)

IT would be very difficult, among the finely illustrated books of the year, to find two more delicate in touch and dainty in design than those issued by Messrs. Augener under the above titles. Mr. Le Mair's pictorial representation of the dear old rhymes and songs of our childhood are excellent; every detail has received attention, and although the colouring appears very pale in some of the illustrations, in others it serves to show up the few bright dashes of colour with greater effect. The familiar music to the rhymes also adds to the charm of the books, and if it were not a shame to rob the little folk of their due, we think that the music is about all of the books that would be left for them, for each study is well worth a frame.

Picture Books

TO "Father Tuck's Annual," edited by Edric Vredenburg (Raphael Tuck and Sons, 3s. 6d.), must be accorded its usual welcome, for it comes to brighten with its miscellany of rhymes, pictures, and stories, as does also "More About the Empire," by Alice Talwin Morris (Blackie and Son, 1s.), and Vol. XVI of "Golden Sunbeams" (S.P.C.K., 1s. 4d.). Children who are fond of animals will enjoy "Three Jovial Puppies," by J. A. Shepherd and E. D. Cuming (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d.). The quaint doings of these mischievous little pets will delight many a small person as they turn the double leaves so suited to their rough but kindly handling.

Another double-leafed book is "Babes and Beasts," with designs by Charles Robinson and verses by Jessie Pope (Blackie and Son, 2s.). In this book a few lines are devoted to a description of each animal, wild and domestic. Miss Jessie Pope also writes verses for "The Adventures of Silversuit" (Blackie and Son, 1s. 6d.), as well as for "The Cat Scouts" (Blackie and Son, 1s. 6d.). The illustrations of this latter book are by Louis Wain.

Miss Grace G. Wiederseim has some quaint illustrations in "Kiddie Land" (Dean and Son, 3s. 6d. net). "Wee Tony," by Rosamond Praeger (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), does not appear always to be a good child, but is an amusing one. "Sambo and Susanna," with pictures by Ethel Parkinson and verses by May Byron (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), records the doings of a black boy and girl, while "Molly and Me," written and illustrated by H. G. C. Marsh (Dean and Son, 2s. 6d.), consists of adventures of two white kiddies. "Three Jolly Huntsmen" contains verses again by Jessie Pope, and drawings by Frank Adams (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.), and is a good sporting book of olden times. "Blackie's Green Picture-Book of Nursery Rhymes" (1s. 6d.) does not lose by the new illustrations provided by John Hassall. In "Merry Days" (Blackie and Son) there are a good assortment of stories and pictures for the price of 1s. A neat little set of six books are issued by Dean and Son, at 3s. 6d. net; they are prettily bound in colours, nicely varied in theme, and well illustrated. Messrs. Dean and Son also issue three very useful books mounted on cotton cloth: "The Delightful Book" (3s. 6d.), "Canada" (1s.), and "South Africa" (1s.); two good painting books at 1s. each, and a "Patchwork Puzzle Book" at 6d. In looking through this last book the source is now revealed from whence came the ideas of the Post-Impressionist artists, although happily small fingers will eagerly seek to piece the odd-looking forms together, and not leave them a blurred mass, as is the way with more experienced artists. "The Bye-Bye Book" (Dean and Son, 6d.) is something new in toy-books, and has detachable cardboard dolls in front of each book.

Some Christmas Issues

The Windsor Magazine for December is full of good things. To start with there is a very interesting article on "The Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool," in which Mr. Edward Rimbault Dibden describes the growth of the gallery and the attention given to art generally in this city of the North. Music, too, receives its meed of appreciation from Mr. G. Wodnil, who, under the heading of "The Royal Academy of Music," gives a detailed account of the origin and aim of London's musical centre. "Little Wars," by H. G. Wells, is an intricate but most useful game, "to be played by boys from twelve to one hundred and fifty," so that the much discussed question of "too old at forty" has not to be reckoned with in this instance. Stories by popular writers complete the number, while "The Pluperfect House," by Keble Howard, with illustrations by W. Heath Robinson, provides the dash of humour which is always associated with these two names.

The supplement to the Field is devoted to the sports and pastimes of different nations, and snow has been deliberately chosen as a background on which to represent the various aspects presented. The numerous illustrations are accompanied by descriptive articles, and include, among many others, an account of John Gilpin's ride.

The titles of Publishers' Circular and The Bookseller may to many convey the idea that they are publications intended only for the trade, but in the case of the Christmas numbers, at any rate, this is not so. The issues before us are full of pictures, well produced from some of the principal books issued by various publishers. There are short reviews of each book mentioned, while in the case of the Publishers' Circular odd corners are filled up with droll jokes—a lapse, we believe, only allowed by the magazine in question at this season of the year.

Although many periodicals, presumably for the young, have made their appearance since the advent of the Boy's and the Girl's Own Paper, we believe that these earlier magazines are still great favourites with all healthy-minded boys and girls. The current numbers are full of good stories, with coloured plates and articles on Christmas fun and Christmas fare.

All ladies are bound to be interested in their own newspaper, the Queen. For ourselves it is always difficult with regard to the illustrations, to determine whether the advertisement pages or those further on in the paper are the better. In addition to the usual features there are two pages of puzzles, and among others a good article in "The Romance of Old London," together with some very fine coloured illustrations. We understand that the number is already out of print. The Gentlewoman has not increased its price, and gives some fine illustrated pages of seasonable presents.

Cards and Calendars

IT is not possible to vary in any great degree the style of the cards and calendars issued each year by Messrs. A. R. Mowbray and Co. The subject of them being scriptural they cannot, of course, be fashioned to the changing caprice of the moment. As much as possible is done, however, to make them tasty with regard to colour and design. This season is the first time we have noticed the issue by Messrs. Mowbray of the autograph card, and the specimens we have before us are very suitable in every way for the festival for which they are intended. The calendars, also, are very good, and we are glad to see that many of them have fair-sized blocks for the dates. Without being at all near-sighted, it is extremely difficult on many almanacks for anyone to see the day of the month from any point farther than a few inches away.

The Theatre

"The Eldest Son" at the Kingsway Theatre

THEATRICALLY, London is the most fortunate city in Europe at the present time. There are at least six plays now running which abound in interest and compel towards delight. Among these, Mr. Galsworthy's sincere, straightforward, realistic domestic drama takes its place with ease. It is well considered, distinguished, profound, and boldly simple. To those who find it boring, life must be a tedious affair; to those who can be affrighted by its candours, existence must be terrible. The author takes the old English family of Sir William Cheshire for his figures of the theatre, but he depicts them with perfect justness and truth, and poses them a primarily simple situation, which, owing to the artificial circumstances of many generations, is made to be an intolerably difficult one. Sir William Cheshire has inherited his tradition from the thirteenth century, when his family first lived and ruled in his pleasant country home. He is not exceeding rich, but everything is and always has been perfectly comfortable. He is a law—under tradition—to those on his estate. A gamekeeper compromises a girl of the village; they are tired of each other; the man desires not to marry; the girl feels she must reinstate herself in this, the usual, way in the eyes of the community. Sir William is strongly roused by the affair; he makes it impossible for the man not to marry, and tradition is satisfied. Soon the position occurs again. Bill, his eldest son, has loved for a little while Freda, the daughter of Sir William's head-gamekeeper. She, too, is likely to have a child. In this case Freda still loves Bill, but he, having ceased to love her, is still determined to marry her. Given the feeling of caste which lies so heavily on the family, and presuming the feelings of Freda and her father—a most devoted, honourable, competent servant—a situation of the greatest interest is evolved, and the development awaited with candid excitement by the audience.

The affair is ended without the slightest artificiality. There are no strokes of the theatre for Mr. John Galsworthy; everything is sincere and beautiful in its simplicity. The language throughout is exactly such as the characters—all well known to every man of general experience—would have used. The situations develop naturally, nothing is forced, nothing set down for mere effect. Much is left to the fully stimulated imagination of the audience. Although written a few years ago, it is by far the truest and soundest piece of dramatic work produced in our generation. To have such a play staged under the management of Mr. Granville Barker is a point on which we congratulate both that gentleman and the author. Seldom has a cast been so admirably chosen; rarely have sixteen actors formed just such a valuable ensemble. One cannot over-praise the portrait which Mr. Edmund Maurice gives of Sir William Cheshire, the confident, self-satisfied, proud, and perfectly human country gentleman, who believes, heart and soul, in the importance of such a family as his in the conduct of the country. Never for a moment did Mr. Maurice loosen his grip upon the audience, or fail to sustain the manner in every look and movement of the man he intended to show us.

The Freda of Miss Cathleen Nesbitt proved of equal value to the play; her sincerity cut one to the quick, her regretful self-negation at the end of the play left one subdued to a sense of pity and of bitterness. The Irish lady who is visiting at the Cheshires' country house, Mabel Lanfarne (Miss Ellen O'Malley) says of Freda, whom she recognises as a difficulty in the way of her friendliness with Bill, that "she walks in beauty." Only Mabel could have quoted Byron thus, for the whole family is far too reticent, far too lacking in ideas, to do anything so appropriate and meaning. It is one of the thousands of admirable character-touches with which Mr. Galsworthy endows his fine play. For Freda really does walk in beauty like the night, and all that's best of the darkness and the stars meet in her wonderful eyes. Miss Nesbitt walks in beauty and walks to victory. If every other part were not perfectly played, she alone might have made the fortunes of "The Eldest Son."

But, as it is, we have the added delight of Miss Irene Hentschel's Rose Taylor, the village girl as she really is; the Rev. John Latter of Mr. Maunsell; the baronet's second daughter Dot of Miss Irene McLeod, who suggests the revolt and the future in store for the Cheshires very plainly. It is rather tedious to recount the names of the perfect cast, but one cannot forgo the pleasure of mentioning the excellence, in their different ways, of Mr. Claude King, Mr. William Farren, Mr. Moffat Johnston—these shine a little more fully because of their parts, but no one is weak, no one is wayward, no one permits the illusion of reality to drop for one moment. The result is a fine play splendidly presented.

THE DANCERS

BEFORE this admirable piece of acting we are entertained for a little while by Miss Margaret Morris and her dancing children. One cannot imagine a more delightful prelude to a serious play, or a more attractive entertainment in itself. The music and the dancing are full of light and colour. Possibly the little girls are not so beautiful or accomplished as Miss Isadora Duncan's pupils, but that does not matter. They are delicious little children, in delightful costumes, who dance and move to the beautiful music of Schumann, or each in turn—

> . . . . . musical at heart—
> Throbs to the gathered grieving of Beethoven,
> Sways to the light coquetting of Mozart

Only, I don't think Mozart happened to be in evidence on the night I saw this most pleasant group influence the audience at the Kingsway in the direction of beauty and gaiety.

A Triple Bill at The Prince of Wales' Theatre

THESE three curious and delightfully original pieces are for a few matinées only—if one may judge by the note on the programme; but if we may be guided by the pleasure of the audience, they should hold the stage for a long, long period.

The first and in its particular manner the most captivating is "An Imaginary Conversation" held in the pleasant room, with early Georgian furniture, over Mr. Moore's shop in Dublin, in May, 1797. The characters are Robert Emmet, the handsome and heroic (Mr. Graham Browne); Tom Moore (Mr. Shiel Barry), as a lad, beginning to fit his pleasant words to old Irish melodies; and his sister, Kate Moore (Miss Marie Tempest), who sings some of them and the "Marseillaise" in her sympathetic, clear, enthralling voice. Mr. Norreys Connell, who has never written anything commonplace or dull, weaves a gay and pathetic story out of the conversation of these three, and ends it with a dramatic and tragic epilogue which drives home the underlying seriousness of the play with a sting from the lash of his ever-ready satiric whip. To the unknowing this may seem an undramatic trifle. But there are no trifles in art, and this "Imaginary Conversation" is distinguished and bold and original, and made doubly delightful by the two clever actors and the gifted Miss Tempest.

"The Dumb and the Blind," by Mr. Harold Chapin, is also far from the dusty, beaten track which one usually has to follow in the theatre. It tells in vivid, broken words of a hidden but beautiful love incident in a tenement house in Bermondsey. Joe Henderson, of Mud Barge E4 (Mr. Graham Browne), and his wife Liz (Miss Elsie Davison), have been married some years, during which time the man's work has kept him a good deal away from home. They are deaf and dumb to each other's love. He is moved to a job which will enable him to remain at home. By an accident Joe discovers how deeply grateful Liz is for this chance of seeing more of the man to whom she is devoted, and he is touched—well, far beyond expression. That is a simple story, but it rings truly, and it is developed by the author with a fine sense of the tenderness and humour of life. Liz's young daughter Emmy is a character made perfect by Miss Bessie Courtney. Bill Pepper (Mr. John Alexander), a friend, is delightful in his seriousness and truth. The whole thing, compact of romance, is still expressed in the exact terms of tenement life. Mr. Browne's acting of Joe is certainly the best thing he has ever done, and he has often done well. Miss Davison I have not noticed in other parts, but she presents Liz with complete knowledge and effect; her every movement and intonation tells; she can play upon the emotions of the audience just as much as she pleases by the simplest and most direct means. The play is a victory in which the author and actors share equally.

"The Malingerers" makes one more entertaining change in the triple bill. After Mr. Connell's lightly treated satiric tragedy, and Mr. Chapin's realistic and, as it were, secret romance, we are diverted to the fantastic wordless world of Pierrot, his love, his rival, and his doctor. The period and the whole comedy is boldly rococo, yet decorative and diverting. The scene, the costumes, the furniture, and the play itself have been invented by Mr. Sidney Lewis-Ransom, who plays the part of Fraud, the doctor, with a fine feeling for this queer figure of pantomime. The general air of the piece reminds one pleasantly of Beardsley's illustrations to the "Rape of the Lock"—some of his most beautiful work—but it goes further back than those drawings in spirit, and contains the essence of all Pierrot comedies within its elegant limits. For the second time in the afternoon Miss Tempest holds the admiration of the audience. Her Pierrot, here called Frivol, is a superb piece of pantomime character; her lightness, her sadness, her gaiety and despair are all delicately and yet strongly expressed. Miss Kate Sergeantson—who is always so clever—surprises one with her remarkable manservant, Silence; Miss Dillon is a divine enchantress; and, for the third time in the afternoon, Mr. Graham Browne is excellent in this play as the rival of Pierrot. There are plenty of people who find our theatres trite and conventional; they can be assured of amusement—and deeper pleasure, too—at one of these Prince of Wales' matinées.

"Hedda Gabler" at Clavier Hall

THE Drama Society presented Miss Octavia Kenmore and Mr. Leigh Lovel in "Hedda Gabler" at the Clavier Hall, Hanover Square, on Tuesday, November 26. Mr. Leigh Lovel has to some extent familiarised English audiences with Ibsen's great character tragedy. And who that has seen it can ever forget that picture of Hedda Gabler? The relentless and determined mental aberration that deviates neither from its path nor from the results of its actions is probably unexampled in dramatic literature. Sometimes jealous, sometimes cynical, sometimes ambitious; but ever and always moving onward to that terrible goal with which the tragedy reaches its natural culmination. The character, at once remorselessly intelligent and at the same time lacking in intellectual and moral traits, is exceedingly difficult to represent; nevertheless, allowing for the difficulties of staging the production, Miss Octavia Kenmore must be congratulated upon a very thorough study. Mr. Claud Sykes as the husband, George Tesman, was never able to realise his part. The general dullness of perception (outside his subject of sociology) and the peculiar idiosyncrasies of diction were so overacted and emphasised that the character was made to appear ludicrous. Mr. Leigh Lovel played the part of Judge Brack with considerable insight, while Mr. Rathmell Wilson acted the character of Eilert Lövborg with great feeling. Miss Doris Digby as Aunt Juliana and Miss Daisy Race as Mrs. Elvsted gave careful studies of their respective parts. The play was produced by Mr. Leigh Lovel. At the next performance the Drama Society will present a new Russian play.

The Cossacks and their Value to the Russian Army

BY A COSSACK OF THE DON.

IT is very difficult to speak of Cossacks as warriors before having said something as to the reasons of their appearance on the bounds of the Russian Empire, which, ever since the fifteenth century, they have guarded from the invasions of numerous neighbours. With the development of slavery, the peasants showed a wish to become affiliated with free peoples, who occupied themselves with wars and irruptions, who knew no slavery and no restraints, and who, thanks to their warlike spirit, lived richly and sumptuously. The more the peasants were persecuted, the more they went over to the Don and were inscribed as belonging to the Cossack race. By that means was formed the mighty and powerful army which saved Russia so many times and continues to carry the heavy task of the vanguard proclaimers of war.

It is impossible to enumerate all the battles in which the Cossacks played the determining part. But of their more glorious deeds the most remarkable in its conception was their campaign towards India. I am not sure that everybody is acquainted with the great strain which was caused by this whim of the sick Emperor. Twenty thousand men, counting the old and infirm, under the command of Ilovaïsky, general-in-chief, advanced to Orenburg on February 27, 1801, not even having the map of the empire which they had to subjugate. One of the reasons of this foolish decision was the wrath that the Emperor harboured towards the fine policy of the British nation. The strength of the Cossacks and the great energy which was hidden in the hearts of men accustomed to live by war, and only for war, had to be poured out. All the wealth and beauties of India, all the attractions of the East promised by the Emperor in reward, stimulated the fancy of the inhabitants of the Don. They moved, as the Magi, searching their way by the stars, without either artillery or river-boats, nor having any stores of food. Indeed, they were given only three days for the outfit.

It is no wonder that in such conditions they lost six thousand men without even leaving Russia. But happily on the ascension to the throne of the Emperor Alexandre this strange adventure was stopped. History provides many other examples of Cossack daring: the conquest of the vast Siberia with a division of seven hundred men under the command of Ermak, which greatly enlarged the territory of the Russian Empire; and, further, of Azoff, Potsdam, and Neimour, which fell victims of the savage bravery of a horde equipped according to Eastern custom, with swords, lances, and knives, and with only very few firearms. But it is unnecessary to look so far back, when the Ataman cavalry during the wars of 1878 and 1904 gave splendid examples of Cossack bravery. When we listen now to the tales of the veterans who remember the most bloody moments of the Turkish campaign, we are astonished to hear how dreadful, even in simple narrative, are the images of the fights of the Caucasian Turks with our Cossacks. And involuntarily our minds go back to the glorious times, when all the South, all the course of the Dneiper, were formed by the camps of the Cossacks. Then the Tartar Hans, the Turkish Sultans, and the Kings of Poland feared them.

But with the modern evolution of military strategy, which places the centre of weight in war on the artillery, the importance of the Cossacks as of the whole cavalry loses much of its weight. Now the attacks on horse are so rare that the elementary qualities of the Cossack tactics have a mere historical significance. But it is not to be forgotten that the peculiarity of the Cossack order of battle is so confined that every Cossack is obliged to undergo a careful course of preparation before he is able to take his place in the ranks. He must be physically strong and be well acquainted with the horse; indeed, complete harmony must reign between the rider and his steed. These accomplishments are only acquired by continual practice during long years and beginning from early youth, and this is the reason why at the Don there are preparatory sections in which all boys over sixteen years of age have to serve. Those who are enrolled in the lines of the Cossacks of the Don have to be proficient with the sword and the lance, to jump from the horse and to pick up money which is strewn on the ground—in other words, must be able to jump as skilfully as acrobats. These are the first acquirements of a Cossack. Certainly such violent exercises contribute to keep the war qualities and the physical vigour among the people. Their height, strength, dexterity, and promptness astonish those who see for the first time the Cossacks of the Don, who, even by their exterior, little resemble the regular cavalry. They enter the regiments provided with their own horses and ammunition, and are, from the beginning, a well-formed and friendly mass, needing only exterior polish to become quite appropriate to war. The Cossack regiments differ from the other branches of the army in that, during many months, the latter lose time in bringing their recruits into normal order, whereas the Cossacks of the Don can at any moment of the year come forward to the defence of their country.

In the space of a single article it is not possible to present the whole picture of Cossack life; but, without going into details, it must be said that the Cossacks do not look on the military service as upon a hard task, but as upon a high, sacred, and agreeable duty. And really the organisation of the Cossack regiments contributes to unfold in the Cossack love of the military service and a friendly feeling, one man towards the other. On entering the regiment, which each year is recruited from the same stanitza (village), the soldier meets there a brother, an uncle, a friend, not in one, but in many instances, and so the ties of his early life are perpetuated.

The Cossacks of the Don comprise twenty regiments. Each regiment bears the name of a Cossack leader who specially distinguished himself in battle, the guard regiments having as chiefs—the first, the reigning Emperor; the second, the Heir to the Throne. We find it necessary to mention this because the Cossacks themselves very highly esteem the laurels won in the wars by the regiments in which they serve. They do so by a quite comprehensible feeling of proudness, and, secondly, because the names of those who fought for their country will never be forgotten in history, while humanity will remember the exploits of those who settled the fate of nations and sovereigns. and warlike characteristics of the Cossacks, we may now look a little upon another side of their life, which, it must be said, has a great influence on the morale of the Cossacks as a unit in wartime and in civil life.

At the Don there are not many towns of importance —Rostow, Novotcherkask, and a few more, the last-named being very great rivals. Rostow resembles Odessa, but is larger and richer. Its inhabitants are very mixed, and, if it were not for the military schools, one could scarcely see any traces of its belonging to the troops of the Don. Novotcherkask, considered the capital of the Don, is the favourite town of the Cossacks, and contains many ancient monuments and old and precious relics. The Palace of the Hetman is in this town, and in it is concentrated the central administration of the country. The Hetman is the first person in civil as in military matters, the post being always occupied by one of the most worthy generals of the Empire. Nowadays it is a hero of the recent war—Mischenko, Adjutant-General to the Tsar, who fills the office of Hetman.

Most of the population live in villages called "choutar," and have their own self-government in the persons of delegates who represent the country and district authorities. They help the Cossacks in many land-suits and other domestic questions. Each Cossack, after his birth, is given a plot of land, as if in compensation for his service, his outfit, and his steed. Class and social divisions exist at the Don, but they differ from those obtaining in other provinces of the Empire by the little importance that is attached to quality and noble birth, which with them have no price, whereas everywhere else they have much importance. They have the highest class, which is represented by officers who play the part of the educated guild, but very unwillingly. Certainly the distinction of birth is very much esteemed, the descendants of heros and Hetmans standing high in the public consideration, many of them serving in the guards, but that is all. In the hours free from duty an officer of noble birth speaks with and treats his Cossack quite as an equal: the soldier, indeed, would be astonished were it otherwise. He is well aware that not only the Cossacks, but even the officers would turn away from a conceited comrade. These are the charms of life at the Don. There never were and never will be any slaves. Therefore it is not inaccurate to remark that if the ideas of universal freedom are only now being preached in Russia, they existed already many centuries at the Don.

Concerning the development of instruction one must say that here also the outskirts of the country are not behind the centres of culture. A very good Polytechnical institute, a newly built university, a good many public schools, and special military establishments, tell us that even in the arts and sciences the Cossack keeps pace with the other members of the Russian population. The most popular Russian historian is a Cossack and the descendant of a celebrated general. It only remains to be added that at the south of the Don there are rich coal mines, which are nearly all superintended by young engineers, Cossacks by birth, who finished their education in the high colleges of Russia and Germany.

AL MOHOVSKOY.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

IT is becoming more and more clear that the Home Rule Bill cannot be made to stand up—even if left alone and not attacked. It has been so carelessly drafted that its defenders cannot even answer questions about it. For instance, on Wednesday we examined, or tried to examine, a new body to be formed called the Joint Exchequer Board, which is to be given the power of deciding how much money England is to give Ireland. Manifestly a very important body; but we could discover very little about it. We diligently inquired of how many members it would consist; what class of person would be nominated on to it; were they to be paid; how much authority were they to wield?

"It is not necessary to provide for all this in the Bill," said Rufus Isaacs. Austen, who has that rare gift, a memory for past debates, taunted the Government with their statements during the passing of the Parliament Bill that they intended to make the House of Commons supreme in the matter of finance; and here they were delegating it to a body of which we could learn nothing. Stuart-Wortley, a painstaking railway director, who does not speak half enough, coined a phrase that will stick—"I call it cynical indolence." That is exactly what it is, and the worst of it is that although they now see it for themselves, they have no time to amend. They are caught in the wheels of their own guillotine; they cannot stop to put things right—that would cause more discussion and upset the second time table. They must, therefore, press on with a Bill that is not workable even from their own point of view. It was Arthur Balfour who said: "Tyranny grows upon what it feeds." "This system of ruthless and indiscriminate closure," he went on, "has made the Government thoroughly indifferent to the ordinary decorum of legislation."

On Tuesday we sat up all night over Welsh Disestablishment. When the Parliament Bill was going through Mr. Asquith certainly gave the House to understand that only one measure of first-class importance should go through each Session. Did he say it? If so, when did he say it, and what were the words? Everybody brought in old volumes of Hansard and quoted bits of speeches. Asquith denied saying anything of the kind. He said he had distinctly and directly refused to pledge himself to any limit at all except what Nature itself would impose on the power of endurance of the House of Commons! So this is what Parliament has come to. Laws are to be passed by means of gag and kangaroo so long as members can keep awake.

We therefore decided then and there to test the physical power and endurance of the coalition. Some Radicals spoke against adopting the closure for this Bill. That querulous quidnunc Byles, who is always protesting but takes care never to vote against the Government, was dead against the closure. Why substitute party strength for the real triumph of reason and argument? Bonar Law twitted Asquith with not being present at the debates, but the Premier said he had been absent because of weighty matters that required his attention elsewhere. Both the early majorities fell to 74 and 72, and the Government saw it would be wise to give way; for if seventy-eight Nationalists had not been present the Government would have been defeated again. Two more days were given, and all through the night the Unionists fought on, having the satisfaction of keeping over twice their number out of bed; and all through the night the Radical Whips kept an anxious eye on the door, for it was feared that at three or at four fifty Unionists might come back.

Friday is always considered a bye-day, and yet the Government now intended to take this Bill on Friday, starting the sitting at eleven instead of noon, to the great inconvenience of business men. "It is all very well for professional politicians at £400 a year to snigger, but do you want to drive all business men out of the House?" asked Bob Cecil. The last division was taken about half-past five. The Unionist leaders did not want to challenge, but some hot-heads argued that they must divide against the main question. A number of Unionists left the chamber as the division bell rang, as a protest, but as the Irish had announced that they intended forcing a division at any price, it would have been better if they had stayed. The only good done was that the Unionists who left took all the cabs and taxis, and the Radical party had to hie its way to the Underground Railway and wait for the workmen's trains.

"It was very dull," said John Redmond, as we stood waiting in the cold darkness, the rain pattering on to the tin roofs—as if he would say, "If we had been obstructing, we should have had more fun." And yet a lot of funny things happen that never get into the papers; for instance, one day last week a breezy young Unionist Whip in temporary charge of the divisions, discovered that both the Radical Whips were bald, so for the sake of uniformity he chose (quite unknown to them) two bald men to tell also. When they bowed in the dim afternoon light it looked as if four ostrich eggs were bobbing up and down. Encouraged by this success he next chose two fat men and then two thin men—all equally unconscious of why they were summoned for this honour. The game was only discovered accidentally by Balcarres, who wanted to know why Amery, the shortest man in our party, was told off to tell with Ronald M'Neil—our son of Anak. This he stopped, to the grief of the few in the know. Reviewing the story afterwards in the smoking-room somebody alleged that in the *x*th division, the breezy Whip had chosen the two ugliest men in our party. "Why, that was when I was——" objected a listener, amid roars of laughter, in which he fled.

On Friday we came down to the House at noon, six hours after we had left it—"feeling fresher but pink-eyed," as Bobbie Monsell graphically expressed it. The debate was on a really high level. Griffith-Boscawen proposed that the Bill should be divided into two parts. Some Radicals were honestly in favour of Disestablishment and others in favour of disendowment. Some wanted both, but there were a great many who wanted one and not the other. He boldly claimed Lloyd George as a non-disendower. Did he want to live in history like Henry VIII? Did he want, to use his own phrase, to have his hands "dripping with the fat of sacrilege?" The Nonconformist bodies had trust deeds setting out their beliefs in black and white. It was common knowledge that many of their opinions were in a state of flux. There would be a temptation to the cupidity of a Government to disendow them on the ground that their objects had failed. F. E. Smith, as a Nonconformist, made a long speech, low in tone and very moderate in expression; but his very moderation increased the power of his attack, and he made out an unanswerable case for the separation of the two questions. He spoke like Cave, the embodiment of equity.

There were one or two explosions, and the Speaker urged members not to be provocative, but it all ended in the usual way; the gag was applied and the instruction was defeated.

Ginnell had the audacity at five p.m. to try to debate on the scandal of the Dublin Crown jewels—but this was too much for everybody—so we fled before forty could be counted. Some stood behind the Speaker's chair to see the end. Mischievous Booth shouted out—as the Speaker ended his count—"There are some behind your chair, Sir!" The Speaker turned round, but it was too late, "he could not see them for dust."

On Monday, to the annoyance of the Scotch, who always make a great festival of New Year's Eve, Asquith announced that the Christmas holidays would consist of ten days, from December 20 to 30. One member asked him if he was not aware of the custom, and Asquith blandly replied: Oh, yes, he had been there, and knew all about it! There is a sort of promise held out that we shall have all February for a holiday, but personally I do not see how it will be possible. We can never finish all we have to do by the end of January, even if we sit all night, and that would be going beyond Asquith's limit—namely, physical endurance.

There was a human little touch when grim Sir Henry Craik apologised to Masterman for asking why he was not present the other day to answer his question. It appears that Masterman had become a father on the date in question, and he blushed under his tangled mane when the House cheered the news.

We then went on to financial relationships again, and Cassel made the speech of the evening. He is a K.C. in considerable practice, and used to facts, figures, dates, and juries. The way he administered a series of interrogatories to the Government was most entertaining. With admirable clearness he first asked if the Government proposed to do so and so, and, without pausing for a reply, gave the answer. That stuck them on the horn of one dilemma. Then he took it that the Government would take the other course, and showed how equally impossible that course was. This kind of question and answer extended over four or six different subjects, and was greatly enjoyed by the Opposition, while the Government officials writhed uneasily.

Lloyd George is a very clever man, but he has no head for details, and I should say was less at home at figures than Arthur Balfour, which is saying a good deal. I have been told that, if you gave him a thick brief overnight packed with facts he could no more digest it than fly, but he can get secretaries to do it for him in such a way that when he meets, say, a deputation in the morning he would convince them all that he knew the subject in all its details. He has a genius for picking out salient points and things that matter. He "strolled into the House" this afternoon, as Bonar Law described it, and tried to answer Felix Cassell and make things clear; but this was no respectful deputation, but a keen and critical Opposition in the House of Commons. It was certainly not one of Lloyd George's "days." Bonar Law tore his explanation to pieces, but he had only ten minutes in which to do it before the guillotine fell. The greatest friend the Government has is the clock. It answers questions that would otherwise be unanswerable.

On Tuesday the question of the Judges was discussed: should they be appointed by the Imperial Authority or by the Dublin Parliament? When I was in Canada I was at some pains to inquire why so many Americans were crossing the border, and one of the reasons given was because the Canadian local courts were purer than the United States State tribunals. Inquiring further, I found that the Canadian Government had resolutely determined to make all appointments from the central authority at Ottawa, instead of allowing each province to appoint its own judiciary. In the United States the opposite is the case; local pressure and local passions are brought into play, and the locally appointed judge has not the independence necessary. And yet in this United Kingdom the Government actually propose to leave the appointment of the Irish Bench to the minions of Redmond and Devlin.

Religious animosity blazed all day. William Moore told a story of two Nationalist poachers being caught in the act—how the local magistrates released the poachers and put the Protestant prosecutors in prison, and on both occasions Mr. Birrell had to interfere and get them released by telegram. Mr. McMaster made a neat speech endorsing my Canadian experiences, but all to no purpose; the guillotine fell with an unintellectual thud.

The important speeches on the Territorials and the necessary defence of the country delivered recently by Lord Roberts to the citizens of Manchester and to the Men of Kent, at their annual dinner, have been reprinted in sixpenny pamphlet form, and will be published by Mr. John Murray at once.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE INTERNATIONAL DEADLOCK.

THE alternative waves of optimism and pessimism which characterise the views of the daily Press afford little by way of clue to the exact state of the international situation. Frequently we have insisted in these columns that, so long as Austria and Servia maintained towards each other an uncompromising attitude on the question of the Adriatic seaboard, a severe strain would necessarily be imposed upon the peace of Europe. Naturally, as the time is approaching for a settlement of all issues arising out of the war, and as neither party to the dispute over Albanian territory shows the least sign of yielding, the crisis has developed acute symptoms. But we cannot subscribe to the theory advanced in certain quarters, where an incorrigible douleur prevails, that these symptoms necessarily portend a clash of arms in which the Great Powers will be called upon to range themselves in opposing camps. In spite of the more combustible elements in a situation admittedly grave, we refuse to believe, even at this stage, that the application of the principle of reconcilability is beyond the resources of diplomacy.

The present tension arises, of course, from Servia's desire to find an outlet on the Adriatic coast, an outlet by way of a strip of territory over which she asks for international recognition of her sovereignty. At the time when her requirements were first made known to the world, outside the two Adriatic Powers, almost universal sympathy was expressed in regard to what were termed her legitimate aspirations. Indeed, even earlier forecasts of objections which it was expected Italy and Austria would raise to the prosecution of such a policy were concerned exclusively with the obligations of the Governments of Rome and Vienna to see maintained the integrity of Albania. To-day, however, it is becoming clear that the real motive underlying Austro-Italian hostility is to be found in a jealous determination to exclude Servia from the shores of the Adriatic.

There, then, lies the true cause of the present deadlock which threatens such widespread and such alarming complications. Up to a point Servia has given some indication of the desire to act in a spirit of compromise, her express wish being to avoid anything in the nature of an open rupture in which the Great Powers might find themselves involved. That her attitude has been largely determined by Russia, whose counsels all along have been on the side of moderation, there can be no room for doubt. And so it has come about that in the process of modifying her demands Servia is approaching what amounts to the irreducible minimum consistent alike with national honour and national requirements. Yet she is met, apparently, with an uncompromising front by Austria-Hungary and Italy. "The two Adriatic States," writes the Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, "have resolved to oppose the advent of a third Power to the Adriatic, and, even if Servia's demand were limited to one square mile of territory over which her national flag could fly, it will be refused without discussion." The question naturally arises as to how much farther the St. Petersburg Government is likely to go in the direction of bringing influence to bear at Belgrade, with the object of finding a peaceful solution. In our opinion, the Northern Power, whose interests in the Balkan problem are indisputable, has already reached the irreducible minimum to which she is disposed to exert such influence. We cannot doubt that this probability is being taken carefully into account, both in Downing Street and at the Quai d'Orsay.

Meanwhile the attitude recently adopted by Germany should give food for reflection to people in this country who throughout the present crisis have clamoured for freedom from our "entanglements" on the Continent. In no country in the world does there exist a more intelligent conception of the widespread evils of war than in Germany. The peace party of the nation is large and influential; and yet, as Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg well knows, the people as a whole would temporarily relinquish their ideals in the face of national peril. It is true that neither we ourselves nor Germany possess any immediate interests in the Balkans; but we cannot, from the point of view of our Imperial safety, afford to remain idle when out of the Balkan problem may come a redistribution of European influence. Before electing finally to remain without the arena, we must make up our minds as to what would be our position were we to do so, whether such a redistribution of influence favoured the Powers of the Triplice or the Powers of the Dual Alliance. In either case we could find no cause for satisfaction; and the least evil that could result would be a serious blow to our prestige arising from the shaken confidence and diminished respect to which we would be regarded alike by foes and erstwhile friends.

THE latest phase of the protracted controversy over the tyre test business consists of the publication of an official statement by order of the committee of the R. A. C. which places the latter in a worse light than ever, and makes it clear that they have bungled the matter from the beginning. It is to the effect that although the Club originally agreed to conduct a competitive trial between the Victor and three other leading tyres, "at a late stage in the negotiations it became clear that the Victor tyres could only be selected from one stock in this country, whereas the tyres of the other companies could be selected from a large number of depôts all over the kingdom," the inference intended to be drawn being that the other companies would have been unfairly treated had the agreed trial been carried out.

But in what does the unfairness consist, unless the other companies make a practice of supplying their

The NOISELESS NAPIER—the Proved BEST CAR

CLUTCH. The latest Napier clutch, which does not require lubrication, never gets fierce, and can be slipped to an incredible extent at will without harm or vibration. It has all the advantages of the Napier multiple-disc clutch, but eliminates the necessity for oil.
Two driving discs revolving with fly-wheel, coated on wearing surface with a special heat-resisting composition, are pressed together by a number of springs against a plain steel disc fixed to gear-shaft. Depressing the clutch-pedal forces apart the two driver discs, so that they revolve freely. The last word in Clutch construction.

38.4 SIX-CYLINDER LIGHT-TOUCH CHANGE-SPEED GEAR-BOX. Provides three speeds and a reverse, the top speed direct, when the lay-shaft is out of mesh and lying idle. This lay-shaft is taken out of mesh and returned by positive means, no springs being used. This is a unique feature, as no other gear-box is made with such an advantage incorporated.
All locking and gate mechanism is inside gear-box itself, and special oil-retainers are fitted to clutch and propeller shafts capable of resisting paraffin. The most carefully thought-out gear-box made, without exception.

SIX-CYLINDER ENGINES... . (above 15 h.p.). The original Napier conception, and since adopted by all high-class manufacturers. No dead centre; constant torque eliminating distressing blows to transmission and tyres; consequent lightening of gears and gear-shafts and saving of wear on tyres. The extra purchasing cost of six cylinders is soon repaid by saving of cost in tyres—at least 20 per cent. greater mileage with six cylinders compared with four cylinders of same horse-power and load.

WORM DRIVE ON 15 H.P. AND 30 H.P. Napier worm drive, having proved so successful on the 15 after long continued tests, now adopted on the 30-h.p. six-cylinders. Difficult to manufacture, but when perfect, as on the 30-h.p. six-cylinder Napier, nothing to equal it.

15 H.P. NAPIER WITH ENGINE-CLUTCH AND GEAR UNIVERSALLY SUSPENDED. The engine-clutch and gear-box are all connected together in one complete unit, which is suspended in the frame from three points in such a way that chassis distortion is not communicated to the unit. This does away with the necessity for universal joints between the engine and clutch and clutch and gear-box.

various depots in the provinces with tyres inferior in quality to those kept at head-quarters—which is highly improbable? And in any case, why could not the test tyres have been selected, if necessary, from the head-quarters of each of the four companies concerned? It has apparently taken the Club nearly five months to evolve this "explanation," which is too palpably lame and insincere to satisfy anybody, and which has obviously been given only at this late stage because it has been found impossible to maintain silence any longer. The fact is that in accepting the invitation to hold the trial the Club made a gigantic mistake. It entirely overlooked the contingency—obvious to everybody else—of powerful opposition on the part of the trade, and when this opposition made itself evident it thought to extricate itself by a curt intimation of withdrawal. The forced and belated "explanation" only makes matters worse, and the thanks of motorists are due to the makers of the Victor for having declined to take their treatment "lying down." The unpleasant part of it is that in future no one will believe in the absolute independence of the Club from the pernicious effects of the influence of "the trade."

The extent to which the motor industry is transforming the industrial aspect of the country is evidenced, not only in the great motor manufacturing centres of the Midlands and the North, but also in many towns which until a few years ago were famous in quite different departments of industry. Luton, for example, which has for generations been associated in the public mind with the manufacture of straw hats, has within the last seven or eight years become an engineering centre of considerable importance. This fact is strikingly emphasised in the recently issued birthday number of the Luton News, which cites a number of large firms that have revolutionised the industrial life of the town. Among these are the makers of the well-known "Commer" commercial motor vehicles, which are familiar to every Londoner, and Vauxhall Motors, Ltd., the manufacturers of the popular pleasure car of that name. These two companies alone give constant employment to many hundreds of hands, and every week witnesses additions to the number of motor mechanics engaged in the town.

Mr. H. T. Vane, the new managing director of Messrs. S. F. Edge, Ltd., has signalised his accession to the supreme control of the company by bringing out "The Napier Book," a splendidly printed and illustrated catalogue of the Napier models for 1913. The contents, unlike those of many others of the catalogues issued by motor-car manufacturers, are exceedingly well arranged, the illustration of each of the various types being accompanied only, on the same page, by a simple statement of the car's special features, its chassis, and complete prices respectively, and the tax it pays. The complete specifications are given in another section of the book. In addition, there is a selection of names of distinguished owners of Napiers, an imposing list of the principal world's records, etc., secured by Napiers, and an interesting description of the processes they pass through in manufacture at the immense works at Acton. It will be news to many that the family of Napier has for generations made the machinery for the Royal Mints, both of this and other countries.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THERE is no change to report in the attitude of the City. The war continues and the refusal of the public to buy stocks and shares remains unchanged. Who can blame them? If peace is suddenly accomplished then we shall get a rise of one or two points in certain securities. But if war goes on and other countries become involved, a drop of 10 to 20 points all round is a dead certainty. Therefore, the man who buys to-day as a speculation is really laying about 20 to 1 on peace. These are not the odds at all. Indeed, as I write I should call them much nearer 2 to 1. The bulk of the public has a sort of rough-and-ready sense which keeps it out of danger except in days of great excitement. That sense is helping it to-day. Caution is money when the world is fighting.

But a few reckless promoters have braved the cold wind that chills the City. Horatio Bottomley tried fate once again with his Consolidated Oilfields of South Africa, a truly desperate venture. But he found no followers. His optimism has once again misled him. Frankly, I have never met a more ridiculous offer of shares. I cannot call it a prospectus. It does not come within the Act. At least, I presume that it doesn't. Perhaps someone will test this point. I notice that the Statist advises those who have applied to withdraw by telegram. But if the offer is not made under the Companies Acts—and there is nothing to show that it is—then withdrawal would be useless because I imagine that the Board would allot each day and all day any share or shares that are applied for.

The British Portland Cement is once more asking for money. I think it would be wiser if investors waited to see what result the combine can exercise upon prices. Trade is good, and the cement works are busy. But if they become slack I imagine that these over-capitalised concerns would do very badly indeed.

MONEY does not grow cheaper. On the contrary the banks will not lend readily. They are most conservative. Austria needs money badly and is compelled to borrow on Treasury Notes at very high rates. She is on the eve of a financial crisis. Germany needs money badly. She is in good credit, but even she finds difficulty in getting what she wants. It is possible that the Reichsbank will have to put up its rate. The Bank of France is losing gold. Our own bank, thanks to its courage in raising the rate in time, is in a much better position. But in the United States call-money is very dear. Extravagant rates have been paid for short loans. Russia has an ample supply of gold, but she has most foolishly entered into a State-aided market deal directed against her ally France. It is said that here the hand of the Grand Dukes is visible. Russia is so rich that she can afford to play pranks with finance, but it is a queer thing to support a gambling market with State funds. Brazil has done it, but no other country that I am aware of. We shall get no cheap money before the end of January. Even then the outlook is not good for trade is booming and the demand for money is increasing, not falling away.

HOME RAILS.—The prices of Home Railway Stocks look cheaper each week as the end of the half year approaches. Traffics remain good, and as there have been no labour troubles in the half-year, the companies must have done well. Prices of coal, copper and iron have been high, and this will affect working expenses. But most of the lines have raised their passenger rates, and we may find that the increase here will counterbalance the additional cost of materials. As I have again and again pointed out, the Great Central shows the most important relative increase, and the 1889 Preference should get the full dividend. Indeed, there may be enough to pay a little on the 1891. North Eastern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and London and North Western are all sound purchases. I suggest no speculation. The present price of money makes that unprofitable. But I do say that those who want a five per cent. gilt-edged investment could not do better than buy to-day.

YANKEES were startled by the decision that the combine between Union Pacific and Southern Pacific was illegal. But the position of the Union is not damaged because it is still in possession of an entrance into San Francisco. That is not disturbed. It will have to sell its Southern Pacific stock. It may decide to retire the preference. It may cut the melon for the benefit of the ordinary shareholders. In any case I look upon the decision as a "bull" point. Chesapeakes have been bought, traffics are improving and the common stock looks cheap. It is a good investment at to-day's prices. Southerns are a reasonable lock-up. Business all over the South is good and this railway is now in excellent shape. The common stock may not pay a dividend this next year, but it will earn one.

RUBBER shares are steady. This means that no one tries to sell. But there are no buyers. There is nothing to induce buying. The Taiping report is out but I see nothing attractive in the shares. The capital is too big. The report does not tell us anything. Mr. Lampard has spoilt us. He always gives complete details. When other companies fail to reach the high standard of the Harrisons and Crosfield group we grumble.

OIL shares remain very much as they were last week. Mr. Boxall having denied that he had joined the board of the Oil Trust of Galicia has now changed his mind. He is the chairman. Maisel will not, however, obtain any control. The story that Mr. Kennedy Jones will take a hand in this company is not confirmed. The wells will be under the management of the Premier Oil and Pipe Line. North Caucasians have been rushed up in a few weeks from 2s. to 3s. 6d., as McGarvey has now got a much bigger production, and the group claim that they can eclipse Spies and become the biggest oil company at Grosny. Some of the Debentures have been converted into shares, but Standard Russe, which owns £50,000, decline to convert.

MINES are quite out of fashion. The Pahang report shows that the company has gained enough to pay off its arrears of preference and carry forward a good round sum. If those who have the call on the new shares exercise this call the company will be in funds and can go on prospecting, but at present it has hardly enough money to do more than pick out the richest spots and sell the tin to pay expenses. The shares are, however, talked higher. The Whim Well report tells us very little. What we all want to know is whether the French group whose engineer has just come back intend to find fresh capital. This must be found if the mine is to work its large bodies of 5 per cent. ore. It can hardly be hoped that the mine will go on finding 20 to 30 per cent. ore for ever. The Lena report is bad and I should not be surprised to find it worse next year than this. The mines are badly managed. Both the Kaffir and Rhodesian markets are quite dead for the moment. Copper shares are still suffering from the slump caused by the war. This seems absurd, for the war must have caused the destruction of thousands of tons of copper. The statistics of this metal are good, but the market for the shares is dull.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are steady. Slaters report is a shade better than last year, but not good enough to suggest a purchase of the shares. The P. and O. report was satisfactory. This great company tell the public bravely that they find 5 per cent. depreciation quite insufficient for a shipping company. They pay the usual 15 per cent. on deferred and the financial position remains as strong as ever. There is much talk of great opposition in South America to the Farquhar schemes and it is said that the Argentine Government flatly refuse to sell their lines. They also talk of a refusal to allow B.A.G.S. and B.A.W. to amalgamate. The Argentines hate trusts and fight against any inclination to combine on the part of the railways.

INSANITY AND CRIME.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—As there are no subjects still so unknown as the causation of insanity and crime, and as there are none which call more urgently for a careful investigation, it seems a pity that in your review of Dr. Hollander's book in this week's ACADEMY you should state as facts what are not only not proved facts but are matters of very doubtful opinion.

That "heredity is by far the most potent predisposing cause of insanity" rests on no solid ground. The evidence for it cannot stand scrutiny. For instance, A is insane and it is discovered that his great-uncle B was once insane for a time, therefore it is inferred that there is a hereditary taint. But, if so, why are not the fifty other grand-nephews and nieces of that great-uncle insane? A hereditary taint that only shows itself in one case out of fifty, is not hereditary taint. Again, a hundred years ago B went insane. He has left a hundred descendants, none of whom is insane. If it is a hereditary taint, what has become of it?

C is insane to-day, but no hereditary taint can be discovered. How is that? And how can he originate a taint that will be transmitted?—acquired characteristics are not transmitted. If you take at random a thousand sane people and compare their ancestry with that of a thousand insane people, will you find more taint in one than the other? If so, it has never been proved, and I believe that there are few people who could not find in their ancestry some one who had been insane. That fact is ignored by those who maintain the hereditary nature of insanity. It is not enough to prove that insane people have somewhere an insane ancestor, you must prove that sane people have no such ancestry. But facts are the other way.

Therefore, what justification have you for saying "it is the duty of persons of either sex who have a mental taint not to continue the strain." Had your advice been followed in the past we should have had no Queen Victoria, no Edward VII, no King George, no German Emperor, yet I think the English people have been proud of their last three sovereigns. Are you proposing to bring the Royal families of England and Germany to an end? And this is not an exceptional case. If facts were known it would be found to be a common case. It is owing to this prejudice which you state as a truth that facts are concealed for the sake of the children, yet the children need have no fear. Were your suggestion adopted, half the world, the best half, would be ended. Elsewhere in your article insanity is attributed to pauperism, factory life, etc.; uncivilised people are said to be less subject to it, but both these statements are debatable, and the last probably quite incorrect. But if they are true, then the "hereditary taint" must be abandoned. If a person, though he or she have the "hereditary taint," does not become insane except under bad surroundings, then insanity is due to the bad surroundings, not the "taint."

Again, as to crime, you say "that the difference between the madman and the criminal is that one cannot and the other will not increase self-control." That such a theory is necessary to justify the penal system is true, but where are the facts to support it? There are none, and no one who has studied criminals in the making would admit the theory for a moment. The difference between a madman and a criminal is that the former does not know what he is doing, the latter does. Neither can help it. The madman is like a man who goes out into the rain, not knowing he will catch cold; the criminal is he who is caught in the rain. He knows well enough it may be his death, but he has no shelter and cannot buy a coat.

The criminal is made, not born. Lombroso's theory of stigmata has no sanction, because the "stigmata" are found universally. Other characteristics, such as loss of sensitiveness, are acquired, not hereditary. They arise in the process of making criminals. The discovery of what this process is and how to stop it is the most urging need of the day, but gaols only make things worse. In Holmes' "London's Underworld" and Devon's "The Criminal and the Community," we have real efforts to discover causes. But the study of the criminal after he is made is little use. The mischief is then done and can rarely be retrieved.

The best working theory of both insanity and crime which we have at present is that they are like tuberculosis—once also supposed to be an hereditary taint—the individual is predisposed to them by circumstances in his environment not under his control, and so weakened that when the microbe, the strain, or the temptation comes he cannot help but fall. The cure lies in changing the environment and not in talking of "taints" or "want of will." Your obedient servant, H. F. H.

THE TERRITORIAL IMPOSTURE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The columns of our leading daily papers have for some weeks past been largely occupied by correspondence relating to the present condition of the Territorial Army, and to that of our defensive resources in general. A great many letters have been written upon the subject by officers of the force in question, and have appeared in print. Such officers are clearly and undeniably guilty of a breach of the King's Regulations. And the gentlemen in question are doubtless fully aware of their guilt. That they should nevertheless deem it incumbent upon them to lay before the public the result of their experience as officers should surely suffice in itself to convince us that there is something seriously amiss with the Army in which they are serving. The figures relating to that Army recently published in the House of Lords by Lord Herschell are such as to give any sober citizen furiously to think. According to those figures the force is short of establishment strength by no fewer than 51,500 officers and men. Of members serving, 34,700 officers and men did not attend camp at all, and 67,000 attended for fewer than fifteen days. Of 198,160 men examined in musketry 34,504 failed to pass the tests—roughly speaking, 17½ per cent. The establishment strength of the Territorial Army, viz., 315,000, represents what at the time of its formation was regarded by Mr. Haldane and his expert advisers as the absolute minimum possible to meet the necessities of the case. Not only, therefore, are we at the present moment 51,000 short of the bare margin of safety, but a very high percentage of officers and men actually serving are returned as inefficient.

The answer, if answer there be, apparently is, that, even so, volunteers, however few, are preferable to any possible number of troops compelled to serve. The whole of military history refutes such a contention, but the gist of the matter is that we do not volunteer. In sober truth the volunteer is so hopelessly handicapped in the modern commercial and industrial struggle for existence that any system of national defence based upon voluntary service is obviously doomed to failure. The greater the praise due to our gallant remnant of a forlorn hope which bears the grandiloquent title of "Territorial Army." When will the Briton, if any Briton be left amongst us, dare to face the plain facts and assume that duty of national service which should be the proudest portion of his heritage?

"EDWIN DROOD."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In recent discussions upon the "Mystery of Edwin Drood," the Tartar-Datchery theory appears to have been somewhat ignored. Yet the evidence in its favour is very strong. John Forster, who was undoubtedly in Dickens' confidence, believed that to Tartar had been given the task of unmasking the murderous choirmaster.

The traditional method of fiction demanded that the lover of Rosa Bud should himself attempt to rescue her from persecution.

Tartar, also, was absent from London. Rosa expected him in vain to call upon her. Where could he be if not in Cloisterham?

Datchery, again, had a military air. No one except Tartar—who had actually commanded a corvette—could have assumed the walk and manner so well.

Datchery was unfamiliar with Cloisterham; so, also, was Tartar.

The first act of Datchery was to seize an opportunity of meeting Jasper face to face. Now, as Tartar did not know the choirmaster by sight, he would wish to acquaint himself at once with the latter's personal appearance.

The whole part, too, of Datchery suited Tartar admirably. He was himself "living idly on his means," and the "single buffer's" easy, frank, and open manners corresponded to his own.

Datchery's habit of going abroad in Cloisterham without a hat, and of keeping his hands in his pockets, indicated the careless sailor unaccustomed to the conventions of city life.

Tartar possessed, too, the courage, resolution, and quickness of invention, which his enterprise required.

Indeed, there does not seem to be a single weak link

A WORD WITH THE AMBITIOUS.

How a Master-mind will put you on the Royal Road to Success, Power and Influence.

IT is the ambitious man that we want to talk to in this announcement. It is this type of man particularly who will be more interested in what we have to say. Now to this type of man we put these questions, "Are you ready now, to satisfy your ambition, if we show you the way?" "Are you anxious to grasp your opportunities with both hands, and make the most of them?" "Are you willing to train your mind, personality and influence, along the true and scientific lines?"

What are your answers? YES! to every one of them! That is what we expect of you.

You want to succeed? You want to better your position in the world! You want to earn more money?

Then it is obvious you need the FRANK HARTLEY COURSE OF MENTI-CULTURE.

It is only the man who can use his brain, who can act promptly, who by reason of his superior mental culture, naturally dominates, and whose strong and powerful memory, who reaches the top rung of the Ladder of Success.

In whatever sphere of life you may be, it is the man with the magnetic personality, with the powerful grip of essential details—which can only be obtained by a well ordered and systematic mind—who will win.

Ask yourself how the various great schemes—political, commercial, naval, military and social—have been carried out. In each case the man or men with the powerful brain, with the indomitable courage—with the sure grasp of their proposition, forgetting nothing, it is to these men that we owe the successful endings to which those great schemes have been brought.

Now, why don't you succeed? You want to, of course. Why not, then, take up the FRANK HARTLEY COURSE? Its cost is little; its results are guaranteed, you are put to no risk, and personally you have the privilege of corresponding with Mr. Frank Hartley himself, and before you have finished the course you will have well appreciated this fact.

MR. FRANK HARTLEY

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT FOR THE BENEFIT OF AMBITIOUS READERS OF "THE ACADEMY."

To every reader of THE ACADEMY who sends for his book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible," enclosing two penny stamps to cover postage, Mr. Frank Hartley promises to send One Free Lesson.

Furthermore, in order to secure one hundred readers of THE ACADEMY as enthusiastic supporters of the Hartley movement, Mr. Hartley has decided to offer to enrol the first 100 readers who apply as students at HALF THE USUAL LOW FEE.

This is a very extraordinary offer, and is a proof of Mr. Hartley's confidence in his ability to do justice to every one of his students.

THE FRANK HARTLEY COURSE.

What is the Frank Hartley Course of Menti-Culture? It is the most Scientific and systematic course of mind training in the world. It develops your mind, rouses the latent powers of your brain, and makes it give forth of its great and wonderful fruits, and, in consequence, gives you a strong and magnetic personality. In these respects alone the Frank Hartley Course is unique.

The Hartley Course will instal into you the knowledge, desire, and ability to succeed, power of concentration and a powerful memory, and that personal magnetism which makes you a thorough and complete success in social, political and commercial life.

A Powerful Mind Means Powerful Pay.

Continuity of thought and ability to express those thoughts in coherent and well-chosen language is only the gift of a man whose mind is well ordered, shipshape and spontaneous.

To be logical, to be consistent, to set thoughts and ideas in chronological order, is to be successful, and the Frank Hartley Course teaches you how to be successful.

By a series of lessons each student is, almost unconsciously, scientifically and systematically taught to think for himself, to develop his power of observation, to have confidence in himself—in his ideas, his opinion, his word—to attract, to fascinate, and to conquer.

Another Extraordinary Offer to Readers of "The Academy."

But Mr. Frank Hartley makes still another offer. He says "If any student after taking the course has not improved himself, he or she is at liberty to return his instruction papers, and his or her money will be returned in full.

Do you know what this means? It means that Mr. Hartley is perfectly confident of the training he imparts.

Think this over. Ask yourself if your mind wants scientific training, and we are sure you will not delay in writing for Mr. Frank Hartley's Free Book and his Free Lesson, which will prove a forerunner to your move forward to success.

COUPON WHICH ENTITLES "THE ACADEMY" READERS TO THE TWO ABOVE MENTIONED SPECIAL OFFERS.

FRANK HARTLEY, Room 6, London Institute of Menti-Culture, 35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

Dear Sir,—Please send me, without any obligation to enrol, your Free Book "How Failure Becomes Impossible," and your Free Lesson. I enclose 2d. for postage, etc.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Christian Science is built on the New Testament. Therefore, with all due respect to Mr. Martin, I no more "see the absurdity of putting forward material arguments as a justification for the acceptance of a spiritual doctrine," than Jesus of Nazareth did when he said that if his hearers would not believe for the word's sake, they must believe for the very work's sake.

He says he believes that in the fourteenth century such a mental attitude was quite common. He alludes, I suppose, to the mediæval schoolmen. Now the mediæval schoolmen, if they did nothing else, at least taught the people of the Middle Ages how to think; and the man whom Huxley once described as the most subtle thinker of them all, was the man who declared that theology, or the word of God, was the only absolute science, and that all the other so-called sciences had merely a relative value. In spite of this, I should not have thought that Mr. Martin could have discovered a particularly close analogy between, say, the "Summa" of Thomas Aquinas and Mrs. Eddy's "Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures," and, indeed, his sparkling pleasantries on the subject of microscopes and stethoscopes fill me with a suspicion that his mental grasp of either subject is as mixed as that of the nurserymaid in "The Pirates of Penzance," who bound her master's son apprentice to a pirate by mistake for a pilot.

> "Mistaking the instructions which > Within her mind gyrate,"

Only such a lapsis mentis surely could have induced him to imagine that I began this correspondence. Surely he has not forgotten that "epigrammatic conundrum" which led to my first replying to him. If he has, let me remind him that it is to be found in your issue of September 21. The fact is that Mr. Martin is, I cannot help feeling, just a little bit annoyed, or he would not seriously propose that I should produce the evidence of Christian Science healing in a letter to the Press. He was inditing a sort of amateur "Pilgrim's Scrip" in your columns, to his own entire satisfaction, when it occurred to him to introduce an aphorism on the subject of Christian Science. Now, the worst of aphorisms is that they have a way of sounding much better than they explain. Mr. Martin has been explaining ever since.—Yours truly, FREDERICK DIXIE.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In order to meet the views of your correspondent who signs himself "Quis," I beg to be allowed to submit to him the following extracts*:—

INTERROGATIVE PRONOUNS.

The interrogative or questioning pronouns in English are "who," "what," which." "Who" is used only as a noun. It has two genders, the "personal," including masculine and feminine, expressed by "who," and the "neuter," expressed by "what." "Who is that man?" "Who is that woman?" "What is that thing?" These forms are plural as well as singular: "Who are those men?" "Who are those women?" "What are those things?"

"Who" has an objective case "whom," parallel to "him," from which, however, the uninflected "who" is substituted in the spoken language, as in "who(m) do you mean?"

"What" differs from "who" in being used as an adjective as well as a noun. In both functions it can be used in a personal sense, but in a meaning different from that of "who": "what is he?" "what woman is that?"

"Which," like "what," is mainly neuter in meaning, though it is used personally as well. It is both a noun and an adjective, and is indeclinable, not having even a possessive form, as "what" has: which (of those things) do you want?" "which boy do you mean?"

When an interrogative pronoun is used to introduce an independent sentence, the interrogation is said to be "direct." When it introduces a clause dependent on a principal clause containing a statement or question, the interrogation is said to be "indirect." Thus we have indirect interrogation in such a sentence as "I asked him who he was" and "what he wanted," contrasting with the direct interrogation sentences "who are you?" "who is he?" "what does he want?"

It must be borne in mind that an interrogative pronoun is always the predicate of the sentence it introduces, whether the sentence is independent or dependent. Thus the question, "who is he?" ("I asked") "who he was," correspond to the statement "he is somebody."

In English the interrogative pronouns "who," "what," "which," and the definite pronoun "that" are used also as relative (and conjunctive) pronouns. "That," when used as a relative, is indeclinable, as in "the men that were here yesterday," compared with "those men," being used also only as a noun, not as an adjective. The use of "who," "what," "which" as relatives is parallel to their use as interrogatives: the relative "who" is used only as a noun, the relatives "what" and "which" both as nouns and as adjectives, the use of these three pronouns as regards inflection being much the same when they are relative as when they are interrogative.

The relative pronoun makes the clause it introduces—the relative clause—into an adjunct to some noun-word—called the "antecedent"—in the principal clause. Thus, in "I know the man who was here yesterday," the clause "who was here yesterday" is an adjunct to the antecedent "man" in the principal clause "I know the man"; and in "I say it who know it," the antecedent is the pronoun "I."

In conclusion, I beg to add the following quotation from "Bain's Grammar" (p. 158):—"When a clause limits or defines a noun or pronoun, it is of the nature of an adjective: 'men "that are selfish" ("selfish" men) never win our esteem.'

"The adjective-clause, being by its nature restrictive, should be introduced by the restricting relative 'that,' or its equivalents, rather than by 'who' or 'which,' the relatives more properly adapted for co-ordination. 'The man "that" is wise' (meaning the same as 'the wise man') is preferable to 'the man "who" is wise,' etc., etc. An adjective clause is 'not' separated by a comma from the noun."

An example of a "non-defining" relative, given by the authors of "The King's English," might also prove useful under the circumstances:—"The man, 'who' had behaved most rudely, then walked off."

I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

Notes of the Week

WE have no great faith in the usefulness of ambassadorial conferences. They have been tried before, when some of the world's most distinguished diplomatists at Constantinople have laboured in vain to compose intricate problems arising from the momentary phases of the Eastern question. Our hope is that the impending conference will prove an exception to the previous rule. An element of hope certainly exists at present. It is that all the absurd ideas which fluttered the dovecots of the Cocoa Press at the outbreak of the war about the ineffable Turk, the necessity for his expulsion from Europe, and the rest of the fustian of the Memorial Hall has been wiped off the slate by the action of the Allies themselves. They are perfectly willing to negotiate with the Turk on the basis of living in amity side by side, and some of them are not unwilling to secure their own salvation by allying themselves with the unspeakable pariah of Europe. Exit Brunner, Byles, and the venerable Doctor Clifford.

We wish to enter a protest against much which has appeared in the London Press with reference to the case of the engine-driver, Knox, and we feel the better able to do so because no reproach can be brought against us of having given even a modicum of support to lawless conduct or hysterical advocacy of shop-window dressings or weepers intended to placate the worthless dregs of the population. Here is a different case. Knox has been a hard-working man, and, so far as we know, the Railway Company—his employers—have had no previous cause of complaint against him. We are entitled to draw thot inference because one of the most extraordinary features of the case which we are considering is the extreme slowness of the Company in taking action after the engine-driver's conviction. We should uphold any employer who is entrusted with the safety of the public or of a large number of his own workmen in taking the most stringent measures against a servant whose conduct jeopardised their safety. We should, however, demand that such action should be promptly taken, and in default we should look with some suspicion on the excessive anxiety of the employer in the cause of public safety. As regards the justice of Knox's conviction, we quoted with approval a few weeks ago Judge Parry's tribute to the magisterial benches of the country: "They work well, and make no more blunders in the administration of justice than any other courts, as the statistics of the Appeal Courts will testify." Such a tribute from a man of Judge Parry's known predilections is significant. No court of first instance is, however, infallible, and the decisions of benches are sometimes reversed on appeal by quarter sessions. Driver Knox in his representation to the Home Secretary has adopted a sane line, and he ought not to be prejudiced because a number of his fellow-railwaymen have lost their heads and adopted a reprehensible course, which we strongly condemn.

If Sir Isaac Newton had never rested beneath his apple-tree, or if no apple had chanced to fall while he was there, doubtless by this time some other acute mind would have arrived at the theory of gravitation which has revealed to man the exquisite beauty of the universe, of which his home, the Earth, forms so microscopic a portion; but it is fitting that a twig of this particularly historic tree should find a home with the Royal Astronomical Society. The relic seems to be well authenticated, and, although its wood does not resemble apple-wood, Kew has staked its reputation, and declared the piece to be genuine. We should very much like to know whether, before the Great Idea dawned on him, Sir Isaac Newton idly ate the apple and thus achieved wisdom.

We observe that Mr. Frank Harris has been discoursing in New York, in the vein of his celebrated interviews. His acquaintance, it would appear, with the British aristocracy is practically exclusive, and he is able to impart unexpected and intimate details of the doings and misdoings of the caste of Vere de Vere to panting American audiences. We like Frank Harris. He is so robust, so full of blood, so imaginative, that although we may laugh, our laugh is not at him, but with him.

Pan.

UP and up the silent hill,
And on and on athwart the glory.
Dreams at her heart, the earth lies still;
And time wears thin as an oft-told story.
A far-off rill makes faint replies
To the wind's last whisper ere it dies.

Sweet is labour, and wise is rest
Where the air is cool and the world is wide.
Gone is the rose from the mountain crest;
And deep in the valley an owl hath cried.
The moon sits pale o'er the dusky scaurs;
And the mute heart waits for the quiet stars.

The stuff of dreams is the life of man;
The stuff of clouds is the melting clod.
The lord of the earth is the shy god Pan,
And the spirit knows him a mighty god:
He steals from the deeps in the evening dim,
And man stands 'mazed in the face of him. . .

Down and down the haunted hill,
And on through the moon-webs' witching glory,
The ghostly woods lay weird and still;
In a starry hush hung the pine-tops hoary.
Through the eerie gloom the awe-thrill ran,
And the heart in the hush cried, "Pan! Pan!"

JAMES A. MACKERETH.

The Dogmatism of Cobbett

FOR some reason that, since it hangs on no anniversary, it would be difficult to explain, the present publishing season has seen a revival of interest in the works of two rural writers, with little in common but their passionate love of the vanishing village life of England—Borrow and Cobbett. Cobbett, author of the "Rural Rides," one of those "books of all time," as Ruskin called them, was chiefly characterised by a thoroughness verging on brutality and admitting no compromise or trimming. Sprung from sledgehammer stock, he was nothing if not a bully, though, at his best, a very entertaining bully. He is not, however, always at his best, even in the pages of the work on which his reputation mainly rests. Courage of their opinions may be virtuous in politicians, but in scientific men, if it should render them reluctant to modify their views in the light of new research, it may be wholly detrimental, and there are few more painful illustrations of the drawback of dogmatism than the smug satisfaction with which, in the work referred to, Cobbett propounds half a dozen silly problems in his own version of natural history to the "prigs." These are the kind of queries that carry their own answer, and unfortunately Cobbett's answer, begging the question in each case, was invariably the wrong one. Whence, he asks, come fish in new-made places where none have ever been put? What causes horsehairs to become living things, drops of rain to turn to frogs, mosquitoes to appear in rain-water in a glass covered with oiled paper, or flounders —"real little flat fish, brown on one side, white on the other, mouth sideways, with tail, fins and all, leaping alive"—in the inside of a rotten sheep's liver?

It will be gathered—and from the full context it would be apparent—that Cobbett's so-called questions are in reality postulates, and they are, without exception, based on fallacies. One of them, the alleged transformation of horsehairs into eels, is as old as Albertus Magnus, who mentions that horsehairs may be thus converted by soaking them in water. The so-called "eels" are, it may be mentioned, merely a nematoid parasite of the horse, just as the generation of threadworms, not unlike microscopic eels, in decaying paste or vinegar gave rise to an analogous superstition. The seemingly spontaneous generation of fishes, frogs, and mosquitoes in water supposed to be free from foreign matter, is explained by the ease with which the spawn of fishes and frogs can be conveyed in the feet and feathers of waterfowl. The eggs and newly-hatched larvæ of mosquitoes would easily be overlooked by the careless eye until the more conspicuous perfect insect hatched out.

It is, however, to the last of these amazing propositions that Cobbett attaches supreme importance, declaring that any farmer, ploughman, or shepherd will attest it on oath. There is no denying that country folk are as a rule prepared to attest even stranger goings on, notably the habit of the viper swallowing her young, but in his description of what is merely the parasite known to farmers as the sheep's liver-fluke, Cobbett gives the reins to his imagination with abandon. This endoparasitic trematode, though having, needless to say, nothing in common with the flat fish commonly known as the fluke, or flounder, does roughly resemble it in outline, though actually more elongated in form, like a sole. It is not, however, coloured in the manner described, and it has no fins, no tail, and no lateral mouth.

It is well to bear this dogmatism of Cobbett in mind in order that those who read the "Everyman" reprint of his "Rural Rides" may not be carried away by the fascinating style in which the author describes rustic England in the light of his travels in the New World. Cobbett's natural history will be found not much in advance of Herodotus and considerably less picturesque; and the defiance with which he poses these fatuous questions to the "prigs" of his generation suggests the propriety of exercising caution when enunciating wild statements which scientific investigation may refute before the writer's ink is dry. There are Cobbetts teaching popular science even to-day.

Le Fils de l'Homme

(By "LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE.")

Napoleon's Son. By CLARA TSCHUDI. Translated by E. M. COPE. Illustrated. (G. Allen and Co. 7s. 6d.)

A GOOD many years have elapsed since we last stood in that vault of the Capuchins, at Vienna, which has long served as the last earthly resting-place of the members of the House of Hapsburg. A hundred memories assail one on gazing at those rows of plain, grim coffins, mostly of a uniform type, and thus only distinguishable one from another by the plates affixed to them. In that gloomy spot the words of the Preacher, "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity!" ring in one's ears with renewed force. Here lies all that is mortal of some of the highest-born, the most exalted, of human kind. Here, too, you come into contact with some of the world's great tragedies. Yonder lies Maximilian, some time Emperor of Mexico, but shot at Queretaro by the orders of Juarez. Here, at rest at last, is the once restless and unhappy Elizabeth, assassinated by the Anarchist Luccheni; and beside her are the remains of her singularly gifted yet ill-balanced son, that Crown Prince Rudolph who so passionately loved the beautiful Maria Vetsera, but took his life—as she took hers—one wild night in the sequestered retreat of Meyerling. Farther on, another mother and her son repose close together. She entered the world as an Archduchess of Austria, became for a few years Empress of the French, and ended as Duchess of Parma and Guastalla. He was born King of Rome, and died an Austrian colonel.

On three occasions attempts have been made to procure the removal of his remains from the Capuchins in order that they might be laid beside those of his glorious father under the dome of the Invalides. Twice did the third Napoléon apply to the Emperor Francis Joseph to that effect, and subsequently the French Republic made a similar suggestion, but the Emperor of Austria has always refused the requisite permission. And, after all, it is perhaps as well that this throneless unhappy Prince should rest beside his mother at Vienna. France saw little of him. His life was essentially an Austrian tragedy.

In the volume before us, Mme. Clara Tschudi tells the story of his young inglorious career, in the manner which one might expect of an author who has repeatedly proved how catholic are her sympathies. In previous works Mme. Tschudi has compassionated the misfortunes of Marie Antoinette, the Empress Eugénie, the second Ludwig of Bavaria, the last Queen of Naples, and others; and now in the brief life of Napoleon's only legitimate son—let it not be forgotten that the modern Alexander still has lineal descendants through his illegitimate offspring, Count Walewski and Count Léon—she has found a subject well suited to her kindly pen.

Truth to tell, there is not very much to be recorded respecting the ill-starred Prince whom his father's subjects saluted as "L'Aiglon" and "Le Fils de l'Homme." The poet has ascribed to him the words, "Ma naissance et ma mort, voilà mon histoire," and, so far as he was of historical importance, that sentence sums up everything. Bonapartist writers claim that he at least reigned as Napoléon II from June 23 to July 3, 1815; and as the French Chambers recognised him on his father's second abdication, there is a little truth in that contention. But it should not be forgotten that since the previous year the King of Rome had been a virtual captive in Austria. As he did not die at Schoenbrunn until July 22, 1832, there may still be some octogenarian or nonagenarian Austrians who saw him in their childhood; but he left France in 1814, and so it is extremely doubtful whether any Frenchmen now alive ever set eyes on him. One of the last to remember him in France was the present writer's father-in-law, who passed away a good many years ago at the advanced age of ninety-six. Great-nephew of a medical man who was celebrated at the close of the eighteenth century, son of an officer attached at one time to the person of Eugène de Beauharnais, afterwards Duke of Leuchtenberg, he was in his eighth year when Marie Louise and the King of Rome quitted France; and in his later days he often told the story of how his father, after taking him up before him on his saddle, rode to meet the departing exiles near the frontier, and how at last they reached the fallen Empress's travelling coach, in spite of all the foreign escort. The lad had been provided with a few flowers, and these he tendered to Napoleon's consort, who ended by taking him into the carriage, in which he rode with her and the little King, then three years old, till the frontier of France was reached. And there Marie Louise kissed him, and there, too, he gave a kiss to the child Napoleon—France's kiss of farewell, as it were, the last which her great Captain's heir ever received from French lips.

On looking at some of the portraits which illustrate Mme. Tschudi's interesting pages, one is reminded of the lack of physical resemblance between Napoleon and his son by Marie Louise. The child who was most like him in features was the boy born of the beautiful Polish Countess Walewska, the son on whom he bestowed the Christian name of Alexander, and who was a year older than the King of Rome. During the Second French Empire people often commented on the resemblance between Prince Napoléon Jérôme and his uncle, the first Emperor; but that between the latter and Count Walewski was really closer. It happened, however, that the Count, who served at one time as French Minister of Foreign Affairs and succeeded the Duke de Morny as President of the Legislative Body, was very unlike his father in mind and disposition. Quiet, urbane, a polished gentleman, he had none of the Napoleonic ambition, spirit, brusquerie, or other characteristics. In all his qualifications he was a Walewski, not a Bonaparte.

On the other hand, the King of Rome was facially a Hapsburg, one of the many examples of that Hapsburg prepotency in matrimony which has inclined scientists to the view that the Hapsburg type always asserts itself in the offspring of any marriage which may be contracted by any Archduke or Archduchess of Austria with any foreign Prince or Princess whatever. Nevertheless, there may have been some of the Napoleonic spirit in the son of Marie Louise. We know that he chafed under captivity, that he yearned for opportunities which never occurred. Perhaps he might have become a good soldier, for the Austrian reports on his military efficiency are distinctly favourable. We read that as a lieutenant-colonel he commanded his battalion with skill. We are aware, too, that he was an expert and daring horseman. But the régime to which he was subjected was such as might quell the most aspiring disposition. Surrounded by spies, he shrank at last from any attempt to assert himself. He was afraid to communicate with those of the Bonapartes who endeavoured to get into touch with him—as, for instance, Elisa's daughter, the Countess Camerata, who made repeated but fruitless attempts to see him. We are somewhat suspicious of the story which shows him telling Prokesch-Osten that his mother was not the wife his father deserved. We feel, too, that most writers are unduly severe on Marie Louise. She was by no means so callous as some have asserted. It is certain, for instance, that she was deeply affected by her son's death. But she was a woman, and Napoleon, after a time, became a very indifferent husband. Some writers apparently think that he ought to have been mated to a woman of virile mind, but the consequences would probably have been disastrous. We know what happens only too often when a strong-willed man and a strong-willed woman are joined in marriage. Mme. Tschudi certainly brings out some of the good points in Marie Louise's character. For the rest, her pathetic narrative of the young Napoleon's unhappy career is full of human interest, and deserves to find many readers.

The Royal Visit to India

Narrative of the Visit to India of Their Majesties King George V and Queen Mary, and of the Coronation Durbar held at Delhi, 12th December, 1911. By the Hon. JOHN FORTESCUE. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. FORTESCUE has had a great opportunity, and on the whole has acquitted himself successfully in his task. His subject was calculated to inspire the pen of a courtier, but it had its defects as a theme for a continuous narrative. It involved the accounts of much of what Indians and Anglo-Indians call "tamasha," a significant word including processions, ceremonies, displays, shows of all kinds and degrees. The prominence of this feature somewhat marred the effect of Sir W. H. Russell's volume on the (then) Prince of Wales's visit to India in 1875-6, and Mr. Fortescue has wisely taken warning from that precedent. He has done well to relegate to an appendix the official programmes of the tour, and the accounts of the various assemblages, receptions, banquets, camps which figure so largely in Royal processions. This has enabled him to present the course of the King-Emperor's journey by sea and land in such a manner that the story can be read with pleasure: it is not wanting in enthusiasm in some places, but the restraint and moderation of the author are generally manifest. Mr. Fortescue lets himself go most conspicuously in attributing the real success of the Durbar to the presence of the King-Emperor:—

> The organisation of the pageant was admittedly perfect. Yet even if all the setting had been perfect, it would have availed nothing without the precious stone in its midst. It was the King and not the King's clothes, or the King's surroundings that so profoundly impressed India. The inhabitants, it must be repeated, believe in no vague abstraction called a Government; they believe in the one ruler whom God has set over them; and when he comes among them they fall down and worship. Nor, if the matter be considered, is this surprising. In the ordinary routine of life one man is better than another; but in the presence of the King all men are so immeasurably below him as to be merged together on the same footing. The King is the King. All other are his subjects; as such they are equal; and in the King's presence the humblest peasant feels himself on the same level with the Viceroy.

The Royal visit on this occasion, unlike the King's visit to India six years before as Prince of Wales, was not extensive in time or distance. Bombay, Delhi. Calcutta, shooting in the Nepal Tarai—while the Queen-Empress enjoyed the scenery, the old-world charm, the chivalry of Rajputana—occupied nearly the whole of the King-Emperor's energies, though there were several side-shows, so to speak, as at Arrah, Patna, and Nagpur, where their Majesties' appearance met with loyal welcome. The Delhi Durbar, with its eventful eight days of pageantry, was, as it was intended to be, the main occasion of the Royal visit; and unique importance was added to it by the surprising announcement of the transfer of the capital from Calcutta to Delhi. Mr. Fortescue apparently believes in this change; this is not the place to discuss it. Throughout the tour the King and Queen bore themselves with a dignity, grace, and affability which delighted the Europeans and Indians alike. Some of the impromptu incidents were perhaps the most effective. One happy inspiration was on the day of the native pageant at Calcutta, when, at its close, their Majesties drove very slowly round the whole length of the quiet ring of native spectators, within two yards of them; the absence of escort and police showed a marvellous confidence, which, to their credit, the natives loyally reciprocated. Another unpremeditated movement was the leave-taking at Bombay, when their Majesties, unattended, paid their farewell greeting to India. Such actions struck the imaginations of the spectators. The Oriental tendency to worship a personality was exhibited everywhere. Mr. Fortescue has not really grasped its origin when he writes: "So strong is the impulse in men to deify the power which keeps them in discipline and order, and thus brings to them the divine blessings of peace." The idea of propitiating the source of all favours must be included.

It is when Mr. Fortescue writes of other matters than the events of the tour that his work is more open to criticism. His historical sketch of India has a number of slips which a reviewer who does not know Indian history may fail to notice. Alexander the Great did not penetrate to the Sutlej, but only to the Bias—the Hyphasis—where he built altars: his soldiers declined to go farther. Babar died in 1530, not 1540. Akbar reigned 49 years, as Mr. Fortescue could easily have calculated, and not just upon 40. Nanak was followed by nine Gurus, not ten: there were ten in all. The Popes' Bulls which divided the world were issued in 1493 and 1506, not in 1502. The 39th Regiment went to India in 1754 under Adlercron, not under Eyre Coote, who obtained his captaincy in India. The Battle of Buxar was fought on October 23, 1764, not in February. Arthur Wellesley did not accompany his brother Mornington to India. Arthur reached Calcutta in February, 1797; Mornington assumed office in May, 1798. Dalhousie annexed Oudh under orders from Home; it was not his policy. Hardinge did not make over the Viceroyalty to Dalhousie at the end of 1847: there was no Viceroyalty to make over: the Governor-generalship was transferred on January 12, 1848.

These are sufficient samples of Mr. Fortescue's inaccuracies in history. Can he be relied upon for the accuracy of personal observations? He is severe upon Lord William Bentinck, and perhaps rightly. But he is quite wrong in supposing the British military officer to be more closely in touch with Indian thought and feeling than the civilian: for one thing, the native officers are few in a regiment; the civilian deals with hundreds of natives, subordinates, and independent persons of all sorts. To attribute a certain decision, apparently the King's own, to "malignant officialism"—even as a quotation—is hardly judicious or proper. If Mr. Fortescue knew the bazaar opinion regarding the King's entry into Delhi, he has rightly refrained from recording it. The disparagement of the civilian wherever possible is to be regretted. Mr. Fortescue's short time in India might have taught him better. The long disquisition on the meaning of education, and especially literary education, and on the devotion of shepherds to literary education, is out of place. Mr. Fortescue is also critical of red baize, aniline dyes, and of the camp arrangements at Delhi: he finds fault with Muhammadan architecture, and writes of the reproaches to British architecture which at present stand unabashed in Calcutta and Bombay. These are the impressions of a visitor, and are, after all, superficial. The suggestion that, in the future, "what is needed in both parties"—England and India—"is sympathy and patience" requires more reflection. It is easy to preach sympathy: the difficulty lies in the practical application of the term. Are the English in India to sympathise with native ideas and customs on such subjects as, say, "suttee," female infanticide, inaccuracy, opposition to sanitation, dilatoriness—in fact, with the Eastern view and standard of civilisation as opposed to the Western—to sympathise, that is, to the extent of reversing the policy of the last hundred years? In preaching sympathy, some explanation of its operation might be offered. As to the need for patience, there can be no question: it is required in reading some of Mr. Fortescue's remarks which detract from the merits of his book.

Prison Life.

My Life in Prison. By DONALD LOWRIE. (John Lane. 6s. net.)

AT a time when men in England who find themselves in a workhouse are known to commit wilful breaches of discipline in order to enjoy the greater comfort of prison and to be treated with more respect (as one of them told the present reviewer), it is interesting to read an account of prison life in California in this century.

Mr. Lowrie served a long term in San Quentin Prison, which is maintained by the State of California to accommodate the law-breakers of the State, who hail principally from San Francisco. Our author was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for burglary committed under pressure of hunger and poverty—a strong sentence, according to our ideas, for the crime.

Perhaps a general summary of the points of difference between our system and the Californian may be pointed out for the benefit of those who do not read the book, which is, of course, written from a prisoner's point of view, a point of view which naturally does not coincide with that of the authorities.

First, then, the inmates, generally speaking, are not isolated for any length of time, but occupy a cell in parties of four or less. They take their food in batches of twenty-four in a dining hall, and the food being placed on the table, help themselves. They are allowed tobacco, and on Sundays all meet together in an exercise yard, where they can talk and have a band maintained by themselves, which plays for dancing. They have a library also maintained by themselves. Religion is, as with us, Protestant and Roman Catholic, and our prisoner speaks very well of the priests, but not so well of the then Protestant chaplain. Prisoners are permitted to buy necessaries—such as soap, towels, handkerchiefs, tobacco, and musical supplies—and to receive papers.

The principal work on which they were employed was a jute mill. At the time of our man's entry the great trouble was the smuggling into the prison of morphine—called "dope." This appears to have been stamped out. Punishment was confinement in a strait-jacket—a fearful torture, as the prisoner could not move; at one period there appears to have been no limit to the time in which a prisoner might be under this penalty. It seems to have been used to make prisoners "squeal," i.e., confess; and many confessed to prison offences rather than endure this pain.

Capital punishment was in vogue, and the author devotes much space to gruesome details—quite unnecessary, to our mind—as to the methods adopted.

As one might expect, the book contains a great amount of moralising, some of it true, some not; but we quite agree with one remark, that the more abnormal a man's life is, or is made (i.e., by prison discipline and customs) the more liable he is to get out of touch with what we call civilised conditions. There is much American slang in the book, and some amount of humour. Even prisoners have their little jokes.

Corresponding to our ticket-of-leave system or licence, is what is called the Parole Law, passed in 1893; by this the State Board of Prison Directors is empowered to make rules and regulations under which any prisoner not committed for life may be paroled after he has served one year of his term, and life prisoners after they have served seven calendar years. The practice, however, at the time the author was a prisoner, was that no application for parole was granted until the applicant had served one half of his net sentence and had a perfect prison record for six consecutive months preceding the consideration of his case; that he shall have advertised his intention of applying for parole in a newspaper of general circulation in the country where his conviction occurred; that he shall have employment assured him by affidavit from some responsible person, and that he write a biographic sketch of his life from boyhood—a stringent set of conditions to be complied with! The general result of giving parole appears to be good.

The author, in conclusion, asks for a change of system, so that prisoners may be benefited and converted into useful citizens while "paying the penalty" for crime, and suggests an indeterminate sentence with parole based on individual merit under a remunerative industrial plan whereby the prisoner may support his family while he is confined; and later he observes, "God meant human beings for fresh air, sunshine, and work."

As a general principle we agree with this. Our present system tends that way—plenty of work—and hard work is the best thing to restore the self-respect of a prisoner; and as he shares in what he earns, he can obtain a considerable reduction of his sentence by his own good conduct. Unless he is a hardened character, and better both for his own sake and the country at large under care, the ordinary accidental criminal has little to complain of, owing to the working of our Probation Act—proving every day more and more of value—or by the light sentences now imposed, the care taken of his health, comfort, and morals.

One step we should like taken, namely, never to send a man or woman to prison for non-payment of a fine unless it can be shown that the person meant wilfully to set the law at defiance.

Our prisoners' aid societies do much quiet and good work in helping men to make a new start—much more good work than people generally understand or recognise. A problem not yet solved is what to do with the working-man's wife and family when the bread-winner, or he who should be the bread-winner, goes to prison. Attention is being given to this question—a serious one—and something is being done, but the workhouse is the fate of many families, and thus a double charge is thrown on the country, and the sins of the father are truly visited on the children. Perhaps some of the readers of these notes may consider this problem.

The book, we may observe, was printed in the United States, and the effect is poor.

Contra Mundum

The Enthusiasts of Port-Royal. By LILIAN REA. (Methuen and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

A GREAT preacher remarked recently that "the Jew is our expert in religion"; he might perhaps have added that the great amateur in this matter is the Anglo-Saxon. The Englishman on his travels abroad visits churches which are otherwise never entered except for purposes of devotion. The retired officer or administrator solaces his enforced leisure by a very active participation in the affairs of the church that is, topographically or theologically, nearest to him. On the pathological side we are, in the view of many of our fellow-mortals, incredibly well informed. We have many miniature Bossuets capable of doing justice to one side at least of the "Variations of the Protestant Churches."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Most readily, however, is Anglican curiosity excited by the phenomena of dissent or qualified assent within the Church of Rome. Dr. Döllinger and the foreign Modernists have found almost as many sympathisers or critics in England as among their own compatriots. Port-Royal and primitive Jansenism, as the most considerable of modern attempts at forming an independent community within the Roman Catholic Church, have always been a special object of wonder. The above description is possibly loose, but we do not believe that it is as inaccurate as many writers on the subject profess to believe. The movement was the minority report of the "Grand Siècle." Its leaders were Catholics and patriots; they did not wish to dissociate themselves from their Church or their country, and, if circumstances brought them into conflict with existing authorities, it was because a tyrannical theory of the State held the field. The State in France has always been more hostile than the Church to the "écarts" of pietism. Moreover, Port-Royal occurred at the very moment when the great question of Gallicanism, which it considerably complicated, came up for solution.

It is little more than five years since Mrs. Romanes published a book on Port-Royal of very similar scope and tendency to the one before us. We are doubtful if Miss Rea has added very much to the knowledge offered by her predecessor. At most she has complemented the facts and conclusions of Mrs. Romanes. The light and shade are sometimes rather different; some of the characters are more prominent than heretofore; others retire a little further into the background. There is, perhaps, a little less Pascal and a little more Racine—it may be an impression. Speaking generally, there is a great abundance of interesting detail, and the book is eminently good reading. There are, unfortunately a good many faults of style, slips of the pen or the press, and oddities of translation, but these last are often rendered innocuous by the presence of the original on the same page, and the weaknesses are not strong enough to impair the excellence of the whole work.

The description of the two Port-Royals—of Paris and of "les Champs"—are very clear, and the rather confusing story of the various migrations is well told. Apart from the two or three feminine leaders of the movements, and the fashionable outposts, like the Duchess de Longueville, interest is naturally focussed on "les Solitaires." The story of Pascal has been told a good many times, and the relations of Racine to Port-Royal are still matter of controversy, but there were many men of transcendent worth among the "Solitaires," and every trait of them has its interest. There is Doctor Pallu who began his career in the "Wilderness" by "writing a treatise on the salutary qualities of the laugh"; and that other doctor, Hamon, who knitted and read books of devotion as he went his rounds. There is also the noble duellist, de la Petitière, who became an evangelist cobbler. Antoine le Maître is better known, but embodies the supreme self-renunciation of Port-Royal—the greatest orator of France condemning himself to the "humility of silence." The chief temptation of these, as of other saints, was to spiritual pride, and while we can endorse Archbishop Péréfixe's criticism—"pure as angels and proud as Lucifer"—we can spare a little sympathy for the monarch who persecuted the "Solitaires," as the Athenian condemned Aristides, because he was tired of the perpetual cry: "Ces Messieurs! Ces Messieurs!"

Shorter Reviews

The Day Before Yesterday. By RICHARD MIDDLETON. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)
Poems and Songs. (Second Series.) By RICHARD MIDDLETON. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

ONCE again we have to note the beauty and delicacy of the work of the late Richard Middleton, much of it familiar to our readers in its original appearance in these columns. There are essays in "The Day Before Yesterday" equal in quality to any of the pages in "The Ghost Ship," and they are all to be read with pleasure. The delightful plea for "Votes for Children" in the article on "Street Organs"; the description of "Real Cricket"; the excellent study of a pet cat in "A Distinguished Guest"; all are in his best vein of quiet humour. A little picture from "Real Cricket" must be quoted as a good example of Middleton's style:—

> The oddest cricket I ever played was with a gardener, a reticent, impassive man, who came and played with me when sudden mumps had exiled me from my holiday-making comrades. He would bowl to me silently for hours, only parting his lips now and again to murmur the name of the stump which he proposed to hit with his next ball, and no efforts of mine could prevent his grim prophecies from being fulfilled. When I gave him his innings he would pat my widest and most wily balls back to me politely until he thought I was tired, and then he would let me bowl him. This unequal contest was not cricket as I knew it, but it fascinated me nevertheless. At night in my bed I would hit his bowling all over the world and upset his stumps with monotonous ease. By day I could only serve his humour. The devil was in the man.

Through all these essays runs Middleton's constant protest against the prosaic materialism amidst which he was forced to labour, and, in a different form, a much sadder form, it can be traced in his poems. The new volume does not contain such fine work as is to be found in the previous issue of his poetic artistry, reviewed in THE ACADEMY for June 1; it has, however, one very beautiful lyric which we remember reading and admiring a year or so ago—"Queen Melanie and the Wood-Boy." It is a conception of pure delight, and we doubt whether any other writer could have treated it in so exquisite a fashion. In the other poems the thought of death is frequent, and love is sung with a music that is perfectly rendered but not particularly new or individual. The four books—two of essays, two of poems—contain the finest part of Middleton's writings; and it is on these that his name, that of a sweet singer and a dreamer, must worthily rest.

Writing the Short Story. By J. BERG ESENWEIN. (Andrew Melrose. 6s. net.)

GIVEN four hundred pages of good advice, a pen and some ink, and a receptive mind, who would not dash at the opportunity offered for a mere six shillings of learning how to write the short story? Fame lies before us; and if others are so rash as to inquire whether Henry James, Kipling, Hardy, Wells, invariably consulted a book of instructions when the desire to write seized them, let us retort with a supercilious smile that had they done so, doubtless they would have produced better work. Alas! not in such a manner is the author to achieve immortality; if there is one thing that certainly cannot be taught, it is the art of writing the short story. Mr. Esenwein does his best, and, as editor of Lippincott's, he surely knows how short stories should be written. He has read, it seems, most of the specimens of the art accessible to him; he has analysed them carefully, found differences and resemblances in their methods, and published the result of his unwearying investigations to the world of ambitious youth. So far, so good; the chapters on "Selling the Story," and "Why Stories are Rejected" may be of value to many eager free-lances, and the advice on the choice of a title is admirable. Meanwhile, we must reiterate our conviction that, given the idea and the power to write, the short story will precipitate itself in an effective form without the aid of a guide-book. As to the machine-made magazine story, that is another affair altogether.

A Miscellany of Men. By G. K. CHESTERTON. (Methuen and Co. 5s. net.)

ALL of these essays, we believe, have appeared before as separate articles in the Press, and some of them are worth preservation in volume form. Not every one can stand Mr. Chesterton's "awful jollity," and many of his readers must be very tired of his literary tricks; the trick, for instance, of labouring an argument from the first thing that happens to cross his mind. We give an example or two:—

> There are things in this world of which I can say seriously that I love them, but do not like them. The point is not merely verbal, but psychologically quite valid. Cats are the first things that occur to me as examples of the principle. Cats are so beautiful that a creature from another star might fall in love with them, and so incalculable that he might kill them. . . .

This is the beginning of an essay entitled "The Elf of Japan," after reading which we still remain puzzled as to what Mr. Chesterton is trying to say. Here is another piece of strained juggling:—

> Thinking backwards is not quite easy to define abstractedly; and perhaps the simplest method is to take some object, as plain as possible, and from it illustrate the two modes of thought: the right mode, in which all real results have been rooted; the wrong mode, which is confusing all our current discussions, especially our discussions about the relations of the sexes. Casting my eye round the room, I notice an object which is often mentioned in the higher and subtler of these debates about the sexes: I mean a poker. I will take a poker and think about it; first forwards and then backwards, and so, perhaps, show what I mean. . . . .

"There is nothing up my sleeve, ladies and gentlemen," we can hear Mr. Chesterton protesting; "I will take this poker, this plain, ordinary poker, and from it deduce tremendous notions about Imperialism, Socialism, the Suffrage Question, and many other things; heaven only knows where we shall finish." It is funny—once; but to watch the literary acrobat go through all his repertoire brings mere tedium.

Probably, however, there are in this world many good people who take a pure delight in this sort of legerdemain, who, by its use, are tempted to read on just to see what is coming; to them at least half of the little essays here collected will make an irresistible appeal. They will not be disconcerted by the sudden introduction of cows, rabbits, a giraffe, and a wasp in an article entitled "The Sun Worshipper." Mr. Chesterton is like a heavy excursion train which does not know its destination and crashes along at full speed all the time; sometimes it gets off the lines, and things happen; fortunately, as a rule, tragedy is avoided. In some of these essays, where he keeps to the track, he is a joy to read: "The Real Journalist," "The Romantic in the Rain," "The Priest of Spring," and several others, bring thrills of appreciation that encourage a very forgiving mood towards the times when Mr. Chesterton's fearful momentum carries him near to disaster.

The Voice of One Crying. By E. GIBSON CHEYNE. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

A VOLUME of "verse" in Whitmanesque style is something of a problem to the critic. It is almost sure to be blamed for what it is not, rather than for what it is, supposing it to deserve blame. Thus one who is a lover of beautiful form in poetry comes and finds only an irritating hybrid "prose-poetry." And on the other hand, the seeker for ideas, who is careless of form, is apt to be disappointed; for, after all, there is only one Whitman. This is not to say that there is any shortage of ideas in Mrs. Cheyne's work. On the contrary, she has enough ideas to fit out any half-dozen modern minor

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

rhymers. She presents us with a kind of raw material for really great poetry. Thus:—

> No one is a lover of Beauty, who has not gone hungry and barefoot for her sake.
> No one is a lover of man, who has not hung upon a cross for him.
> No one is a lover of God, who has not given up man for Him.
> Yet the world is full of lovers, and life is fed by their sacrifices.

There is an idea, not new, it is true, but worthy of the mightiest treatment. It would be expecting too much to look for new ideas on every page. Mrs. Cheyne does, however, often achieve freshness:—

> The tides of joy and sorrow are the tides that irrigate the wilderness of the world,
> Till it blossoms into beauty.

She gives utterance in this volume to a creed of spiritual unity and solidarity somewhat vaguely expressed, but always stimulating; and she has a keenness of spiritual insight only too rare among poets. We do not know whether it would have been possible to crowd these thoughts into any of the more recognised verse-forms; but if the writer had been able to do it at all successfully she would almost have produced a masterpiece. As it is the book is worth reading more than once; and, moreover, is worth a very great deal of thought.

Fiction

The Crock of Gold. By JAMES STEPHENS. (Macmillan and Co. 5s.)

IT is a very excellent thing when the watcher on the tower—as the reviewer is imagined to be by the guileless of heart—may leave his post and simply pull a joyous peal on the bells of praise. It is splendid to sheathe the sword on one's hip—to think for one moment of the petty scalpel of criticism by so dignified a title—and to pull vigorously on, because the merry clangour over one's head is the only thing proportionate to the joy in the soul. Really that office is won, more often than it would appear, when it takes a little courage to fulfil it; but no courage should be needed in the case of the "Crock of Gold."

The Crock of Gold itself has little to do with the subject. Neither have the two Philosophers; nor their two respective wives, the Grey Woman of Dun Gortin and the Thin Woman of Inis Magrath; nor, for that matter, their two children, nor the Leprechauns, nor Pan, nor Angus Og, nor Caitilin Ni Murrachu. There is only one person who has anything to do with the book; and that is Mr. Stephens, who has given some considerable care to Blake, and a good deal of care to his own devilment. In fact, he has given so much care to Blake that he has not altogether digested that mighty man's scheme of things, being too content to give it speech on his own lips with a disorder of idea that it had not in its originator's brain. That is an incidental complaint common to most of Blake's readers, who cannot step quite as decisively as the strong man himself did in the involutions of his scheme of things. But the inspiring spirit is here; and it gives a singing beauty to Mr. Stephens' own devilment. That devilment is undeniable. It both makes and mars the book. It was a very good thing for one of the two philosophers, and his wife, the Grey Woman of Dun Gortin, that they, in a surfeit of life, spun round like tops till they died; or they would have added to the number of people in whom our interest is aroused, to remain unresolved at the end of the book. Caitilin Ni Murrachu leaves Pan for Angus Og, and that is an end of her—and a very good end, too, one may say. But her father, Meehawl MacMurrachu, who stole the Crock of Gold, and was singularly afflicted by the Leprechauns in consequence, is never heard of again. The surviving philosopher is rescued from prison by the Shee, after their hosting, we are told, but the manner of it we are not told, nor are we told why the Shee hosted, nor what came of it in the larger purpose of things.

The book concludes with four dots to signify a conclusion that is no conclusion. The remaining half a page should have been filled with dots, had Mr. Stephens wished adequately to signify the unconcluded interest. But the characters happen not to be the matter of our interest. It is Mr. Stephens who provides that interest, and the characters are only by way of a framework on which he may stretch himself. We have spoken of his spirit in the book as one of devilment; but it must be understood that it is that manner of devilment that is full of wisdom, the inspiration of which, indeed, is wisdom. No man can dance down the road, and leap and laugh in the sun, and pluck flowers where he will, and stretch in the fields when he will, without having joy in his heart; and he cannot have that joy in his heart without having wisdom in his soul. He cannot tell us that wisdom, since wisdom defies the intellect. He can only communicate that joy to us, and we may find the wisdom for ourselves. The phrase of his song, the light in his eyes, the sunlight on a blossom in his hand, may communicate that joy to us; but if it cannot, it will not, so irresponsible is it. And such is the procedure of the book. Being what it is, it is a little matter that it is unconcluded, or that its characters are not taken to the end of their history in the tangle of interest aroused by the Crock of Gold, even as it is a small matter that the song sung on the roadside should lack an ending. The manner of the singing was all, there; and the manner of the telling is all, here. It is such chance things that recreate the sunshine that is the air of joy and wisdom; not a well-framed tale and a concluded interest. We can scarcely imagine anyone reading this book without having a sunshine kindled in his soul; and without looking with a kindlier and wiser eye on his dear Mother Earth and his Brother Man. And if Mr. Stephens wants a better praise than that, then he is a different man from that we have taken him for.

The Heroine in Bronze. By JAMES LANE ALLEN. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

AFTER the many hours of pleasure which have come to us from the reading of Mr. James Lane Allen's work in the past, and the memories of anticipations keenly gratified when a new novel from his pen was announced, it is extremely disappointing to be compelled to record a sense of futility concerning the present book. We have a profound admiration for Mr. Allen's work, testified on more than two or three occasions in the columns of THE ACADEMY; his characters move in a purer air than most characters conceived by present-day authors; they achieve happiness through suffering without any taint of sentimentalism and without any sacrifice of the interest of the story. "The Heroine in Bronze" has the thinnest of plots, so thin and flimsy that it will not bear the weight of words erected upon it; and as a result we feel, with the sorry joke of the hero at the expense of his wife, which concludes the book, that the whole structure is toppling, and that we really have not cared all the way through what happened.

How different were our sensations when reading "The Choir Invisible," "The Increasing Purpose," or any of the other little masterpieces which Mr. Allen gave us a few years ago! We admit quite freely that there are some charming passages in this volume, pages which recapture for a brief while some echo of the older music; but they seem the aimless improvisings of a musician who has lost his theme. Our hope is that this pallid heroine and insignificant hero may be but a temporary lapse, and that Mr. Allen has some better work in store.

Dr. Tuppy. By STEPHEN TOWNESEND. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

MR. TOWNESEND has drawn vividly upon his imagination for Dr. Tuppy, with the result that if we have not quite a life-like figure, at any rate we have an amusing one. The unfortunate man is very near-sighted, very kind-hearted, and absolutely guileless. The effect of such a temperament upon his colleagues at the hospital is easy to foresee, and there are many amusing—and several pathetic pages of the treatment poor Dr. Tuppy is called upon to endure. Two of the nurses are kind to him, and one goes so far as to promise to look after him for the remainder of his life, so we take leave of him hoping that the worst of his trials are over. The story is bright and amusing, and although the author has given the greatest care and attention to the character who gives his name to the title, those of the nurses and his maiden aunt are also very clearly portrayed and add to the enjoyment of the book.

Our Alty. By M. E. FRANCIS (MRS. BLUNDELL.) (John Long. 6s.)

AN outlying district of Liverpool is the scene of Mrs. Blundell's latest romance. Alty is a girl of the people, and thrown upon her own resources at the age of seventeen, with a cross old grandmother to provide for, sets about her task with the true north-country spirit of being daunted by nothing. There crosses her path a young Territorial, who is charmed by her bonny looks and artless manner. They arrange a runaway marriage, but circumstances in the shape of Alty's employer and secret admirer prevent the elopement. From this period we have a changed Alty, for she finds that her eager young admirer has not the courage to stand by her in the face of his parent's opposition; and the knowledge gives her pain. Also, the gossips are busy with her name, for the story of the proposed flight has leaked out, as such stories are apt to do. Again her employer comes to her aid, and the reader is gradually led up to a very momentous meeting between the old love and the new, at which Alty herself is also present. We must leave the reader to find out the result of the encounter, and in doing so he will spend a very pleasant time.

Idle Hands. By W. CLINTON ELLIS. (Jarrold and Sons. 6s.)

A VOLUME of short stories is a direct temptation to the reviewer, for it is always possible to read one or two of the stories and write as if judging the whole book—but a long railway journey prevents a multitude of sins in this direction. We can recommend this work as a travelling companion, for all the stories that it contains are light and entertaining; they make no undue calls on the intellect of the reader, nor are they likely to remain long in his or her mind once the book is put aside. Mr. Ellis's capacity for recording light and smart dialogue is happily illustrated more than once in this volume. The American lady reporter—who, by the way, does not marry the hero of the story—remarked that paternity and maternity might still be regarded as matters of sex, however equal the sexes might be in other respects, and the aptness of the hero's rejoinder: "That'll be got over some day, doubtless," can only be appreciated after perusal of the context. Although we quote this instance, it is with no desire to represent the book as "risky," for such piquancy as characterises its contents is perfectly fresh and wholesome. Its author has kept to the beaten track of the magazine and periodical contributor; his work is not uninteresting, and it is not excessively thrilling. He writes a pleasant short story—and that is all.

The Theatre

"The Waldies" at the Haymarket Theatre

THE Incorporated Stage Society, though not on this occasion sufficiently fortunate to present a play of the calibre of "You Never Can Tell, or "Hindle Wakes," was able to produce at the performance on December 9 at the Haymarket Theatre, a play with regard to which the writer may perhaps be counted unlucky. Mr. G. J. Hamlen, the author of the new four-act play, "The Waldies," has improved upon his earlier effort "Barbara Grows Up," but the atmosphere and the types presented were essentially those of what may be called "the 1912 drama." And Mr. Hamlen, who might possibly have been heralded as the leader and originator of a dramatic phase, is just the latest adherent of the new style.

Once again we have the middle-class home of "Rutherford and Son" and "Hindle Wakes"; we have the harsh and intolerant father, whose ambition and business energy have destroyed the individuality of the frightened family; a son, who doubtless was an only son, and who brings trouble into the household; there is the irrepressible daughter who tactfully evades the paternal displeasure; and there is a foolishly-behaved mother, and, of course, a matronly daughter who carries the troubles of the others. But there are variations upon the usual theme in "The Waldies." Aleck Waldie may have been made what he is by excess of parental restraint, but there is no excuse of "wild oats" in his case; he is just a nasty little creature who will drift into the criminal classes, and whose repentance at the end of the play seems but an inconsistent sop to the English notion of the happy ending. Aleck, who, we feel sure, takes no delight in wickedness, and is simply a degenerate, has got into the hands of a moneylender named James Pritchard, who threatens to disclose the transaction to the father. Meanwhile the excitable sister Euphemia has been influenced by the revival services held by a missioner named Ross, and in her religious excitement has placed her rings, including her engagement ring, in the collection plate. Ross, thinking of the remorse on the morrow, returns them to the Waldies, but the engagement ring disappears, and the poor missioner is suspected and victimised. Aleck, however, is the thief, and has given it to Pritchard in payment for his debt, and the latter individual returns it to the enraged father. John Waldie declares that it is not his daughter's ring—surely a terrible deed for such an honest, intolerant man. Then comes the usual straight-talking on both sides, and father and son repent.

There are some good moments and some good lines in the play, but Mr. Hamlen's hand is still uncertain. Mr. Philip Leslie gave on the whole a good rendering of the part of the son, but the finest character in the play was Euphemia, acted by Miss Cathleen Nesbitt. Euphemia was a gloriously natural, joyous, devil-may-care girl who did not suffer from the over-smartness of her dramatic type. Miss Gwynneth Galton made the most of Mrs. Waldie, but Mr. Charles Bibby was never happy in the part of the father, John Waldie. It was the worst-drawn character in the play, and should have been used to a much greater extent. Miss Ellen O'Malley, as the matronly daughter, acted with a quiet charm and force which exactly suited that queer household. Mr. Norman McKeown as the missioner, and Mr. Anthony Warde as the moneylender, both did well. The play was produced by Mr. Norman Page. "The Waldies" possesses genuine humour, while the audience seemed to discover a great deal of amusement in the religious references. But why not change the atmosphere or the types? We wonder what the dramatic fashion of 1913 will be?

"Where There's a Will——" at the Criterion

THIS play was described on the programme as a four act comedy, but it soon showed considerable possibilities as a three act farce. I believe since the first night the amusing side of "Where There's a Will——" has been developed, and the tedious, inappropriate serious passages have been reduced. Under some such system of improvement the play should delight the modern Criterion audience, for there is no end of ingenuity displayed in the complication of the will; there is also the bedroom scene, and a lady ready for repose, which seems to be popular just now. If one may have a personal point of view, I think a woman, after she is eighteen, never looks quite so stupid as when she lets down her obviously coiffured hair. But it is always done on the stage, and is supposed to be immensely "fetching." Thus Miss Dora Barton, who plays the heroine of the comedy, Hilda Burchell, has very nearly the whole of the second act in this supposedly attractive négligée.

Her charming husband, Harry Redgrave, delightfully played by Mr. Vernon Steel, has been very brave in the first act. Hilda was punting, and knocked an elderly gentleman into the river; Harry, at great risk to his life—he was already married to Hilda, but had not a penny, so the matter was secret—saves the victim of his wife's clumsiness. The old man makes a nice will, leaving Harry so many thousands a year, and then, most conveniently, dies. All promises well for the hero and heroine, but not for the play, which needs complications. These are readily supplied. Mrs. Harry has been a witness to the excellent old gentleman's will. When she is explaining her good fortune to her uncle and showing him how she will score in regard to a disagreeable mother who has provided her with an unwelcome suitor, the uncle, who is a K.C., points out that which most people would have already known, namely, that Harry cannot inherit under a will which has been witnessed by his wife. Thus and thus a charming imbroglio is provided, and Mr. Bernard Parry, the bold author, works it for all its worth and a little bit more.

However, the play marches, and with the aid of an excellent company may prove very agreeable to a holiday audience for the next month or two—or more, I hope. As the mother of Mrs. Harry, Miss Vane Featherstone gave by far the most considered and convincing character-study in the play. When she happened to be on the stage she held the audience with her old easy grace, and although Mrs. Burchell's severity and self-seeking is something of a departure for this delightful actress, she kept well within the hard limits of her part, and gave us a complete piece of art. Mr. Paul Arthur was disappointing as the over-clever uncle and K.C. His difficult speeches—involved and would-be smart—refused to flow freely from his lips. To make matters worse he frequently attempted imitations of Sir Charles Wyndham's voice and manner, and then forgot to continue the affair. Sir Charles was in the stalls and probably did not notice these banal efforts of Mr. Arthur to reproduce the effects beloved of both Mr. Esmond and Mr. Lorrain. Mr. Vernon Steel and Miss Dorothy Minto both bring great charm and liveliness into their somewhat empty parts; one only wishes they had something more worthy of their attractiveness and skill. As Herbert Mossop—the lover who is not beloved by Hilda the heroine—Mr. Spencer Trevor gave an admirable character-study; in fact, in most cases the acting was a little better than the thing acted. As Mr. Louis Meyer presents this four act comedy, I apprehend it has been wrought into a telling and crisp success by this time. When first presented one could only glance at his box sympathetically and welcome the end of the fourth act with a glad sigh.

"The Price" at the Aldwych Theatre

NOTHING is more fully regretted by the student of the stage in England than the constant failure of American successes when transplanted to our midst. Mr. Broadhurst, the author of "The Price," is, I believe, English; but his play, so elaborately and carefully produced here, has so many qualities beloved of the American public and disliked in London, that we regret to say it has already passed from the stage of the Aldwych Theatre. The cast, which was greatly helped by the strong character-acting of Miss Henrietta Watson, presented Miss Fannie Ward in an elaborate part which she seriously attempted to make emotional and realistic. This actress has a complete knowledge of the technique of the art which she takes so earnestly, but, unfortunately, in all the parts in which we have seen her, she fails to convey to the audience the charm of her personality. To some this gift is given unasked; to those who strive for it, how slowly it appears to come. Mr. Ben Webster, as the busy and successful medical man, looked the part to perfection, and Mr. Frederick Kerr was admirably made up for the quite thankless and impossible part of Professor Damaraff. Miss Pattie Browne was hardly fitted to the difficult character of a servant with a past, her method of casting her eyes to the gallery was somehow understood to mean that she expected a laugh when the action of the play needed something akin to tears. But with all its faults "The Price" was an interesting and encouraging experiment. It is to be hoped that a clever dramatist will take Miss Ward's measure and enable her, one day soon, to give us of her best.

"The Visit of the King" at the Palace

TERRIBLY chastened by the mistaken views of a writer on the "Fleshly" movement in the theatres, the management has substituted a Scottish piece of meek dulness in place of the curious and often beautiful "Venetian Night." Mr. E. V. Lucas is so justly popular with those who like to be thought literary and those who wish they could enjoy humour, that we suppose his little play was considered likely to prove a winning card. With the aid of Mr. Watson Hume, Miss Florence Haydon, and the beautiful Miss Laura Cowie, perhaps it will yet succeed. An ex-Provost believes he will have to take the place of the Provost when the King visits a Scottish town, and his family, with the exception of his old wife—charmingly played by Miss Haydon—hopes he will be knighted. These affairs engage the thoughts of all and lead to many little touches of quaint character, and some rather well-worn jokes, and then the Provost recovers fro mhis illness sufficiently to receive the King and the knighthood and all sorts of possibilities vanish. They vanish just as the humour and sentiment and satire vanish out of the play before the sight of a regretful audience.

A Charity Matinee at the St. James's

SOMEWHERE among the illusions of one's youth used to rest the desire that the English edition of "Le Monde où L'on S'ennuie" called "The Lion Hunters," should be revived. It may be remembered how brilliant were the performances of Miss Boucicault and Mr. H. B. Irving, also how this version of Pailleron's long successful comedy did not hit the taste of the public. The matinée for the benefit of sufferers in the present war was an admirable occasion on which to prove that the play had not been rightly appreciated, and might still be made into a London success. Under the all too apropos title of "The World of Boredom" it was given the other day, and one realised, alas! not for the first time, how mistaken were our enthusiasms of yesterday. No one can expect to follow Miss Boucicault with perfect satisfaction, but Miss Margery Maude played the heroine with something more than her usual grace, and Mr. Saintsbury made one almost forget the clever character-study of Mr. Irving. And yet the whole affair seemed like the far off echo of its old self, the lees of the bright wine of a past theatrical generation. For on the stage there is a new generation every ten years, and few are the survivors of that awful passage of Time.

"Curios" at the Coliseum

WITH Mr. G. P. Huntley as the "antique dealer," Mr. Harry Grattan and Miss Eva Kelly as the American buyers, with the passion for collecting in the air, and the vast auditorium of the Coliseum packed with a simple-hearted audience, we justly expected half an hour of utter delight. But, alas! the whole affair proved to be a mirage of enjoyment. As you approached, it drifted before you; as you stood to welcome the ripe humour of Mr. Huntley, the light patter of Mr. Grattan, and the grace of Miss Kelly, these things evaded your embrace and all was barren, dull, and weak. Surely it would not have needed any remarkable gift of tongues to have provided such admirable comedians with some chance to amuse their public. As matters now stand, "Curios" is merely a sad and rather biting commentary on what is supposed to satisfy the playgoer. That it will have a good run is, no doubt, foredoomed, but all our sympathy is with Mr. Huntley for having to be so dull, and with audiences, far and wide, who will politely pretend to enjoy this dreary piece of empty comedy.

Music

WHAT a blessed comforter music can be on a very cheerless day! In these days of biting wind or nipping frost, all recollections vanish of the moments in summer when we have sought her to calm our fever. We remember no more the afternoons when we lay in the hot heather, cooled by the music of the waterfall, or on the lawn, refreshed by the chanting of the tree-tops. Let us go in to the warm concert-room to-day—oh! concert-room, so often blamed for your stuffy tawdriness!—with its cheerful lights and its eager be-furred company, and see if the rich flood of splendid, harmonious music will not kindle body and soul like a draught of generous wine. So it is that we find ourselves in Queen's Hall, and Sir Edward Elgar is advancing to the conductor's desk, the London Symphony Orchestra, expectant, before him. To read the title of the first piece on the programme is to be conscious of a quickening glow of warmth. "In the South (Alassio)." The very name has the sun upon it! Are we indeed going to drink a beaker full of the warm South? Is the conjurer able to transport us into one of those lovely garden-terraces that blush or turn pale with their clambering roses, where the sapphire spires of "Echium Zebrina"—tenderest of Riviera jewels—mock the blue of sea and sky; into the olive groves up higher, enamelled with their jonquil-stars, of which, with the maidenhair fronds of the "Erba di Fontana" we may make the sweetest bouquet? Yes, Sir Edward has known how to distil the warm elixir of Alassio into orchestral melody, and as we listen to his gentle, pathetic goatherd airs we are wandering again along the slopes of Italy's diviner coasts, far away from bleak Langham Place and the noise of London's relentless traffic of wheels. When we hear the discords crash out that the Roman Empire which once ruled the favoured land was a despot, we are not so sure that Alassio ever made us ponder over any tyranny more terrible than that of the dinner-hour which forced us, reluctant, to descend the flower-arched paths. But Sir Edward has a brooding mind, and it turns, even amid the serenity of quiet little Alassio, to old, unhappy far-off things. We note this character, too, in his beautiful introduction and Allegro for string orchestra and solo quartet. Since we first heard it, we have always looked upon this as one of Elgar's most original and delightful compositions. Why did he never confer upon it some poetic title and make it, in fact, a companion to "In the South?" He has given it a motto from Cymbeline, "A Smiling with a Sigh"—a poet borrowing from a poet—and very happy is this illustration of the interchanged brilliance and tenderness of the Wales-inspired music. It was a very great pleasure to hear this sympathetic music again.

Sir Edward generally succeeds in getting his band to play his own music well, but his most faithful admirers would have to admit that he lacks the decision and force for the conducting of that of the other composers. Dr. Serge Barjansky, a brilliant violoncellist, was sadly hampered in Dvorak's Concerto by uncertainty as to what his accompanists were doing, and that pleasant music made less than its usual effect. So in the noble symphony of César Franck, the instruments were not kept in due subordination, and many of the effects of the wonderful contrapuntal writing were lost. Unlike a good deal of Franck's music, the symphony is so easy to follow and understand, that it can hardly ever fail to impress; but its thrilling melodies should be rung out with a great deal more of inspiring impulse than that which was given them by Sir Edward Elgar; and when, after the romance of the middle movement, the finale is driven along with real spirit, even the most phlegmatic audience ought to be roused to enthusiasm. Some years ago the Philharmonic Society and Sir Henry Wood performed this symphony with tolerable frequency, but it has of late been rather neglected. We do not wish that it should be "done to death," as was the case with some of Tchaikovsky's symphonies, but each season should offer one performance at any rate.

But we must go on with our tribute of gratitude to those who have warmed us by their music—better than a piled-up fire—during the recent chills. How were we not comforted, one Tuesday afternoon, by the glorious voice of Miss Muriel Foster! If on entering Bechstein Hall we had nourished any thoughts of cold criticism, it soon became impossible to do anything but rejoice that once more a happy public is permitted to hear those splendid tones, too long reserved for private audiences. There was nothing in Miss Foster's programme to stir us to the depths as we are stirred when she sings the Alto Rhapsody of Brahms, even when she sings it, as recently, with a conductor whose way is not precisely her way. But she sang "The Lovely Lass of Inverness" with a sense so right of its drear tragedy, and "My Faithfu' Johnnie," with such a lovely tenderness, that it was almost as good as anything we could have wished. One heeded not the fact that Beethoven's string accompaniments to the Scottish tunes do not add in the least to their beauty. We could, and did, complain a little that Miss Foster sang so lengthy a list of songs by Hugo Wolf. Most of them are beautiful, no doubt, especially "Zur Ruh'" and "St. Joseph's Song," but Wolf could not vary his language as the greater song-composers could, and the effect of many of them together is monotonous. One had only to note the refreshment of spirit brought about by Brahms' "Zigeuner Lieder"—and with what delightful art they were sung!—to realise the difference in the genius of the two composers, and to regret that the prevailing fashion pushes Wolf into a place which, in truth, he does not deserve. Still, Miss Foster may sing what she will, and we must always go to hear her.

And we will never willingly lose an opportunity of hearing the clarionet quintet of Brahms, which the Klinger Quartet and Mr. Draper performed one afternoon with commendable results. The tone of the quartet is not always mellifluous, and its playing is straightforward rather than subtle; indeed, it is sometimes harsh and cold, but Mr. Draper's tone is good, and he competes not unsuccessfully with the difficulties of his part. But in its way, is there anything in music more perfectly lovely than those first two movements of drawn-out, entrancing sound? The last two movements seem to us to present almost too sharp a contrast to the first. It is hard to change one's mood so quickly from the warm, almost scented luxury of the adagio to the grave calmness of what follows. Still, it is all so beautiful that it were heresy and ingratitude to pursue the subject. The Quartet had played some Mozart and one of Beethoven's posthumous quartets, but less fortunate than the rest of the overflowing crowd which filled every corner of Bechstein Hall, we were unable to get there in time to hear them. It is a good augury when so noble a programme can bring together so great an audience.

Should we ask Sir Henry Wood, at Queen's Hall, to make us forget the weather with the aid of his orchestra and Mme. Carreño, a pianoforte concerto by MacDowell, a new piece by Glière, and the C minor symphony? Or should we seek to be snug in Bechstein Hall, and hear Mr. d'Albert play a programme of Beethoven? We had not heard this fine musician-pianist for a good many years in such a programme, so the lot was cast upon him. Sad it is to say, but he left us cold, in spite of his superabundant energy, and his dash, and his bigness. Of the bigness there is still no doubt at all, but we cannot think that he still plays as finely as he did. Choosing the best known sonatas, the Waldstein, the Appassionata, and the great C minor, he swung them along with a rhythmic impulse that never halted, and this was very good. But his tone was too frequently explosive; in the climaxes he became even distressingly noisy, and some of his effects were theatrical rather than dramatic. Dignity was lost in vociferation, and we were reminded of Queen Elizabeth played by an actress who scolds because she cannot command. In former days Mr. d'Albert used to show a tendency to be angry with the piano, and sometimes to cow his hearers instead of persuading them. This tendency has increased considerably. But since the audience was very large and very enthusiastic, it must be supposed that his militant methods with Beethoven are by no means displeasing to everybody.

Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. announce that they will shortly re-issue M. Rene Bazin's dramatic story, "The Children of Alsace," at 2s. net, and that they are adding "Love's Mask," by Effie Adelaide Rowlands, to their series of sixpenny "Clear Type" novels.

Pictures of Passing Islam

I.—The Selamlik

SINCE the days when that red-handed old despot, Abdul Hamid, fearful for his life, used to gallop on Friday with furtive eyes to the Hamidié Mosque, the Selamlik has lost much of its pomp and significance. Now the Sultan has become a mere figure, and power has passed into the hands of his ministers, but such as it was, the Selamlik that I saw just after the declaration of war by the Balkan crusaders was a picturesque sight enough.

A crowd of old white bearded men—Bokharas for the most part—from Turkestan, of a Mongolian caste of countenance, and dressed in robes of many colours, lined the dusty square in front of the tawdry white and gold Mosque.

They stood there in silence stroking their beards and waiting for the leader of the faithful to appear. One wore a gorgeous robe of orange embroidered with rose-coloured flowers, another a sky blue cloak and the green turban of those who have made a pilgrimage to Mecca. Opposite them, in a reserved space, was a group of privileged Europeans under the guard of a magnificient Embassy kavass; on the other side of the square were two smart European broughams in which the dark-eyed women of the harem waited to see their lord and master pass. Near them were two gigantic flat-footed eunuchs in frock coats and top hats, treated by all with exaggerated deference. On the high ground beyond the rails of the square had gathered a motley group of women in dresses of orange, mauve and green, some of them wearing light hued yashmaks, and others shamelessly exposing their pretty pale faces to the gaze of the unbeliever. Beyond them again were the Hamidian Lancers in blue and crimson, mingled with the scarlet of the Sultan's Circassian bodyguard.

Constantinople was so denuded of troops that the fire brigade—who, indeed, are soldiers in all save the name, even to the extent of carrying a rifle and bayonet—had turned out to do duty at the Selamlik. They are a grotesque looking lot, for on them has descended the egg-shaped scarlet helmet of the conquerors of Byzantium, only now it is combined with a modern khaki uniform.

Tales are told of how when a house burns these legalised brigands will bargain for baksheesh before consenting to wage ineffectual warfare on the flames with their puny hand engines.

Then the leader of the faithful arrived in a victoria drawn by two of those fat horses with arched necks and exaggerated gait, which appear to be the monopoly of Royal carriages all the world over.

The Sultan looked old and stout, and as if not long for this world. He was received by a group of ministers and officials in blue and gold. Then as he waddled up the steps of the Mosque, the crowd of solemn old turbined men cast their dignity to the wind and ran pell-mell to find a place in the empty Mosque, sublimely confident that by doing so they were materially increasing their chances of an entry into Mahomet's somewhat material paradise.

Then, after the Muezzin had called north, south, east, and west from the bracelet of the minaret for the faithful to assemble and pray, the old men in the Mosque began the noisy ritual of their sterile creed.

League for the Defence of the Constitution and the Union

We are informed that a League on the lines of the communication which we print herewith is in the course of formation. We invite our readers to weigh carefully the bases of the movement, and we shall be glad to receive correspondence on the subject.

ED., ACADEMY.

THIS confederation is banded together for the sworn purpose of opposing the tyranny of the overbearing oligarchy that now controls the government of these islands, that has degraded public life in a manner hitherto unexampled and shattered the Constitution which has heretofore been our proudest possession throughout the centuries.

The confederation has two objects:—

(1) To resist by every means in its power any Act of Parliament that is carried without the sanction of the House of Lords, and to deny the authority of the same, feeling that its members have been brought up as true Constitutionalists to respect the law as enacted by King, Lords and Commons, and that the elimination of one vital essential of these three adjuncts is fatal to the continuance of that acquiescence.

(2) To resist the present flagitious attempt to dismember the Imperial Kingdom at its very centre—and to do so, though in sympathy and co-operation with the people of Ulster who are similarly moved—on grounds that are purely British and based on the following arguments:—

It has been falsely alleged by advocates of Home Rule that the only obstacle to a solution on that basis lies in the problem of Ulster and the recalcitrance of the North-Eastern corner of Ireland. So far is that from being the case that if there was no Ulster community in existence at all, the objection to the Home Rule Bill would still be insuperable and overwhelming. The Bill as a possible pacificator of Irish rebels or satisfier of Irish agitation is in its inception an insult to the intelligence of anyone acquainted with the facts of Irish Nationalism and the personality of its leaders, but the charter of our resistance stands rooted in the following provisions in the Bill that are intolerable to any citizen of this country with the most elementary regard for his civic rights. These may be tabulated as follows:—

We are determined to resist this Bill on British grounds for three predominant reasons which are apart from the obvious consideration that it creates a fatal dual control within the area of our home politics and arms a community of avowed enemies with an incalculable power to act to our detriment.

(1) That forty-two Irish Members will be retained at Westminster to vote on English and Scottish measures without the faintest justification for such interference.

It has been suggested as an excuse for this gross violation of our liberties that only a proportion of them will be Nationalists, and that some of them will be Unionists. This is utterly beside the point, as there is no single Irish Member of any political faith who has any conceivable right to legislate for Great Britain when once a Parliament is established in Dublin.

(2) Large sums of British money are to be placed at the disposal of the Irish Government without any control of the British people and without any suggestion that they have pretended to assent to the same.

This is the issue upon which the American Colonies revolted with the approval of every Radical theorist, and this is—as it then was—a sufficient incentive in itself to warrant a resort to arms.

(3) The proposed institution of a separate Customs house and a separate Post Office is manifestly repugnant to the interest, sentiment, and traditions of a country that has from time immemorial been in all such respects entirely at one with itself.

This last consideration is as intrinsic as any other, and of an importance so insistent that the same spirit that animated the Northern American States in their prolonged and unyielding struggle to keep their dominions under the ægis of the same flag, inspires us to-day. We are going to fight the Secessionists, and we found our resistance on an avowed menace to our well-being, on injustices to ourselves that no self-respecting citizen is prepared to endure, and on the fact that no law can have any binding force save through the triple medium that our forefathers devised and their children have learned through the ages to regard.

On these grounds we pledge ourselves to withstand Home Rule (equally with any measure passed in defiance of our honoured Constitution), to declare unmistakably now that at the earliest possible moment it shall if passed be repealed, to ally ourselves with the Ulster movement in their flat negative of its acceptance and to affirm with the same unequivocable voice, "We will not have Home Rule."

The Secret of Romance

IT is unfortunate, from many points of view, that the fascination which Death has for us is so much deeper than the fascination of Birth. There is no real philosophical distinction between the gate which leads to the unknown and the other gate which leads from it. But the mere fact that the former lies before us, and may loom up at a hand-stretch at any moment, gives it an overwhelming significance to the practical mind. We listen with profound concern to everything that poets and prophets, metaphysicians and saints, and men of science have to say about death, but we take little more than an obstetric interest in the phenomenon of birth. It appears to be nothing but a formal preliminary; it has no more mystic quality for the majority of us than the hammer-blow which announces the rising of the curtain upon a play which may be good, bad, or indifferent. So little do we think about it that we regard it as a step no less sudden and complete than that of death. We speak of "beginning life," whereas we are no more alive at the moment of birth than when we were hidden in the womb. We speak of "opening our eyes upon the world," whereas these organs are no more capable of seeing with effect than our infant limbs are of sustaining us. The true miracle of birth lies in the slow emergence of an organism capable of responding with thought and emotion to its environment. Nature starts with a single cell, which proceeds to divide and to grow until it produces a complex something, sensitive to light, sound, and the contact of material things. Presently, out of the reciprocity between this unconscious mass and the impulses which rain upon it, there appears a being which becomes aware of itself and of the world. This is the true birth—a far more wonderful and mysterious thing than the collapse of the structure in death. For centuries we have sought the secret of life on the further side of the valley of the shadow; it lies, as a matter of fact, under the shadow from which we creep to self-consciousness.

Digitized by Google

Few of us realise this simple fact, because the change comes so slowly, and is so easily lost among the childish memories which are washed away like ripple marks on sand. It sometimes happens that ripple marks are preserved by some chance which converts the shifting grains into solid rock; and occasionally a similar chance leaves the permanent mark of this true-birth on the mind. The moment of awakening has such a fine romantic quality that we treasure the faintest traces of it, and must regret that it comes at a time when the soul is amorphous and purblind. Nothing in adult life is comparable with it, save the first sudden leap of the flame of passion; and even that, no matter how great its revelation may be, seems to glow in answer to an instinct which has long been struggling for expression. The earliest conception of the strangeness of life precedes it by many years; it is a real virgin sentiment, for it touches chords which were until then passive in the heart of the infinite. It comes as something absolutely fresh; and it is the basis of that elusive and beautiful view of life which we call Romance.

There is something more and something less in this phenomenon than the appearance of that spirit of inquiry which makes a child launch a "why" at everything he sees, hears, or touches. The mark of interrogation is there in both cases, but in the romantic birth it is not concerned with material things, and it is inarticulate. Anyone who can recall the event from his own experience must remember how he became aware of something impalpable and thrilling, before which all ordinary questions were silent. It was something different, moreover, from the mysteries of ghosts and fairies, for it belonged to the everyday world of visible land and sea and sky. It was something so novel and so incomprehensible that he would not have known how to speak of it, even if his instinct—itself mysterious—had not led him to dwell upon it in secret.

The strangest part of this first glimpse into the hidden meaning of life is that it often comes from the contemplation of death. Just as the savage builds his theories of the other world upon the puzzle set him by a corpse, so the child may take his earliest lesson in the incomprehensible from a coffin or a tomb. The tragedy of these sombre things may not touch him, but they have a subtle emanation which penetrates to his embryonic soul. One evening during my early childhood I was sitting idly on a grass-grown rock, close to the waters of a northern firth. I recollect the stillness of the sea, the soft greyness of the lingering twilight, and the haze which made the opposite shore seem remote and gloomy. The picture itself is so clear that I feel sure it would have remained in my memory even though nothing had occurred to imprint it deeply. But as I gazed around me I became aware of figures entering the path which led round the base of the rock to the beach beneath me. At the same moment I observed, for the first time, a boat drawn up at the edge of the water. The figures were those of four men carrying a coffin on their shoulders, and followed by several other men. As they passed beneath me, I noticed that the coffin was small; and I had a vision of a boy like myself, lying shrouded and cold within it. They laid the coffin in the stern of the boat, took their seats near it, and rowed away. I have no recollection that they made the slightest sound at any time; their footsteps on the rough shore, and the oars as they dipped and rose, were soundless. The twilight deepened as they approached mid-channel, and I lost sight of the boat in the haze as night fell. My imagination pictured the men lowering the coffin into the sea.

It would be easy to take quite a commonplace view of this incident. But it made so profound an impression upon me that I mentioned it to no one. I hid it away in my memory as if it had been a sacred rite of which I had been an illicit witness. Although I felt no curiosity about the men who had taken part in it, or about the boy within the coffin, I looked upon the event with a growing sense of the mystery, the glamour, and the picturesque sadness of the world. Indeed, the event served as the creation of that sense; and in later years, whenever my path led me in the neighbourhood of Romance, the memory of that funeral would loom from the wayside shadows, like a human spirit with friendly but unfathomable eyes, gazing at me with a question and a message, the very symbol of life itself. Nothing which I have since encountered, either in actual experience or in the pages of imagination, has surpassed that solitary recollection in its strange and persistent magic.

If we knew more about the inner history of romantic writers, we should probably discover that in their most delicate work they are seeking to recapture the beauty of such a dawn. And if we knew more of the psychology of mystics, we should perceive in their spiritual aspirations a pathetic attempt to grasp the solution which seemed to be offered to them in such an accidental glimpse of the unknown. However that may be, the real inwardness of Romance cannot be understood if we consider it merely in its adult condition, with its full panoply of sex-passion and noisy conflict and daylight adventure; we must trace it to its root in the first quiver of the soul as it emerges from darkness, the first conscious response of sentient life to the vibrations of the infinite. There is frequent truth in the contention, often so lightly held, that to keep our taste for Romance we must retain in some essential form the heart of a child.

The Magazines

THE English Review for December opens with a poem by W. H. Davies, entitled "Christmas," and improves on this with an exquisite lyric by Walter de la Mare, "The Dreamer." John Drinkwater also has a poem which is worthy of more than a single reading. The fare in the way of stories and articles is very varied—from Henri Fabre to Gaby Deslys is a terrible leap. M. Fabre discourses on the wonderful methods adopted by hunting-wasps in rendering their prey motionless and harmless, and comes to the conclusion that the modern theory of instinct is "no more than an ingenious game in which the armchair naturalist takes delight"; the whole article is fascinating. "Wayfarers," by Mr. Algernon Blackwood, is a mystical account of the dreams that came with an accident which stunned the writer; we have read better work from the same pen. Mr. Maurice Hewlett has an interesting essay, "The Gods in the Schoolhouse," full of suggestive thought, notable for his description of the thrilling moment when, as a schoolboy, the sense of poetry came to him. The very French scrap of reminiscence and chat by Mlle. Deslys, an able discussion of some of Strindberg's work by the editor, and a well-wrought discourse on "Art for Life's Sake," by Arthur Ransome, form other features of a good issue.

The most striking contribution to the Fortnightly this month is "The Bubble in the Far West," by J. B. Firth, a warning against the craze for real estate speculation in the new township of Canada. Some surprising facts are given. "In Calgary alone," says the writer, "with a population of about 60,000, there are 600 real-estate agents—one for every 100 men, women, and children in the place." "Wherever two or three are gathered together, there is the real-estate man. The poison is in the blood of the whole population." The Eastern question, of course, demands a fair proportion of space, and it is a relief to escape from these serious matters, important though they be, to a purely delightful comedy in one act by Lady Gregory, "The Bogie Men," and a good article on "Stage Decoration," by Charles Ricketts.

From a literary point of view, the best pages of the Nineteenth Century are those by Sir Sidney Lee, who, writing on the story of the Dictionary of National Biography, glides necessarily into a capital essay on the art of biography and its scope. "The Problem of Marriage and Divorce" is discussed by Bishop Welldon and W. S. Lilly; Lord Avebury writes on the subject of "Private Property at Sea in Time of War"; Yoshio Markino, in an illuminating essay, treats of "The Drama in Japan and England"; and the pressing interests of war and peace are well to the front in various capable contributions. A remarkable and fascinating paper, which we should like all our readers to see, is that entitled "The Listener Speaks," by H. M. Wallis (Ashton Hilliers), on the theme of evolution.

"Traquair's Stalk," an exciting adventure told in "Linesman's" best style, will appeal to many—even to juvenile readers, we fancy—in the current Blackwood's Magazine. "Q" finishes in the same issue his new tale of Troy, "Hocken and Hunken," already reviewed in these columns, and the "Tales of the Mermaid Tavern" are continued by Mr. Alfred Noyes. The cricket of the passing year is analysed in a good and pungent article which does not neglect the point which was to the fore last summer—slowness of play. An appreciation of the late Mr. William Blackwood, for more than thirty years the editor, closes an exceptionally fine issue. The Cornhill contains a very amusing account of "The Manœuvres from the Wayside," by one who evidently saw more than the mere dry facts of march and countermarch; another sketch by Mr. Pett Ridge of "A Vanished Humorist"—the driver of the horse-'bus—deals with the lighter side of things. In "Drake" Sir Harry Johnston estimates pitilessly, but doubtless justly, the character and achievements of the sea-king whom most of us admire without detailed knowledge of his doings. Other contributions in fiction and in discussions of topical questions will please many tastes.

The Christmas Number of Harper's Magazine is full of good things; the very first paper, "My Quest in the Arctic," by V. Stefansson, holds the attention, and, with the aid of an excellent outline map, is easy to follow. This is the opening instalment of what promises to be a most interesting story. Miss M. Cameron has an amusing sketch, the scene of which is laid at the New York Customs Office, and there are several more capital articles and stories. The illustrations, as usual, form a notable feature of this issue. The Vineyard for December is specially devoted to Christmas fare; Mr. Ernest Rhys writes on "Old Welsh Carols and Customs," and there are some attractive translations from the French and Swedish.

The Throne for December 4 formed a special Christmas issue, and is well worth getting; there is plenty of good-humoured fun in the supplement, dealing with the adventures of "Three Jovial Statesmen" in their search for a programme "calculated to catch votes and guarantee salaries," and the usual excellent features of the paper are not allowed to suffer. Punch, of course, in his annual "Almanack," eclipses all previous efforts, and the sly satires on various folk who happen by good or bad luck to be in the public eye are very good indeed.

The December number of the Oxford and Cambridge Review contains a striking article by Mr. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P., which is certain to arouse a lively controversy. Mr. F. E. Smith undertakes the defence of Lord Roberts, and the defence does not extenuate or attenuate the effect of the Field-Marshal's recent candid utterances, but proceeds on an uncompromising plea of justification. First, Mr. Smith bestows a brief notice upon the politicians who have assailed the soldier on his own ground, and remarks: "The height of insolence is surely reached when Under-Secretaries, who have never done anything for the country, and are never likely to, attempt to advertise themselves by attacks upon him, which are founded upon gross perversions of his actual words." This personal rebuke duly administered, the writer turns to consider the Field-Marshal's declarations as they affect Germany. In his opinion our militant kinsmen on the other side of the North Sea have no good ground of offence in Lord Roberts's warnings to his fellow countrymen.

He then passes to what is the kernel of the argument in favour of instituting universal and compulsory military service in this country. "Let us assume that whatever other merits national service may possess, it cannot reasonably be supported by the apprehension of invasion. There would still be overwhelming reasons why we ought to adopt it and ought to adopt it at once. In the present position of European politics it is almost universally recognised by men of all parties, that we in this country cannot stand by and see France crushed. On at least two occasions in the last five years a position has developed from which the consequences above adverted to might easily have emerged. . . . Either we must make up our minds that we will not take part in a European war under any circumstances, or we must have national service; but we cannot make up our minds on the first of these points unless we are prepared to do what our ancestors to their eternal glory refused to do in the days of Napoleon, acquiesce in the hegemony of Europe by one Titanic power."

These are days of tribulation for Little Englanders both in and out of Parliament, and Mr. F. E. Smith's joyously aggressive article is especially well adapted to fill up their cup of woe. There is much excellent matter in suitable association with it in the Oxford and Cambridge Review. Mr. Hilaire Belloc offers a gloomy but dramatic view of the House of Commons in an assumed condition of advanced corruption; a poignant study of a dingy district in London bears the fitting title "Tragedy Row"; an article on "The Prospects of Catholicism in England" is full of a challenging courage, and a discourse on "Style," by a purist, will edify the supercilious and pleasantly divert others.

The Christmas issue of the World is exceedingly good. As usual, a clever topical skit on events of the day, "The World Variety Theatre," by Mr. Adrian Ross, occupies a prominent position; the illustrations to this, by Mr. Walton Corbould, are in his best vein of smart caricature. Among the various Christmassy stories is a fantasy by Mr. Wilfrid L. Randell, entitled "The Snowy Lovers," descriptive of the loves of a snowman and snow-woman overtaken by a sudden thaw; other seasonable articles and sketches compose an excellent number. Mr. Mostyn Pigott contributes a set of verses, and we may mention "A Christmas Rose" and "The Vengeance of Israel Vischein" as two of the best stories. The usual interesting features are included in this special issue.

Notes and News

The Rev. Wm. Ewing, of Grange U.F. Church, Edinburgh, has written a new devotional work, daintily produced and suitable for presentation purposes, entitled "Cedar and Palm," and announced for immediate publication by Mr. Robert Scott. Mr. Ewing will be recognised as the joint author and editor of the "Temple Dictionary of the Bible."

A new travel work entitled "Half Hours in the Levant," by Archibald B. Spens, will be published shortly by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. In this volume the author gives his impressions of the peoples and cities of the near East, and supplements his pen-pictures with many interesting photographs of the various places visited by him.

Mr. Elliot Stock announces a new work by R. W. Pounder, intended mainly for the men and women who compose the average church congregation, entitled "Historical Notes on the Book of Revelation." The author's endeavour has been to treat in a simple and non-technical manner some of the questions which have gathered round the most obscure book in the New Testament.

Mr. Thomas Wright, of Cowper School, Olney, is preparing for publication an entirely new and exhaustive "Life of William Blake," founded upon a quantity of hitherto unpublished material. The work, which will be lavishly illustrated (partly in colours), will be issued in two volumes, large demy octavo, 24s. net; Edition de Luxe (of which not more than eighty copies will be issued), printed on hand-made paper, and bound in parchment, £2 2s. Price to subscribers—ordinary copy, 20s.; Edition de Luxe, £1 15s.

Mr. John Lane announces that the third edition of Mrs. Alec Tweedie's "Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life," is nearly exhausted, and that a fourth edition will be shortly on the market. The success of "The Letter-Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer Stanhope," by A. M. W. Stirling, is reviving interest in "Coke of Norfolk" by the same writer. The new edition of "Coke of Norfolk" (12s. 6d. net), is not a mere reprint. With new matter available the work has been especially revised and extended.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. are about to issue a new edition of Lord Acton's Letters to Mary Gladstone, first published by Mr. George Allen in 1904. The new edition has been revised, and contains a series of hitherto unpublished letters covering the period from 1883 to 1901. These letters deal with a number of questions of public interest, such as the formation of the 1892 Administration, the Irish question, and the Ulster problem, Lord Rosebery and Mr. Pitt, and appreciations of several contemporary statesmen.

Dr. Vaughan Cornish has written a volume which gives a record of travels undertaken by the late Mrs. Vaughan Cornish and himself, "The Travels of Ellen Cornish, being the Memoir of a Pilgrim of Science," contains a description of their visit to Japan, to Niagara, the great earthquake of Jamaica in January, 1907, during which they were at Kingston, and several visits to the Panama Canal works, illustrated by a fine series of original photographs. The book will be published by Mr. Ham-Smith immediately.

Robert McClure, of "Ye Auld Buik Shop," Cromwell Street, Glasgow, has in preparation a brochure which ought to be of interest to students of Scottish history, entitled "Mary Queen of Scots and the Prince her Son," being a transcript of a contemporary Venetian manuscript in Latin, hitherto unpublished as far as he knows. The MS. forms one of a collection of sixteen ambassadorial reports on various topics (in Italian) historically known as "Relazioni," at present in Mr. McClure's possession. The concluding section is headed: "Presens Scotiæ Status," with the date 1578.

A year's course of lectures on the Groundwork of Eugenics will be held, by kind permission, at the Imperial College of Science, South Kensington, from January to December, 1913. The growing feeling among social workers of the need for an elementary knowledge of the foundations of eugenics has led to the organisation of the course. It will be arranged so as to be open to the public on the payment of the fees stated, and previous university training will not be compulsory. The course of elementary biology is to meet the needs of those who have not already studied that subject elsewhere.

We are requested to state that a biography of the late Victoria Lady Welby is in course of preparation. It is hoped that her friends and correspondents may be willing to assist by placing such letters as they may possess at the disposal of her family. The greatest care will be taken of the letters, and they will be returned to their respective owners intact at the earliest possible date. In the absence of any definite expression of wish to the contrary, it will be assumed that the loan implies permission to publish where deemed desirable. The letters should be sent to Sir Charles Welby, Bart., C.B., Denton Manor, Grantham.

The "Arrow Booklets" is the title of a new series (1s. net) announced by J. W. Arrowsmith, Ltd. The aim of the publishers is to produce in permanent form original literary work of real merit, in prose and verse, for which publication in a more imposing dress is unsuitable, but which might otherwise be lost. The first of the series—"A Tale of Wulstan," by E. J. Watson—tells, in eleventh-century style and diction, of the efforts of Bishop Wulstan to suppress the slave trade in Bristol. The second is a translation, also by Mr. Watson, of Carducci's great ode, "Alle Fonti del Clitumno," which is produced in English for the first time. By the kindness of the Italian publishers, the English version appears opposite the Italian original.

The list of staff members of the Mayfair School of Music is headed by Madame Albani; associated with the great prima-donna are Miss Marie Brema, Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Plunket-Greene, Mr. Gregory Hast, and Mr. Frederic Austin. Dr. Vaughan-Williams and Mr. Cyril Scott have been secured to give instruction in composition. Madame Alma Haas, Mr. Archie Rosenthal, and Miss Gertrude Bauer, are some of the professors in pianoforte teaching, and the teachers of the violin and violoncello include Mr. Edgar Haddock, Mr. Louis Pecskai, and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse Special interest is lent to the elocution and dramatic side of the school by the association of such teachers as Miss Ellen Terry, Miss Edith Craig, and Mr. Basset Roe.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

THERE is a dullness about the House which is unmistakable. The members are worn out. Although it is an autumn session, Committees are still meeting at 11 and going on until 3, or by special resolution until 4 p.m. Then there is the Marconi inquiry and the Samuel Select Committee, and from 2.45 to midnight those who have sat on Committees have to take their share in either speaking or listening in the House downstairs; Asquith's "limit of human endurance" is being rapidly reached, whilst the legislation enacted is a farce.

Trivial incidents are hailed as comic relief. Sir William Byles aspires to the seat so long occupied by Labby and afterwards Dilke. The Labour Party did not mind either of them, but they object to Byles. If you come in to prayers, you have a theoretical right to sit where you like, but you must slip a little card with your name written on it into a brass slot at the back. Byles does this, and then goes out to get his letters, or ballot for seats for constituents, or the hundreds of other things that a member does every day as a matter of routine; when he returns, he finds his card has disappeared, and a Labour man is coolly seated in his place. According to the Globe, the word "literally" is continually abused in the sense in which it is used, but on Monday afternoon Duncan and Byles literally sat alternately on each other, Duncan on the arm of the seat, bulging over Byles, uncomfortably seated below, and vice versa.

We then discussed the Home Rule Bill again. Clause 29 makes special provision for the decision of constitutional questions by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, by reference to them by the Lord Lieutenant or a Secretary of State. The Unionists pooh-poohed this safeguard. It was as imaginary as the rest of them. How was a Liberal Ministry dependent on Irish votes to set the machinery in motion, and how could the Lord Lieutenant act? Being a Liberal, he could only act through the mouthpiece of the Irish Ministers. Hildred Carlile moved a clever amendment to enable questions as to whether any executive power in Ireland had been unlawfully exercised or withheld to be referred to the Privy Council, and he pointed to the Nationalist record as law-breakers in the past. There was a growing tendency to travel beyond legal limits, and in Ireland the temptation would be specially great.

Rufus Isaacs saw no necessity for this. He hoped there would always be an active and vigilant Opposition in Ireland, which would be a sufficient check. Tim Healy, to the surprise of everybody, turned and rent the Opposition in a fierce speech. He was tired of listening to attacks on his people. For three centuries the English had wronged and oppressed the Irish; his race had been decimated and almost destroyed. His speech greatly pleased the Ministerialists and the Irish; it seemed almost as if he was back amongst his old allies. Lord Helmsley next moved that the Lord Lieutenant's expenses should not be paid by the Imperial Exchequer, but Herbert Samuel would not listen to it, and the gag came down in due course.

On the adjournment, "Boadicea" Hunt drew attention to the state of the Territorials. Courtenay Warner brought forward the old charge that the Opposition were trying to make capital out of the state of the Territorials, and it was a shame to discourage them. This was hotly denied. Seely did his best to defend the present state of affairs, and spoke strongly against compulsory service; he urged members to abandon a will-o'-the-wisp, and back up what they had.

On Thursday we went back to the Welsh Church. McKenna announced that the Government would graciously allow the Church six months in which to adapt itself to the new condition of affairs after it had been disestablished and disendowed. Cripps proposed to give the Church two years' time. Several members demanded to know "why six months?" what was the hurry? The Church had been in existence for nearly 2,000 years. Why allow it now 200 days to clear up? "I know why it is," said Bob Cecil, with bitter emphasis. "You daren't give us the time we ask for because you fear that there will be a general election in the interval and that the Bill would be rejected by an overwhelming majority." Eventually McKenna agreed to a postponement of six months as a minimum, with a possible extension to twelve months, and the minority had perforce to be content with this.

The next point of interest was religious equality. Silvester Horne, in an unctuous speech, said that by a policy of freedom and concession to other religious denominations absolute religious equality would be obtained, which he believed would be good for the Church itself. She must not be in the toils of the State. Alfred Lyttelton said the House seemed to have forgotten that the Bill contained proposals, not merely to disorganise and impoverish the Church, but to secularise the State. Mr. White said that the State could only be secularised if there was no religion in the hearts of the people. Hemmerde bluntly said he did not know a single Liberal—including Liberal Churchmen—who was not in favour of disestablishment and disendowment, not only in Wales, but in England. For hypocrisy, hatred of the Church, and a malicious determination to destroy it, root and branch, I have never seen such an exhibition as that afternoon.

At the adjournment Pretyman asked the Chancellor to consider the advisability of an inquiry into the working of Part I of the Finance Act. Lloyd George promised to consider it.

I ought to have mentioned that the Speaker at question time came down rather heavily on Byles in the battle of the corner seat; he said it was highly inconvenient for a man to plant himself among a party to which he did not belong. Byles whined that he was only asserting the universal right of every member to sit where he pleased.

I believe it has been stated that the House in its long history has met at every hour round the clock. I do not know whether this is true, but it is clear that it must be a great many years since it met at 11 o'clock on a Friday. Business men have been in the habit of doing their business on Friday before the House met at noon, and to take an hour out of a short morning is felt to be little less than an outrage. However, a goodly number turned up.

Many years ago, the division bell once did not ring in St. Stephen's Club, and two score of members, when they strolled in half an hour later, discovered to their dismay that a division had taken place, and that the Unionist Government had been beaten. A nationalist member was always suspected of cutting the wire that runs along the tunnel between Palace Yard and the Club. Measuring other people's corn by his own bushel, Mr. Willie Redmond at the outset of the proceedings called attention to the fact that Big Ben had stopped, and asked that the clock should be at once attended to, "as it increased the danger of snap divisions." Bob Cecil asked why, having brought us all down at this hour, the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary for War, the Foreign Secretary, and other members of the Government were not present. Illingworth countered smartly by saying that they were attending a meeting of the Imperial Defence Committee, at which there were cheers from the Ministerialists, meaning that the Unionists could not complain if the Ministry were so patriotically engaged. Just then Lloyd George walked in, evidently having left the I.D. Committee, and was greeted with loud cheers, while the Ministerialists shouted, "Where was Bonar Law?"

We then went on to discuss the question that all the ecclesiastical courts should not have any force in Wales after disestablishment. The Unionists passionately protested at this wanton interference with the internal Government of their Church by the Nonconformists. By substituting civil courts for the ecclesiastical courts you are putting the Church more completely under the heel of the State, said Robert Cecil. Balfour was very bitter. "In the name of liberty you are going to impose this perfectly gratuitous hardship on a Church to which you do not happen to belong," he said. "Was the status of a single Nonconformist body spiritually improved?" Lord Hugh said there was a pagan emperor who had treated the early Church better than this Government were proposing to treat this Church, inasmuch as he recognised the authority of Church courts in their own affairs. No one had enough knowledge of history to attempt to controvert the fact. The Mad Hatter put his oar in, and Lord Robert passionately moved that the question be now put, which was done, and the machinery of the Church disappeared. In the next amendment Lord Hugh said the Government could not even do an unjust thing in a just way. They were acting unfairly because a body of Welsh Nonconformists' opinion was necessary to their political existence. The Chairman gently interposed: however strongly either side felt, they must carry on the debate on a basis of mutual good faith. Hugh, nothing daunted, said he was imputing that honourable (and he laid a stress on the word) members were acting from political motives in a religious controversy and that was true. That was not set aside by the fundamental customs of any assembly. The Church was being wronged and robbed and members opposite were prostituting their own honour. Clem Edwards said the language reminded him of St. Mary-at-Hill, which was close to Billingsgate. McKenna declared that the Church could go on with the same courts after disestablishment if they liked, but members of the Church must be defined if they had any fear that Welsh Nonconformists could interfere in the reconstitution of the Church after the disestablishment. Cripps, the great Ecclesiastical Lawyer, had barely time to say that he disagreed with every word the Home Secretary had said when the guillotine fell again. Progress was then reported and the debate adjourned. Ginnell again tried to bring on the question of the Crown Jewels, but he had no luck—the House was at once counted out. Members were not inclined to discuss Irish as well as Welsh burglaries in one afternoon.

Monday is always a favourite day for questions. As you have to give two days' notice, everything that you want to know after Wednesday is naturally put down for Monday, and to-day there were many of interest. The epoch-making gift of Canada was the subject of several. The Government, through Winston and Asquith, set the minds of the House and the country at rest on certain matters connected therewith. In accordance with the expressed wish of Canada, the three additional battleships would be an addition to the existing British programme. They would directly strengthen the naval forces of the Empire and the margin available for its security. They would also welcome a Canadian Minister as a permanent member of the Imperial Defence Committee, and, indeed, representatives of the other self-governing Dominions. It will thus be seen that Canada's patriotic action will have far-reaching effects, and the foundations of a Pan-Britannic Parliament are being laid more quickly than some of us hoped. We shall yet live to see a Parliament of the Empire regularly meeting in Westminster Hall, the cradle of the race!

Asquith denied that Lloyd George had said he intended next to disestablish the Church in England, and ended with this cryptic remark: "It shows the inadvisability of departing from the rule of giving publicity in the Press to statements alleged to have been made in the course of private conversation," which led us all to wonder what it was Lloyd George did say to the Baptist minister—at the Scotch railway station!

Archer-Shee wanted to know if the secret land committee had begun their investigations in Surrey, and whether they had yet come across the Radical who was acting the part of a second William Rufus and forming an immense deer forest in that county. He obtained no reply, but the matter will not be allowed to rest.

The Home Rule debate is getting into the doldrums; comparatively small details are now discussed. Mr Hoare pointed out that the Civil Service in Ireland were beginning to get rather uncomfortable as to their position under their new masters; Birrell described them as "admirable and perhaps naturally agitated persons." He proposed to spend £40,000 in compensating those who wanted to retire. Redmond was graciously pleased to approve, and the amendment was negatived without a division. Sir Philip Magnus then proposed that the principal teachers should be included in this arrangement. Birrell was aghast at the suggestion. He adopted Paul Kruger's celebrated phrase, and said that the cost "would stagger humanity."

Mr. Balfour attributed no ill motives to the new Irish Parliament, or any avoidable bigotry; but the Government were deliberately setting up a system which might and probably would destroy the whole system under which the teachers had come into their posts, and he thought that to leave them in that position would be unnecessary and unjustifiable cruelty. But it was all no good. The teachers were rushed out of court by the majority. We then had a series of divisions which completed the Bill down to Clause 36.

On Tuesday, Bonar Law asked the Premier when the House would be given an opportunity of expressing its gratitude to Canada for her gift. Asquith spoke admirably in reply: "His Majesty's Government fully recognise that it is both the desire and the duty of the House of Commons to give formal and authoritative expression to the universal feeling of warm appreciation and heartfelt gratitude which has been aroused in the Mother Country by the splendid patriotism and liberality displayed in this matter by their fellow subjects in the Overseas Dominions and Provinces. The Government, however, think, and the House will probably agree, that it would be proper, and in deed only respectful, to the Canadian people to defer taking such action until the proposals introduced by Mr. Borden come under consideration and discussion in the Canadian Parliament."

Keir Hardie got up and wanted to know what steps had been taken to find out if the Labour organisation in Canada had agreed to the expenditure. "That," said Asquith, "is a matter for Canada"—and Keir Hardie sat down, and the few other Little Englanders silently gnashed their teeth. They dare not say anything about this most inconvenient gift.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

By LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE CRISIS.

WERE one to depend solely upon the daily Press for enlightenment with regard to the international situation, then the conclusion would be inevitable that during the last twenty-four hours the outlook has become appreciably worse. As a matter of fact, however, the truth lies in the recognition that the international situation has undergone little change; and that it is neither more nor less critical to-day than was the case some weeks ago, when the Austro-Servian dispute first developed into public prominence. At one time it doubtless appeared to those unacquainted with the undercurrent of foreign affairs that no cause existed for anxiety, either immediate or ultimate. Germany and Great Britain were believed to be working for peace upon terms which, taking into consideration their past relations, could only be described as indicative of sincere intimacy.

Then came the speech of the German Chancellor, in the course of which at one period he turned towards this country and frankly acknowledged the welcome improvement in feeling, and at the same time avowed Germany's adherence to the sacred cause of peace, while a few moments later he turned towards Russia, and said in blunt language that, were Austria to become involved in war with a second nation—meaning, of course, the contingency that Russia might range herself on the side of Servia—then Germany could come to the aid of her ally. The subtle oration succeeded in its immediate object. Russian public opinion noted the warning and resented its terms; British public opinion felt itself flattered by the Chancellor's courteous attentions. Within a few days of this weighty pronouncement, the Triple Alliance which, under ordinary circumstances, would have run until May or June of 1914, was renewed.

Abundant proof is therefore forthcoming that the Triple Alliance stands firm on the question of vetoing Servia's claim to an outlet on the Adriatic. In view of its attitude, it is idle to attempt, as some writers have done, to whittle down the issue to one of merely local importance Once again, as in the case of the Agadir incident, the efficacy of the balance of power in Europe, so essential to the very existence of the British Empire, is about to be subjected to a critical test. The Conference of Ambassadors, to be held, probably in London, about the same time as the Peace Conference between Turkey and the Allies, cannot, in the nature of things, prove a very decisive instrument in the maintenance of peace. According to Sir Edward Grey, this eminent assembly is to be informal and non-committal. These restrictions would not in themselves warrant pessimism, were it not for the plain indications, coming from several quarters, that, acting to some extent independently, Austria is bent upon forcing the issue with Servia. The military preparations of the Dual Monarchy have continued with undiminished vigour, and the recent changes in the higher commands of the army were obviously decided upon with deliberate and ominous purpose.

In a country where war is looked upon as a contingency of the immediate future it is not surprising that trade and commerce should be disorganised. Thus we hear of the run upon savings banks, of the losses of large sums of money, of pawnshops filled to overflowing with pledges, of the inability of creditors to collect debts, and, in short, of a widespread upheaval in the normal life of the community. Moreover, the middle-class Austrian, ordered to betake himself to the frontier and there to undergo the hardships of a common soldier's life at a period when the calendar indicates the approach of the festive season, feels irritated beyond measure. He recalls that he was compelled to undergo similar disabilities two years ago, when a crisis arose with Servia over the annexation of Bosnia. Naturally he vents all his wrath upon Servia. It is with difficulty that the Government is holding in check the swelling tide of public opinion. Nevertheless, the Government, too, is bent upon finally clearing up the Servian situation, for it is not slow to realise that the moment for such a decisive settlement may never be so opportune as it is at present. To begin with, the Triple Alliance is of one mind on the question. Then Servia, to a large extent exhausted by her campaign against Turkey, has all the appearance of an easy prey.

And, most important of all, there are not wanting signs that the Triple Entente is ready to make substantial sacrifices to secure peace. Contrary to the precedent established over the Agadir incident, there has, on this occasion, been no weighty pronouncement on behalf of this compact that it is ready, in certain eventualities, to resort to extreme methods. Russian public opinion enthusiastically supports Servia, and doubtless, when the proper time comes, the Government will uphold the legitimate aims of Slav kinsmen. But, as far as Great Britain is concerned, there is no denying the plain fact that the belief is widely entertained that the employment of the British Navy in the interests of Servia would mean that the statesmen in responsible office had taken leave of their senses. The conclusion is inevitable that British public opinion has been wrongly instructed. The real issue lies in the determination of the Powers composing the Triple Alliance to reap full advantage of the implied, and therefore loosely expressed, obligations of the opposing group, the Triple Entente, in order to force its will upon Europe. In the absence of any explicit and authoritative statement that Russia, France, and Great Britain are in complete agreement as to their policy in the Near East, Austria, conscious of the full support of her allies, exhibits a tendency to expand her demands. It is not sufficient that Servia should be denied a port on the Adriatic.

She is to be called upon to give Austria positive proofs of neighbourly friendship. For example, the trade which Austria acquired in the days when she kept the little kingdom in economic servitude must not be interfered with by the imposition of tariffs. Then a hint is to be conveyed delicately, though none the less firmly, that, now Turkey is subjugated, Servia, if she desires relations of amity with Austria, can have no further need for a large army. Yet, in spite of these extravagant requirements, the Vienna Press endeavours to persuade the world that it is Servia who is arrogant and obstinate, whereas the Belgrade Government has throughout assumed an attitude noteworthy, on the whole, for its patience and correctness.

It is only too apparent that there are dangerous elements at work in Austria, making for a European war. We still believe that this overwhelming disaster will be averted, but the clouds will gather dark and low before the first signs of a permanent improvement in the situation become noticeable.

MOTORING

IT is announced that the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders have allocated out of their funds the sum of two thousand guineas as a prize for a satisfactory home-produced motor fuel. This is a handsome gift, commensurate with the importance of its objective, and the Society is to be congratulated on having at last offered to do something for motorists in return for the splendid patronage the latter give to the Society's annual shows.

The motor-fuel question still continues by far the most important and interesting topic of discussion in motoring circles. The actual position seems to be that it is to benzol that we must look for the ultimate solution of the problem, but it becomes more and more evident, in spite of the optimism displayed in certain quarters, that it will be a long time before this spirit can be manufactured and distributed on a scale calculated to disturb the operations of the petrol "ring." It has been proved that it can be manufactured from ordinary coal dust, of which we have unlimited supplies, at a comparatively nominal cost; but in the process of manufacture there are enormous quantities of by-products for which a market has to be found. It appears that the by-products now produced can be profitably disposed of, but it does not follow that such would be the case if the many more millions of tons of coal necessary to meet the motorists' requirements were treated for benzol production. If they could not be disposed of, the cost would have to be borne by the benzol, which would therefore be placed at a prohibitive price. What little benzol can be obtained at present in this country costs a little over one shilling per gallon at the place of manufacture. To this must be added the duty of threepence per gallon, say twopence for distributing charges, and twopence for the agent. This brings the actual cost to the consumer to 1s. 7d. per gallon—the

HISTORIC TESTS: No. 5.—The Test of Reliability

A Brahman test, but of prehistoric origin. Where we swear oaths before Commissioners, the Brahman drank three cups of holy water with solemn rites before Shiva the Destroyer God, whose authentic reproduction in the background will be readily recognised by the faithful. If thereafter the Brahman lived three weeks without aches or pains he had told the truth.

Nevertheless we must be content with our legal bond that guarantees all rubber VICTOR TYRES for 1,000 miles more than any other tyre is guaranteed. That evidence of reliability (shorn, by the way, of all the usual clauses by which some manufacturers contract out of responsibility), plus the road evidence of the tyre trial, the steel-studded round of which Victor won with 5,010 miles, will, we hope, be good enough to satisfy our potential patrons that the VICTOR TYRE is something better than any of its competitors and worthy of personal trial. Our actual patrons prove by their repeat orders that Victors are better.

What Victor Tyres are to others Victor retreads are to others and Victor Vests are to every liner and shield on the market. The first is built up as a new tyre is built. Unsound retreading covers are exchanged free. The last is the only device to support the cover from stem to stern, from tread to bead, rendering it absolutely burst proof and preventing punctures. It rescues a tyre from the scrap heap and renews its life and youth.

During the remainder of the Tyre Trial special sporting discounts allowed off all Victor Tyres.

present price of petrol. There is therefore little inducement to the motorist to make any change under existing conditions, even if he could obtain the benzol without difficulty.

Several months ago the London County Council applied for the imposition of a speed limit of ten miles an hour on a portion of Streatham High Road and Tooting Bec Gardens. The usual inquiry was held by the Local Government Board in October last, the application being opposed by the Automobile Association and the R.A.C. Formal intimation has just been given that the Board has declined to comply with the Council's application. This is another instance of the value to motorists of co-operation between the two big motoring organisations, and it is of special importance in view of the fact that the Streatham High Road forms a portion of the main Brighton Road, which is probably the most motor-frequented highway in the kingdom. It is evident that, if it were not for powerful and organised opposition to the L.C.C.'s continuous applications for special limits, the lot of the London motorist would be a very hard one.

During the last few years there have been several attempts on the part of inventors to so construct a pneumatic tyre as to render it capable of easy and permanent repair in the event of damage to one particular section, such damage to the ordinary tyre frequently resulting in its being rendered totally useless, although nine-tenths of it may be perfectly sound. The "sectional" principle upon which these devices have been based is applied in a very interesting, and apparently quite sound, method to a new tyre, called the "Clark," which is just about to be placed on the market. We hope to give full details in a future issue, but in the meantime we may say that very great claims are confidently made on behalf of the "Clark," a minimum service of 4,000 miles being guaranteed, even with the smallest tyre manufactured.

The position of the Royal Automobile Club in the matter of the tyre test is even worse than appeared. It will be remembered that the Club recently advanced a certain specific reason for its refusal to proceed with the test—namely, that the Victor tyre could only be procured from the headquarters of the makers. The latter now practically accuse the Club of deliberate lying in representing this as the reason for the withdrawal. They assert that on June 18 last, at a joint meeting of the committees of the R.A.C. and the Society of Traders, three reasons were given for withdrawing from the trial, one of them being that "it was proposed to conduct it without the consent of the other tyre firms," and they have deposited £100 with two important journals, to be handed over to the Society's own Benevolent Fund if the R.A.C. can prove that such is not the case. This is a direct challenge, impugning the veracity and straightforwardness of the committee of the Club, and it will be both interesting and instructive to note what happens.

ALTHOUGH peace seems nearer to us business is coy. The speculator at any rate refuses to gamble in any market, and I do not suppose brokers have had a duller account for some years. There is an uneasy feeling abroad that Russia and Austria are not as friendly as they seem. The pretensions of Austria grow more absurd each day; when we remember that she is in serious financial trouble these airs are somewhat irritating. France and Russia combined have huge reserves of gold, which after all counts for everything in a war, and neither Austria nor Germany has any to speak of—their wealth is all on paper; therefore they should not threaten Europe in the way they are doing to-day. It is neither polite nor politic. The Reichsbank can go on issuing paper ad lib., but it does not improve the credit of Germany.

We have at last roused the promoter, and dozens of schemes are being offered. Some good, such as the Grand Trunk Debenture; some speculative, such as the De Bruyer Preference; and others frankly wild-cat, such as the Tin Concessions. The Tilling issue came betwixt and between. You may call it attractive. A cocoa-nut plantation in Tobago is trying to get underwritten; it may succeed. But no one should apply for shares.

The Pathescope went like hot cakes. They say that the shop in Piccadilly sold 400 machines the first day it opened. Those who got an allotment were lucky. It is to be a second Gramophone.

Most of the gossip of the week centres in the Oceana scandal. Henriques has resigned; the Ehrlich crowd is fighting for control of the New Egyptian against Mr. A. A. Baumann and Sir Ernest Spencer—two clean men whom shareholders in this company should unhesitatingly support with their proxies. With regard to Oceana, I think the best thing is to vote against the new directors who are of the Ehrlich group, but I do not think that the Conybeare faction will succeed, though if they do we shall see some pretty disclosures. There are various matters connected with the Piccadilly Hotel and the H. D. Syndicate which should be examined into, and the doings of the Bend and Zed companies also call for more publicity. Indeed, were I a shareholder I should insist upon a committee of investigation or I would vote against the directors.

MONEY is not quite so hard, but until the end of the year no change will be made in the Bank Rate. It is not likely that even Germany will advance her rate, as she is getting good supplies of cash from Holland, where money is quite plentiful. France also has more money than she knows how to use, and some very big loans are being arranged in Paris, Brazil being the chief borrower.

FOREIGNERS are steady. Japanese issues have been put up, and I suggest that it is a good opportunity to get out. The change of Ministry cannot affect the financial position, which does not grow better. On paper Tintos look undervalued, but the speculative blocks taken over by the banks at the last crisis have not yet been sold. All international stocks are quite strong, which looks as though the big banks were convinced that peace was a certainty.

HOME RAILS are dull on the absurd strike on the North Eastern. It is hardly likely to last long, but it will spoil the half-year of this railway. I believe that when the figures are all complete we shall see that the leading lines have done splendidly. The Railway Bill will enable them to raise rates next year, at any rate sufficiently to cover the increase in wages. The best stocks to buy are Great Central '89 Prefs, Great Western, and Lancashire and Yorkshire, and Midland Deferred. Those who want a lock-up can purchase Dover A, but they must not think that they will get any immediate result from the Kent Coalfield; this will take some years to fructify. Clever people are buying the stock, and locking it up for the not far distant day when it will touch par and be worth it.

YANKEES are suffering from nerves. Dear money and the Union Pacific decision combined have upset the market. It will recover. All the American Railways are making good profits. Increases are recorded each week, and though taxation has increased also the present half-year will be good. I look upon the decision in the Supreme Court as a "bull" point. All the railway wanted was the entrance into San Francisco. That it gets. It no longer needs the Southern Pacific, and the cash it will get for its shares will be a bonus for the ordinary. Union Pacific has huge reserves and it will surely pay off the preferred, and thus put ordinary into a much sounder position. The Convertible bonds have fallen and are very cheap just now. Atchison is showing big increases and may be safely bought. Southern Common are also cheap.

RUBBER has been talked about all the week. The Trusts want prices marked up by the end of the year in order that their balance-sheets may look better. The dealers and manipulators of the rubber market have been picking up cheap shares for some time past, and they hope to unload before Christmas, but there is nothing in the position to warrant any rise. I have always held that the production from Brazil must rise as the price of rubber falls, and the past year proves my argument. The demand from the United States has absorbed the Brazilian increase, and will do so next year, but the Malay States production for 1913 will be very big, and there is no chance of any sustained rise in rubber, and therefore in rubber shares.

OIL.—The Ural Caspian report is frankly disappointing. It tells us no new thing. It might just as well have been dated 1911. No doubt some progress has been made, but I can't see it. Yet the share is such a favourite gambling counter that few people sold. The history of Ural is the history of all new oilfields—long delays, bitter disappointments, and perhaps loss in the end. Shells were weak on the Ural report. But why, I don't know, for the Shell makes its profit on the handling of oil, not the baling. It is now said that the Galician Oil Trust troubles are at an end. I hope so, but this company has been in trouble since its birth, and we must not be too sanguine.

MINES.—The report of the Ashanti Goldfields is better than people expected. The price of these shares has steadily fallen, mainly owing, I think, to selling of executors, and to-day they pay 16 per cent. on the market price. There are about 2½ years' ore in sight. Van Ryn report is good also. But no one wants mines. The Bauchi costs work out very high. Nigeria is another great disappointment. Hay mine is now another Rhodesian Mine gone wrong. Clearly the deposits of Rhodesia are most erratic, and it will be hard to get anyone to put a penny into this country. The Globe and Phœnix shareholders have succeeded in getting a new director put on the Board. At least that is the story.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The agony of the holders of National Telephone Deferred will not be prolonged much longer. Cute people are now buying, and on each fall they add to their stock. The Darracq report was an astounding document. No debenture preference or any other dividend could have been paid but for the reserve fund. Darracq has gone, and the whole business looks black. Evidently the insiders knew what was going to happen, for the price has steadily fallen for months past. Amalgamated Press holds its own. That is good, for the selling by insiders has been stealthily going on for many months past. The profits are up and the goodwill has been written down—altogether not a bad report. But the shares are too high. RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE TRADE DISPUTES ACT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The judgment in the case of Vacher and Son v. the London Society of Compositors, deciding that no action for libel against a Trade Union can be entertained by any Court, has served a very useful purpose by removing any doubt as to the extent of the immunities conferred upon trade unions by the Trade Disputes Act, 1906.

By the Trade Union (No. 2) Bill which is now before Parliament the Government is deliberately extending the powers of the unions so that they may enter into trade and compete against others by wrongful means and yet carry the absolute immunities of the Trade Disputes Act; or they may run newspapers and libel and slander all who cross their path and yet leave their victims without redress. How powerful this weapon will be in contested elections, or trade disputes, is easy to imagine.

The judgment will be welcomed by all who had previously recognised the need for an alteration in the law. The first step towards a cure is rightly to diagnose the disease, and now that this has been so ably done by the Law Lords the politicians cannot long be allowed to shirk their duty.

The danger is that in finding a remedy there may be some inclination to go too far and so create an injustice on the other side. I would therefore call the attention of your readers to a Bill which has been prepared by the Committee of the British Constitution Association—copies of which can be obtained from their office, 11, Tothill Street, S.W.—and which has been introduced into Parliament by Lord Robert Cecil. This Bill relieves the Union funds from liability for unauthorised acts of their members and others only when such acts are effectively repudiated by the managing committee. Again, while allowing the Unions all reasonable latitude for carrying out their objects in accordance with their rules, it prevents them from using their great power for the purpose of injuring others. So well does it attain to the happy medium that it has almost, if not entirely, disarmed criticism. The Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress attempted an attack upon it, but were quickly silenced. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

INSANITY AND CRIME.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—If H. F. H. does not believe in the power of heredity, it can only be that he has never studied the subject seriously. Apparently he does not believe in hereditary taint because it often happens that some members of a tainted family go through life without any serious breakdown. He forgets that heredity is only one of the factors to render a man liable to disease; it is a predisposing factor; the exciting factor may never occur. There are, for example, people who go through life experiencing the saddest disasters, and yet they keep their optimism and cheerfulness; there are others who on the slightest misfortune, often only an imaginary one, think at once of suicide. Surely we mental specialists are in a better position to test the importance of heredity than any lawyer can possibly be. If a patient has a good family history, I am invariably hopeful as to the prospect of curing him. If in the patient's ancestry insanity, epilepsy, consumption, or suicide has occurred, I may also get the patient well, but I shall dread the recurrence of his particular affliction, for the disposition of the nervous system to get out of order will always be there. He has the "taint."

H. F. H. asks, Why do some members of a tainted family escape? The answer is not easy, but probably it is because the exciting factor never occurs A tainted person may marry a healthy partner, and thus the children may escape. But if both parents have a taint, the outlook is a serious one. I need only quote one example —one of a great many—from my practical experience. Last week I was consulted about a boy who had an epileptic attack. Both father and mother were absolutely healthy and never had a day's illness in their lives. Yet, on further examination, I ascertained that the father's father had died insane, the mother's father had died of consumption. Not only was this particular boy an epileptic, but a sister of his died two years ago in an idiot asylum, and another sister, still in her infancy, proves uncontrollable. To deny heredity, when one has such cases in one's daily practice, one must be lacking in intelligence.

H. F. H. considers it deplorable that tainted people should not be allowed to marry, and mentions Royalties of distinction who would have never existed had the eugenists had their way. In my preface to Nisbet's "Insanity of Genius" (Stanley Paul and Co.), just published, I have referred to the same fact, that a great many men of genius, especially poets and artists, mostly come from tainted families. Such genius is a "sport" creation in Nature and generally dies out with the abnormally gifted man. Whether it is of greater advantage to the State to encourage the breeding by insane people in the hope of producing now and then a man of genius, or whether it is better to encourage normal people to reproduce their kind—that is, men of average talent—is a question for the sociologist, but I do not think there can be two opinions.

H. F. H. has also peculiar views as to crime and criminals. He says: "The difference between a madman and a criminal is that the former does not know what he he is doing, the latter does." In his opinion, "the criminal is made, not born." He traces all crime to the influence of environment. To be fair, it must be admitted that a large number, perhaps the largest number, of criminals have fallen owing to the influence of environment. But I declare that a large number are criminal by disposition. I have seen them in good society and healthy environment, and if they have never committed a crime, it is simply because being wealthy, the temptation was never strong enough; but the tendency, and I have it on their own confession, is always there. It is not true either, that the criminal necessarily knows what he is doing. A man in a passion, the impulsive man, the epileptic, all these do not know at the time the consequences of their actions. Besides these, there are a number of insane, who if not recognised in time, are liable to commit criminal offences; they may know what they are doing, but their crime is the natural outcome of a diseased brain, or a brain functioning in a morbid manner, and to punish those as ordinary criminals is the height of injustice.

Most men do not recognise insanity until it becomes apparent to the commonest man in the street. Lawyers often accuse lunacy specialists that they are in favour of pleading insanity for every criminal. This is not my standpoint. I know perfectly well that the great majority of criminals are the result of unfavourable circumstances; at the same time, I have come across a good many criminals who are such by a peculiarity of their brain organisation. I have seen a number of children in my time, of whom I prophesied that they would become criminals. In most instances the parents feared the same. Some I have been able to treat; as regards others, I have been helpless, there being no institution in this country to take care of them. These children were not insane enough to go to asylums; they were not "intellectually" feeble-minded, so as to go to idiot institutions; they were morally deficient (some with brilliant intellect), and for congenital moral deficiency no provision is made in this country. One of these children, a girl now grown up, has at the present time some twenty convictions against her, of which all the details are in my possession. Yet the Home Secretary, the Lunacy Commissioners, magistrates, and judges declared themselves powerless to deal with the case as one of brain disease, when the evidence was placed before them.

H. F. H. says: "The individual is predisposed by circumstances in his environment not under his control, and so weakened that, when the temptation comes, he cannot help to fall." Nonsense! Circumstances may be very strong, but if they were so powerful, and the innate disposition counted for nothing, as H. F. H. assumes, property—nay, life itself—would not be safe for a moment, and no State could exist. There are men inherently good, others inherently bad, and some are what circumstances make them. The first, with a predominance of good qualities, would rather die than commit a sin; the second, with a predominance of bad qualities, will not be deterred by any prospect of punishment, and are beyond reform; the third may remain good if placed beyond the reach of temptation, otherwise they fall. It is the last class on whom reform measures succeed. Finally, there is the irresponsible criminal from brain disease or disordered brain function. For him we want hospitals, not prisons. —I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—It is, I am afraid, clear that Mr. Dixon has no intention of giving the public a chance of judging of the value of the evidence on which he thinks he became a Christian Scientist. He now thinks that a letter to the Press is not a proper means of producing such evidence. In this he is, I should think, quite right. The point on which most people probably disagree with Mr. Dixon is the propriety of laying claim, in a letter to the Press, to the possession of evidence which one has no intention of producing, either in the Press or elsewhere.

Mr. Dixon was led to begin this correspondence by my mentioning—in another correspondence—Christian Scientists as being people who habitually fail to differentiate between a fact and a hypothesis. By way, I suppose, of showing how unjustifiable my insinuation was, Mr. Dixon has put forward in your columns—apparently as facts—a series of propositions, than which it is difficult to imagine anything more hypothetical and less susceptible of proof. I recognise the special difficulty of finding out what Mr. Dixon really believes about anything: but, as far as I can make out, the following are among the things which he looks upon as facts:—

Adherence to any religious system is generally (or frequently?) the result of a purely intellectual process.

Any man who has formed any belief on any subject is likely to be a more reliable witness as to the nature and validity of his reasons and the correctness of his train of reasoning than an outsider.

He himself was led to accept Christian Science by critical and unbiassed examination of evidence as to what Christian Science had accomplished in specific cases: so were most other people who have accepted it.

He is in possession of a vast mass of such evidence, conclusive enough to have converted him from his originally hostile attitude. [Therefore, one would suppose, conclusive enough to convert other people.]

He has excellent reasons for not producing this evidence.

Inharmony of every description can be overcome by Christian Science. [If this means anything, it must, to my mind, mean that the confirmed drunkard, at whatever age, can, by Christian Science treatment, be put into as good a condition—physical, mental, and moral—as the man who has led a life of self-control.]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Dixon possesses valid evidence of such things having been done, and is logically and morally justified in refusing to produce it.

I, of course, deny Mr. Dixon's moral right to keep such evidence up his sleeve. The satisfaction which a man may derive from feeling that he is the only educated man in the community to which he belongs cannot justify the withholding of evidence which would, if published, bring in troops of other educated men, to the manifest advantage of themselves and the community. I am, of course, not implying that Mr. Dixon is consciously actuated by any such motive: any man in whose mind such a motive was at work would be the last person in the world to know it.

In his latest letter, Mr. Dixon has put forward a further "fact," more enlightening, perhaps, than any of the others. I—an opponent of Christian Science—am likely to be "just a little bit annoyed" at the course this correspondence has taken. What an unappreciative wretch I should be, adding to all my other failings an utter lack of gratitude for the benefits which have been vouchsafed to me.—I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

T. G. MARTIN.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.
THE TESTIMONY OF FLORIO.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—John Florio tells us quite clearly that the author of the Shakespeare plays was a person of distinction, "a gentleman" . . . . " that loved better to be a poet than to be counted so."

In Florio's Second Frutes, 1591, immediately after the address to the reader there is a sonnet, Phaeton to his friend, Florio, which, it is admitted by Sir Sidney Lee, must have been written by "Shakespeare." I think that Dr. Munro was the first to discover that this was a "Shakespeare" Sonnet (see the article "Shakespeare" in the old Encyclopædia Britannica). Well! what does "Florio" himself say about it? The Sonnet appeared in his second Frutes, 1591, and he thus refers to it in "A World of Wordes," which is dated 1598: "There is another sort of leering curs, that rather snarle than bite, whereof I could instance in one, who lighting upon a good sonnet of a gentleman's, a friend of mine, that loved better to be a poet than to be counted so, called the auctor a rymer, notwithstanding he had more skill in good poetry than my slie gentleman in good manners or humanite." Here we see that Florio says most distinctly that the author of the sonnet which is addressed to himself "loved better to be a poet than to be counted so." But the author of that sonnet is admittedly the author of all the "Shakespeare" sonnets, and also admittedly the author of the "Shakespeare" plays. Florio, therefore, tells us in words the meaning of which it is not possible to mistake that the mighty author was a "gentleman" who "loved better to be a poet than to be counted so." Florio was always a servant of Bacon's, and eventually received a pension of £50 per annum for making my lord's works known abroad. It is quite possible that Florio could have been alluding to the "Householder of Stratford" when he said that the sonnet was written by a "gentleman" who "loved better to be a poet than to be counted so." The man of Stratford could have had no possible reason for desiring concealment if, indeed, he, who could neither read nor write, had been a poet. Furthermore, William Shakespeare, of Stratford-upon-Avon, did not become entitled to be styled a gentleman till he had obtained a coat of arms in 1599. In "Every Man Out of His Humour" we read that the essential clown is so desirous of the title of "gentleman" that he is willing to pay for it. Accordingly, when he appears upon the stage in Act III he says, "I can write myself gentleman now; here's my patent." Writing in 1598 about what was printed in 1591, Florio could not have described "the essential clown," William Shakespeare, of Stratford-upon-Avon, as "a gentleman," "a friend of mine." If it were possible to imagine that Florio might have been friendly with "the essential clown," he would have written merely "a friend of mine," and would not have gone out of his way to say "a gentleman," "a friend of mine."

I have known the facts stated above for many years, but only in this present month, November, 1912, have I made public this convincing evidence that, the greatest birth of time, the Immortal plays were not the works of the drunken illiterate clown of Stratford, but were written by a man of position, "a gentleman" who "loved better to be a poet than to be counted so."

Yes! Florio's testimony proves that Bacon was Shakespeare.

EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE.

November 14, 1912.
13, Carlton House Terrace, S.W.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—May I add one belated argument to the masterly letter of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, published in your journal for October 26?

Why did Bacon choose the name of "Hamlet" for his greatest character? The reason is this: "Hamlet" is a diminutive form, and signifies "a little Ham"; and "a little Ham" is "Bacon." Q.E.D.

Bacon was quite a model of industry. He wrote the "Dramas" of Shakespeare, Marlowe, and Greene; the "Poems" of Spenser, Shakespeare, and a few others; the "Prose Works" of Burton; and he translated the Bible, Don Quixote, and Montaigne, besides "polishing up" Chaucer. No wonder literature was found by his contemporaries to be rather a poor profession. There was nothing left for them to do.

Sir,—It is refreshing to read the excellent common-sense letter of "Tom Jones" in your paper of the 17th. I am grateful to him for it. Much good would it do some people if they read a very convincing and sound essay by my old friend the late Sir Theodore Martin, published by Blackwood in 1858, called "Shakespeare or Bacon." They might read, too, with benefit a careful compilation by C. E. Hughes, published in 1904, entitled "The Praise of Shakespeare." In a history of the Church of St. Saviour, Southwark, the author, the Rev. Canon Thompson, alluded to the Baconian theory, and in a footnote, page 295, says, "Dr. Furnival, we may add, flings the wild craze aside with scathing contempt." He then gives a quotation from the learned Doctor's introduction to the Leopold Shakespeare; it is strong, but not a bit too strong. I will not trouble you with it all. He alludes to the craze as one "which can be entertained only by folk who know nothing of either writer, or are cracked, or who enjoy the paradox joke"; and he ends with "the tomfoolery of it is infinite."

Last year some diving operations took place in the river Wye, carried out by some eccentric and enthusiastic individual who from some reason or other believed that an iron chest or box would be found containing matter in reference to the Baconian theory. I heard Sir Herbert Tree speak of this gentleman as one seeking in the Wye for the wherefore of Shakespeare.

I have not heard of any discovery having been made. My hope is that the craze may soon be—

"TACITÆ" AND "SILENTIA" IN AENEID II, 255.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,— We will not discuss how far the torch-flare from the "regia puppis" might have been visible through the darkness of the clear atmosphere of the Trojan coast; or whether Vergil meant it to be the signal which caused Sinon to open the "pinea claustra." But, if Mr. H. C. Minchin will read once more the lines which we have been considering, he will see that "extulerat," in the pluperfect tense, must have preceded the "ibat" of the "Argiva phalanx," in line 254, which is the inceptive imperfect tense. The royal ship had held aloft the flames; and then "iam Argiva phalanx instructis navibus ibat." That surely is what "cum" comes to in line 256.

Notes of the Week

IT has been our lot to adjudicate over a course of years in cases of drunkenness. We have heard many fine distinctions advanced as to the precise condition of persons who are charged, but Mr. Chester Jones is, so far as we know, the first to invent the offence "drunk in the police court sense." Drunkenness or sobriety rests entirely on the evidence produced. Not infrequently the evidence takes the form of a doctor's certificate. The practitioner judges from the perfume of the breath of the alleged culprit, from his ability to walk with undeviating steps along a straight line, and from the appearance of his eyes, whether they are suffused or whether they are not. No doubt when these evidences are before the court and are all present in the case under examination, it is clear that the defendant is drunk "in the police court sense." We are not aware that any medical evidence was offered in the case of the engine-driver Knox. If no medical certificate was produced we think that the learned magistrate should have been able, upon the evidence before him, to arrive at a conclusion whether in his opinion Knox was entitled to be acquitted or must necessarily be convicted. Such a decision, we submit, would have been infinitely more satisfactory than the halting and hesitating judgment at which Mr. Chester Jones arrived. It is not fair to Knox to suggest that although he was drunk he was not so drunk that a conviction was justified. It is also not fair, we think, to the railway company to adopt a course which prevents them from taking disciplinary action against a servant who has clearly failed to convince a court and a special commissioner that he was virtuously sober. The interests of the travelling public undoubtedly demand that men who are entrusted with the safety of a large number of passengers should be habitually immaculately sober. Personally we enter a protest against being conveyed in trains of which the drivers can urge no more powerful plea than that they are not drunk "in the police court sense."

The Prix Goncourt was awarded last week to M. André Savignon for his book, "Filles de la Pluie," which was reviewed in THE ACADEMY on May 11 last. His most serious competitor was M. Benda, whose novel, "L'Ordination," received five of the votes of "The Ten" in the last ballot. The casting-vote of the President of the Académie Goncourt, M. Léon Hennique, was given to M. Savignon. The new lauréat lives in England, where he is studying life and language for literary purposes. As a journalist he has become well known by his contributions to many periodicals during the past ten years, but "Filles de la Pluie" was his first book. It deals, as our readers will remember, with the Isle of Ushant, and is a poignant study of the conditions and character of the women of that almost Adamless Eden.

The headline in the hands of an acute sub-editor is a wonderful phenomenon. We picked up a daily paper this week and found several articles which, judged by their titles, looked interesting. "Superstition Overthrown" seemed promising, and we settled to read of the breaking of historic and classic beliefs, to find that it was an account of the "Springboks," who had won a football match. "Downfall of the Lions" tempted us, but the "Lions," we discovered, were a celebrated football team. "Woolwich Arsenal Blown Up" thrilled us; what an explosion it must have been; but the first paragraph told us that "Tottenham Hotspur" had defeated "Woolwich Arsenal"—at football. "Why the Orient Failed" drew us on to explore the wisdom of the Occident; but no—the "Clapton Orient" had simply equalised against "Barnsley"—at football. "Birmingham Shivers"; was there an extraordinarily low temperature in the Midlands? Not at all; the article related to . . . but is there any need to go on? For two whole pages the clever sub-editor held sway, and we ranged forlornly among headlines of murder and distress in the endeavour to find some interesting news, thankful to know that not the whole of the paper was devoted to victories and disasters on the field of mud and local glory.

Autumn on the Downs

GREY fall the shadows on the Downs,
The birds no longer cry aloud;
The sheep-folds and the vacant fields
Draw mist around them like a shroud.

Death seems to lie upon the land;
Save in my heart, no thoughts remain
Of Spring's first magic flush of green,
Of wild-flowers after summer rain.

Yet in the sombre view there lives
A charm; and he may find who wills
High courage in the open sky
And peace among the folded hills.

A. G. W.

Soul

SOUL soars where science falters: she shall fare
From creed to creed. The wisest of the wise,
Her goal is far. Serene her fate—to rise
A phœnix from the flames of low despair.
Time's swift mutations in their passing wear
Life's murky reflex and the dust's disguise;
But she hath seen the vision, and her eyes
Are dazzled with the beam no man can bear.

Beyond the ultimate boundaries of the known
She breathes, and life's high arbitress shall be
Mid all the poignant flux of transiency,
Gleam through the flesh, and glimmer in the bone,
Haunting the world, till truth's white light be grown,
A prescience—pledged to immortality.

A Churchill! A Churchill!

THE Right Honourable Member for Dundee cannot complain of our heading this article with the ancient cry of the Scottish war-lords who were bent on extermination of every human obstacle which stood in the way of their designs. Mr. Churchill would, if he could, have annihilated the party which was responsible for the prominence which belonged to his immaturity, and there is every reason to believe that he would at least as cheerfully sacrifice the party to which he very reluctantly belongs, if any personal advantage would accrue from such a course.

The First Lord enjoys the perhaps unique distinction of having been a failure in every office which he has filled. It is not too much to say that he cut a ludicrous figure as President of the Board of Trade. As Home Secretary he has been bettered even by Mr. McKenna. On his advent to the Admiralty hopes were entertained, and appeared for a time to be partially justified, that the Right Honourable gentleman had at last secured a billet in which his action might be beneficial.

It would now appear that the first indications that he was entering on a path of usefulness had no foundation in fact. His predecessor, a person of no importance, had been totally unable to withstand the fatal cheese-paring policy of the combination of men who pass as a Cabinet. The natural impulse, the unavoidable course of a man of Mr. Churchill's temperament, naturally was to adopt a diametrically opposite policy to that which had been pursued by his predecessor. Hence the new First Lord was hailed with acclamation as a strong navy-ite, and a man who at all costs would secure national safety against the known inclinations of the majority of his colleagues.

So far well; a Minister's innate contrariety wrought for the good of the Nation and the Empire. Soon, however, it became apparent that Mr. Churchill possesses a dual personality. It is unnecessary to refer to Stevenson's well-known work depicting a nature in which benevolent and malevolent ingredients were constantly at war. The Minister who succeeded to his present office in October, 1911, is now repudiated in many vital aspects by the Minister who at the moment occupies the same chair at the Admiralty. Plain speaking, and apparent veracity in 1911, have given place to obscurity and patent inveracity in 1912.

A Minister who has, it is now apparent, been promoted out of all proportion to his experience and gifts, has gradually become—by a process of elimination—dictator in the supreme region of national security. Never since the French Revolution have tumbrils been so frequently requisitioned to carry victims to the guillotine. Mr. Churchill has shown himself unable to assimilate advice from the most distinguished admirals of the day, either those whom he found at the Admiralty on his appointment, or those whom he subsequently appointed himself The list is a long one: Sir A. K. Wilson, Sir Francis Bridgeman, Rear-Admiral Moore, Rear-Admiral Briggs, Captain Packenham, and others. A veritable Bluebeard's chamber of horrors!

We shall never know with exactitude the reason for the decapitation of several of the Sea Lords whom we have mentioned; but unless we are much mistaken—which is scarcely possible, because we speak with accurate inner knowledge—the circumstances of the "dismissal with a royal declaration" of Sir Francis Bridgeman will be fully elucidated.

We say, with a full sense of responsibility, that the statements hitherto made by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons are devoid of truth. We know precisely what has occurred, and it is only out of deference to an August Personage that we do not print here and now the whole of the facts of the discreditable episode. When the truth emerges, as emerge it will, personal considerations will give place to the serious question whether a Minister, who is incapable for a week or so together of a steadfast and uniform line of conduct in connection with the administration of the most important branch of national security, is a man who can be safely trusted with destinies which call for very different attributes, both of character and conduct.

Disraeli

The Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield. By WILLIAM FLAVELLE MONYPENNY. Volume II, 1837-1846, with portraits and illustrations. (John Murray. 12s. net.)

SECOND NOTICE.

By SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

I HAVE always thought Lord Morley's "Life of Gladstone" one extreme of biography. Admirable as it is, beautifully as it is written, it is so closely packed with facts and quotations that inevitably it makes heavy reading. It is an etching. Winston Churchill's life of his father stands as the other extreme; it is a masterly sketch—brilliant, bright, and breezy—a crayon drawing. I admit the two subjects stand in two categories and demand different treatment, but that difference is very striking. As I ponder over this Life of Disraeli, I am more and more impressed with the painstaking skill with which the facts are marshalled. One is struck over and over again with the care that is taken to put everything in exact proportion, and the industry employed in verifying a date or name or the number in a division. It is a rash thing to say, but I am of opinion that, if the book has been sufficiently finished to proceed on the present high lines of excellence to the end, it will prove to be a better-balanced work than either of those just mentioned.

Chapter VIII is devoted to the events of 1844-5. Disraeli has been six years in Parliament. Here is a vivid sketch of his position at the time:—

> He had shown qualities that would have won him influence and promotion as a Minister, and, if he had been taken into the Ministry in 1841, progress would have been easy. But an open and visible check, such as he had received, is more often than not fatal to a Parliamentary career, and in his case recovery was rendered more difficult by the dubious reputation which, taking its origin from his early political escapades and his affectations of dress and manner, still clung to him persistently.

But Disraeli believed in the wisdom contained in his own motto, adopted later on in his career, that "nothing is difficult to a brave man." He bided his time, and began by attacking Peel. It is made perfectly clear that Peel was no match for his antagonist in debate. It was a case of the swordfish and the whale over again; Peel was solemn, conscientious, and heavy in speech, while Disraeli was full of "subtle, speculative, and volatile brilliancy." He had to fight a party which included in its ranks men like Palmerston, Gladstone, Russell, Graham, Cobden, Bright, whilst on his own side it is not unfair to say he was the only man of first-class ability.

The fascinating story of how he succeeded after years of incessant conflict in overthrowing Peel is told with spirit and without bias; indeed, what helps to make the book so human a document is the fact that Mr. Monypenny never goes out of his way to extenuate anything. He does not gloss over any of his hero's faults or mistakes.

In his preface Mr. Monypenny apologises for dealing at such length with the facts contained in these eventful years, but his judgment is sure. To do justice to the statesman's career, one must learn how he came to be the trusted leader of a party so difficile as the Tories then were. Here is an accurate and illuminating summing up of the position, viewed by the knowledge of present events:—

> Peel was overthrown, but his policy prevailed. In its origin it was not suggestive either of foresight or circumspection, but the stars in their courses fought for it. The great development of steam and railways that was proceeding when it was adopted, and the gold discoveries in California and Australia that soon followed, led to a mighty growth of national prosperity, with which the new system from the first became identified in the public mind; and the period of almost continuous war that presently began, and lasted till the 'seventies, long concealed its chief weakness by postponing the injury to English agriculture which Disraeli and his friends predicted.

He speaks of a statesman of wider vision than Peel, who might have done all that Peel attempted by other means "than a precipitate and violent scheme":—

> The repeal of the Corn Laws was the first decisive step in that policy of sacrificing the rural life of England to a one-sided and exaggerated industrial development which has done so much to change the English character and the English outlook, and which it may not impossibly be the business of subsequent generations to endeavour to retrace.

Disraeli, when he refused to be blinded by the fanaticism of free imports, did not pay any tribute to the fanaticism of protection. In Mr. Monypenny's opinion, if Peel had taken Disraeli for his guide, or continued on the lines he at first laid down, he might have been identified with a system of free trade, of which, after a lapse of two generations, the United Kingdom would not have been the solitary adherent among the nations of the world. He defends Disraeli from the common charge that, if Peel had taken him into his Government, he would never have turned against him, and allows the reader to judge for himself by a minute description of the sequence of events.

Disraeli consistently supported the Peel Government for two years after it came into power, and he only began systematic opposition when he saw that the Ministry were drifting away from the principles on which they had attained office. The author describes how hard and continuously Disraeli struck at Peel, but shows how, except in the Canning episode, he did not transgress the bounds of taste and judgment. He knew how to spare the fallen. From the moment he had succeeded in the great task of driving Peel from office he never uttered another offensive word against him.

With this account the volume ends. In early and mid-Victorian days it was the fashion for Dickens, Thackeray, and others to bring out their novels in monthly instalments. The story usually ended in an exciting part, where the words "To be continued in our next" appeared, and the reading public were left in a pleasing state of suspense. With similar feelings we await the next volume of this book. The third phase in Disraeli's career is about to begin; we look forward with interest to a description of his next Parliamentary duel with Gladstone, which, as Mr. Justin McCarthy says, "only knew a truce when, at the close of the session of 1876, Mr. Disraeli crossed the threshold of the House of Commons for the last time." The interest is heightened from a literary point of view because at the time of writing we know not who will be invited to assume the mantle of editorship. To wear it effectively, successfully, and worthily, it must be a strong man.

Immortality and Life Eternal. By WILLIAM P. ROBERTSON, B.D. (Skeffington and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)
Our Future Existence. By FRED G. SHAW, F.G.S. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Great Initiates. By EDOUARD SCHURE. 2 Vols. (Rider and Son. 7s. 6d. net.)
Life Understood from a Scientific and Religious Point of View. By F. L. Rawson. (The Crystal Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. ROBERTSON, who is Treasurer's Vicar of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, gives his work the sub-title, "A Study in the Christian Contribution to a Universal Hope." This explains the basis of his position, that belief in immortality is and has been almost universal, quite independently of Christian revelation, a fact which he deduces from an examination of comparative religion. Mr. Robertson refers to the research and opinions of many eminent men, adding various original thoughts of his own. In his volume of interesting essays, one of the best is the last chapter on Christ's victory over moral rather than over physical death. The real penalty of sin is moral death. The doctrine of the Resurrection is that life is continuous, though the fact of physical death remains as a necessity of our earthly condition. Even the Genesis story implies that man was created mortal, and the well-known opening of "Paradise Lost" is merely a false deduction.

The author of "Our Future Existence" has doubtless found in angling—as did Isaak Walton—much time for reflection. So, having some reputation as a past-master in the art of fishing, he now, like the Apostles, turns his attention to psychology, and with no little success.

His work may be shortly described as a rather prolix inquiry into the old philosophical problem of the identification of mind and soul, the question whether mind-consciousness survives or not. Mr. Shaw lays down this position:—

> To render tenable the belief in a future conscious existence, the normal consciousness, the mind, must be acknowledged as perishable, and therefore separate from its imperishable adjunct, the psychical consciousness, the soul.

This is at once a challenge to Haeckel and the monists, and also to the usual Christian attitude, that mind-consciousness is bound up with soul-consciousness. But the real difficulty lies in the problem: How far is the soul conscious independently of the mind-process? To what extent Mr. Shaw's speculations answer this question, we leave to his readers the determination, though we note that he is compelled to postulate a soul-memory totally independent of the brain. Mr. Shaw writes with a strong faith, with much vigour of expression, of thought and of criticism; and his book is well worth reading.

"The Great Initiates" is translated from the French by Mr. F. Rothwell. The work has appeared in various fragments, partly in the Revue des Deux Mondes, during the last seven years. It is now given in homogeneous form. The author, who was born at Strasbourg, studied in Paris, and afterwards at Munich, where he became the friend of Richard Wagner, on whose drama and work he has also written.

This book is a most interesting examination of the esoteric teaching in the mysteries of religion. We can best give some notion of its scope by citing the subjects of which the writer treats: Rama, or the Aryan Cycle; Krishna, the Brahmanic Initiation; Homer, the Mysteries of Egypt; Moses, the Mission of Israel; Orpheus, the Mysteries of Dionysos; Pythagoras, and the Delphic Mysteries; Plato, the Mysteries of Eleusis; and, finally, the last great Initiate, Jesus. The author's contention is that, in addition to the exterior history of the dogmas and myths of religions as publicly taught, there is a common esoterism in the "profound science, the secret doctrine, the occult actions of the great initiates, prophets, or reformers, who established, maintained, or propagated these religions." A greater knowledge of esoteric teaching alone will show that Science and Religion are not irreconcilable and hostile forces, and also satisfy the widespread modern aspirations after spiritual life. Further, the author believes that "the transformation of Christianity in its esoteric sense would bring with it that of Judaism and Islam, as well as a regeneraton of Brahmanism and Buddhism, and furnish a religious basis for the reconciliation of Asia and Europe." In short, his optimism, like that of many others, is based on his belief in the ultimate value of the study and knowledge of comparative religion.

"Life Understood" is a truly marvellous production—a sort of gigantic commonplace-book, with extracts from innumerable writers, running commentaries, and discursive dissertations and sermons by the author, well interspersed throughout with texts of Scripture. The range of topics is immense. Even a compressed analysis of the table of contents would occupy columns. The medley of subjects is an overwhelming farrago. Theology, Psychology, Physiology, Homœopathy, Philosophy, Theosophy, Ancient and Modern; Anglo-Israelism, Christian Science, Evolution, Sex Problems,

Inspiration, False Beliefs, Divination, Medicine, are but a few of the leading headings, while the subdivisions and side-issues, as given in the Table of Contents alone —not the Index—number no less than eight hundred.

With this wonderful compendium the publishers very kindly issue a review of their own—four pages foolscap —from which we take the following extract. It gives a better idea of this work than we could possibly attempt:—

> Each reader is shown how he himself can at once put into practice, in some degree, the scientific and therefore infallible and instantaneous method of obtaining revolutionary results, ultimating in deliverance from every kind of difficulty, including sin, disease and death.

At the same time this unqualified praise exactly corresponds to our own feeling that now at last the world is presented with a Universal Guide or Handbook to the solution of all the mysteries and problems that have ever worried mankind. This exceedingly happy result may, perhaps, be traced to two dominant influences—Faith in Christian Science and the conviction that the English people are the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel. Mr. Rawson is a man of eminent ability in his own sphere, and also, as this book shows, of extensive general reading. Yet we cannot but recall the ancient maxim, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam."

1812: The German Allies of Napoleon

Die Deutschen in Russland, 1812. Leben und Leiden auf der Moskauer Heerfahrt. By PAUL HOLZHAUSEN. With Maps, Plans, and Facsimiles of Documents. (Morawe and Scheffelt, Berlin.)

"KORLEN hewwen de Franzosen mitnamen nah Russland, un hei's nich wedder kam"—that is all the news that the German miller in the play of Fritz Reuter can give of his son. These simple words serve Herr Holzhausen as a text for his wonderful book on the sufferings of the German contingent in the business of 1812. The anniversary of that fateful year is being celebrated in Russia with patriotic fervour and general rejoicings; in France its commemoration assumes a more chastened and reflective form—1812 is the cairn, made of the bones of heroes and the wreckage of armaments, raised at the highest point of the mountain of fame ever reached by mortal man. In the breast of the least military of Frenchmen pride and sorrow must hold divided sway when the magical words—Moscow, Tarutino, the Beresina are spoken. "Que l'on dise de nous, il étoit à cette bataille sous les murs de Moscau."

It is easy to forget that the Great Army was far from being a merely French force, but was made up of contingents from almost every European State. France contributed in fact only a quarter of the host, and of the remainder a very large proportion was supplied by German-speaking countries. It is with these Germans that Herr Holzhausen has to deal. They went out in their hundreds of thousands, they came back in only tens of thousands. The vast majority of them perished in the campaign or during the first months of captivity, a considerable number finished their lives in the qualified freedom of a compulsory exile. A few accepted their expatriation, and, as physicians, soldiers, or industrials in a backward country, achieved a prosperity that in their own homes would probably have been beyond their reach.

The most astounding thing about the Moscow campaign is not the magnificence of the attempt, nor even the vastness of the failure. It is the extraordinary spirit that the name and presence of Napoleon breathed into the ranks of the allies, his victims of yesterday and his conquerors of to-morrow. It is an object-lesson in the illogicality of war, an awful warning to the calculator of political probabilities. A German count speaks of the universal "Vive l'Empereur!" that burst from an army, "three-quarters of which was drawn from nations with whose true interests the opening war was in the sharpest conflict." A Saxon lieutenant records the "unfeigned joy" that, "from the very first day's march, shone on every countenance; . . . each man thought only of the duty he would so soon have to perform, of the glory to be won for his regiment, and every other sentiment, even his patriotism—however warm that might be—was henceforth alien or silent."

The accumulated disasters of the campaign never once destroyed, in the greater part of the German contingents, this devotion to a supreme man and to an immediate duty. Suffering, defeat, and injustice failed to disturb their loyalty. In two instances only had Napoleon miscalculated: the Prussians on the left wing and the Austrians on the right were from the first resolved to do nothing for the cause beyond what was absolutely necessary to their duty as allies; the latter, indeed, probably did a good deal less than their stipulated duty, and certainly failed to cover the retreat at the most critical moment of all, but Herr Holzhausen is not specially concerned with the Austrians, and even they exerted themselves to save their friends, the Saxons. The Prussians fought with complete but grudging loyalty in the cause of their oppressor till the momentous day of Tauroggen. Even then there were many Prussian officers—not Yorck, whose "ausgesprochener Franzosenhass" admitted of no weakness or exception—who were moved to tears at the necessity of deserting the chivalrous Macdonald.

Herr Holzhausen repeats more than once that one of the greatest blunders of the campaign was "the placing of the least trustworthy allies on the extreme flanks." A mistake that also touched the Germans very nearly was the early squandering of the cavalry, in which Murat was the principal agent, for the Germanic States had contributed more than their just share to that arm. The corrupt administration of the French commissariat was another source of weakness to the whole army, as was also the short-sighted policy of wholesale devastation that prevailed. At the outset of the campaign the army was not ill-provided, but in the circumstance excessive care was needed in the husbanding of resources, and even in the initial stages Gouvion St. Cyr is forced to admit that "each day's march cost us more men and horses than a fierce battle."

The strategy of 1812 is only a secondary object of this book, but it is well and concisely indicated. To treat frankly a single aspect of a great subject is often the best way of treating the whole subject. The Germans were everywhere—except on the flanks Napoleon had deliberately dispersed them—and what happened to the Germans in particular happened in general to the whole army. And Germans have left notes of their experiences in every corner of the vast Aceldama. Those of Margrave William of Baden—one of the soberest and most veracious of chroniclers—have recently been discussed in THE ACADEMY. German authorities are certainly among the best for this campaign, but Herr Holzhausen seems to us rather too summary in his remarks on Russian mendacity and French exaggeration. In his purely military criticisms he is very just and impartial, giving the French as their undoubted due the first place in the roll of honour. For the Russian generals he has little praise; opportunities of annihilating their much-tried enemies were vouchsafed them over and over again. If nowhere else, they should have forced matters to a finish at the Beresina, especially as Napoleon had wilfully destroyed his pontoons. But Kutosov—the Fabius Cunctator of Russia—was the most cautious of a cautious race, and felt the prestige of his opponent almost as strongly as did his opponent's army. It is curious to note that the tragedy of the Beresina was principally due to a thaw that had, a few days before, been welcomed as a favour of heaven by the luckless dupes of the Russian climate.

All the horrors and all the heroisms are here. Among the latter perhaps the most remarkable is that of the French engineers at the Beresina, drowning or dying of cold in the icy water to make the bridges that should save their comrades. Of the horrors it is useless to speak; they were too many. Death and disease in every form, hunger, thirst, vermin, hospitals without medicine, doctors, or nurses, treacherous and barbarous conquerors—these were some of the ingredients in the cup that the Great Army drained to the dregs. Not only bodies, but also hearts and minds were frozen; mad universal hatred was sometimes the one surviving feeling. Herr Holzhausen instances a German trooper who kicked over a bucket from which his horse had drunk rather than give it to a German officer who begged for the water that was left in it. Cannibalism and murders for food were not unknown. The worst horrors of all were, according to Herr Holzhausen, to be found in the hospitals of Wilna, especially after the arrival of the Cossacks. To the cry of the prisoners after the end of everything the answer was that of a Russian governor: "Heaven is high, and the Czar is far, you French dogs!" The word of a German officer, spoken before Borodino, might have been echoed at almost any subsequent moment by any soldier of the Great Army: "Lieber ein Ende mit Schrecken als ein Schrecken ohne Ende."

Fifty Years of English Literature

A Survey of English Literature, 1780-1830. By OLIVER ELTON. Two Vols. (Edward Arnold. 21s. net.)

PROBABLY no period in English literature was charged with such important consequences as that which Professor Elton has selected as the subject of these volumes. England was slowly awaking from an intellectual torpor which had benumbed the national imagination and frozen the national fancy for close upon fifty years. New ideals were in process of formation. The hard crust of classicism was giving way before the warmth of a humanitarian sentiment which was to find its ultimate expression—though in varying forms—in the poetry of Wordsworth and of Shelley. Collins had already sounded—however faintly—the trumpet of revolt, and the process of emancipation was carried a stage further by Cowper. Crabbe, "a Pope in worsted stockings," had opened up a new realm for poetry in the lives of humble people, and his successors, while they discarded his diction, were careful to retain much of his sentiment. Blake piped down the valleys wild to an unheeding generation. In Scotland an inspired ploughman was enriching the language of his country with the sweetest lyrics that it had ever known, while Sir Walter Scott brought back to English literature the breath of that older romance which had filled the Middle Ages with mystery and colour.

The French Revolution, which set thrones a-tottering throughout Europe, left its permanent impress alike upon English life and English literature. It was in vain for Edmund Burke, the last of the Whigs and the first of the Conservatives, to attempt to stem with his lofty and impassioned rhetoric the incoming tide of democracy. The world—or so men felt—was being recreated. Shelley appeared as the herald of a new dawn, and Byron—that Titanic figure—his head in the clouds and his feet planted firmly on the earth, flaunted through Europe "the pageant of his bleeding heart." The fight between the old classical tradition and that new spirit which has been so happily termed "the renaissance of wonder," raged fiercely for a space, flickered down, and died. The victory lay with the moderns.

To write the literary history of such a period is a task almost superhuman in its magnitude. It is not, indeed, the task of any one man, be he never so gifted. Professor Elton applies himself to a work at once more modest and more effective. "The book," he writes, "is really a review, a direct criticism, of everything I can find in the history of fifty years that speaks to me with any sound of human voice." As such it must be judged, and as such—if we mistake not—it will be held to be the most entirely satisfactory contribution to this vast and perennially interesting subject that has yet appeared.

Necessarily the personal equation plays a considerable part in these appreciations and criticisms. There are writers for whom Professor Elton professes a warm-hearted admiration, while others, of equal eminence, leave him dispassionately critical. But his judgments are always sane and well-balanced. His enthusiasms stop short of idolatry, and he is capable of a condemnation that is wholly devoid of rancour. On every page, almost, we encounter the right thing rightly said. Occasionally the critic displays a depth of insight into his subject that is almost startling in its penetration. This—of Cowper—may serve as an example:—

> Cowper had trembling, naked sensibilities, and reasoned his notions to the bitter end. He hated Rome; yet who cannot wish that he had been born in the old faith, and come into the hands of some humane, adroit confessor, such as Balzac paints, who might have "cleansed the stuff'd bosom" at the right moment, and led him back, by mingled suggestion and authority, to the paths of sanity, softening by nominal penances gently graded, or by the chance of purgatory at the worst, the more hideous of the patient's delusions? For Cowper, being not a sinner, but the very pattern of innocence, went through a struggle harder than any sinner's; a struggle with a possessing delusion. The real tragedy lies in his never suspecting it was a delusion.

Again, what reader of Jane Austen—what male reader, at least—but will be forced to agree with the following estimate?

> She is the woman our enemy. We could only have the advantage of her by taking her off her own ground; and, artist and humorist as she is, she knows this, and never quits her ground. The contest is a drawn one. She abides; we acknowledge her, we do not quite like her, and we quit her—perhaps run away from her—not without relief, bidding to such cold voices a somewhat long farewell.

But one might go on quoting indefinitely.

It is impossible, indeed, to follow Professor Elton into the various ramifications of his enormous theme. The poets and the novelists, the political philosophers and the metaphysicians, the critics and the historians—each in turn is made the subject of a sympathetic and discriminating study. Equal justice is rendered to the elaborate eloquence of a De Quincey, and the sturdy common-sense of a Cobbett. Among the best studies in the two volumes is that of Hazlitt, who rightly claims a chapter to himself, while, in his remarks on the minor novelists of the period, Professor Elton shows a knowledge of early nineteenth century fiction which, of itself, is a remarkable contribution to English critical literature.

No student of modern English literature and poetry can afford to neglect these volumes. The work wanted doing, and Professor Elton has done it admirably. In all the nine hundred odd pages there is not a superfluous sentence. The author is entitled to our gratitude and our thanks.

Spiritual Intimates

Unseen Friends. By Mrs. WILLIAM O'BRIEN. (Longmans, Green and Co. 6s. 6d. net.)

HOW often and how fervently have some of us longed to meet in the flesh those writers who have cheered, comforted, or inspired us! They have been the companions of our spiritual pathway, and have sometimes assumed a reality that not even our visible friends possessed. We have known these unseen ones so much better; they have unveiled the sanctuary of their nature for us. The sense of the intime will more often be felt with such master-spirits than with the living personalities who so persistently hide their hearts from us. Many would desire no better heaven than such a high intellectual and spiritual fellowship. It is, therefore, a wholly delightful task that Mrs. O'Brien has set herself in this book. Her intention is sufficiently well expressed in the introduction:

> As we usually have something worth saying as to the men and women we love best in the flesh, in the same way there may be some interest to dwell on the unseen friends whose qualities have helped to shape our character for good or ill.

From this it will be guessed that all these studies are personal rather than critical. We would not wish it otherwise; quite enough of a critical kind has already been written about some of the characters dealt with here. Thus it would be difficult to say anything new along these lines concerning such a writer as Charlotte Brontë. But Mrs. O'Brien's paper, full of very evident affection, and regarding the woman as of more importance than the works, is quite refreshing. When one has mentioned the names of Christina Rossetti, Mrs. Oliphant, and Jean Ingelow, one has exhausted those in the essayist's list who can be said to be really well-known people. Eugénie de Guérin is best known to most folk through Matthew Arnold's study, while Felicia Skene may be remembered by a few good people of the last century. The rest of the names in the contents-table will not call up many associations. Here, again, we commend Mrs. O'Brien, for she has not worshipped at the shrines of the mighty, but has followed the dictates of her own preferences, and given us essays about little known characters.

Our author is a Roman Catholic, and throughout this volume she has not tried to disguise that fact; in a book of personal preferences it would have been wrong to do so. Thus a good half of these studies is taken up in delineating for us the characters of women who became foundresses of religious orders, or Sisters of the poor. That kind of virtue which is at once pious and practical appeals very strongly to Mrs. O'Brien. Yet her Catholicism is of no narrow type, blinding her to the virtues of other creeds. Only once does she allow her love for her faith somewhat unduly to influence her, when, in writing of Christina Rossetti, she expresses the opinion: "It has often struck me that as a Roman Catholic she would have been a happier woman." The combination of intellect and piety is irresistible to her; she becomes reverentially affectionate before it. Mrs. O'Brien is an Irishwoman, and thus is usually happy in dealing with women of her own nationality.

The chief defects of the book are an occasional repetition, and an occasional, though rarer, looseness of diction; as, for instance, on page 94:—

> Now the writer who can produce such an impression, by the mere power of truth, that writer is not likely to sink into forgetfulness, and we need not wonder at the interest roused by Mr. Shorter's labour of love among all Brontë enthusiasts, to whom Charlotte Brontë has given some of the most profound impressions of their lives.

Those who wish to increase their circle of spiritual intimates will do well to read this book.

A Literary Henchman

William Hone: His Life and Times. By FREDERICK WM. HACKWOOD. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

THERE is a class of personages, often of a not inconsiderable stature, who may be said to live in footnotes. In the course of literary work some reference to their doings or writings becomes necessary, when a note is added at the bottom of the page for the benefit of the uninitiated. For not all of us have explored the holes and corners of literary and general history; and if we have—well, human memory is an extremely fallible thing. Every now and then one of these folk is rescued from his footnote obscurity and given a full-length biography. William Hone may be said to belong to this class; for, in spite of the vogue of "The Every-Day Book" and "The Table Book" in a previous generation, those who are not students to-day generally look for the necessary footnote when his name crops up. We are tempted to ask, when a man is unearthed after this fashion, "Cui bono?" and the question recurs in perusing this volume. The chief value of a work of this kind is the number of sidelights which it gives on other better-known characters. Thus Hone's account of how, when a child, he saw John Wesley is one of those vivid and first-hand touches which is worth any number of official biographies:—

> . . . I saw the black legs, with great silver buckles, coming down the stairs, and there came into the room a venerable man, his long silvery hair flowing upon his shoulders, his countenance cheerful and smiling and ruddy as a youth's, and his eyes beaming kindness. . . . The room seemed illuminated by his presence.

Hone's relationships with George Cruikshank, and his encouragement of the young artist, are good things to remember for the light they shed on both men. But the man by whom the memory of Hone is chiefly kept green is, of course, Charles Lamb; so long as his letters are read, people will ask, "Who was William Hone?" If curiosity about him still continues, it may be completely satisfied by referring to Mr. Hackwood's work. His book is a piece of tardy justice to an estimable character, for until now no worthy record of Hone existed. At the end of the volume, too, we get a glimpse of Charles Dickens, who visited Hone in his last illness, and was present at his funeral. This sidelight on Dickens is a not altogether pleasant one, for it shows the great novelist using his descriptive powers in a way that afterwards gave pain. But it is well that the controversy which arose out of this affair should now be fully presented and finally settled, for the good of all parties concerned, as it is here.

Perhaps this life of Hone will give some modern moralist a shining example with which to illuminate his pages. Hone may be held up in this fashion in two ways, according to tastes. His hot, revolutionary, pamphleteering youth may be put forward as an ideal for these unrestful times; or his irreproachable, "converted" old age may make a subject for a tract, as it has already done at least once. Mr. Hackwood's work is certainly not lacking in interest, and, generally speaking, is very well done. There are occasional repetitions, but these are due to his arrangement, which strikes one as being, at times, rather awkward. We do not know what public he had in mind when writing this book, but we think he might give his readers credit for some small literary knowledge, and not append such solemn bits of information as that about Gifford of the Quarterly Review on p. 229, and that concerning "Tuyfelsdröckh" (Hone's spelling) on p. 333. A word of praise must be added for the excellent bibliography and illustrations. After all, Mr. Hackwood has more than justified his choice of a subject.

"Who's Who" and Others

The Writers' and Artists' Year-Book, 1913. (A. and C. Black. 1s. net.)

THOSE people who make a point of collecting each edition of certain books as they are published must see a very great difference between "Debrett's Peerage" of several years ago and the one issued for the year 1913. The number of hereditary, personal, and courtesy titles, together with the companions of the various orders, now totals 18,000, so that the volume before us is very massive compared with the three small books which constituted the principal reference there was to the peerage of over a century ago.

The "Peerage" issued by Messrs. Whitaker at the price of 5s., although not containing the many details of the larger Debrett, is a book formed on similar lines to its companion, and is very handy for people who cannot afford the money or space for the handsome red and gold favourite.

"Who's Who" always strikes us as a book that is far more interesting than many novels. In it one can read the history of their favourite writers, musicians, divines, or soldiers, while the little human touch provided by an account of the recreations of the various people mentioned seems at once to bring them into closer relations with the outside world, which can merely wonder and gasp with astonishment at the extraordinary amount of work and number of accomplishments some people seem able to crowd into one short span of life. For instance, a French lady who has been, and still is greatly admired by the English, not only has to her credit the honour of being the director of one theatre, the founder of another, but has gained a medal for sculpture and published many books—all this in addition to the numerous rehearsals she must have attended in order to perfect the numerous characters she has from time to time represented on the French and English stage.

The gentleman whose recreation appears to have ceased after he "represented Cambridge in the quarter-mile v. Oxford" in 1886 cannot certainly be accused of over-indulgence in the pleasures of this life. Another, resident in Australia, once had a two years' visit to England, since when, slightly to paraphrase the words of the advertisement of a well-known commodity, he has had no other. A few have no recreations, or are too modest to state them. One impresses upon us the fact that, although now occupying a notable position, he was born of working-class parents and married a collier's lass; while we are all well acquainted with the genial musician who spends his spare time in looking up, or rather down, upon the tombstones of the great, in order to ascertain their condition, and has also written upwards of 1,400 letters to the Press.

In addition to the usual "Almanack," Messrs. Whitaker this year have issued "The International Whitaker." They claim for it that it can be used "either as the companion . . . or in substitution for the older but less topical handbook." From a casual glance in many instances it appears to contain in a much fuller form information with regard to the countries of the world, similar to that given in the "Whitaker" with which we are all acquainted.

Among other interesting items, "The Englishwoman's Year Book" contains a very able and concise article by Miss Harvey on the much criticised Insurance Act. Educational, professional, and social work is also dealt with at some length. In fact, no subject likely to be of interest to women is omitted, and the arrangement of the whole book is to be highly commended.

"The Writers' and Artists' Year Book" has again been revised and brought up to date, and will prove this year, as in previous years, a most handy little guide for young authors who desire to know the best markets in which to place their manuscripts.

Shorter Reviews

The Romantic Trials of Three Centuries. By HUGH CHILDERS. (John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a good book, but one which might have been much better had it been written by a man of legal training. Mr. Childers shows but little sense of proportion; thus he starts his volume with one of the most unreadable episodes portrayed in it. He is evidently a man who is unable to sift a quantity of evidence and present salient features in a condensed and agreeable form. The opening article, entitled "The Great Alibi," extends to thirty-seven pages, although the author does not seem to recognise the fact that the story of Elizabeth Canning is one which has very little intrinsic interest, and it could very well have been disposed of in half the space.

On the other hand, the story of the trial of so fascinating a personality as William Penn, told in fifteen pages, might have held entranced the interest of the reader for three times that length. The history of Beau Fielding and the Duchess is kept within suitable limits; that of the notorious Elisabeth, Duchess of Kingston, is also well presented; but the narrative of Dr. Dodd, called "The Macaroni Parson," bores the reader by its quite uncalled-for amplification. The same may be said of the trite and well-worn story of "The Lyons Mail." It was scarcely worth while to introduce this long narrative, covering nearly fifty pages, unless the author was prepared to shed a good deal of light upon its obscure aspects. We think Mr. Childers believed that this was a masterly paper; we regret that we do not agree with him. The trial of Disraeli for libel is distinctly interesting, as everything connected with that incongruous but brilliant man must naturally be. There are several minor stories which are readable, and, on the whole, the volume may be cordially recommended to those who are interested in legal proceedings in which prominent persons through several ages have appeared.

One Welshman: A Glance at a Great Career. By WHITELAW REID. (Macmillan and Co. 1s. net.)

THIS is a reprint of the address by the late American Ambassador, to whose memory such eloquent tributes were lately paid in the House of Commons, delivered at the University College of Wales at Aberystwith. The lecture gives a bird's-eye view of the career of Thomas Jefferson, author of "The Declaration of Independence." Perhaps Mr. Whitelaw Reid is correct, and perhaps he is not, in ascribing Welsh origin to Jefferson. We admit that we have never heard that Jefferson belonged to that nationality. Perhaps fifty-nine pages are hardly sufficient in which to present a complete view of a man of Jefferson's achievements. However that may be, the impression which one derives from the perusal of the lecture is that Jefferson was a past-master in all the arts which a man who appeals to popular approval should be possessed of. He was very little troubled with principles, and consequently there was no uniformity of design or steadfastness of action observable throughout his career. He was able to trim his sails to catch any wind, and there is no doubt that he would have done violence to a sensitive conscience, had he possessed one, by many of the gyrations in which he indulged when he thought that political profit would accrue from them. Still, he was a great figure in American politics and progress, and Mr. Whitelaw Reid's lecture, if it does not lead us to entertain the highest possible respect for Jefferson as a man, yet enables us to perceive the qualities which enabled him to perform a great part in the evolution and progress of American nationality.

Indians of the Terraced Houses. By CHARLES F. SAUNDERS. Illustrated. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

DOWN in the south-west of the United States, half a dozen or more communities of Indians dwell unto this day in the primitive sort of semi-civilisation which was theirs when first the "conquistadores" set foot on Californian shores. They have never warred with the white intruders, nor misbehaved themselves in any way; they are industrious agriculturists, with some sort of knowledge of stone architecture, and other simple arts which place them above the level of the mere savage, and they form a remarkable remnant of aboriginal America, a link rather with Mayan and Aztec forms of culture than with the bloodthirsty tribes of savages who once hunted on the northern prairies.

Among these people Mr. Saunders and his wife spent a period of almost unalloyed happiness, if one may judge by the record which this book contains. The author introduces us to sundry characters whose acquaintance we are glad to make—Dick, the policeman of Zuñi, is a noteworthy instance. Dick as intermediary in the purchase of meat is a joy, and indirectly he sheds much light on the ways and customs of these "Indians of the Terraced Houses."

While writing in light and truly entertaining style, Mr. Saunders conveys a good amount of serious knowledge to his readers. Philologists may note the absence of "r" from the Zuñi tongue, and thus deduce another link between the Far East and the Far West in attempting to place the original birthplace of these Indian tribes—especially those among whom civilisation had made some progress before white men came to overthrow and remodel. This by the way, for it is only one point worth thinking over among the many which the author raises in the course of this narrative, which, it may be said, is well and adequately illustrated by photographs of these people and their belongings, and is in itself an entertaining record, well worth perusal.

Ὁρατίου ᾠδαί, κατὰ μετάφρασιν Πανευμόλπου. Τόμου ἁ τεῦχος ἁ. (Parnassus Press. 2s. 6d.)

M. PANEUMOLPOS presents us with an interesting "specimen" of an intended translation of the Odes of Horace into Greek—not modern, but classical Greek. Apart from a critical preface and some rather commonplace notes, both in Greek, he gives us renderings of two well-known odes only: "Odi profanum vulgus et arceo" (III, i) and that to Leuconoe (I, xi). Of the former there are three and of the latter no less than ten renderings, besides suggested variants. It can hardly be intended to carry out the work on this scale, which would expand it to the size of the Encyclopædia Britannica; and, furthermore, this repetition of translations of the same Latin words unavoidably produces also repetition of the Greek phrases used. Thus, in the "Leuconoe," "scire nefas" in the first line is rendered four times by οὐ θέμις εἰδέναι and four times by οὐ θεμιτὸν εἰδέναι—to quote no further examples.

The language is, with rare exceptions, strictly classical. We note, however. that πέπρωτ' for πέπρωται is a comic form. It is the more remarkable that M. Paneumolpos, whose preface shows that he can write ancient Greek with ease and fluency, should not have adopted as the vehicle of his translation some of the ancient lyric metres which Horace copied and of which sufficient fragments remain to furnish models, while the brilliant imitations of Carducci have shown that it is possible in a language closely allied to the original to reproduce those metres with success. M. Paneumolpos has adopted none of these, nor even what he calls the "national" verse of fifteen syllables, but rhymed lines arranged in various modern lyric forms. But though the language is classical, both the rhyme and the rhythm depend on modern Greek usage and peculiarities of pronunciation. For example ὁποῖον is made to rhyme with ὡροσκοπίων and θεωρεῖται with μήτε. Similarly, pronunciation by accent governs the rhythm. This is familiar enough to Continental schools, where prosody is neglected, and Greek verse-writing practically unknown, but to English scholars it is somewhat repellent. Elision, moreover, M. Paneumolpos only uses where it is convenient. Nevertheless, the experiment is an interesting one, and the work deserves perusal, if only for the sake of the lucid and elegant Greek of the Introduction. The printing and general appearance of the book are excellent, but there are some strange mistakes, due, evidently, to faulty reading of proofs. These are chiefly in the Latin—e.g., "tagenta" for "tangenda," "eorem" for "eodem"; and there are a few misprints in the Greek.

Chinese Poems. Translated by CHARLES BUDD. (Henry Frowde. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE chief value of this book will, we imagine, be found to lie in Mr. Budd's introduction dealing with the construction and technique of Chinese poetry. Even the slight sketch he gives of the history of Chinese poetry, valuable though it is, and wonderful in its concision, has to date its value from that essay. And from what he says it is clear that the Chinese had no slight task before him in the construction of a poem. It is, of course, fairly common knowledge that in the Chinese language the tone of a word gives it meaning more than the sound, many words having the same sound and having to rely on the various tones in which they are spoken for their differing meaning. And it is obvious that, since one of the highest things in all poetry is its tonal significance—a fact that is too often lost sight of among modern poets and the critics of poetry—the possibilities before Chinese poetry must have been considerable; the more so since the poet had not only to construct his pattern of lines and his pattern of rhymes, but also his pattern of sounds and tones. Whether, however, this possibility was ever at any time realised is difficult to judge from the present work. This was more or less to be expected. Poems devised in this way are untranslatable—for the impossibility of translating poetry at any time is just the impossibility of translating tones. Mr. Budd's efforts are, as he modestly says, "pleasantly readable," but they are no more.

Apart from the difficulties we have already spoken of, a man who is in the habit of translating "commercial documents," and has no practice in the forms of English poetry, is only adding to the formal difficulties: he is bringing one inability to another. But in the most opaque of renderings it is usually impossible to catch the echo, or spirit, of whatever greatness is singing unmuffled in the original, and the chief disappointment in these poems is that, in spite of our hopes aroused by his introductory essay, very few of the poems seem to hint any more than prettiness in the songs of Chinese poets. The note that, in Western poetry, cries aloud in our spirits, and makes us know we are gods of immortal destiny, seems altogether lacking in Eastern poetry—judging by these efforts, and by translations of Japanese poetry. It seems only the Aryans in the East—Aryans like ourselves—who can strike this deeper note. Of course, it may not be so. We can but judge from the translations given us by different scholars, the best and most authoritative of all being Mr. Budd. Readers of this book expecting a high note will be disappointed. If they desire prettiness, even the prettiness of "bijouterie," they will find abundance of it. But Mr. Budd's introduction is quite another thing.

Persian Literature. By CLAUD FIELD. Illustrated. (Herbert and Daniel. 3s. 6d. net)

WE have often wondered how many of the thousands of admirers of Omar Khayyám think it worth while to step outside Nishapur and pluck the roses of other Persian poets. Omar has had, thanks to Edward FitzGerald's adaptation, an enormous vogue. It is not to be wondered at that the majority of readers regard these quatrains as typical examples of Persian poetry. The reverse is the case, for Omar's pessimism, raillery, and rather cheap cynicism are certainly not characteristics of Persian poetry generally. Firdawsi has told wonderful tales in his "Books of Kings"; Hafiz has sung of the beauties of his mistress or of the joy of the wine-cup; while Jami, Jalalu'd-din Rumi, Attar, and Shabastari in his wonderful "Rose-Garden of Mystery," make the bulbul singing to the rose, the beauty of women, and the ecstasy derived from the juice of the grape, symbols of the lover seeking union with the Divine Beloved. Here, indeed, is a store of exquisite thought and rare imagery that far transcends the utterances of the popular Omar. Those who have found the highest form of mystical love in "Flashes of Light" comparable with the ecstasies of Ruysbroeck or Suso; those who have wandered in "The Abode of Spring," and sat in Sa'di's "Rose-Garden" or "Orchard," will have discovered in the Land of the Lion and the Sun a literary treasure as fair as the white temple "Shah Jahan builded for his lady's grave."

We could have wished that Mr. Claud Field had written with a little more enthusiasm, also that he had chosen less obsolete translations. He has, however, made a careful study of the subject, from the "Zend-Avesta" to Babiism and the Bahai movement. If the arrangement of the book could have been improved, we must take into consideration the vast amount of material the author had to deal with in the limited space at his disposal. Apart from Professor E. G. Browne's monumental work, "A Literary History of Persia," there was no comprehensive study of Persian literature in the English language until the present volume was published. We trust that Mr. Field's book will be the means of attracting not only the student, but also a number of Omarians who have so much to discover in Persia's rich and splendid literature.

Fiction

Hoffman's Chance. By WILLIAM CAINE. (John Lane. 6s.)

THE author has taken a set of very real people for characters in this story; and has gone minutely into the details of their lives; he has a way, which is none too pleasant, of stripping both men and women down to the moral skeleton, dissecting each layer as he finds it, and giving the result of his experiment in a sardonically humorous fashion. It is not so much the humour of the book that we realise as the amusement of its author at the follies and frailties of his people. With all this he constructs a thoroughly interesting story.

Hoffman verged on genius, so far as music was concerned, and Bertram Orde gave him his chance in the form of money to produce a comic opera, of which Orde wrote the libretto. Psyche Whittaker spoilt the chance by inducing Orde to cut and alter the play in the interests of her part, until little of the original comic opera remained, and, of course, the piece was a "frost." Michael Hoffman retains our sympathy throughout, and Linda, the woman who inspires his work, is drawn with equal skill. Save for these two, our admiration is not asked for any character.

We can accord only a stinted measure of admiration to these two, for the author writes in a detached, analytical, staccato fashion, as if he himself were unenthusiastic over the matter in hand. Here are technique and literary skill fully evident, but the book was never a vital thing to its writer—it was, rather, an abstract problem, and hence even its solitary love scene is cold The net effect is rather disappointing; we leave Hoffman standing with Linda on the verge of big things to be accomplished, and, in spite of the skill with which the story of the first "chance" has been related, we feel that the big things are all to come—they are not set down here.

The Sorcery Club. By ELLIOTT O'DONNELL. Illustrated. (William Rider and Son. 6s.)

THREE San Francisco clerks, out of work and starving, get hold of a book which describes the sure way to Black Magic, and, driven mainly by hunger, they set to work to make themselves initiate. In the various processes to which they are subjected we get rather a surfeit of "superphysical" manifestations—by the way, why will not these authors on psychic subjects write "supernatural," the everyday word that we know, and whose meaning is larger, rather than this pedantic compound? Save in the case of those who depend on out-of-the-way words and phrases for their effect, surely the teller of a plain story would achieve greater results by simple means than by such unnecessary complexities as this.

The three schemers succeed in their compact with the malevolent, invisible influences up to a point, and then, as has happened from the beginning of time, a woman steps in and spoils their plans. There were seven stages of psychic development through which they must pass for perfection, but they never reach the seventh—the woman attends to that. Some portions of the story are amusing, notably that which deals with the working of evil spells, but none of it is forcible enough to induce a shudder. It is as if the author were not sufficiently impressed with his own subject to render it more than commonplace, though the marvels of which he has to tell are stupendous, in all conscience. Yet, even in a story of this kind, it is the manner that counts rather than the matter, and the manner is for the most part absent from these pages.

Chess for a Stake. By HAROLD VALLINGS. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

WHEN into the first page of a book enters a young man with a dark, strong face; when, further, information is laid against the aforesaid young man to the effect that he has set his affections on a certain girl, we feel tolerably certain that he will marry the girl somewhere in the vicinity of the last chapter. In this we are not disappointed, but it must be confessed that the love affair of Will Pigott and Kitty form but a minor portion of this book's contents. The main interest is supplied by a certain Francis Trecarrel and Evangeline Margesson by way of hero and heroine. The part of villain is admirably filled by Jago Polwhele, heir to a huge fortune, but, for the greater portion of the story, a schoolmaster. The title is fully justified, for it is a very intricate game of chess that these and other characters play; Evangeline is the chief "stake," and a study of the multitudinous moves in this complex game is thoroughly interesting.

It may be urged by ultra-critical readers that the plot is almost too complex, for, in addition to the characters mentioned, a number of schoolboys play parts in the story. Polwhele, the villain, is about the best-drawn character in the book; the author does not err on the side of high colouring, but accounts for Polwhele's tendencies by the fact of his birth, and for his acts by the circumstances to which he was subjected. Hence we get a natural and quite realistic villain, whose deeds are thoroughly in accordance with his temperament, and who never descends to melodrama level. As a whole, the book is fresh, sincere, and altogether interesting.

The Theatre

"If We Had Only Known" at the Little Theatre

MR. INGLIS ALLEN has made a charming, straightforward, interesting play on the subject of the joys of parentage and the difficulties which befall those married persons who do not care for children. A pleasant young artist, Robert Vale (Mr. Leon Quartermaine) and his wife (Miss Mary Jerrold) fall out, and kiss again with tears many months afterwards. The reason of their disagreements is pointed out to them by Dr. Paul L'Estrange, their friend, who pops in from Egypt whenever he's wanted. This is a difficult character, made most convincing and sincere by Mr. Rudge Harding. He explains the gaiety and glory of the child in the house, and somehow everything happens for the best, and by the end of the third act everybody, including the audience, is very happy and awfully keen about Roosvelt's views, and quite convinced that—

> To the end of Time 'twill be the same,
> For the Earth first laughed when the children came.

Personally, we dread young ladies who play little boys on the stage, and would sooner be doomed to live at the club for ever than meet them in real life. But we own that Miss Mabel Mason makes the Bobs of Mr. Allen's play quite human and agreeable, an arrangement in which the author is an accessory before the fact, for he makes his important little boy fairly silent—he has no terrible speeches to deliver. Nor have any of the other nine admirably depicted characters. The rich Vaughan Thompsons, who lure Vale away from his wife, are the real people in the hands of Mr. Curtis and Miss Aimée de Burgh. Mr. Eric Maturin gives us a careful study of the young man of the period made mentally clumsy by convention and splendid physically by athletics. There is the loafer of Mr. Wilfrid Benson, and the general servant of Miss Harwood, who only appear for a little while and are perfect in their way.

From these few notes it will be seen that Mr. Allen has written his play in the language and with the feeling of real life—a by no means common accomplishment in any period of our stage history. The result is that his two main characters, taken by Mr. Quartermaine and Miss Mary Jerrold, are able to give us of their best. As the young wife who loves and is disappointed, misunderstood, neglected and bitter—but always loving—

Miss Jerrold plays with the greatest skill. But this lady who grows old so gracefully in the ever-fresh "Milestones" does not appear to age a day in "the several years"—I should think about seven—which pass between the second and last acts. Happy Mrs. Vale, no doubt this is one of the delicate rewards for having added to the coming race. Envoi, one can't help wondering what would have been the comment of the brilliant and bitter Douglas Jerrold, the grandfather of the author, on this simple, clever, purposeful piece of work; I fancy it would have been amusing.

"Aladdin" of the Follies at the Empire

MR. PELISSIER and his clever group of friends have made a new departure with, as it seems to us, happy results. I may own that I have been several times lately to see the "Follies" at the Apollo, but have not allowed myself to write of the performances, partly out of gratitude for so many past delights, partly because they were not worth writing about. But now, with the gallant support of the most powerful "Empire" in the world, the youth of this company is renewed and joy cometh with the miming. Imagine all the rich beauty, delightful colouring, gay corps de ballet, and bright atmosphere which this theatre can command, and superimpose thereon an amusing version of the old "Aladdin" story, now made sometimes to burlesque pantomime, and sometimes to make fun of every other thing under the sun. Conceive Mr. Lewis Sydney, Mr. Morris Harvey, the volatile and graceful Douglas MacLaren, the beautiful Miss Compton, and the gifted master of the Follies pack, Mr. Pélissier, and all the rest of that merry company, free to be as amusing as they can in the freest sort of stage production possible; envision these things in a setting of Chinese beauty, and you will have a good idea of this brilliant diversion. Each night Mr. Pélissier and his friends add fresh fun to the performance; every evening that delicious, that merriest of dancers, Miss Phyllis Bedells, becomes more lively and attractive, and the support of the beautiful ladies of the ballet more entrancing and alluring.

But, as I have said before, the Empire audience is a difficult one to hold, and I understand that "Aladdin" is to pass. However, on the night I saw this cleverly arranged performance there was never a scene—and there are ten—which was not merry or beautiful, or both, but there were a few dull moments. One remembers a quite banal song about China tea, with a few pantomime advertisements in it, which has probably been replaced by one of Mr. Pélissier's happier thoughts, and there was a song at the fall of the curtain by that artist which seemed to be extremely lacking in point. Among the long cast, all of which worked with a will for the success of a by no means light undertaking, Mr. Morris Harvey, Mr. MacLaren, and the lovely dancer, Miss Phyllis Bedells, shone with particular brilliancy.

"The Harem Lily" at the London Pavilion

AN Oriental operetta, by M. Paul Lincke, at a place once the arch-type of the old-fashioned music-hall, is a delightful, most welcome departure. The pleasant voices and gay dresses, the light music and amusing songs which go to make up this short play certainly delighted the audience on the first night at the Pavilion. As with most operettas of this type, the fun will develop as the run continues. Already such comedians as Mr. Bruce Winston, as the Pasha, and Mr. Debnam, as a semi-Oriental music-hall agent, show an inclination to improve upon the rather fragile humours of the author. Miss Marjorie Maxwell, who plays the heroine, Marietta, looks charming and sings with taste, so that there can be no doubt that this piece—the ingenious little plot of which you must discover—will please many audiences for many days. By the way, we see the play is "presented by Mr. Anthony Ellis," whom one remembers as the accomplished critic of the Star. This seems to open out a vista of delight to the wayworn writer for the Press. Can it be possible that we may yet bourgeon forth into the gay impresario, and, laying aside our tools, "present" such lively little things as "The Harem Lily" to a waiting world? EGAN MEW.

"Troilus and Cressida" at the King's Hall, Covent Garden

AT the complimentary dinner recently given to honour Mr. William Poel, whose innovations in Shakespearean production can scarcely still be described as unusual, Mr. Shaw is reported to have said: "If Mr. Poel had been a German, they (the British public) would probably have believed there was something in him; they never believe that art can come out of England. In all textbooks he will probably be described as a disciple of Reinhardt." And now, after thirty years of pioneer work, Mr. William Poel has brought to a close his series of productions, strange, original, and fruitful of much good to the Shakespearean stage.

Mr. Poel chose "Troilus and Cressida," rescued from the obscurity of three centuries (except for Mr. Charles Fry's venture in 1907), for his production by the Elizabethan Stage Society, assisted by the Streatham Shakespearean Players, at the King's Hall, Covent Garden. "Troilus and Cressida" is a strangely uneven play; it has some splendid scenes and also some very crude workmanship; it is usually classed with the tragedies, but many critics argue that it is a comedy; really it is a grim satire of the shamelessness of humanity. We have not space to criticise Mr. Poel's production in detail. The wonderful continuity usually obtained by him was not as prominent, probably because some of the actors appeared to be believers in the tragic and others in the comic interpretation. The stage was set in tiers, and a tent, which corresponded to the wings, served as a hiding-place for the sulking, top-booted, yeoman-like Achilles. Prologue was dressed in full armour; the Greeks were presented as Elizabethan soldiers, all the Trojans in the flamboyant design of Elizabethan masque costume; Patroclus affected a nasty stutter and smoked a diminutive clay pipe; Thersites was dressed as an Elizabethan clown; Cressida (Miss Edith Evans), who was exceedingly handsome, wore a hat which was reminiscent of Gainsborough to a merely masculine critic. Several of the male parts were given to girls; Pandarus adopted a peculiar Cockney accent; councils of war were indistinctly heard from the back of the stage; and the acoustics of the King's Hall were possibly responsible for the inaudibility of many of the players. Mr. P. L. Eyre's Hector was audible and adequate, while Mr. Poel, as Pandarus, was the outstanding member of the cast. Mr. Poel's acting was extremely good, and deserved more efficient support.

The Pioneer Players at the Little Theatre

AT the Little Theatre, on Sunday, December 15, the Pioneer Players presented three plays by Hugh de Selincourt, Edith Lyttelton, and H. M. Harwood respectively. The plays seemed to have been arranged in their order of depression, so that the resultant effect was scarcely as interesting and varied as it might have been. "Beastie," by Hugh de Selincourt, opened the performance, and showed the awkward position of a young husband who is seeking a nurse for his infant son. The girl turned out to be an "old flame" of his 'Varsity days, but his wife sees no real impediment in this, and even goes so far as to present the uncomfortable girl with a keepsake. Miss Hilda Bruce-Potter played the part of the wife extremely well, and the piece received an enthusiastic reception.

The second play was "The Thumbscrew," a piece dealing with the terrible and hopeless lot of the women workers in a sweated industry. This atmosphere has been previously utilised by Mrs. Lyttelton. "The Thumbscrew" relates the struggle of Bernice Field—who drags out a fearful existence by sewing hooks on cards—between her two lovers. The one is anxious to marry her and emigrate to Canada, while the other, a mere boy slowly dying of lead-poisoning, selfishly appeals to her to remain. The "middle-woman" makes a reduction in wages, which seemed already at an irreducible minimum, but Bernice gives in to the suffering worker. Miss Phyllis Relph and Miss Margaret Yarde both played very cleverly, and the piece was well received.

The concluding play, H. M. Harwood's "Honour thy Father," showed a horrid, gambling, bankrupt father who is depending for his arrears of rent upon his daughter who is about to visit him. She is intercepted by a more horrid and undeniable blackmailing friend of her father, and this man threatens to disclose the source of her income. The threats avail nothing; the father is informed, blusters, but eventually accepts his daughter's money. Miss Hilda Moore gave a fine interpretation of the character of the daughter, while Mr. J. Fisher White, as the father, and Mr. Moffat Johnston, as the blackmailer, both did well. A. H.

Music

"THEY say that women and music should never be dated," says Miss Hardcastle in the play, but, indeed, it would be no easy matter to date Sir Hubert Parry's new Symphony without the most convincing documentary evidence. We can well imagine the puzzlement of future musical pundits who should "discover" Sir Hubert, and seek to reconstruct him and date his masterpieces, as the art critics discover a Maitre de Flémalle or a Gerard David. Laying hold of such a chef d'œuvre as the Symphony in B minor, one set of critics will say, "This is certainly one of the later works of the Kensington Master who composed the 'Symphonic Variations,' and perhaps is identical with the composer of 'Judith.' It shows indubitable traces of experience, and is extremely mature in style." Then another batch of explorers into the musical work of British primitives will declare: "This cannot be a late work, whoever may have been its author. Look at its youth, its early-morning freshness of spirit. This music cannot have emanated from a head crowned with grey hairs, nor from a heart which had known the bitterness of advancing age. True it is that both the thoughts and their expression are those of a man of experience, but the hand that has set it all down was a hand in the full flush of its early vigour, a hand directed by a personality which, if we are to believe that its owner had even reached middle life, must have known the secret of perpetual youth." Yes; our first reflection, while Sir Hubert was conducting his new Symphony for the Philharmonic Society, was one of amazement that a composer whose time is chiefly occupied in the direction of an immense college of music, who for a good many years has foregone the delights of Symphonic composition, and who took his degree as Bachelor of Music at Oxford so long ago, we believe, as 1867, should be nevertheless capable of pouring forth this stream of fresh and beautiful music.

Edward Fitzgerald did not believe much in the "Fine Arts thriving on an old Tree." Heaven forbid that we should think of Sir Hubert Parry as an "old Tree," but he would certainly count among the exceptions to Fitzgerald's belief; we must class him with Titian, with Verdi, with Thomas Hardy. We can recall no composition of Sir Hubert Parry's which surpasses his new Symphony in the peculiar quality of freshness, in the precious grace of buoyant life. Even in the first movement, which he calls "Stress," in which there is tragedy, suffering, distress, we are sure that the composer is not going to be overmasked by them. They are there, as they must be in every fully developed life, but they will not be permitted to obscure what Life has of sweetness and light. Our composer is an optimist; he can look with brave countenance upon tragedy, summon Love to heal the wounds made by inexorable fate, and, further, bring in the "inexhaustible instinct of humanity for play, merriment, gaiety, fun, humour," which has its "genuine province and its share in helping." Here, perhaps, we discover one of the secrets of Sir Hubert's youth and success. He knows the value of humour as a factor in Life. So we come to a Season of Content and Hopefulness, which are the blessed offspring of Love and Humour. But "in human things, tendencies overshoot the mark, and Content leads to careless physical exuberance." A return of Distress, even of Tragedy, is inevitable and salutary, but Tragedy is eventually transformed by Love.

We have long known, and frequently pointed out, that in Sir Hubert Parry the Poet is balanced by the Philosopher. No one who is familiar with the subjects which he has taken for musical illustration, and the words he has selected or invented for choral treatment, can doubt this for a moment. His new Symphony gives us his commentary on Life. It is a poetical criticism, if ever there was one, and its philosophy is as sound as its poetry is beautiful. It is also absolutely personal to the author; it is what he and he alone can give us. As we listen, we are never reminded of anyone else's music, and though it is written on a definite plan, though its themes are definite illustrations of ideas, though they are intermingled and worked up, and contrasted according to the exigencies of symphonic structure, there is never a page on which any unpleasant effect of effort is apparent. We never feel that the composer has been in any difficulty as to the working out of his plan. We should say that no more sincere music than this was ever penned. It is like the speech of an honest man, one in whose every word we believe instinctively. Musicians will not need to be assured that it is full of art and craft, but only in the sense in which the speeches of John Bright or the sermons of John Henry Newman were similarly full. We also notice with pleasure that Sir Hubert has not been afraid to show that he is perfectly cognisant of the developments which music has made since first he began to write. He has borrowed from no one; he shows the influence of no particular composer, but he makes legitimate use of the forces which in later days have come to be common property.

And when all is said that can be said as to the serious import of Sir Hubert's latest Symphony, as to its modernity, its skill of construction, its power of orchestration, the most important question of all remains to be asked and answered. Is it beautiful? Is it a piece of music that may be listened to with pleasure by the ignorant or by those whose intelligence shrinks from the musical discussion of the problems of Life, by those, too, who know nothing of the science of music, or the rules which guide the writer of symphonics? Unhesitatingly we reply that it is. Without knowing anything of the key which the composer has supplied, without an acquaintance with even the A B C of music, anybody who is sane and human and loves beautiful themes and sonorous interweavings of sound, will enjoy this Symphony. The blasé man can enjoy Shakespeare without knowing anything about the history of the periods represented in the plays; he can enjoy Don Quixote and Dante, though he knows neither Spanish nor Italian, neither the romances of chivalry, nor the doings of Popes and Kings. It is one of the questions we have never been able to answer, whether he who is fully instructed derives more real enjoyment from Art, whether pictorial, literary, or musical, than the deuce who has only love, taste, and a certain instinct of understanding as his guide. We cannot decide whether it is better only to wonder and not to know, or whether it is better to know in order that we may wonder. It may be that the musicians who can take Sir Hubert's score into their hands, and read it as easily as they can their morning newspaper, who have so studied the science of composition that they can detect at a glance all the subtle cunning of orchestration, the transformation of themes, etc., that such folk will enjoy a performance of the Symphony more than those who cannot tell the voice of the clarionet from the voice of the bassoon, who understand the meaning of counterpoint as little as they do the Spectrum Analysis; but we are not sure. We ourselves pretend to no profundity of musical science. We have forgotten a good deal of our Prout, and would rather confront a band of militant Suffragettes when we were walking in the company of Mr. Lloyd George, than be set down to play a complicated score on the piano at sight in the presence of the professor who once sought to teach us that art. Yet we could and did enjoy Sir Hubert's Symphony as much as we have enjoyed any piece of music for a long, long time.

It will be a shame, even a disgrace, if all the competent orchestras of the Kingdom do not presently include it in their programmes. We should like to hear Mengelberg and Safonoff conduct it. Not that it is one of those baffling works of which we can only say, "We shall probably like it better when we know it." We shall come to like it better in the way that we like a friend more and more, who has delighted us from the first. We are sure that each time we hear it, this Symphony will rivet more tightly its hold upon our admiration and affection, for our instinct tells us that its beauty is not of the kind which either fades or falls.

We understand that Mr. Richard Edgcumbe has nearly completed the second volume of "The Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley," which will shortly be published.

"The Interpreter," a quarterly magazine of Biblical and theological study, edited by the Rev. Hewlett Johnson, M.A., B.Sc., will in future be published by Mr. Robert Scott, Roxburghe House, Paternoster Row, E.C.

Aspects of Ireland: Culture and Prosperity*

IN his "View of the State of Ireland" Spenser laments the barbarous state of Irish roads, and outlines his scheme for remedying the bad condition of the country. But we know that centuries before his time Ireland had had a well-constructed system of roads; and, since her commercial and civil prosperity grew steadily till the time of the Tudors in England, it seems pretty clear that her roads were not likely to have deteriorated in the natural course of events. But then Spenser was looking at the country from the outlander's point of view. He had come in the rear of invading armies A defending people naturally destroys its roads behind it; and hostilities may be relied on effectually to conclude what they, in their proper defence, began. It is, as we have said, a matter of standpoint. Regarded from without, the picture seems altogether different when its aspect is regarded from within.

Mrs. Green is one of a small cluster who have effected this change in looking at Irish history. Hitherto it has chiefly been regarded as an appendage to English history, with the result that some of the most interesting pages in the annals of mankind have been missed, and others have been read with a false gloss For instance, a glance at the map of Europe shows that all the natural ports face westward. England is the only country where this is not the case; and if the British Isles be considered as a whole the natural harbours again face westward, along the west coast of Ireland particularly. When, in addition to this, it is remembered that in early western history some of the most adventurous traders were the Scandinavians, the geographical position becomes even more interesting. For clearly, even as they could strike directly southward for Germany and the north of France, to trade with the richer parts of the Continent (the coasts of Burgundy, Spain, and the Mediterranean), the simplest way would be to swing round the open waterway of the Atlantic; and the natural harbours along the west coast of Ireland would become part of a main trade route Which is precisely what happened.

But when the northerners thrust boldly outward and brought Ireland into the arc of a trade route that extended from Norway to Syria, there was already a well-matured civilisation—to employ a much abused word—in Ireland. It is an ironical thing that, whereas a code of laws formulated by one Hammurabi of the Euphrates valley should be studied patiently in popular treatises, a far more intricate and detailed system devised in a neighbour island, should be virtually unknown and neglected. Yet the code of laws administered by the brehons, or judges, and therefore generally known as the Brehon Laws, in their detailed application to the whole mass of civil life, are quite sufficient proof of a well elaborated civilisation. Moreover, it emerges already well formed from before the definite reckoning of history. So that when the Scandinavians swept round and caught up Ireland in a large system, it was very far from an untutored people that was thus introduced to this larger orbit. They themselves, in the settlements they established, were subdued by the Irish to a culture they did not possess. They did not much affect the central life of the nation inasmuch as their settlements were on the coast; yet, although there already existed a fair trade with the south of France and Spain, the country was drawn into the vortex of a wider commerce with more distant nations.

When, therefore, the Scandinavians, and Danes, passed, the result was that Ireland retained the larger area of trade without having had her own national life very considerably affected by invasion. The three or four main settlements were on the coast; and even there Irish culture, manners, and customs had more conquered the invaders in degree than the invaders had conquered the Irish in mass. And after the battle of Clontarf (1014), when the Danes were finally and effectually beaten, the last of the invaders were shaken off, those who remained in the country being drawn into the national life. The Danes had wished to bring Ireland within the pale of their Imperial ambitions, and failed, as the Normans later tried and failed; but they left the memory of their wider sphere of trade, and this was continued and cultivated.

How well it was cultivated Mrs. Green makes evident in her "Making of Ireland, and its Undoing." There she gives details of the trade of each of the chief Irish ports. "So frequent was the ocean traffic," she says, "that when Chester wanted to send messengers in a hurry to Spain, they went by way of Ireland, a fact which shows the number of Spanish trading ships in Irish waters." And again: "At the request of Ghent, Bruges, Ypres and France Phillipe le Hardi gave a special safe conduct to Irish merchants to settle in the Low Countries with their goods and families; and 'Ships of Ireland were long known in Antwerp.'" On the East, Dundalk, Drogheda, Dublin, and Wexford; on the south, Waterford, Dungarvan, Youghal, Kinsale, and Baltimore; and on the west, Sligo, Galway, Limerick, and the inlets of Munster, all had their busy part in this traffic. Galway, for example, traded as far as the Levant and the Canaries. Its trade with Spain was such that to this hour in its streets one may see faces that are manifestly of Spanish origin. Its excellent harbour does not serve much purpose now; yet up till the time of Elizabeth it was one of the chief ports in the British Isles—a fact that is barely conceivable at the present day.

Yet an extended area of commerce is not the truest prosperity a country may know. A material prosperity of this kind may even mean—and in the modern world has meant—neglect of the spiritual world of culture. In Ireland this was not so, however. Before the coming of the Northerners, each chief, from the High King to the king of a tribe, had to be accompanied on his circuits and travels by a brehon, a poet, a bishop, a historian, and a musician, who were maintained by him in dignity and honour. This estimation in which culture and learning were held was part of the essential life of the nation; and it marked the hour of prosperity as surely as it characterised the simpler life of the people. They were, as Campion said in 1653, "lovers of music, pōetry, and all kinds of learning"; and one recalls the line from Hudibras: "As learned as the wild Irish are." Or to quote from Mrs. Green again: "In Ireland, in fact, so long as any independent Irish life survived, the scholar was the most honoured man in the community." From Columcille's settlement in Iona she first evangelised Britain, and the English poet Caedmon received his education as a result of that. Her scholars carried their learning through Spain and France, and even travelled with it to the Levant. In Oxford there was an "Yrysshemanstreete." English writers of that time speak of seeing children "grovelling upon couches of straw, their books at their noses, themselves lying prostrate," "conning by rote the Aphorisms of Hippocrates and the Pandects of Justinian." Not only, however, were the poets and clerics so learned, but it was considered a considerable reproach to any noble if he was not familiar with the learning that was held in esteem.

It is a graceful thing, "and pleasant if one consider it," to see a nation thriving in its spiritual life, carrying learning and culture among its peoples as a charge for which they were content to be at material loss, while they traded widely and freely in increasing prosperity. For trade, then, was not the graceless thing it is now. Yet the truly amazing point is that to the greater number of readers this picture, based though it be on firm contemporary records, should seem so foreign a thing that its insistence should appear either a phantasy or a paradox. This has simply come about because hitherto, prior to the uprise of some who have inverted the order, we have become accustomed to look at one nation's history from the point of view of another nation. It has been so with such national histories as those of France or Spain. It has been especially so in early Irish history. And it is Mrs. Green's distinction that she has wisely, and authoritatively, readjusted the weights.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

Verona

THE memory of Verona is the memory of a ripe fruit—a fruit mellowed and matured to rich colour by summers of golden sunshine. In Rome the legacies of the different centuries are sharply defined. The first association which the name evokes for most people is inevitably that of St. Peter's and the Vatican; but apart from it and apart from each other are Classic Rome, Early Christian Rome, Baroque Rome, and the fashionable city of modern times. Verona, as we know it, is the flower of as many epochs as Rome, but the spirit of the place, or at least of all that is beautiful in it, is single and undivided. Time and weather have ripened the work of diverse ages into a rich autumnal whole. Its name calls up memories of tawny red marble, finely wrought ironwork, wide-canopied church porches opening to the afternoon sun; the sharp savour of the Gothic spirit, half simplicity, half grimness; the surprise of beautiful bridges and springing towers; the Early Renaissance, with its sweet sanity, pure, but too human ever to be cold; hanging balconies of pieced marble, house fronts stained with mouldering frescoes; then, after these and less vivid than they, the heavy nobility of ancient Rome. But all these sensations are united and merged into one, the sense of a sunny ripeness, a rich maturity.

There is no piazza in Italy more lovely than the Piazza delle Erbe, the market-place of Verona. The market-folk set up their stalls in the great oblong space in the middle. Each stall is sheltered by its broad, white umbrella; the square is full of them, domed under the sun like a bed of gigantic mushrooms. In the shadows beneath them, masses of brilliant flowers and fruit, heaped on tables or in baskets, strike notes of resonant colour among other wares. A leisurely crowd moves from stall to stall, and the shouts and chattering of buyers and sellers and the occasional rattle of a cart resound through the hollow space. All round it, the old high houses look down on the turmoil, silent and benignant like human presences. Some have balconies with clothes hanging to dry from them; some are stained with the gorgeous colours of obliterated frescoes—reds, greens, and golds. The top of the Piazza is closed by a fine Baroque palace. Age has weathered it to a ripe golden yellow, and cast a quaint wistfulness over the pompous statues that crown its parapet. Above the tall houses on the east side of the Piazza, the Torre dei Lamberti shoots high over the market. Its square red shaft, running up into the beautiful octagonal summit, stands up strongly against the blue of the sky, quietly presiding over the noisy scene. It gives a sense of the roomy spaces above, drawing the eye upwards and linking the noisy hollow of the piazza with the broad serenity of the upper air. Unlike the great things of Nature, which make mankind as a race seem small and transient, the beauty of old architecture, so full always of the human element, gives a meaning and dignity to the hustling business of the crowd; one realises the continuity of the race, the unbroken tradition which has kept that place the market place since the days when the Roman Forum stood there, and makes it still a vital part of the town.

We find more of the spirit of an age in its architecture than in any other art, for architecture is necessarily social, and springing from social necessity it is shaped by the needs of the time—needs warlike, religious, and civic. The poet may be social or hermitical; the architect must base his whole work on the social habits of those he builds for; without them "his occupation's gone."

and not only his soul but the soul of the city; and those spires which grew out of the social life preserve its spirit, handing down to later times the mind, customs, ambitions, and dreams of their makers. That is why one feels serene and at peace with mankind in an old town; there the strifes, problems, and ugliness of modern life appear in a truer perspective as natural elements of social evolution. In a modern town they take hold of us with appalling significance till we are apt to lose the historic view and to regard the external life of the moment as the only life. Among the beautiful remains of past ages one is in contact with all that is best in the human heart. One tries, looking at their work, to see as they saw and think as they thought, and to do so broadens the mind and sweetens the sympathies.

Verona is fortunate in its river. A river, especially a river swift and alive like the Adige, brings the freshness and beauty of open life into a town; and it necessitates one of the most beautiful of architectural creations. To cross even the least lovely of bridges gives a sense of heightened vitality. Few people can be untouched by the delight of emerging from close-walled streets into open space and realising that the roadway has suddenly become suspended over moving water. A beautiful bridge is a flight translated into material; there is something spiritual in it, as in all beautiful architecture, and to cross it is almost a ceremony. One feels the delight of being lifted up above the earth on a thin platform; the movement of the water below makes one's stability above it seem an adventure, a miracle, and the presence of the airy void on each side and the sound and liveness of the stream are refreshing and uplifting to body and soul.

One of the most lovely things in Verona is its Ponte Scaligero, that bridge which the second Cangrande built in the fourteenth century to connect his castle with the farther bank of the Adige. The arch voussoirs and the bases of the piers are of stone, the rest, like the castle itself, is of brick—brick weathered by the years to a smouldering tawny red. The piers between the three arches rise into great turrets, and these turrets and the lofty parapet-walls break out splendidly at their summits into fish-tail battlements. The arch at the further bank is low, the middle one is larger, but the third is gigantic, flung into the castle wall with the irresistible leap of a rainbow. The sense leaps with it, stimulated to sudden rapture by the bracing swing of the bow. No builder has ever breathed such power and vigour into bricks and mortar, such solidity combined with such speed. It is like some vision of high romance. Watching it, with the swirling Adige weaving its peacock blues and greens over the shelving rocks below and deepening to a shadowy purple under its cold resonant arches, one dreams of the enchanted castle of some terrible old story.

MARTIN D. ARMSTRONG.

A New French Play

A GREAT scientist, Bouguet, has lived for twenty years in perfect communion of thought with his wife, a very superior woman, and a celebrated bacteriologist like himself. Their child, Marcelle, promises to follow the example of her illustrious parents. But though planning in the spheres of superhumanity, Laurent Bouguet lets himself be momentarily beguiled by the mere physical charms of a delicious young secretary, Edwige, who, as her name proves, is of Slavic origin and thus dangerous. And the few instants during which he descended from his pedestal of superiority cause the ruin of his career, of his reputation, and even the loss of his life. His great philosophical work is destroyed as a personal revenge; his discoveries relative to the cure of cancer are endangered —all on account of a pretty little stenographer. Such are the fundamental points of M. Henri Bataille's new play, "Les Flambeaux," which was recently presented for the first time at the theatre of the Porte St. Martin. But on this rough canvas M. Bataille has embroidered many philosophical or sentimental digressions, and he tries to prove that persons of even the highest intellect, proud of their supposed enfranchisement from the vulgar passions of common mortals, are just as subject to the ordinary social prejudices as their inferior fellow men or women.

After having posed the problem of the Idea in conflict with the Flesh, M. Bataille does not solve it. As usual he prefers to discuss vast questions with a vagueness of execution which may be artistic, but is certainly not satisfying. But one must not forget that he is a poet, as is proved by his book of verses, "Un Beau Voyage," so that he does not fear to write his plays before having attained the real truth. His system of working is rather timorous, for we cannot help discovering that M. Bataille possesses no very determined philosophical convictions; he interests us by the poetical side of his work, but does not convince us.

At the end of "Les Flambeaux," the Idea does in truth triumph over Matter, in what seems a rather artificial way. After the storm has blown over, M. Bataille's personages seem to take refuge in their work automatically, rather by habit than by passion or conviction. Bouguet's widow, and Blondel, the man whom he mocked, and who revenged himself by taking his life, forget their deep hatred and sorrow, and unite their efforts to perpetuate the work; but do they do it out of veneration for the dead man, or out of simple desire to resume the life from which passion and jealousy has momentarily expelled them? In fact, one cannot help the impression that M. Bataille has aimed at rather too lofty a subject. The drawn-out scenes are tedious, and there is a profusion of cheap sentimentality which surprises one on the part of an author of so high a reputation.

The character of Bouguet shocks us often. Is it conceivable that a man of so fine an intellect as M. Bataille represents him to be, should marry his mistress to his greatest friend and associate, in order to free himself from certain calumnies which are circulating in the Institut Claude Bernard, of which he is the head? We think not. Is it admissible that the passion Edwige nourishes for Bouguet, a man nearly three times her age, should be of so violent and sensual a character? Of course, Edwige is of Slavic origin; nevertheless it is painful and repulsive to see that fresh young girl beg for a proof of Laurent's affection. Would it not be more natural for her to have simply a great veneration for the great genius near whom she has the privilege of living?

The character of Mme. Bouguet is, with the exception of Blondel, the best drawn of the play. The conflict the news of her husband's treason provokes in her is finely depicted. She is a superior woman. We cannot ignore that fact, for she repeats it so often that one is exasperated by her unfailing superiority, and comes very near excusing Bouguet's weakness for a common mortal. Nevertheless the analysis of the emotions battling in the breast of the woman who for twenty years has lived in a sort of apotheosis of glory and work, far above the pre-occupation of humanity, and who suddenly discovers a very human side of her character, ignored till then, is treated in a masterly way.

A particularity of the play is that the title is explained to us in the second act, in a scene which has no other raison d'être between Bouguet and a great writer, Hernut, who, having followed the guidance of his senses during his youth, was led by sentimentality, in the autumn of his life, to follow the Ideal. To Bouguet's philosophical work he owes his evolution. Bouguet finds himself in a cruel dilemma. Having been all his life the passionate devotee to the Ideal, he has suddenly succumbed at the crowning point of his career to carnal weakness, thus undergoing the very opposite process to that followed by Hernut. And it is with real terror that he awakens to the fact that he is very near being entirely dominated by the senses. Bataille then expounds a theory which, we think, contains much truth: at some time or other, Nature will triumph in every human being, and perhaps more brutally still the higher the intellectual faculties of the person are that she assails.

M. Huguenet, in the rôle of Blondel, displayed a power and emotion of rare quality. He was quite human: and that is the greatest compliment one can pay him. Laurent Bouguet was personified by M. Le Bargy, who for the first time appears on a public stage since he quitted the Comédie Française. It is true that for his freak he has to pay a fine of 100,000 francs; this fact, however, adds to the general reputation of elegance M. Le Bargy enjoys. In leaving the house of Molière, he has not freed himself of certain of his defects. His conception of a superior man is a solemn, hypocritical, and pedantic person, fully convinced of his own infallibility and of the frailty of the world in general. He is perfectly insupportable, and supportably perfect! M. Le Bargy redeems his reputation in the death scene; but we have to wait till the end before hearing him pronounce a single human and sincere accent. One can pardon his automatic conception, since he at last lives and vibrates at the moment of dying. Mme. Bouguet was represented by Mme. Suzanne Desprès, who, as usual, was ardent, concentrated, and seemed particularly pleased to play the part of a sublime woman whose abnegation is saintly and irritating.

Mlle. Yvonne de Bray was as irresistible as ever in the rôle of the passionate Edwige. We prefer her, however, in light comedy; for, when she finds herself in a tragical or emotional situation, her one resource seems to be to wring her hands and become dishevelled, which is by no means a disagreeable picture, but as a dramatic means is rather tedious.

A fact that rather surprised us was that the heroines of this remarkable play move among operating-tables and microbes of all kinds and descriptions, in delicate flimsy gowns, surely due to the inspiration of some great "couturier" of the Rue de la Paix.

MARC LOGE.

Christmas Exhibition at the Baillie Gallery

AMONG the various exhibitions of book illustrations generally open at this time of year some charming work is being shown at Messrs. Baillie's Gallery in Bruton Street, where one room is devoted to Miss M. V. Wheelhouse's colour drawings for some Victorian books. The books illustrated include "Jane Eyre" "Silas Marner," "Cranford," and others by Mrs. Gaskell, and several of Mrs. Ewing's. It is not easy to make pictures for such famous old stories as these, but Miss Wheelhouse's work is full of delicate feeling, and such evident sympathy with the characters and situations that she rarely fails to suggest the atmosphere in each, and one goes round the gallery enjoying the pictures at once for their own sake and for the sake of the books themselves—which, after all, is what an illustrator must desire one to do. It matters very little whether we conceive Miss Jenkins as "possessing herself of the orange" exactly as depicted by Miss Wheelhouse, or of Solomon as heading just such a procession, since in spite of weaknesses of detail, a certain feeling of the scenes is always there The artist has a way, too, of giving personality to her interiors, and these are all books in which places count for a great deal. "We took turns for the ride next to the lilac" from "Six to Sixteen," the first "Little Women" picture, Miss Natty's shop and "Mrs. Hamley reading aloud," from "Wives and Daughters," are among the best of the drawings exhibited, and it is only to be expected that the illustrator of Mrs. Gaskell and Mrs. Ewing should fail more or less with such a book as "Jane Eyre," though even here it is only a partial failure.

In another room in the same gallery Mr. F. L. Griggs has a collection of what the catalogue ingeniously describes as drawings of "English Landscape Architecture," which are very interesting. There are a great number of these, the best of them representing architecture, whether of cathedral or cottage, in a pleasantly unarchitectural way. In such studies of places as "Amberley Castle," "Old Houses at Whitchurch," "Dinton," and "Grevel House," for example, one feels the love of the architect for the beauty of buildings, but it would seem that Mr. Griggs, having studied architecture, had begun to draw only as an artist.

There are two other exhibitions in the same gallery—some clever caricatures of well known people by Mr. C. P. Hawkes, and a number of children's book illustrations by Mr. L. Leslie Brooke.

The Painters in Water Colours

WITH an occasional exception the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours pursues the even tenor of its way. The exhibition now open at the Gallery in Pall Mall East does not greatly differ from its predecessors of recent years, and there is not even a Sargent to surprise us. The occasional exception this year, however, is Mr. Edwin Alexander. His delicate studies of wild flowers and insects have been among the interesting things at the exhibition for some time; he has now been painting landscapes as delicately. From making studies of groups of reeds and grasses he has begun to draw the sweeps of marsh country—"Cullani" and "The Witch's Finger," for instance—in which they grow, with the same touch of feeling. He has also two frames of the most delicate pigeon studies.

The most beautiful thing in the exhibition is Mr. Clausen's "The Seine from Chateau Gaillard"—the river lying like a blue ribbon across the plain, with soft clouds above. His "Ludlow Castle" and "The Tree" are not at all equal to this, but Mr. Clausen could hardly paint anything which had not some beauty and interest. Near them hangs Mr. Walter Bayes' "Panorama Rattorin," in which there is a certain directness and decorative quality, but it is slight, and looks very slight against the work of Mr. Clausen. There are a good many of Mr. Walter Crane's pictures, among which the cleverest and most striking is one of an "Aviation Meeting," and the most individual and pleasing, "A Deer Park." Mr. Claude Shepperson's "The Lake, Grasmere," "The Rain Cloud," by Mr. Henry A. Payne, in which there is something of an early Italian touch, Mr. Walter J. West's "The Gleam," with its soft colour and design, and Miss Fortescue Brickdale's "Travellers," are all good, but Mrs. Laura Knight's water colours in this exhibition are slighter and less interesting than hitherto. A member of the society whose technique has altered a good deal is Mr. Robert Little. He has been painting in a more direct manner than formerly, adding very much to the value of his work. There is, of course, a great deal of work exhibited, though the Gallery is a little less crowded than usual, but we are only able to name in conclusion two of Mr. Arthur Rackham's designs, as charming and fantastic as always—"The Castle of the Twelve Dancing Princesses," and an illustration to "Don Quixote."

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

JUSTIN McCARTHY, writing of Palmerston, said: "He was not in the highest sense of the word a truthful man; that is to say, there were episodes in his career in which, for purposes of statecraft, he allowed the House of Commons and the country to become the dupes of an erroneous impression. Personally truthful; honourable, of course, it would be superfluous to pronounce him. A man of Palmerston's bringing up is as certain to be personally truthful as he is to be brave, and to be fond of open-air exercise and the cold bath." I could not help thinking how well this description applied to Churchill on Wednesday when he was being cross-examined by Lord Charles Beresford about the resignation of the First Sea Lord. These are the two questions and answers of moment:—

Q.: "Is it a fact that the resignation was due solely to reasons of health?" A.: "So far as I am aware, there was no other cause whatever." Q.: "From which side did the proposal emanate?" A.: "Since the noble lord presses it, the proposal emanated from me." The catechism caused a profound sensation. Churchill went very white; he did not know how much Lord Charles knew, and he fought for time when he said: "Before answering that question, I should like to know whether the noble lord is speaking on behalf of Sir Francis Bridgeman."

Lord Charles was able to declare that he had had no communication with the First Sea Lord: "I merely asked the question in the interests of the Service, because so many First Sea Lords have left during the last few years." Lord Charles then wanted to know why Canada had suddenly made her magnificent offer, and what was the exact date when the Government became aware of the grave peril they were in through insufficient naval forces, as disclosed by the Admiralty memorandum to Canada.

Mr. Churchill was not to be caught a second time in one afternoon; he "had nothing to add to the full statement of policy contained in that memorandum." Joe Martin, from Canada, wanted to belittle his country's gift as much as possible by asking how much it was going to cost the British taxpayer to maintain the three warships; but he received no satisfaction.

We then got back to Home Rule. There is a hopeless muddle as to when the new state of things is to begin. Not to go into dry details, the Unionists suspected that the alteration of dates proposed meant that the Government wanted to have a general election after the Bill had passed, but before it became law. It was a case of "Heads I win, tails you lose," because, if the Coalition came back, they would say—quite naturally—that the country supported the Bill; if they lost, why, then, the Unionist Government would have to reverse the action, a course which, as I have already more than once pointed out in these notes, is very rare in practice. But it was all to no purpose; the guillotine stopped all argument at 7.30.

At 10.30 the guillotine fell again, and we started walking round and round for three and a half solid hours—not hurriedly, but at an average rate of eleven minutes to each division. The Radicals squealed and gibed or ridiculed, but the Unionists were determined to revenge themselves. They had had the guillotine for weeks and weeks, and now the Government should taste of their own medicine. The smallest amendment was challenged, and we had the satisfaction of keeping more than twice our numbers out of bed through the night. Our grandchildren will perchance wonder at such an exhibition, but it is the only way at present in which a minority can make the majority feel a protest.

Claude Lowther once said to me, at 2 a.m.: "This is a beastly place. They are going to adjourn now, and I shall not know what to do with myself for the rest of the evening." Somewhat in this mood, the House sat down at 2 a.m. to polish off the White Slave Traffic Bill. Arthur Lee said it was a case of now or never, and, supported by the Government, he appropriately flogged through the Lords' amendments by 4 a.m. One gets mixed after sitting all through the night; but that concludes the account of Wednesday night's sitting.

On Thursday we heard that there were going to be thirty-one divisions at 10.30. This at eleven minutes each means five hours and forty minutes—or sitting until 4 a.m. again. The Mad Hatter was manifestly alarmed at such a tea-party, and, to the annoyance of his friends, begged the Government to approach the Opposition "through the usual channels" and see if they could not be reduced. Asquith duly promised to do his best, but he was not sanguine. The Irish are supposed to be a witty race, but, if the Nationalist M.P.'s are specimens, I can only say that the supposition is quite unfounded. With one or two notable exceptions, the mass of them are dull tradesmen, whose only contribution to the debate are occasional uncouth noises. Willie Redmond and Jerry MacVeagh are supposed to be the wits, and Jerry was put up this afternoon to ridicule the Union Jack. It arose owing to an amendment by Hamersley, who wanted the Union Jack to remain the official flag of Ireland, and to be kept flying each day until sunset over the Irish Parliament House, exactly in the same way as the Union Jack floats from the tall flagstaff on the Victoria Tower at Westminster.

Balfour showed his disgust at Jerry's cheap wit: "What I thought myself, speaking as a citizen of this Empire, absolutely intolerable." The astute John Redmond saw he had made a mistake and spoke smooth words and soothing. He objected to the amendment because he thought the proposal was intended to be some humiliation for Ireland: "The Scotch have a flag of their own, and he had seen the Welsh flag hanging over the house of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Downing Street. Ireland ought to have her own flag, but beside it would float the Union Jack, the symbol of the Empire, with which Ireland would for the first time feel she had been admitted on honourable and equal terms." It was a clever speech, and did away with some of the mischief caused by Master MacVeagh. After several other small details and many divisions, the Bill finally passed through the Committee stage at 12.5, amid great enthusiasm on the part of the Coalition and a running fire of vitriolic sarcasm from Jack Wilson, who, I am glad to see, is now regularly back in his old place after his long illness.

On Friday the House assembled at 11 to go on with the Welsh Spoliation Bill. Outside in the Lobby men discussed Winston's amazing treatment of Sir Francis Bridgeman, who was bluntly asked by an enterprising reporter of the Standard: "Was your resignation voluntary, or on grounds of ill-health?" He replied: "The answer is in the negative"!

When we went inside, we found Mr. France, a Liberal Nonconformist, with an amendment in the shape of an olive branch. Would the Churchmen on one side and the Radicals on the other be content with the following suggestion:—"Let's take from the Church her tithe-rent charge, and leave her all the rest of her revenue." Young Gladstone made a fine speech. "Let your sense of justice be tempered with clemency and generosity," he said, "and allow the Church to retain endowments of which she has enjoyed undisputed possession for so long." Not a bit of it. McKenna was getting alarmed and angry. "If you pass this amendment, I shall drop the Bill!" he cried. Lloyd George was far more artful. "If we accept the amendment, will you agree to the Bill?" "No," said Colonel Pryce-Jones; "we can't do that; we firmly believe that all the endowments are rightfully ours." "Ah!" said Lloyd George, "it is useless to talk about a settlement by consent if the most reasonable of the representatives of the Welsh Tories require an offer like that." With his back to the wall, not quite certain how many of his own side would vote against him, Lloyd George fought with desperate courage. All the old demagogue in him broke out afresh. He attacked the landlord, he declared that the parson did not look after the poor, and offered to go down to Wales himself and try to make peace if that were possible. Balfour replied; he ridiculed the "logic" of the measure that the Government prated about—showed that they had made out no case at all: (a) that the clergy in Wales are overpaid, or (b) that the work was ill-done.

At 4.50, after an anxious afternoon, the bell rang, to the relief of the Government, and 68 Irish Nationalists, mostly Roman Catholics, came in to assist the Nonconformist Radicals, and saved the Government by a majority of 50. If this portion of the log-rolling Coalition had not been there to perform their part of the bargain, the Government would have been beaten by 18.

On Monday there appeared in the Times a statement which was obviously inspired, to the effect that Winston "would take an early opportunity, probably this afternoon," to make a further statement on the amazing case of the retirement of the First Sea Lord. On the Bench at question-time he passed a paper, which was evidently the statement, over to Asquith, who looked at it and shook his head. The time was evidently not opportune. I admire Asquith's style of speech very much, but his written encomium on Whitelaw Reid, masterly as it was, did not touch Balfour's unstudied tribute to the man and his work. All parties were pleased at the decision to send the remains of the Ambassador to his native land in a British man-of-war.

We then went back to unseemly wrangling over the funds of the Welsh Church. It is apparently the intention of the Government to interfere with the remainder of the Church funds after she is disestablished and disendowed. Daylight-saving Pearce had the impertinence to say: "All these little manœuvres to obtain a little more money for the Church are viewed with dissatisfaction by many Nonconformist members." As if a man would not struggle, if left wounded on the ground by highwaymen, to preserve what they had overlooked—and come back for!

This is not the place to describe what takes place outside the House, otherwise I should like to say a word about Bonar Law's speech at Ashton-under-Lyme. It was discussed at large in the Lobby. With his usual directness, our leader has cleared the air, but at a cost which remains to be seen.

At question-time, after some rather churlish answers from McKinnon Wood, Mr. Watt, a Radical from Glasgow, inquired hopefully if and when the Secretary for Scotland was going to be made a peer, at which everyone laughed loudly.

All day and all night the Welsh battle raged. Mr. Handel Booth, with exquisite taste, hinted that some of the early endowments of the Church were the proceeds of the immorality of women. Sir A. Cripps warmly denied so scandalous a charge, and Booth withdrew it.

McKenna made a concession over Queen Anne's Bounty, which got him into trouble with the Welsh Radicals. I foresee a good deal more trouble before the Bill is through.

Notes and News

Mr. C. J. Bishenden, the author of many popular books on his original method for "voice, singing, and health," has written "Forty Years' Recollections of the Handel Festival Choir," published by the Standard.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke announces his twelfth year of modern chamber concerts. The first concert will take place at the Æolian Hall, on Friday, January 31, 1913, at 8.15 p.m.

A second edition of Mr. Israel Zangwill's play, "The Next Religion," which was so warmly discussed at the time of its first publication, will be issued by Mr. Heinemann in a few days. This new edition contains a special preface by Mr. Zangwill.

The book on library economy and allied topics by Mr. James Duff Brown, Mr. R. A. Peddie, and other authors, published originally by Messrs. Libraco, Ltd., will in future be issued by Messrs. Grafton and Co., of 69, Great Russell Street, W.C.

Attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Christopher Stone's last novel, "The Shoe of a Horse," published last spring by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, contains an account of the rising of an imaginary Balkan State against its oppressors, and in many respects describes with remarkable accuracy the kind of warfare that has been raging in the Near East. It is a curiosity in fiction which deserves notice.

Mr. Frederick Harrison has, by an arrangement just concluded with Mr. Charles Frohman, secured Mr. J. M. Barrie's one-act comedy, "Rosalind," for the Haymarket Theatre; this will be presented at the matinée on Saturday next, with Miss Irene Vanbrugh and the rest of the original cast. "The Younger Generation" will begin as usual at 9 o'clock, and will be followed by "Rosalind" at 10.30. The performance will commence at 8.30 with "Aristide Pujol," by W. J. Locke.

The catalogue of valuable second-hand books issued by Mr. R. Atkinson, of 97, Sutherland Road, Forest Hill, S.E., is a capital guide to students of literature in search of lore on subjects which lie outside the beaten track. Books on finger-prints, mnemonics, whist, dogs, memoirs and biographies, and treatises on various themes, in addition to numerous specimens of first editions, are to be found there, and the list is arranged in a method which makes reference very easy.

Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons will publish in January the first volume of "The Everyman Encyclopædia," edited by Mr. Andrew Boyle. The full set will consist of twelve volumes, and the last volume will be ready in December, 1913. This encyclopædia will be quite a new production. It will be a practical, comprehensive, and yet condensed work of reference for students and readers of all branches of literature and history, and will form an integral part of "Everyman's Library."

A meeting of the Library Assistants' Association was held at the Association Rooms, Bloomsbury Square, on December 11, when the president, Mr. H. T. Coutts, gave an address in memory of Edward Edwards, the pioneer of the public library movement. Mr. H. G. Sureties, of Hornsey, followed with a suggestive paper, in which he urged all library assistants to join the Association and take part in its good work. The secretary, Mr. W. C. B. Sayers, dealt with the possibilities contained in the subject of staff exchanges, by means of which assistants would be enabled to gain a wider and more thorough knowledge of their duties and of the various methods pertaining thereto.

In view of the success of the first Summer School of Town Planning, held at the Hampstead Garden Suburb, in August last, under the auspices of the University of London, it has been decided to hold a second school next year at the same centre, commencing August 2 and continuing till August 16; during that time lectures and demonstrations on town planning and subjects connected therewith will be given by some of the leading authorities. Particulars can be obtained from the Hon. Secretary of the Summer School, Mr. J. S. Rathbone, The Institute, Hampstead Garden Suburb, London, N.W.

The Poetry Society makes the interesting announcement that Mr. Stephen Phillips has become the editor of the Poetry Review, and in the January number will deal authoritatively with poetic drama. Mr. Phillips has just finished the revision of his "Sin of David," which Mr. H. B. Irving has taken out to South Africa before producing it in London next year. Other features of the January Poetry Review will be the text of Lord Dunsany's fantasy, "The Gods of the Mountain," and the prologue of a poetic play by Mr. Charles Cayzer. The Poetry Society offers the sum of £10 monthly for the best contemporary poetry, and particular attention will be paid to the development of the use of poetry in education.

A beautiful work, entitled "Gems of Japanese Art and Handicraft," by George Ashdown Audsley, is soon to be published by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Ltd. It contains sixty-four plates, printed in colours and gold, and others in monochrome. The different materials—bronze, porcelain, etc.—are exquisitely represented, and the whole makes an indispensable book of reference for the student of decorative art, as well as for collectors and dealers. There is also to be a limited edition printed on Japanese vellum. The same firm have issued "Eothen" by Kinglake, "The Life of Nelson" by Southey, "The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam," and "The Revenge" by Raleigh—all illustrated by Mr. Brangwyn. The texts are well edited, and the books very attractively bound.

England's Frenzy

GIBBON in his "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," lamented that the age of stirring events had passed, and that the future duty of the historian would be to chronicle the unromantic happenings of an era of universal peace and goodwill amongst mankind. Yet, within a measurable space of time, the world was moved to its depths by the French Revolution of 1789, and Europe resounded to its remotest parts with the clash of the rise and fall of Napoleon.

The eighteenth century had been a period of comparative peace and enlightenment. The most brilliant brains in Europe, satiated with strife, eagerly turned to the pursuits of commerce and art, and pressed along the fascinating paths of science. Philosophers, statesmen, and the ardent well-wishers of mankind did not hesitate to prophesy the advent of the millennium. War, it was urged, was the result of the wicked intrigues of kings and courts, and if only the people could obtain political power, they, as the principal sufferers of disturbance, would take such steps as to make its recurrence an impossibility. The spread of education and the diffusion of knowledge would have the effect of demanding a halt in all things warlike, in favour of the purely pacific.

What is it, then, that has made these sanguine expectations of success result in realised failure? The human race, it is true, is advancing and does not recede; progress, sometimes rapid, more often slow, is ever pursuing her course, and like the waters of some great river in flood, is obliterating the old landmarks and signs in order to create the new. Man, it is urged, is becoming better, more humane, merciful, and generous, less inclined to evil, more disposed to good, as the years roll by. In a word, the philosophical dreams of the ardent, the generous, and the philanthropic are based on the theory of human perfectibility. They maintain that the tendencies and actions of mankind generally are naturally inclined to good, and but for the adverse environment and conditions ruling amongst nations, these tendencies would triumphantly assert themselves.

The advocates of human perfectibility decline to take into account the inherent quality of the wickedness and deceitfulness of the heart, but stake their all on changes of Government, the spread of education, and the assimilation of knowledge among the races of mankind. They fail to perceive, or if seeing, wilfully close their eyes to the fact that knowledge is not wisdom, and that the unthinking many live but for the fulfilment of their desires for present gratification and pleasure, whilst the thinking few alone take heed for the future. Hence it is that all their efforts for social amelioration are foredoomed to failure, for their remedies touch only the outer skin of the body politic, and leave the vitals of the patient as they found them.

Once more then, Europe is faced with a crisis in her history that bids fair to outdo in magnitude the Napoleonic struggles of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. How will England acquit herself? Will she issue from the threatened conflict stronger and more united, as in 1815, or will she, at last, be numbered with the fallen greatness of historic Empires, whose whitened bones strew the plains of Europe? We confess to a pessimism as to the answer—more especially when the events of the past few years are called into review.

Let us at once say, before proceeding to explain our fears, we do not for a moment believe that the individual courage and fortitude of our countrymen is any whit the less than in the days of our forefathers, but we are persuaded that these qualities alone, in the light of modern requirements, are insufficient to bear the strain of the nation's coming trial, and without a truly national system of organisation for defence individual gallantry is of little avail.

England and her allies by dint of the self-sacrifice of their people were enabled to limit and eventually overthrow the ambition of Napoleon and to deliver Europe. The fleets of England ruled the seas, and her armies commanded the respect of friend and foe alike. At no time during that memorable struggle was her naval supremacy seriously endangered. Her population, some 16,000,000, was practically self-supporting, and her policy directed by an aristocracy. To-day, we are an overcrowded nation of some 45,000,000, and dependent on sources from overseas for our food supply, for our raw materials, for our trade, and for our staying power. Further, we are governed by a democracy, and in the modern democratic State, unless public opinion is gained and eventually organised into a national system of self-defence, that State invites attack by reason of its weakness. England is threatened with the fact that in any future great war she must meet on the battlefield the highly-trained troops of some hostile Power or group of Powers reinforced by their manhood compulsorily trained to arms.

Europe has long since acknowledged the situation. "Every imaginable preparation" for war is and has been taken by the statesmen who control her destinies. They realise the magnitude of the forces which will be engaged, and understand the vital necessity of preparation. For it may be said that the nation which is beaten in preparation, has already suffered defeat. England alone, controlled by some fatal blindness, and her people enveloped in a mist of apathy and indifference, declines to adopt this step of national service, heedless of Continental example, and the ominous tendencies of the age. The national habit of solely relying upon the Navy in time of danger hampers not only the adequate defence of these shores, but the protection of our indispensable trade routes. Should disaster overtake us, these islands are faced with certain famine and consequent internal disorder.

Unlike our position in the days of Napoleon, this country has developed into a purely industrial state. Our long immunity from invasion has engendered amongst us the comfortable delusion that war does not concern us either in theory or in practice. Therefore, we refuse to regard it, or the preparations for or against it, as an essential part of our national life and policy. We childishly place our trust in Treaties, Peace Conferences and International Courts of Arbitration. In Treaties that are only considered binding as long as the interests of both contracting parties remain the same. In Peace Conferences and International Courts of Arbitration that have proved the laughing stock of the world. Of what avail have been the Treaties of Paris and Berlin? All history is but a record of torn-up treaties and the subsequent vengeance visited on national unpreparedness and folly. Of what use are the amenities of Peace Conferences and Arbitration Courts to statesmen guided by the axiom of "Clausewitz," that great genius on policy and war, whose teaching forms the political atmosphere of the Continent of Europe that "War is only a continuation of State policy by other means." To discuss academic questions of "The burden of armaments," "the reduction of Naval and Military forces," and "the evils and horror of war," is but to kick vainly against the pricks, to refuse to look facts honestly in the face, and to display an ignorance of modern conditions. European statesmen will not tell us so, but they think so, and underneath the mask of pacific and friendly assurances, consider war an unalterable part of policy. But the people of Great Britain have become solicitous of the welfare of all races on earth, careless of their own. The safety and honour of our vast inheritance is of secondary importance to that of the pleasures and gratification of national ease and trade development.

"To a people," said Edmund Burke, "who have once been proud and great, and great because they were proud, a change in the national spirit is the most terrible of all revolutions." Has this change come to pass? Are the shocks of commercial warfare, the thrilling pursuit of gold, the only fields on which British brains and British grit are to excel? Is Napoleon's untimely gibe, "A Nation of Shopkeepers," to become at last literally true? The future alone holds the answer. G. M. S.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

THE early interruption in the proceedings of the Peace Conference at St. James's Palace need not cause any serious misgivings. It is, of course, out of the question that the Ottoman delegates could have been surprised in being called upon to meet the Greek delegates in common with the representatives of Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro, the signatory States to the armistice. Their decision, therefore, to obtain further instructions from Constantinople can only be viewed in the light of a diplomatic ruse aimed at securing one or more of three objects—(1) gaining time, (2) compelling Greece to cease military operations, and (3) creating at the outset an impression of intractability. As the Allies have taken a firm and united stand in upholding the competency of Greece to participate in the Conference, it is altogether inconceivable that Turkey should press a point which, compared with the larger question at issue, is of little importance. An early resumption of the proceedings, therefore, may be confidently expected. We have little doubt that the ultimate outcome will be the conclusion of an honourable peace.

That, however, the course of negotiations will run smooth is altogether too much to hope for. On the contrary, all the indications go to show that there will be not one but several interruptions in the proceedings, and that on the subject of the future ownership of Adrianople an early deadlock is bound to occur. When the inevitable moment comes for the Conference to reach the verge of a breakdown, then we may expect that Sir Edward Grey, the sentiments of whose well-chosen words on the opening day have been re-echoed throughout Europe, will not lose the opportunity of employing his powerful influence in the cause of peace. While the crises that will arise from time to time may cause deep anxiety, it should not be forgotten that both parties are compelled, by reason of the very nature of their task, to employ up to the last stern tactics in order that neither be suspected of an unwillingness to continue the struggle. Consequently, any concessions that may be necessary before an agreement is arrived at will be forthcoming only at the last moment, and, in all probability, after the persuasion of outside influence has smoothed the way for the party disposed to conciliation.

It is, indeed, in this case a foregone conclusion that the darkest hour will come before the dawn. Both sides have entered the Conference chamber feeling confident of the strength of their own position. In spite of rumours of division among the Allies, and their quarrels in the theatre of war itself, they have presented a united front. That circumstance is the most important factor in the proceedings, and must, to no small degree, have disconcerted the Ottoman representatives. In the light of subsequent events we cannot help reflecting that the non-adherence of Greece to the armistice, if not a calculated piece of strategy, cannot have proved altogether disagreeable to her friends. For the maintenance of the blockade of the Dardanelles and the activities generally of the Greek Navy interfere seriously with Turkish plans for the resumption of the war..

On the other hand, the military position of Turkey at the present moment is far from being hopeless. Adrianople, Scutari, and Janina still hold out, and the force occupying the Chatalja lines is admittedly a formidable one. Then, the military party in Constantinople is gaining the upper hand, so that the Government will find it difficult to accept the terms of the allies and at the same time prevent anarchy at home. Belief in the capacity of the Ottoman arms to recover the situation is based upon evident misconception. The idea that the Allies are disunited can no longer reasonably be entertained, and, were a continuance of the war unfortunately to be decided upon, the Turks would not alone have to face the battle-worn troops of Bulgaria, but also the comparatively fresh forces of her allies. It is nowhere denied that the Chatalja lines are capable of sustaining a prolonged resistance. But tactics purely defensive are bound in the lapse of time to be worn down, and in that case the last state of the Turks would become worse than the first. For even their best friends are not prepared to admit that they are in a position to take the offensive. After all, the faults of the Turkish army cannot be corrected within a few weeks: they are faults in fundamental organisation and training. Whatever progress, therefore, may have been made in assembling a large force at Chatalja, well equipped with food and munitions, a positive advantage lies with the other side. In all the circumstances the optimistic feeling prevalent that peace is within sight would appear to be justified. Meanwhile the Conference of Ambassadors has begun its deliberations at Downing Street, and in regard to the larger international situation, too, the outlook is distinctly hopeful. Austria-Hungary has wisely adopted a waiting policy, and the strain in her relations with Servia has been eased by the official announcement that Consul Prochaska, who represented his country at Prisrend, has not been imprisoned or even ill-treated. The storm in a tea-cup occasioned by the belief in Austria that he had been the victim of Servian violence having subsided, a settlement of the larger question arising out of the war is anticipated. That Servia will gain some form of outlet on the Adriatic, under conditions not incompatible with Austria's interests, would now appear to be certain.

MOTORING

A GRATIFYING feature of the International Motor Exhibition now being held in Paris—the largest ever held under any one roof—is the conspicuous part being played in it by British manufacturers. Altogether, there are no fewer than thirty-four separate exhibits of British productions on view in the Grand Palais, seven or eight of them representing a selection of our best-known cars, and the remainder accessories, tyres, etc., of British make. It is particularly interesting to observe, moreover, that many of the foreign car

THE TEST OF SKILL

All the essential qualities of a successful swordsman are required for success in tyre making—long training, fine judgment, exact calculations. All of them are expressed in THE VICTOR TYRE, together with that special knowledge of tyre ingredients, tyre stresses and how to meet them, which sound construction demands.

In the Victor, tyre science and craftsmanship have combined to make it indubitably the best cover on the market. Guaranteed in legal bond for 4,000 miles in its all rubber varieties. The Steel Studded Non-skid won the first round of the tyre trial easily with 5,010 miles. Special sporting discounts during the remainder of the Tyre Trial. American sizes stocked.

TYRE TRIAL Second (grooved) round. DUNLOP WON. Last week Victor was announced as fighting it out with Dunlop, having beaten Continental and Michelin. The Test Supervisor subsequently reported that, although Continental collapsed first, Victor and Dunlop had a day's running to make up. An accident, which partially wrecked the Trial car put Victor out before it had made up arrears. Through that accident Victor only succeeded, in the second round, in beating Michelin. It just lost to Continental. Dunlop won.

manufacturers are using goods of British patternl, notably in the matter of tyres and detachable wire wheels. Either singly or in conjunction, Dunlop tyres and wheels are exhibited by quite forty of the Continental makers, including such prominent firms as Bollee, Brazier, Charron, Clement-Bayard, Gobron, Panhard and Levassor, Renault, Rothschild, Minerva, Delaunay-Belleville, Sizaire and Naudin, Lorraine-Dietrich, and Unic. This is a great compliment to the famous British tyre company, as it is quite certain that the French makers are sufficiently patriotic to choose home-made goods when other things are equal. President Fallières, during his tour of inspection of the Salon, showed especial interest in the grooves in the most popular Dunlop pattern, and was very desirous of knowing what function they fulfilled. He listened with great attentiveness to the explanation that they provided a very valuable safeguard against skidding, the ribs and channels in the tread giving a definite grip on the road surface, and that they rendered the steering and control of the car much easier than is the case with the flat or smooth treads.

Writing of Dunlops is a reminder that they have won the second round of the tyre test which has been in progress during the last two or three months. The section just concluded is that dealing with the grooved rubber types, and Dunlops have come out first with a total mileage of 3,307. Continentals are second with 3,272 miles, Victors third with 3,130, and Michelins last with 1,215 miles only. It will be remembered that the first "round" was a test of steel-studded non-skids, and that the Victor won with the remarkably good mileage of 5,010. Dunlops were second with 4,767 miles, Continentals third with 4,261 miles, and Michelins fourth with 3,799 miles. Honours, therefore, so far, now that two-thirds of the trial are over, rest with Dunlops and Victors. The last section of the test, that of the plain rubber types, has already begun, and the result will determine which of these two makes has shown the best all-round performance in the fairest and most thorough competitive trial of tyres ever conducted.

Owners and prospective owners of cycle-cars will be interested to learn that the Automobile Association and Motor Union has succeeded in obtaining important reductions in the rates of transport of this type of vehicle on the London-Bordeaux service of the General Steam Navigation Company. Hitherto the minimum rate (£4 12s.) has been charged on all motor vehicles weighing under 10 cwt., but in future there is to be a graduated scale of charges, as follows:—up to 6 cwt, £1 15s.; 6 to 8 cwt., £2 15s.; 8 to 10 cwt., £4 1s.; 10 to 15 cwt., £4 12s. To members of the Association still lower rates are to be charged. It is anticipated that these substantial reductions will greatly increase the popularity of this route for the owner of the smaller type of motor vehicle.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the driver and occupants of the car which knocked down and killed a woman near Hammersmith Bridge the other evening will be traced and receive a punishment commensurate with the dastardly and brutal nature of the offence. The immediate extinction of the electric lights after the accident, for the obvious purpose of preventing the identification of the car, is one of the most disquieting features of the affair, as, of course, a similar method of throwing justice off the scent could be adopted by the driver of any other car equipped with an electrical outfit. From the public point of view this possibility of evading identification constitutes a serious drawback to what is undoubtedly the best all-round method of car illumination. The case in question is one which should be vigorously taken up and investigated by the motoring organisations in their own interests, as nothing could be more calculated to revive and intensify the gradually disappearing prejudice against the car than the permitting of such callousness to be lightly passed over. It is satisfactory to note that the motor Press is fully alive to the importance of bringing the culprits to justice, the Motor describing the case as "the worst on record in the annals of motoring."

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE great financiers to-day—like the robber barons of the Middle Ages—make raids, sometimes upon each other, but more often upon the poor and defenceless. They often hunt in combines. For some weeks past we have been watching a great concerted raid upon those who have bought what they cannot pay for. But the obvious taunt comes quickly: Why subject yourself to such raids? Why not pay for your stock? I do not think that we can expect to change our natures. We are greedy and vain. We think we know more than the financier. We wish to be as rich as he is, or appears to be. We never can know more than the man whose whole life has been spent in amassing wealth, who sacrifices the whole of his pleasures to attain one end—money; who is abstemious, cold and cruel; who lives for money alone. That man gets there all the time. These days of semi-panic are his days of harvest. When all is happy he lends his money freely—and cheaply. He urges you to buy. He makes it as easy as possible. But when, lured on by the hope of wealth, and the apparent ease with which it is secured, you go on buying and go on borrowing, the financier suddenly changes his tune. He invents some pretext—gets up some small war. Money grows dear. Loans are withdrawn. The weaker people go under. The slump increases. Richer people go under. And the slump goes on until everybody has been squeezed out of every stock on which they have borrowed any money. We are now watching such a raiding of the poor borrower as we have not seen for many a long day. Not since the famous Morocco scare. It is not over yet, and will not end until all the "bulls" are destroyed. I do not say that the great financiers got up the Balkan war. But I do say that they will come out of it with huge fortunes.

The promoter lies low till the storm has blown over. One or two small Canadian towns have braved the storm. They must have money and they now offer five per cent., which in some cases appears attractive. But there has been too much borrowing by small Canadian towns, and when the slump comes values will fall still lower than they have fallen already. Each time a town comes into the market it has to pay higher interest. Tillings is an old-established business, and it is offering us some debentures which look attractive to those who speculate in high-yielding risks.

MONEY will not grow any cheaper this side of the New Year. When Austria, a Great Power, cannot borrow a few millions under 6½ per cent. we can hardly expect cheap money. The French banks have definitely refused to discount the American bills which were to provide the necessary cash. But London and Amsterdam will finance the deal through. The original loan was secured by the Hamburg agents of Kuhn Loeb, and they offered it by cable to their New York house, who jumped at it, and now probably feel sorry that they did. Both Berlin and Vienna are in a tight place, and if they attempt to get gold from here our Bank Rate must be put up. I do not think they will. I do not believe our rate will rise now, unless, of course, the political position alters for the worse in the next few days. This seems improbable.

FOREIGNERS.—The money squeeze is dangerous because of the huge "bull" account that exists in Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg. But it does not affect International Government Bonds. Tintos would seem to be over-sold. But they are the gambling counter in Paris, and every speculator in Paris sells Rios just as here they used to sell Consols. We may expect a sharp reaction in the New Year.

HOME RAILS have been dull, but the price holds fairly well, for the traffics are remarkable, and everybody appears willing to believe in higher dividends all next year. The North-Eastern has got over its trouble. The Government Bill for the advance in freight rates will be passed, and at the moment people with money are buying quietly all our leading railway stocks. They are wise, for they will be able to unload in the spring at a considerable profit.

YANKEES have slumped very badly indeed. The "bears" made a big attack on Unions. Kuhn Loeb, who always support this stock, appear to have been too busy financing Austria to take any heed. Perhaps they were not sorry to see the "bears" selling so vigorously. Perhaps they thought it wise to wait. At any rate they made no signs. However, I think the fall has come to an end. At 161 Union are a splendid investment. The nonsense talked about the decision is not worth arguing over. Terror-stricken "bulls" and keen persistent "bears" have vied with each other in the invention of foolish tales. Union Pacific is one of the best railway investments in the United States, and those who buy to-day will make money. But Steels are to be attacked by the new Democrats, and the tariff will be altered. The Trust will be dissolved, and I do not see a good future here. The company can hardly hope to emulate the Standard Oil and actually improve its quotation after the dissolution. The oil trade has built up a marvellous organisation which can never be destroyed. The steel trade changes from year to year.

RUBBER shares do not respond to manipulation. The plain truth is they are all high enough. But as many people want to buy a few rubber shares I again say that Pataling and Cicely are the best. They are doing well. Kuala Selangor has been much boomed. Next year they solemnly swear they will pay 200 per cent. I hope they will. The 2s. share is now 26s., so that if we get 4s. dividend the yield will be attractive. The dividend this year will be 3s. Kuala Lumpur and Edinburgh are also good.

OIL.—The Ural meeting did not do much for the market. The fact is this company has been much disappointed in its land. The area is huge, but the costs will be high. The Russian report will soon be out, but I do not hope for very much. Oil does not pay most companies. Spies' half-yearly report shows that profits have been maintained and that we may expect as good a dividend this year as last. The trouble has been that the Western Plots have failed owing to water troubles. The production does not increase though the price of oil is now 40 copecks, and the company must be agonised to see such a fabulous price and not be able to gather the golden harvest. It is strange that not one of the companies now on the English market can increase its production. I hear bad news of the British Burmah. They say that the report will be very bad. It is a hopeless concern.

MINES.—The Ferreira Deep figures are not good. This company has taken Ferreira over to oblige Wernher Beit and Co., but it has gained nothing by so doing. The shares should be sold. The event of the week has been the Oceana meeting, at which Scott Lings came out triumphant over Conybeare. He was well backed by Herbert Smith, one of the ablest men in the City. I was sorry for Conybeare, who had a good case and muddled it. Herbert Smith admitted that the Bend Co. was Oceana under another name, and that the acts of the directors had been ultra vires. But what carried the meeting was the complete vindication of the acts of the Board in regard to the Piccadilly Hotel. Here they made no mistakes but ran dead straight. The underwriting still remains semi-opaque, the Zed a deep darkness into which no one penetrated. May be there was nothing to discover.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Marconi circular was like most of their circulars—unconvincing. The Telephone market has been depressed by a "bear" raid and mad "bulls" selling. I hear that the verdict will be more favourable than people imagine. The British American Tobacco report was good as far as figures went, but bad as regards dividend. The Prefs. are, however, worth holding. The Orient report was excellent. This splendid line is doing well.

CORRESPONDENCE

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—Perhaps the time is not far distant when anybody who pretends that William Shakespeare wrote "Hamlet," "Lear," and "Macbeth" will be classified among the illiterate. But, en attendant, there are some points which those who will dwell in darkness would like to see elucidated. First of all, we should like to know how Shakespeare can be stamped as a swindler without accusing Ben Jonson, George Peele, Robert Greene, Drayton, Nash, Ned Alleyne—to say nothing of other contemporaries of the Stratford bard—of being accessory to Bacon's deceit. We all love old Ben, and would not like to think that he had been bribed by the great Chancellor to write the noble panegyric on his friend's death. But we must either look upon all these men as cheats, or else as people incapable of distinguishing between a genius and an idiot. Tertium non datur. It appears that at the Windmill, in St. George's Fields, Shakespeare, Marlow, Ben Jonson, Alleyne, Drayton, and Peele used to meet to "smoke their pipes—and quaff their 'canary.'" The famous Globe Tavern is mentioned by George Peele in the following letter:—

"Friend Marle,—I must desyr that my syster, hyr watch, and the cookerie booke you promised may be sent by the man. I never longed for thy company more than last night. We were all very merrye at the Globe, when Ned Alleyne did not scruple to affirm pleasauntely to thy friend Will that he had stolen his speech about the qualityes of an actor's excellencye in 'Hamlet,' hys tragedye, from conversations manyfold whych passed between them, and opynions given by Alleyne touching the subject. Shakespeare did not take this talk in good sorte, but Jonson put an end to the stryfe by wittylye remarking: 'This affaire needeth no contentione; you stole it from Ned, no doubt: do not marvel: have you not seen him act tymes out of number?'—Believe me, etc., G. PEELE."

Now, how do the Baconians explain away this contemporary testimony as to Shakespeare being Shakespeare? If the author of the "Novum Organum" accepted bribes himself, it is no reason why he should bribe others in order that things might be concealed which, had they become known, could not but have added to his fame.—Yours faithfully,

LOUIS XVII AND OTHER PAPERS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Your reviewer, on the question of Louis XVII, puts the case from the Orleanist point of view in a most convincing manner. While writing the biography of Spencer Perceval I came upon material connected with the evasion, notably the letter of Mr. Atkins, 1807, and Queen Caroline's letter of 1814. None of the French authorities quoted by "Le Petit Homme Rouge" refer to inconvenient evidence of this kind. He omits to explain why the Dutch Government accepted Naundorff as Louis XVII, and avoids reference to such details as the advocacy of Jules Favre, and the Berlin passport.

He overlooks the support of St. Hilaire, Morel de St. Didier, the Duc de Berri, the Comtesse de Forbin-Janson, the Percevals, and many others, who befriended Naundorff.

Werg's identity with the case is much on a par with the mysterious Jew fished up by Anatole France, which the latter asserted to be Naundorff, born in what France described as Postdam (sic). I feel more inclined to rely on contemporary evidence connected with Louis XVII than the suppositions of modern journalists, and the theories of M. Turquand—whom, by the way, your reviewer omits to mention in his formidable list of the opponents of Naundorff of the up-to-date type. Yours obediently, PHILIP TREHERNE.

"TACITÆ" AND "SILENTIA" IN ÆNEID II, 255.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Once more I am obliged to differ from Mr. Dodgson. I do not agree that the "extulerat" clause precedes in sense the "ibat" clause, and I have Conington on my side. Let me cite his note, or parts of it: "'Extulerat' is rightly understood by Forb of instantaneous action. . . To understand the words to mean 'after the signal for moving had been given to the fleet,' which is the view of most other commentators, would require, I think, according to the usage of Vergil, 'postquam' or 'ut extulerat.'" Mr. A. J. Butler, of Brasenose, clearly following this view, in my hearing translated the words thus: "And already the fleet was on its way from Tenedos, when the royal vessal suddenly shot forth the signal flame." Now, if Mr. Dodgson remains unconvinced, I have nothing more to say, except to apologise to your readers for the technicalities of this note. I am content to err—if I err—with Conington and Mr. Butler. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Farnham, Dec. 14. H. C. MINCHIN.

RELATIVES AND INTERROGATIVES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The extracts quoted by Mr. Adolphe Bernon form a very interesting analysis of the syntactical use of the relative and interrogative pronouns in English. My question, however, was of a more general character than this, and was concerned with the underlying logical connection which may be supposed to exist between these two classes of pronouns in any language.

That there is a relationship may, I think, be illustrated thus:—

Interrogative (direct): "What" do you want?
Interrogative (indirect): Tell me "what" you want.
Relative: Tell me that "which" you want.

So again:—

Interrogative (direct): "Who" are you?
Interrogative (indirect): Tell me "who" you are.
Relative: Describe to me the individual "who" [you say] you are.

The use of the demonstrative "that" as a relative is not the least of the peculiarities which complicate our simple English grammar.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

QUIS.

SIR HENRY HOWORTH'S CONSTITUENCY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—A Liberal contemporary, in a recent issue, speaks of Sir Henry Howorth as "one of the most distinguished members of the House of Commons that Manchester has sent to Parliament." That is, however, not correct, as Sir Henry Howorth never was member for a Manchester constituency, but represented South Salford as a Unionist from 1886 to 1900.—Yours very faithfully,

Notes of the Week

AS we go to press, early in the Christmas week, it seems certain that the year will not close under very pleasant international or political conditions. The conference of the peace delegates at St. James's Palace is at the moment disagreed upon the question of Adrianople, and it is a disagreement so complete that it is difficult to foresee what will happen. In our own affairs, fresh evidence as to the haste with which the National Insurance Act was passed comes from the decision of an overwhelming majority of the medical men of this country to decline service under it; even a motion "to accept service under protest for a trial three months" was completely defeated at Saturday's debate. This means, if we mistake not, more trouble for an already harassed Government which does not seem to realise that hurriedly constructed political fireworks are liable to explode prematurely and injure everybody concerned. In the East End of London the sudden closing down of the Thames Ironworks will lessen considerably the merriment natural to the week, notwithstanding the optimistic postscript of Mr. Arnold Hills. An asset on the brighter side is that we are fairly free at present from labour troubles, and trade in general appears to be good.

We thought that before long some misguided enthusiast would attack the Christmas dinner as an institution, and here comes a doctor, with eleven letters after his name, to tell us in the columns of a contemporary that the feast is "wrong ethically, bad morally, wasteful economically, and enervating physiologically." His arguments we have not space to refute; but if we had, it would hardly be worth while. We are free to admit that the Englishman has a partiality, a failing, it may be, in the direction of banquets; he distinguishes a scientist or an explorer by giving him an expensive dinner; he bids good-bye to a friend over a farewell supper; in fact, he celebrates most important events by calling the chef to his aid. But, in spite of all the doctors and theorisers in the universe, he will undoubtedly never give up the annual occasion when in festive union he and his friends can meet and discuss roast beef and plum pudding. It would be asking too much—even if there were a tax upon each dish, as there probably will be soon.

The choice seems to be more limited every year as to the particular books most suitable, for the season, to the grown-up people. There is, of course, an annual overdose of magazines and Christmas numbers which begin to appear in October and in a few years' time may spread from Midsummer Day to December; but not many of us could stand the strain of two or three days at these rainbow-coloured special issues. No one seems to write Christmas books now, except for boys and girls; the gap is filled by that peculiarly modern product known as the "gift-book," in which some old and well-tried poem or tale is cut up into sections, printed in beautiful type on art paper, and illustrated gorgeously—though not always appropriately—by artists good, bad, and indifferent. This comparatively new industry seems to flourish exceedingly; and we often wonder what becomes of the thousands of these expensive volumes that flood the market each winter. If, as the legend goes, a copy of every book published has to be stored at the British Museum, small wonder that there is talk of extending the boundaries of that national treasure-house. We feel sorry for the inquirer of the distant future who, writing a history of the Christmas Literature of the Ancient English, has to summarise in a chapter or two the question of the gift-book.

Berlin will soon be a model city—the "forbidden" city in a new sense of the word. After April 13 next, if you are having a little music in your house, flat, or restaurant, the windows must be closed; "whistling, singing, shouting, or loud talking" that may endanger the quiet of the streets will be "verboten"; waggoners must not drive in a way to cause "nerve-shattering noises"; no paper, cigar-ends or cigarette-ends, or fruit must be thrown into the streets; and ladies' dresses must not drag the ground lest germ-laden dust be raised. Life is worth living in London; after April 13 we doubt if it will be worth living in Berlin!

Violets

WITH hope, upon the last sad day
  Of this departing year,
We come from one who, on life's weary way,
  Still holds you dear:

Who, though your heart with grief be torn,
  Would bid your faith arise
And meet the young days of the year new-born,
  With steadfast eyes.

And we, frail creatures of the sun,
  Who linger at your feet,
Offer, as incense to the year just done,
  Our perfume sweet.

Though we, alas! must pass and die,
  Meanwhile to you we bring
Token of deathless love; and, by and by,
  Promise of Spring.

BERTHA HARRISON.

A Christmas Assembly

By WILFRID L. RANDELL.

THERE are some who say that the spirit of Christmas jollity is dying. If you refer them to the good-humoured throngs, laden with packages, in the streets, to the laughing children and the happy faces, they reply that Christmas has become a commercial institution, and assert that the business man looks upon it from the point of view of a more or less plethoric pocket; also, that romance in this connection is dead. Here, then, for their benefit and better education, is a brief account of what happened last Wednesday evening, in London, the city of gloom, where, according to the dismal ones, the spirit of Christmas is forgotten:—

At a quarter to six, forty business men of not particularly romantic appearance assembled in the upper room of a certain hostelry of Fleet Street, associated for as long as it stands with the name of Dr. Johnson. For a while they conversed on many topics; by the earnestness of their mien, and by the way in which they eagerly consulted little books which each one placed on the wooden table in front of him, a stranger might have imagined that they were intent on deeds that should shake the Stock Exchange to its foundations and echo in the bourses of the civilised world, and that the mysterious volumes contained calculations of crops or details of finance of tremendous import. He would be, however, utterly wrong. They were gathered together to read "A Christmas Carol" through, from beginning to end. Think of that, and retire dumb-foundered, you who would so lightly cut the golden chains of Romance!

Precisely at six o'clock the tinkle of a silvery bell, facetiously named "Big Ben," announced that the President of the Assembly was in his chair of office at the cross-table. The buzz of talk died down as by magic; every member of the company opened his little book. The President, a gentleman eighty-five years young rather than old, drew in silence a number from a bag, and called the name corresponding to that number. A voice began to read the finest ghost-story in the world:

> "Marley was dead, to begin with. There is no doubt whatever about that. The register of his burial was signed by the clergyman, the clerk, the undertaker, and the chief mourner. Scrooge signed it. And Scrooge's name was good upon 'Change for anything he chose to put his hand to. . . . ."

After a few minutes, the tiny bell sounded. The reader's voice ceased; another number was drawn, another name was called, and fresh tones took up the tale.

So, amid a hush that was only emphasised at intervals by the furtive striking of a match, amid wreathing smoke that ascended like incense to the smiling Spirit of Christmas that we felt could not be far away, we read in turn of the poor lean clerk, Bob Cratchit, in his lonely, cold "tank" of an office; of the awful door-knocker that changed to Marley's face; of the Ghost of Christmas Past that led the miserable miser through the scenes of his childhood; of the Ghost of Christmas Present that took him to the famous party at the Cratchit's; of the Ghost of Christmas Yet to Come that showed him Tiny Tim, and the "shadows of the things that may be," and his own tombstone. We read of Mr. Fezziwig's ball, laughing as we read; of the riotous joys of the brilliant shops, chuckling with reflected merriment; of Scrooge's nephew's friend's wicked game of blind man's buff, when he couldn't catch anybody but the plump sister (who said it wasn't fair); and of a hundred other things. And at the conclusion of each stave—for this was part of the ritual of the notable occasion — we all shouted "Hear, hear!" as loud as we could; and after the announcement of the last stave — which, as you may remember, is entitled "The End of It"—we roared "Hear, hear!" more heartily than ever; not, of course, because the time for the appearance of the Great Pudding was drawing near, but simply because we were thoroughly enjoying ourselves.

It would be impossible to tell in detail of how that monster of a pudding—a corpulent sphere that a whole waiter could hardly stagger upstairs with—was treated at nine o'clock. I am not ashamed to say that some of us had two helpings; nor am I ashamed to state that we became quite lively—considering that most of us were solid, unromantic business men—when the ale and the cider and—and the other things, came up. We stood in silence and honoured the memory of Charles Dickens with a toast; we toasted also the genial President, who for many years has thus gathered his friends round him to read "A Christmas Carol." And then, at the most respectable hour of eleven, we went homeward, only desiring to meet the misanthrope who should say that the spirit of Christmas is dead. He would have been assured, in no gentle fashion, that it still lived.

Kate's Fall

By EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

AMONG those minor sanctuaries which the remorseless antiquary has robbed of their legends, there is one that may still preserve rank and continue worthy of pilgrimage for itself, albeit the story that belonged thereto is credited no more.

From north-eastern Dartmoor descends the little Lyd, and at a great slope of the land, where men once sank a mine, the river has carved a steep and winding stair upon the face of a cliff, and worms circuitously down near fifty feet from her bed above to her channels below. The solid rock she threads until, grown impatient of burrowing, she flings herself out in a great cascade, and leaps to the bottom of the precipice in one shining, thundering fall. She boils and bubbles in the hollow beneath for a while, then, with recovered temper, by stickle and hover and shadowed pool, glides on her way. When Lyd runs low in summer, the waterfall frays out fine as a woman's hair, and descends with a gentle purr into the hollowed cup of marble beneath; but in winter, or at time of freshet, she pours down in one pillar of whiteness, chased with silver light and scored with dim green hollows in her front of foam.

From these ever-falling waters a vapour lifts, now in clouds of spray, to make a home for the rainbow, now in fine, invisible moisture, that kisses the rocks to life and drapes them with close, cunning tapestries, that hang with velvety colours in the gloom, or shine out on weathered crag and scarp of the little cliffs. Here the sun reaches them as well as the water, to set the orange and silver glittering, to light the black and umber lichens and trace those subtle patterns that wake to life where moisture plays on stone.

Each nook and cranny about Kate's Fall holds a fern springing from the bright cushions of the moss; thorn and furze cling to the steep banks and ivy festoons the ridge of the rocks in a waving curtain. Here also cling oak saplings and the holly, while crowning the heights above this cleft of the river's cutting, stand grey ash and beech. They break the middle distance finely and lead to the dim purple of the Moor that towers beyond.

At close quarters the ears are stunned by the shout of the fall, and one may mark dark pockets and cavities rammed into the stone by the river. There is cause for astonishment here, not at these deep carvings, but at the eternal rocks that have suffered so little and possessed power to resist the torrent through so many centuries. The impact of this weight of waters is terrific, and the solid earth around throbs to the steady and ceaseless thunder of it.

Westward the river winds away with many a silvery curve, and the banks fall until they widen into green fields on either bank. Then a grove swallows little Lyd and she vanishes beneath great woods aglow with autumn fire.

Light breaks fitfully from cloudy skies, and aloft, far away above the river's cradle under Great Links, great darkness frets with storm the blue and silver; but though sunshine fleets but wanly upon the heights, to be swiftly swallowed again by the rolling fleeces of the rain, here in the river valley the gleam is warm; the woods are aflame, and dead foliage flashes brilliantly about the fall. Russet, deep auburn, pale gold, the leaves flood the coombe with colour, and a thousand streaks and splashes of reflected glory from the banks gleam on the river's face, tremble over the darkness of the deep water, fade away into the cold foam-light beneath the fall. The final pageant fires birch and beech, red oak and yellow hazel; but the leaves of the ash have all flown away, though on its grey boughs, clinging to the twigs, there hang great clusters of brown keys to help the colour song.

Here tradition told of aged Kit, whose name was turned to Kitty and then to Kate. Riding home in the moonlight, her horse slipped above the fall, and was carried off his legs by the river with his mistress on his back. Both would have been swept to death, but that the "crooks" which supported the panniers were too wide to pass through the cleft in the rocks. Here, therefore, woman and beast hung suspended all night —to be rescued more dead than alive on the following day.

But the drab truth tells another tale, because this is all a fiction to explain the name. For "Kit," we must read "Skit"—a word denoting the upper waters of a stream. "Skit Steps," was the name of a crossing below the fall, and "Skit" the name of a bridge above it. But there came the romancer to the river side; successfully turned "Skit Steps" to "Kate's Fall," and appropriated these facts to his own needs very pleasantly. Then comes the antiquary to discover and destroy our myth and bid us mourn no more for the predicament of ancient Kate and her steed. So poor poetry is harried from pillar to post, until presently she will be called to abandon the sleeping past altogether, and find her account only in the wide-awake present.

Yet one still remembers that aphorism of Nietzsche: "Art is with us that we shall not perish from truth."

Pipe Dreams

GREEN hills of spruce dipped steeply on the other side of the river right down to the expanse of the blue water that flowed on westward to a world of tender hues. For it was evening, and the west glowed like a wonderful orient rose that had fallen down from the parrot-blue dome of the sky. The tranquillity of a dream seemed to soothe these Canadian backwoods and the Lac la Cloche river preparatory to the brief summer night. There were four of them—the engineer, the draughtsman, their bespectacled aid, and the guide. They had paddled long to make the portage—long, bright, blue hours of a summer day, that seemed to have no end. At last, as the day waned, they had gained it, and clambered up the rocky bank, lichened and blotched with mossy cushions, to a little clearance, where the rare white man came to boil his kettle and sleep beneath a lonely gaunt pine. On the morrow, with shoulder-broadening toil, they would push on over the portage trail to the headwaters.

But now the tent was stretched and they had fed. A thin spiral of lavender smoke gyrated up from the whitening embers of the fire into the delicate, dark, blue air. There was the woodland fragrance of their balsam beds abroad in the twilight presaging the sweet gipsy sleep under the stars. Wadding their pipes with native plug tobacco, they gratefully sat themselves, impervious to mosquitoes, on the glaciated granite slope of the bank. The water's surface, Baltique blue, stole unrippled by and the foliage hung without a tremour. Once a bull frog uttered his guttural ululation. The night lay around them sultry, tepid, and moist, like human breath. The dark blue sky, the emerald verdure and the fading rose of the west entranced them. In the stillness there came booming out over the land the call of the bull moose, embodying, it seemed, the cry of life for happiness. Then the silence closed the more intense around them. But the spectacled one with his usual inanity broke its silver spell.

"Supposing you fellows could get whatever you wanted now, what would you choose?"

Then each spoke after his desire.

"I would like to have a brush and paint it all," said the draughtsman, who, after his kind, was at heart a dauber. "I dream sometimes of colour—flakes and blotches and iridescent colour. I shall never forget the chunks of vermilion and Chinese white one sees in apple blossom in spring, with the shrill green leaves, and the sky faded cobalt washed with gold. . . . I remember the crimson coral of a woman's mouth I loved long ago, and the violet day-dream in her eyes; the vaporous sails of a fishing smack one night across a moonlit harbour; the veil of a mist on a low, flat land of poplars with white ribboned roads; the purple of a moor with the sun sinking in amber and topaz like a crushed jewel. Yes, I remember them. No, I see them, that's it. But I'd be just as content here as anywhere, if only I had a stick-up, knife and brush, and no one made me do anything else, to feed and clothe me, but paint what I see. That's what I should like most."

And the guide spoke. "A sunset always makes me think of fights—hitting a man on the jaw. Everything seems about this time to reek of blood. It makes me long for a great big fight with someone I've never seen but whom I've always hated—for a fight wilder than a boxing match or breaking the heart of a bucking mare, or landing a fish twice your weight, or holding a bull by the horns. I want sometime to find a great fight—to hit out hard and go on fighting, while the sun goes down for the last time."

With his pipe in his teeth the tall engineer spoke.

"I've only been once to Paris. I was swotting then for Woolwich, and went there for a week to get an accent. But by all that's great I'd like to go there again. I'd like to sit out, once more, on an evening such as this, on the Boulevards. It would be good to watch the people stream by—the happiest, daintiest crowd in all the world. Oh, it's like a river—a river of humanity—drinking, chatting, and laughing. Here on the pavement are set the little tables of the cafés with their boxes of sheltering green. Groups and couples sit before the bottles and glasses they hardly ever trouble about. Then the cabs and taxis flit by, like those fire-flies over there, in a fiery ballet of red, blue, and green lights. Then the women—pipe-dreams, perfumed poems, painted pictures, alive, walking, smiling, turning to look at you. Talk about homesickness. I've got Paris sickness—the nostalgia for civilisation, and I've got it bad."

Then the myopic one spoke.

"Of course you know the thing I would like best of all would be to be able to see like you fellows without these blamed glasses. After that I would like to have a little place, a cottage, you know, down on the Dart at home in the old country. How green that valley is! I can see now its woods right down to the water's edge. I think it must be the greenest place in all the world. And there'd have to be a boat to tie up by your door. I know the very place—somewhere near Dittisham, and there's a regular old-fashioned rumbling mill not far away. It has a garden, too, full of Devonshire strawberries and Christmas roses, and a passion flower on the trellised porch. Sometimes among the flowers there I've smelt the tang of the sea away down the valley. Yes, if I had that I think I'd be content. And then I could have some books."

"What books?" said the engineer.

"Oh, not the books you'd like," the spectacled one returned mildly in self-defence. "Just a few books for my own amusement. I think I'd choose," he continued meditatively, "a Spanish novel I once read, a play or two of Schnitzler, a little sheaf of the stories of Eça Quieroz and Marcel Schwob, Joubert's Pensées, Catullus and Wharton's Sappho. My! what a book that is! I got it at school as a prize, and I sometimes dream of its Greek fount. Yes, that, I think, would be all—if there were bees in summer and apples in the autumn."

A deep silence fell on them.

Then someone knocked his pipe's ashes out on his heel and yawned. It was the signal they had anxiously awaited, for a shame had come on them; a feeling that they had permitted the caprice of their thought to unveil profanely the treasures of their heart's desire. The camp fire still glowed as they stretched out on their balsam boughs—the softest and sweetest of God's beds. The opalescent rose of the west had long grown dun, the river and its banks and the lone pine itself spectral. They felt themselves passing out from the world on the sea of sleep, while a stirring white-throat's reedy note startled a distant loon into a burst of wild discordant laughter. And then, full of stealth, the darkness and stillness mixed together—and all was gone.

REVIEWS

Check from the Bishop

BY SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

Landmarks in the History of the Welsh Church. By the Right Rev. A. G. EDWARDS, Bishop of St. Asaph. (John Murray. 6s. net.)

THIS notable book by the Bishop of St. Asaph would have been at any time a valuable and interesting contribution to British ecclesiastical history; its value in the present crisis to all who are concerned for the safety of the Welsh Church, and for all who honestly seek to judge with fairness between her and her assailants, is incalculable. The Bishop's plan has been to give a clear outline of the history of the Church in Wales from the earliest days, showing plainly her position in relation to revenues, though this is not his main theme; and he has at all points supported his statements by evidence that cannot be gainsaid, yet has nowhere overloaded his pages or made his work such that only an archæologist can appreciate it. It is a lucid, moderate, fully supported presentation of the case, and, though full of the results of painstaking research, it is eminently a book for the reader who can intelligently appreciate facts, but cannot follow intricacies as an antiquary.

The Bishop first discusses the dawn of Christianity in Britain, and reminds us that Tertullian, writing in 208 or 210 A.D., said: "There were places of the Britons unapproached by the Romans, but subdued to Christ." In the year 314 the British Church was represented at the Council or Synod of Arles by three bishops, one presbyter, and one deacon. The Saxon invasion of England overthrew the already venerable organisation of the British Church, but the British victory at Badon Hill about the year 510 checked the advance of our piratical ancestors, and "there was a truce of nearly half a century, during which the hunted remains of the British people and the British Church found their main shelter in the fastnesses of Wales." The next "landmark" is the sharp contention between St. Augustine and the representatives of the Church which had an unbroken tradition in Britain. Pope Gregory had written to the founder of Christianity among the Saxons, "I commend to your brotherly feeling all the bishops of Britain," and in 602 or 603, at Down Ampney, near Cricklade, St. Augustine met some of these bishops. They, "doubtless feeling that they represented only a section of the British Church, agreed to a second and more representative conference." When it took place, "Augustine pressed three points, and, according to Bede, only three—namely, the time of keeping Easter, the mode of administering baptism, and the evangelising of the Saxons. Bede gives the answer of the British in these words: 'We will do none of these things, nor receive you as our archbishop.'" The British Church was not of papal institution, and it asserted its independence more than thirteen hundred years ago.

"There is ample evidence," says the author, "both implicit and documentary, that the early British Church was well endowed; in a large number of cases the actual terms of the endowment and the detailed description of the boundaries of the land granted, are extant. A fact yet more striking confirms the title of the Church to her ancient possessions: early documents, whose authenticity is accepted by the highest authorities, record the original bestowal upon the Church of many of the lands which she holds to-day, and has held without interruption since the sixth or seventh century. These grants may be classed roughly under the two heads of land and tithe." The Bishop quotes, and in this connection makes a strong point against two of the main arguments of the advocates of Disendowment.

> The instances adduced cannot fail to convince impartial inquirers that the Church in Wales has as strong a prescriptive right to her endowments, if not stronger, than the Church in England. Two other facts need special emphasis. One is that a careful study of the records shows that the Church in Wales received her endowments either before the papalisation or after the depapalisation of the Church. This disposes of the argument that her ecclesiastical lands and revenues were originally granted to the Church of Rome. The other is that, grants were invariably made either by individuals or by chieftains acting on behalf of family groups, and were bestowed in most cases on particular churches. This is an effectual answer to the statement that the Church received her endowments from the State.

The Bishop deals in a scholarly, but never in a ponderous manner with the vexed question of tithe in Wales. He enlightens us as to the decima magna and the decimae minutae, and a summary of his conclusions may be found in the following sentences: "We have seen that tithe was in the first instance enjoined as a duty by a struggling Church, and given sporadically by the pious. Later, in places where the Church had grown powerful, it was yielded under the compelling power of public opinion, or even under more forcible constraint; and thus there grew up a custom which, in course of time, found its way into the breasts of the judges, where the Common Law of England is said to reside."

Dr. Edwards deals forcibly with the argument that the present established Church is the creation of the polygamous Tudor monarch. "Nothing can really be further from the truth. What Henry VIII actually did was to reassert and maintain successfully the independence of the Church of England and Wales against unwarrantable Papal claims of supremacy." But the Reformation was not an unmixed boon to the Church. The impropriation of ecclesiastical possessions impoverished the clergy, and here the Bishop of St. Asaph opens a notable contention, which he ably maintains in his succeeding chapters, that not endowment and superfluity of means, but the curtailment of revenues and lack of resources were the cause of the ills that beset the Welsh Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The later history of the Church shows, argues the Bishop, that the spoliation in which Henry VIII. led the way was renewed in the time of the Commonwealth "with rapacity stimulated by the added goad of sectarian fanaticism," and with the most disastrous results. Yet the source of all that is best in modern religious life in Wales is to be found in the post-Reformation Welsh Church.

The condition of the Church after the Puritan severities was indeed deplorable; it was extremely poverty-stricken; "in the four Welsh dioceses taken together there were no less than 324 livings of under £30 a year, while the salaries of the curates varied from £5 to £20."

The Bishop gives some highly interesting figures showing the position of nonconformity in Wales in this critical century.

The progress of nonconformity in Wales is of recent date; the Church is the ancient heritage of the Welsh people. And the appeals of nonconformist preachers to the emotional nature of the race have not always been well-directed and abidingly beneficial. "The Welsh revivals throughout were attended by moral and mental derangements too numerous to be ignored or concealed, and thoughtful people doubted the wisdom and the value of the movements which, if not the cause, were certainly the occasion, of these sad occurrences." But there is, of course, a brighter side of the revivals; to which the Bishop does full justice.

Of the more recent work of the Church in Wales it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. Asquith himself has borne emphatic testimony to its progress and worth. We cannot do better than conclude this review of a wholly admirable book by citing a just and weighty warning against the Disestablishment and Disendowment Bill now before Parliament. "The most disastrous consequences of the Puritan oppression and spoliation of the Church during the Commonwealth were moral and not economic. In spite of all their religious professions, the policy of the Puritans infected with a deadly taint the character and the motives of the people, and by shaking the foundation of the virtues of honesty and sincerity paved the way for that torrent of licence and profligacy that disgraced the Restoration. The forces of materialism are silently but ominously gathering strength in Wales: and he is no true patriot who by weakening the oldest and most powerful religious body in Wales will help to prepare a way for the advance of principles which set at nought the purity of the home and the sanctity of the altar."

The Latest Shakespeare

Lord Rutland est Shakespeare. Le plus grand des Mystères dévoilé. Shaxper de Stratford hors cause. By CELESTIN DEMBLON. With Portrait. (Paul Ferdinando, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

A BOMB-SHELL has fallen into the midst of the battle where Baconians and Stratfordians still aim their lethal bullets above each others' heads: whether it will explode and annihilate both of the contending forces is a problem that depends on the qualities of the mechanism. In any case, the intervention is, to say the least, unexpected, and M. Demblon, as he contemplates the scene from his critical airship, may at least enjoy the satisfaction of having drawn the gaze of each mortal enemy away from his cherished antagonist, and to have fixed it for one bewildered moment on high. There is a half-parallel in the notorious affair of Messrs. Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

This is not the time to attempt to confirm or demolish the theory of M. Demblon. It consists of two propositions—that Shaxper of Stratford was not the author of the plays, and that Roger Manners, Lord Rutland, was. The former proposition, to which the present volume is chiefly devoted, does not wield the seduction of novelty; it has helped for nearly two generations to destroy the mental peace both of the just and of the unjust. A few ball-cartridges and "an intolerable deal of" blank—that is a rough summary of the controversy. Scholars, lawyers, pedants, and ignoramuses have jostled together in the dust of a conflict that shows no sign of ending. Questions of authority seem to be tacitly waived, and every opinion, if urged with some show of earnestness, is as good as another. We do not think that M. Demblon has added much to the anti-Stratfordian argument, except a good deal of heat, some misplaced sarcasms, and a display of miscellaneous learning. The justification may be that his first volume is intended as the blast of the horn that is to prelude the entry of the second, the essential volume, into the arena. The Rutlandian portion of the present book is hardly "grand'chose." Rutland is sufficiently unaccounted for to be a plausible competitor; he emerges upon the scene of history at some rather significant moments; he was addicted to falconry. Above all, a document establishes the payment by him of sums for "semi-professional" services to William Shakespeare.

But Rutland is not the hero of the book before us; all we have as yet is "Paradise Lost," as far as Shaxper is concerned; we understand, though, that the volume that is to serve as the "Paradise Regained" of Lord Rutland has nothing to wait for but publication. Till then we must reserve our plaudits or our hisses. Only one word of caution will we allow ourselves. This theory is the theory of a foreigner; he is dealing with what is largely a linguistic problem, and a linguistic problem that does not belong, like Homer, to the other end of the centuries. The language of the author of Shakespeare is the language, only modified, of modern England and New England. The foreigner, however well equipped, starts at a disadvantage, and M. Demblon, who presents the not very relevant qualifications of Belgian deputy and Professor of French Literature, is too self-satisfied to be immediately convincing. It is a challenge, no doubt; if so, he must be prepared to maintain his lofty words with deeds and facts. And, en attendant, he would do well to revise his text rather carefully, at least in the early chapters of the present work, where English words or quotations are in question.

Trouvere and Troubadour

Fires. Book II: The Ovens, and Other Tales. Book III: The Hare, and Other Tales. By WILFRID WILSON GIBSON. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net each.)
Poems of Love and Earth. By JOHN DRINKWATER. (David Nutt. 1s. 6d. net.)

MR. GIBSON carries on his later tradition in these two little volumes, which complete the trilogy of "Fires." It seems long now—though it is really only a very few years—since he sang defensively—

> . . . . of queens and kings
> And lovers crowned with gold,
> Who loved in days of old.

Now his song is of the toilers who on the instant edge of time love and dream and suffer. The troubadour has become trouvère, that is what it amounts to; and these later poems might be called the twentieth century chansons de geste—only they are the gestes not of queens and kings, but of common men. We do not think we have lost anything by the transition. The song of "The Web of Life" was very charming, and we do not despise it, even now; but the song of "Bread" and "Fires" is tuned to a higher scale. It is a true advance both because of what Mr. Gibson has gained and because of what he has deliberately discarded. To adapt a now notorious dictum which Mr. Chesterton applied to Browning, he goes into the meanest of human haunts and publicly accuses men of romance. And so imbued is he with a conviction of the intrinsic poetry of what he finds that he will have it speak for itself, innocent of all tricking and trapping of phrase or verbal preciosity. The absence of these familiar embellishments is apt to produce some hesitation in the mind of those who are not accustomed to the naked spirit of the Muse; but the great essentials in these poems respond immediately to critical enquiry. The whole conception of such examples as, for instance, "The Dancing Seal" and "The Hare," belongs emphatically to poetry. A poet's vision illumines them and a poet's emotion carries them along.

There is the stamp of maturity on the work of these two volumes. It is sincere, lofty, convinced and convincing. What sureness of touch there is in "The Crane," in "Red Fox," in "The Ovens"—where as swift as vision itself past, present, and future, are comprehended in two or three lines, from the den of infamy until:—

> . . .shuddering back from that foul place
> And turning from the ovens' glare,
> He looked into her dreaming face;
> And saw green, sunlit woodlands there,
> And waters flashing in between
> Low-drooping boughs of summer green.

What breath of an air unbreathed filters through "The Lilac Tree" and "Devil's Edge," and how acutely one realises at the end what a grip the spirit of the verse has had on mind and heart! Mr. Gibson has accomplished in the short series here completed what we are inclined to think will be regarded by and by as one of the most notable poetical performances of our time.

Mr. John Drinkwater is still troubadour, yet he has much of the poetic quality of the earlier Mr. Gibson, with promise of the distinguished trouvère if ever it shall please him to assume that rôle. There is a similar economy of phrase, a reliance on the intrinsic emotional values of his themes. It is limpid, spontaneous song all through. The essential difference will be demonstrated by quoting a single stanza:—

> Surely God laughs a little when he hears
> The wind spun into music on the crest
> Of hills that change not with the changing years—
> I know He laughs, for laughter likes Him best.

Those lines are typical in many ways. Mr. Drinkwater's God is too purely a God of laughter, lingering in the clean sunny spaces. Perhaps the poet will yet discover him weeping in some dark, cheerless alley—and smiling again through His tears; and so learn the mystic secret of the rainbow. That seems to us to be the truth about Mr. Gibson's transition. And his discovery of divine romance lying hid in waste places has chastened his Muse's fire and given his verse a new and compelling austerity.

For the Flock Master

The Sheep and its Cousins. By R. LYDEKKER, F.R.S. Illustrated. (George Allen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. LYDEKKER, whose museum knowledge of mammals is encyclopædic, has already published large and important works on this group, and to these the present unpretentious volume must, in one respect, be regarded as supplementary. Indeed, if he had omitted the "cousins" and confined his remarks to the domestic breeds, his book would have been deserving of even greater praise, since the main theme, which is an unusually full account of domestic breeds all the world over, would not then have been padded with two or three lean chapters which give at best a sketchy account of Asiatic wild sheep, of the aberrant Barbary "aoudad" and Tibetan "burrhel," and of half a dozen extinct Pleistocene forms which, on the author's own showing, have nothing to do with the case. This arrangement would also have avoided a misprint which now mars the last page of the book.

In the matter of domestic breeds, however, Mr. Lydekker proves a thorough, reliable, and entertaining guide. This editing of sheep and cattle has produced extraordinary types of what the Germans call "house animals," and Mr. Lydekker is justified in his rebuke of those naturalists who affect to despise the study of them, since it is of immeasurable importance in a wider knowledge of all that is meant, or that may be meant, by the origin of species. The author claims that this account of these tame sheep is unique, and, so far as we can recall other publications on the subject, his claim seems justified. Here, with photographs, is a mass of information on every breed of importance, including the hardy Herdwick of the Cumbrian Fells, the small and sturdy black-faced Highland type, the white-faced Cheviot, the long-legged Norfolk, as well as Spanish Merinos and Manchegas, the spiral-horned Macedonian and Wallachian type, the fat-rumped sheep of Somaliland and the Hejaz, the lop-eared breeds of Guinea and the Congo, with other kinds too numerous to mention. Of peculiar interest is the history of Spanish Merinos introduced into South America. Speaking generally, these have deteriorated in quality, while in the unfavourable climate of Paraguay the once great flocks have also dwindled in numbers. In Chile and Peru it is the curious fact that, whereas the ewes remain hornless, the rams tend to develop an abnormal number of horns, up to six or seven in number. On the pastures of Australia the Merino has always predominated; but, on the other hand, New Zealand farmers have had their greatest successes with the old Romney Marsh breed. Domestic sheep have been taken from their original home in Europe to Africa, America, and the Antipodes, and only a few regions have, like the Malay Peninsula, proved unsuitable to these Alpine animals, which cannot thrive in flat jungle-land.

Unfortunately, even Mr. Lydekker can do nothing to clear up the mystery which surrounds the original domestication of the sheep. We know of its antiquity as farm stock from the Book of Genesis; we know, also, that the Bible draws a sharp moral distinction between sheep and goats; but whether our own sheep are European or Asiatic, or both, we have no satisfactory evidence. All that can safely be surmised is a dual origin, since it seems not unlikely that, whereas the predecessors of the Swiss Lake Dwellers brought their sheep from Western Asia, the European moufflon, which, though to-day restricted to some Mediterranean islands, once ranged over the mainland, may also have been tamed. And that is as far as Mr. Lydekker, or anyone else, can take us.

Sudermann's One-Act Plays

Morituri; Roses. By HERMANN SUDERMANN. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. each net.)

HERMANN SUDERMANN'S one-act plays have been issued in an English translation at the moment when the one-act play happens to be the London theatrical fashion. This form is an exceedingly suitable vehicle for the representation of a tense situation or of an emotional tragedy, since, by reason of concentration, the vividness and terribleness of the action becomes the more sharply defined. The English theatre, however, has allowed it to degenerate into the slight and farcical comedy intended to amuse the audience and to serve as an appetiser for the sterner fare to follow. In this way the "curtain-raiser" has performed a very useful function in the theatre.

Sudermann, with his perfect theatrical equipment, suggests to us how dramatists have in the past neglected the possibilities of the short play. Unfortunately, he has not succeeded in showing us more than the possibilities. The thorough handling of a psychological tragedy and the sufficient presentation and portrayal of character are beyond him. Here, as in "Magda," is the brilliance of dialogue, the geniality and refinement of touch, the cleverness and the knowledge of stagecraft; but his characters are creations of the brain, made in that Sudermann workshop into which the outside world has never entered. The problems of his plays concern soulless people, and the intellectual tragedy disappears in a cloud of sickly sentiment. How can such creatures participate in romances? They are the personification of small talk, small thought, and small imagination. In "Streaks of Light" ("Die Lichtbänder"), from the volume called "Roses," when the wife has sinned and then melodramatically asks for punishment, Herr Wittich in his madness replies: "Yes, they always talk like that—in books, at least." And in reading these volumes the feeling is forced upon us that perhaps Sudermann is joking. But why should he joke for ever? A dramatic genius of his calibre might be expected to create a magnum opus. Yet he has never presented the world with the characterisation of a living personality—"Magda" lacks the necessary compelling force—nor do his characters utter more than commonplaces.

In the earlier volume, "Morituri" (published in 1897), Sudermann does indeed appear to be searching for greater things. "Teja," a drama of the Goths, cleverly reconstructs the brave attitude of the young king, who, after ascending a tottering throne, sacrifices his own life and his mens' lives rather than surrender to his enemies. But the king's love is only for his military honour; we feel that there is no sacrifice of wife-love. "Fritzchen" is the simple story of a young officer in the German army who is forced to die in a duel (a favourite subject of Sudermann's), because the husband of his mistress "whipped him—across the courtyard—out into the street—whipped him like a beast." The pathos is partially obscured by the stiffness of the dialogue. "The Eternal Masculine" ("Das Ewig-Männliche") is a witty rendering of a puppet drama. In each of these plays legitimate excuse may be found for the imperfections of the dramatist because of his difficult situations.

But in "Rosen," published after an interval of ten years, the true Sudermann manner is thoroughly exhibited. The volume may be considered as the culmination of his dramatic method. Unhappy and faithless women are the subjects of the three opening plays. In "Streaks of Light" a faithless wife is murdered by her frenzied husband; "Margot" recounts the story of the young girl "with a secret" who feels that the hand of every man must be against her; and "The Last Visit" ("Der Letzte Besuch") portrays a veiled lady—married, of course—who meets the simple serving-maid at the coffin of the murdered captain. "The Far-Away Princess" ("Die Ferne Prinzessin") deals with an idea of real beauty and quaint simplicity, and represents a moment in the lives of a poor art-student and a little princess. This play stands out in bright relief against the aristocratic sordidness of the previous plays.

The translation of "Morituri" by Mr. Archibald Alexander is oftentimes laborious and lifeless, but Miss Grace Frank in "Roses" has been more successful, though expressions like "inestimable pulchritude" and "pestiferously hot" can scarcely be used in dramatic art. The versions are of American origin.

Le Sapin du Trône

Ecrits de Musiciens (XVe—XVIIIe Siècles). By J. G. PROD'HOMME. ("Mercure de France," Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

"OH, Galuppi, Baldassaro, this is very sad to find!" Browning understood a good deal about ancient music and musicians. In the times of the Renascence, and for many a long day afterwards, the chief study of the musician was his patrons; necessary to his existence, they were approached with fear, humility, and hypocrisy; once gained, they were treated according to all the artist's varying moods, and were flattered, cozened, and insulted with bewildering impartiality. Galuppi's patrons need not have been very obtuse; the message of music is more than ambiguous, and the critic of the Daily News who declared that it shocked him to see Anglican clergymen drinking in, without a blush and without a protest, the obscene melodies of M. Debussy's "Après-midi d'un Faune" is merely an object of wonder to us. But the message of the musician, when it takes the form of literature, is wholly unequivocal. Here is Palestrina, for instance, in M. Prod'homme's book, writing to the Cardinal Ippolito d'Este that he has never written a light song, and, in a dedication to Pope Gregory XIII, vowing that he will never do it again; for the truth is that he has sometimes composed profane and unedifying music, and at the thought he says, "je rougis et je m'afflige aujourd'hui." Tomas Luiz de Victoria, too, takes a high view of his vocation; if he buried his talent, he would be an unfaithful servant, "frustrant le maître du fruit qu'il attend justement." Roland de Lassus, on the other hand, supplies an excellent instance of the sans-gêne of the musician who knows himself to be indispensable. To his patron, the Duke of Bavaria, he writes in a facetious jargon of five or six languages, which must have taken hours to decipher; he wishes him an early arrival in Paradise, "aiant ferme espérance que estans la trouuerons assez de quoj passer le temps."

The interest of the documents contained in this book is very uneven: some of the greatest names only serve as headings to monetary squabbles and the like trivialities. Thus Lully's letters, Handel's, and even Bach's are rather disappointing, though the postscript to a letter of the last-named master, thanking for a present of wine that had arrived seriously reduced in quantity indicates a pretty sense of humour—"Au cas où mon cher cousin aurait l'intention de m'offrir encore de la même liqueur, je le prie de n'en rien faire, car j'ai dû payer pour le transport 16 groschen; à l'expéditeur 2 groschen," etc., etc., "ce qui rend ce cadeau trop coûteux." The sections dealing with Rameau and Monteverdi, with the author's notes, are particularly interesting; and so are the satirical extracts from Marcello; but best of all is the Gluck correspondence, with the magnificently ironical letter to La Harpe. For once music held her own in a fight with literature, fought, as all such combats must always be fought, with the enemy's weapons.

In Search of a Pedigree

Le Molière du XXe Siècle: Bernard Shaw. By AUGUSTIN HAMON. With Four Portraits. (Figuière, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

MR. SHAW seems to be getting a French reputation malgré lui. M. Cestre has just written about him, M. Faguet has commented on M. Cestre, and here we have M. Hamon burning incense before the Shavian Shrine with such recklessness that the Temple of Fame is in serious danger of catching fire. We have not read M. Cestre, but we have read M. Faguet's criticism of him, and we should say that, with all its coolness, the latter is more likely to do Mr. Shaw good, in various senses of the expression, than all M. Hamon's pæans and commentaries. M. Faguet admires Mr. Shaw—who does not?—but he has a very paternal way with him in exposing the youthfulness of paradox, and he gives several good reasons why Mr. Shaw is not going to conquer Paris. The chief of these reasons is that he is too English; M. Hamon thinks he will eventually be adopted, as being "le moins anglais de tous les génies" of Great Britain. These two judgments offer a certain discrepancy; we wonder which of them their object would prefer—probably the second, which contains at least one redeeming word. M. Faguet is guilty of one piece of carelessness, that amounts almost to brutality, with regard to Mr. Shaw. He says "on parle peu de lui" (!), and then proceeds to his belated explanation—"parce qu'on ne sait pas comment il faut prononcer son nom." He should have given the reason first..

M. Hamon has made a very thorough and conscientious study of his idol; one instance that will bring it home to everyone—the conclusion with which he heads his last chapter—is this: "Le théâtre de Shaw est essentiellement comique." Now, it must have been a proud moment for M. Hamon when he found himself able honestly to write down this judgment; he had only arrived at it by months of hard study and anxious meditation. For, at the first production in Paris of "Candida," he was astonished and annoyed to find that the audience laughed. Till then it had never occurred to him that Mr. Shaw was funny; now he knows, and, as we have suggested, it is a proud thought for him. Up till then he had only known the Fabian, the man who has moulded modern Socialism in many lands; now he knows that his guide, philosopher, and friend is, to quote M. Faguet, "le plus grand satirique, à l'heure actuelle, des deux mondes." M. Faguet, it is true, adds, or rather remarks, by way of prelude, "Cet homme, à mon avis, n'est rien qu'un satirique," and, if he was present at the first performance of "Candida," he was probably astonished to find any of the audience looking serious and intellectual. But, then, M. Faguet is a brother of the brush: the expert of irony is probably jealous of the expert of paradox.

M. Hamon has compiled a very solid and careful work. We must remember, in the first place, that he is introducing Mr. Shaw to the French public, and the long analyses of plays that are de rigueur in critical works on foreign authors may correspond to a demand. We must also remember that his idol is also his personal friend, and that his enthusiasm thus flows from a double and infinitely respectable source. We much prefer him to the unattached critic of forgotten foreign authors: the "lues Boswelliana" is a disease, body-snatching is a crime or something of the sort. But we think that he carries his admiration too far; as in the case of Mr. Shaw's humour, so in many other matters he seems to have gained his opinions at second-hand, and his legend of a quasi-omniscient being seems to us to be constructed of rather unsatisfactory materials. One thing that he points out is certain; Mr. Shaw has a genuine passion for justice, and to specialise in a virtue of this sort carries a man far.

Another legend of M. Hamon's is the unrecognised genius. Mr. Shaw "arrived" comparatively quickly and very completely. The Shavian sect, to whom, by the way, M. Hamon is not always as polite as we should have expected, were soon forced to jostle with a Philistine crowd, and have probably long slunk away in quest of some less popular shrine. Mr. Shaw commands the easy laugh; intellectuosity must seek its uneasy banquets elsewhere. The title of this book suggests a puzzle. The comparison with Molière is an obvious one. Doctors—children or servants revealing the truth that is hidden from the wise and prudent—hypocrites—all these occur in Molière and Mr. Shaw. But so they do in almost every satirist. Second thoughts militate against the comparison. M. Hamon, however, develops it well; some of his points are mere "rivers in Macedon," but others are good and valid. The tendency to farce is certainly common to the two authors—possibly to a good many others; the lack of a dénouement is a bond; both are "écoles d'irrespect." They both disbelieve in angels and devils; but not always—Molière has many wholly antipathetic characters, while Mr. Shaw has heroes who appear to possess neither virtues nor vices, and belong presumably, therefore, to a different order of beings.

M. Hamon's work is addressed to his compatriots, and much of our criticism is possibly out of place. But from the Old Testament and from Carlyle we have learnt a certain dislike of idolatry, and passages in this book have fomented this sentiment. We hold no brief for the dramatic tradition of "les Scribe" (or the Pharisees, for that matter), but we are bitterly opposed to the unreasoning cult of modernity as such. For the rest, M. Hamon has many sound intuitions, and often expresses them in arresting phrases. His defence of "l'action intellectuelle" as opposed to action in the vulgar sense is convincing; here, at any rate, are the elements of an understanding between Molière and Mr. Shaw. On the whole, we should not be giving a bad summary of the book if we said that it is wrong-headed but right-hearted. Mr. Chesterton's book on the same subject would be a good corrective.

The Congo Territories

Dawn in Darkest Africa. By J. H. HARRIS, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by the EARL OF CROMER. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

WEST AFRICA has never been a very attractive part of the world, chiefly on account of climatic considerations, but at any time it may produce large questions for national or international treatment. The best and latest information about the region is essential to the public as well as to politicians. Mr. Harris's book is therefore very welcome as the contribution of an expert.

As the organising secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society, he, accompanied by his wife, visited West Africa last year for the Society, in conjunction with some of the principal newspapers, for the purpose of studying social and labour conditions in West Central Africa, particularly in the Congo basin. In this book, full of information locally gathered, he dwells upon the rapid changes through which West Africa is passing; before the changes come, "it behoves us to examine closely the great problems before us—the problems of future political divisions, problems of labour, and of education in the largest and fullest sense—and so to readjust our conceptions and laws with an understanding of the natives as may save ourselves from repeating the blunders of the past; blunders which have indelibly stained for time and eternity the escutcheon of Christian Europe; blunders for which recompense can never be adequately made, but which at least should serve as a warning for the future." In carrying out his examination, Mr. Harris writes with perfect freedom, sparing nobody, and the value of his work is greatly enhanced by the able introduction in which Lord Cromer has practically reviewed it and stated his own opinions upon the prominent points. Mr. Harris has divided his book into four parts, though it is hardly possible to treat all the questions arising in connection with the Congo basin and the Colonies of the Gulf of Guinea in water-tight compartments.

In this method he describes the individual natives, their customs and occupations; then their relations with civilisation and public matters; after which the subject of labour is separately treated; and finally, under the text of moral and material progress, he tells of the principal staples, the production of the oil-palm, rubber, and cocoa, and the progress of Christian missions. As a former missionary and possessed of commercial experience, he is better qualified to probe the facts and to give an opinion than an official or ordinary visitor would be; it is rather when he leaves the observation of facts and indulges in speculative views that other people will be unwilling to accept his conclusions. He clearly states that much immorality is prevalent in Western Africa, whether under the name of domestic slavery or otherwise; among the natives polygamy is rife, both voluntary and by inheritance, and the Christian Church finds in polygamy a problem which at present defies solution, and surrenders to Mohammedanism a potent factor in the propagation of its beliefs. It is shocking to read: "The truth is that in the greater part of West Africa neither monogamy nor polygamy is the prevailing relationship between man and woman," and that under the regime of the late King Leopold a veritable avalanche of filth and immorality overwhelmed the Congo tribes. Nor is this all. Mr. Harris estimates that more than twelve millions of people perished in the Belgian Congo under King Leopold's regime. Every town has lost over 75 per cent. of its inhabitants within the last three decades. Nor was that regime economically successful. For nearly twenty-five years the Congo territories have suffered from uncontrolled exploitation; the rubber vines have been hacked to pieces, destroyed, and no real attempt at reproduction has been made; the ruthless exploitation of rubber had its counterpart in the wanton destruction of elephants in order to obtain rapidly every tusk of ivory.

There are other possible products, gum, copal, and palm oil, but the Belgians think of nothing but rubber, although concentration on cocoa might save the situation for them. Mr. Harris gives his opinion that the Congo will require from Belgium at the very least a million pounds sterling per annum for twenty years, and the question is whether the nation will care to afford the sum. He considers the British administration the best in Western Africa, as it aims at working through the indigenous natives and educating them—not only in literature—but he does not hesitate to comment on the gulf between the officials and the merchants, the exclusion of coloured men from the medical service, and the treatment of African youths. The native proverb, "The Englishman never lies," is a tribute to the British character. For the German system he has no admiration, though the Germans are liberal in some respects; what he has seen of German colonial methods does not impress him that their occupation is far removed from a sort of military despotism. The slavery, proved and acknowledged to exist in the Portuguese territories, especially on the islands, is a blot and blunder which cannot stand investigation; it must be terminated if Portugal desires to continue her alliance with Great Britain. The kindly nature of the Portuguese cannot be accepted as an excuse for the maintenance of slavery in this century. For the French Congo administration Mr. Harris has not a good word to say, and it is noticeable that Lord Cromer abstains from commenting on it, except to intimate that the British cannot interfere. In their Colonies the French object to the presence of other nationalities, while their administration is oppressive to the natives. Mr. Harris has decided opinions on such questions as race prejudice, the demand for labour and its supply, sleeping sickness, the slaves' pathetic desire for liberty and repatriation, the prospects of various products of the country, to which only allusion is here possible. His main suggestion that France and Belgium together should, in a spirit of generosity, transfer the whole or the greater part of French and Belgian Congo to Germany for adequate consideration reads like the dream of an idealist, and cannot come within the range of practical politics. It is astonishing that it should be thought worth putting on paper: it is below the standard of Mr. Harris's illuminating work, which will go far to inform the world of the state of things in Western Africa, and especially in the colonies for which Great Britain is directly or indirectly responsible.

The American Diary of a Japanese Girl. By YONE NOGUCHI. Frontispiece by YEIHO HIRESAKI. (Elkin Mathews. 7s. 6d. net.)

"POEM manufacture is a slow job. Modern people slight it, calling it an old fashion. Shall I give it up for some more brilliant up-to-date pose?" So writes Mr. Yone Noguchi in Miss Morning Glory's most diverting diary. We were almost afraid that Mr. Noguchi had left his poetry behind him, and yielded, judging from the rather clumsy title, to a form of clap-trap on a level with the publication of imaginary love-letters, bound in parchment and tied with ribbon. Though this little volume is a long way behind "The Pilgrimage" or "From the Eastern Sea" in point of sheer beauty, it is decidedly clever. Much of Miss Morning Glory's diary seems to sing—it is so joyous, so quaint, so droll, so irresistible. The most delightful pages are devoted to the Poet of Willow Cottage, but there is a good deal of satire behind the rollicking fun. One day this fascinating little bundle of whimsical ways discovers a scholarly squirrel, and writes his diary as well as her own. Concerning a negro's voice, she observes: "Who could imagine that such a silvery sound could come from such a midnight face?" That she is apt, humorous, and observant will be found in the following: "In the park I noticed a lady who scissored the 'don't touch' flowers, and stepped away with a saintly air. The comical fancy came to me that she was the mother of a policeman guarding against intruders." More than once Morning Glory laughs in her sleeve—the big Japanese sleeve where there is so much room for laughter—at "Meriken" people and "Meriken" ways; but, nevertheless, we fancy that she will win a host of admirers. "R. L. S." would have appreciated Mr. Noguchi's felicity of expression. He takes little commonplace words, and, with a magic all his own, makes them yield up a very pleasing surprise—and Miss Morning Glory.

Samphire. By LADY SYBIL GRANT. (Stanley Paul and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

"SAMPHIRE" is a volume of some two dozen light and short sketches, sometimes skits, written in charming and amusing vein, well fitted to while away an hour that would otherwise be tedious. Lady Sybil Grant, in the course of these pages, touches often on the weaknesses and also on some of the shortcomings of her sex. One of these shortcomings, lack of humour, she shows by her own writings not to be universal, even if it be widespread. The pretty gift of satire which she also displays to such good purpose proves that another of her unwounding strictures is not of universal application. Turning the pages at random, one may alight on the chapter devoted to "A Clever Woman." This person Lady Sybil describes as "without form and void, for her chief characteristics were absence of figure and emptiness of mind." The writer continues not unsagely: "An impressive and sagacious silence had gained for her the spurious reputation to which she very naturally attached great value: since it brought her endless invitations all the year round." Then there is the "Thoughtful Student." But Lady Sybil continues: "I have always found her so eloquent that I cannot imagine when she found time for thoughtful study, unless she should be a sufferer from chronic insomnia."

The Works of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher. Variorum Edition. General Editor, A. H. BULLEN. Vol. IV. (G. Bell and Sons and A. H. Bullen. 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS masterly edition of Beaumont and Fletcher answers one of the most fervent prayers of scholars and students. It may be assumed that both these categories have considerably increased since the Baconian trumpet began to multiply the echoes of the literary arena. "Pylades and Orestes"—though, by the way, critics do not allow much to Beaumont in the present volume, where Fletcher is in command, with Massinger and the shadowy inseparable as humble lieutenants—are as necessary to the study of Elizabethan and post-Elizabethan literature in general as to that of the Baconian or anti-William controversy in particular. The edition, we have said, is masterly. The slight critical notes are as full as they can or need be, and tell us all the positive facts that we are at present entitled to. It must be remembered that Beaumont and Fletcher hide in a darkness to which the shadows of Stratford are as noonday. The text is everything that it claims to be. The plays embraced by the present volume are the two sanguinary tragedies, "Valentinian" and "The False One," and the comedies, "Monsieur Thomas," "The Chances," and "The Little French Lawyer."

Pentateuchal Studies. By HAROLD M. WIENER, M.A., LL.B (Elliot Stock. 6s. net.)

MR. WIENER had already before the publication of this volume secured for himself a well-deserved position among the best qualified of the English-speaking Biblical critics of the orthodox school, and the reputation which he has attained will be enhanced by the present work. This is, in fact, a sequel to his "Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism." The greater part of the present work has already appeared in periodicals in the United States, where Mr. Wiener holds a considerable reputation as a Biblical scholar. Mr. Wiener is essentially a controversialist. He deals out many a hard knock to his opponents, the higher critics, and they on their part cannot with intellectual comfort ignore the arguments with which he essays to demolish their theories.

The Old Gardens of Italy; How to Visit Them. By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND. Illustrated. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

STUDENTS of gardening and garden-lovers should be much indebted to the author of this small guide-book to the famous gardens of Italy. Indeed, we are scarcely just in describing the work as a guide-book, for it is something very much more. The introduction contains valuable suggestions as to the limits of imitation of the Italian style, and draws attention to the careful planning of the best Italian gardens, whereby the essential unity of the house and garden may be secured. It is only of recent years that garden-designers have realised the advisability of a gradual transition from the formality of buildings to the full freedom of wild-garden or park. There is a very large number of illustrations taken from the author's own photographs, and a short history of each of the gardens is given. A useful bibliography is appended. It is a sad and regrettable fact that "there are none that lay out so much wealth all at once as the Italians on their palaces and gardens, and that afterwards bestow so little on preserving of them." May the same fate never befall the many beautiful formal gardens laid out during recent years in various parts of this country.

Mary the Mother of Jesus. An Essay by ALICE MEYNELL. Illustrated. (Lee Warner. 16s. net.)
The Story of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary. By WILLIAM CANTON. (Herbert and Daniel. 6s. net.)
The Star Dream. By ELLEN M. DOBINSON. (Murray and Evenden. 1s. 6d. net.)

IN a very earnest and scholarly essay Miss Alice Meynell sets forth the life of Mary of Nazareth, taking the Gospel narratives and tradition to aid her in her task. The author points out the very great homage that was paid to the Virgin by the early Church, and the influence this holy figure has had upon the thoughts and feelings of mankind through many generations. She refers to the time when "images were read for many ages, day by day, by the bookless," and shows what architecture, painting, sculpture, and literature, owe to the Mother of Jesus. The illustrations, by R. Anning Bell, are very beautiful in colour, and add much to the value of the book.

The sad story of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary is well told by Mr. William Canton, and, although legend has had a great deal to do with the life of this young Princess, it has added to rather than detracted from the interest of the narrative.

In "The Star Dream" Miss Dobinson retells in simple form the story of Pharaoh and his dreams. The book will be found to be of great use to teachers and others who like to have the Bible stories before them in the English of the present day rather than in the more beautiful form of the authorised version.

Masterpieces of Music. Edited by E. HATZFIELD. Illustrated: Haydn. By SIR FREDERIC COWEN. Brahms. By SIR CHARLES V. STANFORD. Rossini. By SIR FREDERIC COWEN. Schubert. By GEORGE H. CLUTSAM. (T. C. and E. C. Jack. 1s. 6d. net each.)

MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK have issued in good time for the holiday season four more of their series of books dealing with musicians and some of their principal works. This time Haydn, Brahms, Rossini, and Schubert have the attention of those to whom has been entrusted the task of writing the essay and making the selections of the various compositions. The books in every way equal those already on the market, and should have a ready sale. We hope that Sir Arthur Sullivan will not be overlooked when further volumes are contemplated.

Fiction

John, Jonathan and Company. By JAMES MILNE. (Chapman and Hall. 5s. net.)

OF actualities, Jonathan bulks most largely in this collection; the author takes a sane, though rather sentimental view of the United States, and one quotation which he makes—"My husband's safe; I'm the proposition"—from a conversation with a young American wife, embodies his view of the nation. We are fain to confess that it is an admirably just view, and the sentence is worth memorising as descriptive of the United States as a whole.

The French-Canadian also comes in for breezy criticism, but he, like all others whom these pages concern, may read the criticism with profit rather than pain, for the author writes in a broad-minded, friendly spirit, and wounds none of the objects of his wandering observations—he is careful, even, lest he should speak hardly of inanimate things. Summing up his work at the end, we find that he deals less with actualities than with principles, less with men than with abstract thoughts; the tour that he took provided food for meditation, and—he meditated on paper. Though once or twice we find him prosy, for the most part we find his rambling essays good to read; there is in them so much that is vigorous and healthy, and so little of modern neuritis. He tells us much of a voyage, some of the United States, a little of Canada, but most of all he tells us of himself, and that self is worth knowing.

The White Knights. By T. G. WAKELING. (John Murray. 6s.)

AN English doctor married the daughter of a Bedouin sheik, helped his father-in-law to organise the men of the tribe on ultra-scientific military lines, and, when the day of trial with an enemy came, had the satisfaction of seeing that his system of organisation was successful. Two small, pale love stories are intervowen with the main theme, everybody is very virtuous and extremely respectable, and at the end we imagine two Anglo-Bedouin families living happy ever after. It is good stuff for schoolboys, for the Great Moral Lesson—with very large capitals—is fully apparent throughout; but to one who knows a little of the desert Arab and his ways, it is terribly unconvincing. And, since it is set in quite modern times, how did Maxim guns get into the hands of a Bedouin tribe—is the British administration of Egypt quite inefficient? The "White Knights," who are made up of all the male and some of the female youth of the tribe, have a passion for saluting on all possible and impossible occasions; they are a little better than the best British troops—perhaps more than a little—and there is not a single villain or adventuress amid the throng. Unrelieved virtue grows rather cloying before we have perused half the story, and we would that the author had given us at least a spice of wickedness, to enliven the pages of what has proved a rather prosy book.

The Grip of Life. By A. and E. CASTLE. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

THE wit which made Bellairs incomparable is absent here, for this book deals with deeper matters, telling how Ughtred Maxwell, scholar and dreamer, succeeded unexpectedly to a title and a fortune, and was gripped by life against his own desire. The intricate plot of the book is too full to be detailed here, even if it were fair to give away the story by means of a précis, but it may be said that the ingenuity which characterises former books by these authors is fully manifested in this story, which deals intimately with the psychological development of Maxwell, together with that of two women. Of these two Aglaé, the "spiritual vampire," as she is designated, first holds him, and then in spite of himself Aglaé's niece rescues him. His arrival at full consciousness of himself is well and finely told, and forms a fitting climax. The most notable part of the book, however, is that which tells of Aglaé's machinations. Although not a common type, she is yet real and convincing; most men have met her at some time or other, and not a few have suffered at the hands of her who "will take all and give nothing," who exacts absolute, unquestioning service and makes no return—drains life away, as it were, and gives no compensation.

Readers may possibly find the first two or three chapters rather dull, for the story opens slowly, and, throughout the book, Ughtred's letters to John Gordon, in which parts of the plot are told, are a trifle irritating, for to a certain extent they break the continuity of the work. We feel that it had been better if the story had been told directly from beginning to end. In spite of these drawbacks, however, the book as a whole is fresh and arresting, and, once fairly started, difficult to lay aside until finished.

Bunch Grass. By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL. (John Murray. 6s.)

SHORT stories customarily come to an exasperatingly abrupt conclusion just when one's interest in them has been thoroughly aroused. In "Bunch Grass" this defect is partially overcome by a thread of continuity running through the stories. The latter depict the experiences of two English brothers upon a Californian cattle ranch some thirty years ago. They are pleasant tales, well told, and so far as one is able to judge, true to life.

The brothers beheld a new country in the making, and the passing of the pioneer who settled vital differences with a pistol. Outlaws ranged at large in the country spoken of as San Lorenzo. Stage coaches were robbed frequently; and every large rancher suffered more or less at the hands of cattle and horse thieves. In Mr. Vachell's pages such personages as Frank James, Judge Lynch and Black Bart live again. In conclusion we may express the hope that the author's repertory has not been exhausted by this volume.

The Theatre

"The Tide" at the Queen's Theatre

ALL those interested in the art of the theatre should see this production. There is a note of high endeavour about Miss Warwick's management which is very attractive, an attempt to leave behind the commonplace and out-worn rubbish of stage affairs. Her "Sylvia Greer" evidently did not conquer the great heart of the playgoer, and no doubt "The Tide" may fail to prove so welcome as are many machine-made, conventionally acted pieces of work. Artistically, that does not matter, and the new comedy, although often weak and wild and unbalanced, is well worth the notice of every student of the stage.

But for the curious unevenness of "Love—and What Then," one should have been slow to credit the writer of "The New Sin" with the inclination to offer so crowded and yet incomplete a work to the public. But the manner of Mr. Macdonald Hastings appears to have changed. He now uses a large and loose and original method as little like the concise workmanship of his first play as it is possible to conceive. His brain teems with mighty issues and vague pictures of, say, the spirit of the sea and the soul of man, but he does not concentrate his inspirations. It would seem as though he said within himself, "Here you will find rich stores of ideas, a crowd of vivid characters, some modern views, a few, a very few, witty lines; all the rest I can fairly leave to the audience and the actors." Perhaps the common run of playgoer—those who make the fortunes of a theatre—will not take the trouble to follow this work of Mr. Hastings with sufficient care really to enjoy those beauties which he himself doubtless knows so well. But it is true that the actors at the Queen's use all their strength to create an atmosphere of reality out of the occasionally amorphous work given into their hands.

Felicity Scarth is a woman of thirty-four, who has, from her earliest days, loved to be loved; without marriage, while her parents were alive, she had a child which was taken from her and hidden from the world. Later she inherits a fortune and dissipates her life in every possible way, so that she may forget her loss and her passion for maternity. When the play opens she has become a physical derelict and tries to kill herself in a London hotel. Miss Warwick gives us a very complete and sustained picture of this complicated woman. She avoids all conventions of voice, manner, or movement. Her tears, which others might make so theatrically effective in an old-fashioned way, are reduced by her to something like the snuffle of a real woman. Again and again she will disappoint the conventionalist and delight the others by her skilful avoidance of the beaten track of heroines. When Felicity is discovered fainting in her room, the hotel people call Dr. Stratton to her aid. Mr. Norman Trevor shows us as remarkable a man as Felicity is a woman. As a specialist in regard to nervous diseases in women he has made a fortune at forty years of age. That is strange, when one remembers the rentals Harley Street way, but far less likely things remain behind. Dr. Stratton soon shows that—notwithstanding his vast experience among women of the same type—he loves Felicity, and that he can make her do that which he thinks best for her. Firstly, he does in a day or two the thing Felicity has failed in doing for years—he discovers that her child is known as Maisie Bretherton, and is with the lady who is supposed to be her mother at a village in Guernsey. Next, Stratton sends Felicity there, so that she may "get back to nature" and taste "sea-wrack," renew her youth, and unknowingly learn to know the daughter she has longed for so passionately. Miss Martin Harvey gives us a cleverly unsympathetic Maisie, and Miss Cicely Hamilton plays the part of Mrs. Bretherton with a degree of reticence, pathos, and power very unusual on our stage. The second act shows us Felicity beloved by Car Whithair (Mr. Breon), who is engaged to Maisie.

Eighteen months later the doctor comes to visit his patient. He has cured her body, but the attitude of the daughter—when the secret is made known to her—is breaking her heart. There is a fine and quiet scene between Mrs. Bretherton and Felicity, in which both Miss Warwick and Miss Hamilton are at their best. Then there is a great deal of storm on the coast and floods of dialogue from which the foreshadowed union of Felicity and Stratton emerges. Maisie remains with the mother who has adopted her; her military lover may return to her—one does not know or care very much. Felicity is at last understood and loved, and a memorable, if sometimes wilfully disappointing, play closes amid roars of applause.

We will presume that it is legitimate for the dramatist to take quite exceptional people to fill the characters of his play. But even then Mr. Hastings seems to have gone a little far afield. Jerry le Maitre, a romantic, Ibsenish, Guernsey fisher boy, played by Mr. Shiel Barry, is considered more than half mad; Mrs. Bretherton describes her odd conduct in regard to her care for dolls in place of children as a sort of madness. Felicity is an unusually erotic personage and would-be suicide. Car Whithair is somehow allowed to suggest the congenital idiot. Maisie attempts to drown herself. Tom Denny, an intentionally comic fisherman, broadly treated by Mr. Macmillan, shows an extraordinarily cruel and unsympathetic nature in regard to his foster-son. Dr. Stratton is immensely gifted and fortunate; in fact, the only person who approximates the normal is Mr. Strick, the owner of the London hotel, a part in which Mr. Heath Haviland gives one more admirable character sketch. Perhaps our world is like that, but if not, and these things are faults, there remains very much that is of value in the play, and there is always a bold confidence in the receptivity of the audience which promises well for the future of the author.

"Where the Rainbow Ends" at the Garrick Theatre

THE first comer of the holiday plays, "Where the Rainbow Ends," is one of the simplest, most direct and engaging that we are likely to see. Everyone remembers that the refrain "For England and St. George" is woven into this play, which on one side is purely fancy, and on the other plain everyday fact. All boys and girls and most men and women appear to love this mélange of the real, the unreal, and the "might-have-been-both."

This year the entertainment is lively and beautiful, and the four clever children Esmé Wynne, Dot Temple, Sidney Sherwood and Philip Tonge—who start on the great adventure of the magic carpet towards Rainbow land—are at once delightfully human and filled with the spirit of romance. Their quest is already pretty well known, and all the better liked on that account, but the fairy background of their undertaking is, I think, fresher and more dainty than of old. The gay and tireless Will-o'-the-Wisp, Miss Mavis Yorke, dances and plays with extraordinary spirit — she is indeed a Puck of even lighter mood, who happens to be gifted with the true gambado temperament. Her will is supported by a host of merry children who manage somehow to translate the whole audience far beyond this work-a-day world, and to fill them with delight. St. George is as splendid as ever in the hands of Mr. Reginald Owen, who is, I believe, joint author of the play with Mr. Clifford Mills. Mr. James Carew plays a double rôle with easy success, and all the wicked and funny people are quite convincing in their many and various ways. When in doubt among the numberless plays produced this year, particularly for children, you could not do better than choose the merry, exciting, patriotic "Rainbow" at the Garrick. E. M.

Music

THE sounds of secular music, if such an epithet be permitted by those who regard all music as sacred, have almost died away, as The Nativity draws near. "Meek-eyed Peace" has descended upon the busy concert-halls. It seems as if both the entrepreneurs and the performers had been reading the great ode of Milton. Moved by those tremendous lines—

> And kings sat still with awful eye,
> As if they surely knew their Sovran Lord was by.

they have closed the piano, and put the violin back into its case, resolved to sit still for a few days. We think that M. Hubermann, who gave a concert on the 16th, must have been the last of the virtuosi to bid an audience to Queen's Hall. Of him we do not use the word "virtuoso" in the restricted and unkind sense in which, of late years, it has been a good deal used. Our grandparents meant what we should call a "connoisseur" when they spoke of a virtuoso, a man whose knowledge and taste in Art exceeded that of the dilettante. Horace Walpole was not, surely, a virtuoso, but Lord Burlington could have claimed the title. Then the word came to be applied more particularly to a musical performer whose skill was admittedly transcendant. Liszt and Thalberg were two of the typical "virtuosi" of the nineteenth century. But in course of time it came to be understood that, if you spoke of a "virtuoso," you meant a performer whose gifts of musicianship and real love for Art were on a markedly lower plane than his executive powers, a performer whose aim was to dazzle his hearers rather than to interpret his composer. M. Hubermann is by no means a virtuoso in this less worthy sense of the term. As an executant he is among the first violinists of our day, but he never gives the impression that his delight in his own skill of bowing and fingering leads him astray from the main path which an artist should follow. He is not one of the more impassioned players, and in the Kreutzer Sonata and a Sonata of Bach he may have been too cold for some listeners' liking. But in Tchaikovsky's Concerto he was wholly admirable, and his tone is so beautiful that we can scarce believe there was anyone present at the recital who did not enjoy it.

The doings of the Classical Concert Society have not recently been of exceptional interest, but its programmes have been tranquil and pleasant. The quartet party which M. Lhotsky leads, but to which M. Sevcik, the famous violin-teacher gives his name, achieved considerable success at their concert on December 10. We could not say that these players call forth our warmest admiration, for though they are invariably correct, and though their skill of ensemble is beyond question, they are wanting, perhaps, in impulse, and do not make us forget the performers in our sheer delight at the beauty of the composition they are playing. But in Dvorak's very tuneful and agreeable Quartet in F major there are no great depths to plumb, and we had a very finished performance of it. Franck's Pianoforte Quintet is quite another story. The pianist, M. Darewski, was, no doubt, to be commended for playing with restraint; for, had he allowed the music to inspire him with something of its fire, the balance of the performance would have been destroyed. But the message of the music was not delivered with the almost imperious authority which we looked for.

A concert given by the Société des Concerts Français, not in a public hall, but in the fine music-room at the house of Mme. Liotard-Vogt, at Holland Park, was of unusual interest. Perhaps its chief attraction was the Sonata for Violoncello and Pianoforte by M. Guy Ropartz, who is known to have been one of Cesar Franck's best pupils, and to be one of the most vigorous and influential leaders of musical progress in provincial France. We have heard reports of the valuable work he does at Nancy, and it was a great pleasure to hear one of his compositions. We can hardly think that the performance of his sonata did complete justice to the work, but the beautiful slow movement made a sensible effect, and that the whole composition, in spite of its length, is worthy of the serious attention of musicians we do not doubt. M. Déodar de Severne's name is, of course, well known to those who have any acquaintance with contemporary French music. He is one of the glories of the "Schola Cantorum." Mlle. Luquiens sang three of his delicate and charming songs. "Le ciel est par-dessus le toit" has often been set to music, but Verlaine's poetry has not been more sympathetically treated by any composer, and we liked "Le Chevrier" extremely, as also some pianoforte pieces which were played by Mlle. Veluard; "Baigneuses au Soleil" should attract the attention of many pianists. A fantasy for clarinet and piano, by M. Philippe Gaubert had less interest for us, and the trio, by Vincent d'Indy, for piano, clarinet, and violoncello, did not convince us that that truly admirable musician has always been in a state of inspiration when he has sat down to compose.

Two of our most popular, and deservedly popular, artists have given concerts which cannot be repeated for some time to come. Mme. Carreño played so superbly that all her admirers, and their name is legion, must have lamented that she cannot return to London until twelve months have passed. One does not know which to wonder at the most—her splendid technical control or the vigorous, brilliant life which the technique enables her to express so abundantly. Mme. Clara Butt, having brought all the most difficult-to-please of the Berlin and Vienna critics, as well as the musical public of those great cities, to her feet, reappeared lately at the Albert Hall, the scene of so many of her triumphs, and showed that her voice is still the finest in the world, and that she can sing fine songs like the best of the musician-singers. We do not say that she is unrivalled in all the songs that she essays. She is not so universal an interpreter as Mme. Gerhardt, for instance, who has also been singing in her best style, but there are certain songs which we think no one could sing better than Mme. Butt. Mr. Rumford, too, is always to be heard with pleasure, and we hope that Mme. Butt and he will prosper exceedingly in the tour round the world which they are now to undertake. Mr. Plunket Greene needs no praise, but we cannot help congratulating him on the altogether exceptional skill with which he makes up his programmes. It is refreshing to listen to a programme which is not cut up into formal groups, which gives you opportunity to hear the work of so many composers, in which you pass from one song and one style to another without the smallest sense of incongruity.

But at this moment when we write, the recitalists are dumb. Carol-singers have taken their place, and many industrious searchers into the records of the past are presenting us with the quaint and often beautiful Christmas songs which they and others have brought to light. In many a church Bach's Christmas oratorio, or parts of it, may be heard, and old Handel is not forgotten. We hope that, in the desire for novelty, the best-known, favourite old carols will not be allowed to fall into the oblivion which, until the recent outbreak of antiquarian activity, has been the lot of so many hymns of the kind. There is sometimes a danger in the joy of rediscovery—we are tempted to overlook the friends who have never failed us. There must always be a place, and that the highest, in our affections, for the Christmas music in the "Messiah," for "In Dulci Jubilo," and "Good King Wenceslas."

Bedside Books

READING in bed is one of the crimes that bring their own punishment. It is a fertile source of colds and sore throats; doctors say it tends to injure the eyesight; and unless you are happy in the possession of electric light—one of the few luxuries for which Literature has to thank Science—you run a very fair chance of burning the house down in addition. But no one was ever yet prevented from reading in bed by the thought of the danger of the practice. When Macaulay first went on circuit, he was observed making off to bed with a book tucked under his arm, and the longest candle he could pick in his hand. An aged lawyer took it upon himself to remonstrate. "I always read in bed at home," said the future historian of England, "and if I am not afraid of committing patricide and matricide and fratricide, I can hardly be expected to pay any special regard to the lives of the bagmen of Leeds." It is to be hoped that he paid more respect to the bagmen of Leeds when he came to represent them in Parliament; but there is not the slightest reason for thinking that his respect was great enough to prevent him from continuing his nocturnal habits. In fact, nine out of ten people who read at all read in bed; and the only drawback that troubles them is the difficulty of getting the right kind of book to read.

At first sight it might be thought that the best kind of books for the bedside would be heavy, soporific tomes, Charles Lamb's "books no gentleman's library should be without," sluggish volumes whose very binding resembles a sleeping mixture. But this is a mistaken view of the case. People do not want to read themselves asleep any more than they want to read themselves awake. The charm lies in the sense of complete, if temporary, detachment from the affairs of the world—the feeling that to-day's work is done, and to-morrow's separated from you by the chasm of sleep—and you need something to harmonise with your mood. You don't want argumentative books to excite "a cogibundity of cogitation" that will keep all your faculties alert, and agitate your mind with logical conundrums. Nobody wishes to argue in bed. You don't want fiction, especially melodramatic fiction, or you will stay awake half the night breathlessly whirling over pages to find out who murdered Sir Reginald, and whether Euphrosyne really married the Earl. You don't want eerie books, such as Poe's Tales and "Dracula," or you'll be afraid to go to sleep at all. What the situation calls for are cheerful discursive books that will capture the attention pleasantly for forty minutes and not constrain it above the hour. The great biographies make splendid bedside companions. You can open Boswell's "Johnson," or Lockhart's "Scott," or Trevelyan's "Macaulay" anywhere and read with the proper sense of placid enjoyment. Then come the Diarists. Pepys and Crabb Robinson should certainly be on your shelf. There, also, the writers of memoirs claim a place. It is unfortunate that the greatest masters of that species of literature should be French, because the number of men who can guarantee to read ten consecutive pages in a foreign language without coming across a word they can't translate is few indeed; and the number of men who are willing to take a dictionary to bed with them is fewer still. The idea of actually getting out to look up a word is too uncomfortable to be entertained for a moment. It would not even be heroic; it would be either madness or mere bravado. Luckily, if we have not the best in English, we have excellent substitutes. Bishop Burnet, Charles Young, Trelawney, Gronow, Medwin, and Lord Hervey are not only readable, they are re-readable—which is the final test of a bedside book. While, if you merely want "something to read an' done with," as Mr. Kipps described it, James Payn, Charles Brookfield, G. W. E. Russell, Dean Hole, the Rev. W. Tuckwell, and Montague Williams, to name almost at random a few amongst our modern purveyors of anecdote, will help you to many an agreeable hour of desultory reminiscence.

What John Ruskin would say if he knew that his work was made the lazy enjoyment of idle people in bed passes the wit of man to conceive; but the fact remains that "Fors Clavigera," "Præterita," and "The Old Road" are three of the best bedside books in existence. The "rigmarole" of "Fors," at which the critics cry out, only gives it an additional charm for night reading, and it is the most glorious rigmarole in the English language; and the mellow wistfulness of "Præterita" and "The Old Road" makes them especially suitable for the first quiet hours of the night. The style has lost the thunder and onset of the first volume of "Modern Painters." No longer will you meet sentences extending over two octavo pages without a single stop more leisurely than a comma. No longer are you likely to be carried away by a descriptive avalanche or a foaming cascade of invective. But what has been lost in power has been gained in resource. Macaulay could not be clearer, or Swift more easy. He is as versatile as Thackeray, as elastic as Pater, as incisive as Newman. He can be witty, pathetic, impassioned, sarcastic, careless, logical, and wrong-headed, all with equal propriety and charm. Put him permanently beside your bed, and, no matter what your mood may be, it will be hard indeed if his infinite diversity does not provide you with one in sympathy.

Smoking

IT is a fashion, a habit, or a vice, according to the point of view, shared by every nation and every class. It has outlived the Stuarts, one of whom held it a custom "loathsome to the eye and hateful to the nose." Boys smoke because they think it clever, and girls for reasons best known to themselves. The keynote of its joy is a soothing mood of forgetfulness. It is Nirvana. It brings effacement to those who weep over the past, yawn over the present, or tremble for the future. It is the panacea for regret, boredom, and anxiety. It banishes spite and makes men sweetly reasonable, wherefore Stevenson cautioned women against marrying any man superior to the weakness of a pipe.

In polite society most men and women are content with tobacco in one of three forms, but Eastern races need the more potent narcotic of hemp or opium. There is a word in Turkish which means repose. It is "kief," and in Morocco this is the name given to a preparation of Indian hemp that the Moors smoke in pipes with long stems and tiny bowls. The Berber of the South smokes honest—and heinous—tobacco, but the Moor will have his "kief," and a victim of the "kief" habit is as degenerate as the Egyptian "hashishi." Occasional indulgence is not, however, attended by such woeful results, and it was after envying the rapt expression on the face of one of my Moorish servants whom I took into the interior, the effect of a couple of pipes after the day's work, that I resolved to make trial of the weed. He was, therefore, sent to the bazaar to buy me a new pipe and just enough of the stuff for the experiment. With an eye to probabilities that showed him a true prophet, the rascal purchased enough of it to last him for a month, and duly came into his own. What I sought was local colour. I got it. The immediate effect of "kief," in theory, is to translate the smoker, as on a magic carpet, to the company of such almond-eyed houris as people the Moslem's paradise. My first pipe of it brought no such joys. My second made me sick, and there was no third. Opium I never tried, having had a surfeit of it, by proxy, in the company of De Quincey and in the Chinese quarter of Sydney and San Francisco. Glazed eyeballs and lolling tongues, with faces more lack-lustre than even the normal of Celestial features, did not spell enjoyment, and I let the opium go at that. With the narghile, or water-pipe, I first made acquaintance in the great Bath of Damascus. Its gurgle is comforting in the lazy hour after a Turkish bath, but I never took to it in other circumstances.

Of all forms of smoking the cigarette is the most injurious. It is deadly to mind and body alike, and my endorsement of the fact should be worth something, for I have smoked little else these five and twenty years. Yet I never inhaled, and no less an authority than Sandow once assured me that, with no inhaling, even forty cigarettes a day would not kill me. The worst result of smoking cigarettes is that in some people it induces spitting. My friends, the Moors, never spit, as may be inferred from their expressive term for the habit, which is "drinking smoke." Since this form of smoking is peculiarly injurious to the young, there is much to be said for drastic discouragement, but Americans go, as usual, to the other extreme and, in many of their cities, forbid the sale of cigarettes to young and old alike. Who can have any doubt as to the result? From being merely a pleasant form of indulgence when subject to no restraint, the cigarette, once proclaimed unlawful, becomes a passion, and nothing is easier, as I once proved during a stay at Seattle, one of the cities in which cigarettes were banned, than to buy them under pretext of purchasing cigars, a little pantomime played for the benefit of purely apocryphal detectives. This strange mania for first making laws and then breaking them is peculiarly American.

The cigarette is smoked in enormous quantities in Russia, where it is the common choice of prince and moujik alike, and its most curious feature is a long cardboard mouthpiece out of all proportion to the mere pinch of tobacco at the other end. At first sight this might look like a disingenuous trick on the part of the tobacconist to make the consumer pay the price of tobacco for paper, but anyone who knows the Russian winter has another explanation. Smoking out of doors, with the thermometer many degrees below zero, is injurious to the throat, and Russians have accustomed themselves to these pretentious whiffs of tobacco to save them from themselves. Imagination goes a long way, and they combine a minimum of nicotine with the comforting illusion of the frequent cigarette.

The smoking accommodation provided on our railways is a matter of eternal controversy between the companies and the public. The smoker's interests are far better looked after on the Continent, where, instead of, as in this country, labelling a casual compartment "Smoking," they specify a few carriages for non-smokers, throwing on these the onus of finding asylum from what King James I. genially called "this stinking smoke." Carelessly considered, this might seem like only another way of arriving at the same result, but it is, in effect, something quite distinct. The difference is subtle, and hunting men will appreciate it as analogous to a witty distinction which someone once drew between Dartmoor and Exmoor—that on the one a man could ride everywhere except where he couldn't, while on the other he couldn't ride anywhere except where he could! The English plan is wholly unsatisfactory. Not only does it provide far too little accommodation for smokers, but it does not even exclude children and non-smoking women from crowding the smoking carriage and leaving vacant places in others in which smoking is prohibited. On non-stop journeys, when a non-smoking carriage is occupied by men only, it is usual, after asking leave, to put it to better use than that for which it was intended. Such permission is usually accorded, but if it is withheld the embargo should be respected. Now and again, of course, a cad will light and puff his fearful fancy without so much as "by your leave." On one occasion a person of this class received a well-merited and wholly unexpected rebuke from a mild old gentleman, in whose face he had puffed several clouds from what purported to be a cigar. Suddenly remembering his obligation, he said:—

"I 'ope you don't mind my smoking this cigar?"

"Not at all, Sir, not at all," was the answer "if you don't!"

Art and Life—III

BY HALDANE MACFALL

I HAVE quoted heavily from "The Splendid Wayfaring" as regards Life, because we must get some clear concept of what we mean by Life before we can get even a shadow of an idea of the basic significance of Art. We have seen, then, that Life has evolved, creating for itself an ever more perfect lamp in which to flame. We have seen Life at last evolve Man; and we have seen that Man rose above the brutes, not by superior bulk, or strength, or ferocity, or courage, or the like, but by the fact that he could commune with his fellows, thereby increasing his intelligence step by step by becoming partaker of their intelligence, by which intelligence he has mastered the world, risen above all other created things; or, to put it in its other form, whereby he has become the supreme lamp wherein life can burn its fullest flame.

How has man been able to do this wonderful thing that has given him supremacy over all other created things? I have gone into this very fully in "The Splendid Wayfaring," so that we will just rough out the main facts, and thus establish the basic function of Art, whereby to test all works of Art whatsoever—for it is obvious that, if we lay down a definition of Art that does not cover all works of Art, our definition is false, and we are testing works of Art by false weights and false measures. It is, indeed, most essential that all critics, before their judgments receive any consideration, should be tested by the essential fact as to whether their concept of Art is false or true; and almost invariably it is utterly false—as will be proved if you but test a large number of masterpieces by their concepts.

It requires but a little thought to realise that there are two ways, and two ways only, of knowing Life: either we must live the whole gamut in our individual experience, or we can become partakers in the experience of our fellow-men, dead and alive, by their being able to communicate to us at second-hand what they have known of life. Obviously there is no other way.

Now, first as to living the whole gamut of life in our own and only individual gamut of life. It is clear that certain experiences must come to every individual. We are born, grow through infancy to childhood, childhood to youth, youth to manhood; we know hunger and thirst and love and heat and cold; and we die. But, without the power of communion with our fellows, all the thoughts, emotions, feelings, and experiences of any single being—even supposing that the individual had the capacity of the greatest of known men—cannot be compared with the experiences and thoughts and feelings of that man's generation. To challenge this fact would be childish. Let us go further: the greatest man of an age, even if he can commune with his fellows, cannot get into his life more than a tittle of the thoughts and experiences of his generation. So that, if he be shut off from all communion with his fellows, even his experience and intelligence must be but a paltry affair.

Fortunately, then, for man, it was granted him to experience life at second-hand by communion with his fellow-men. But how?

Clear away all side-issues, and it will be seen that there are two means by which we can become partakers in the intelligence of our fellow-men—in other words, there are two ways whereby man lifted himself above the brutes and came to mastery; for courage, ruthlessness, strength, and other such powers are not the attributes of man alone.

We can become partakers in the intelligence of our fellow-men (1) by means of exchanging our Thoughts, and (2) by means of exchanging our Feelings.

Now let us be very clear and definite about this; for it is here that we come to the foundation of that which is the province and function of Art. The Thought of another can only become our Thought when that other can make us understand it. In other words, he has to get the thought direct from his brain to our brain by means of Speech—of course written speech is only another form of speech. This logical statement of an idea—or Reason—creates what is called the Intellect, or that part of the Intelligence which is concerned with the direct communion of logical truth. Thought can say to the intelligence direct, by Reason, that two and two make four. This is a prodigiously valuable faculty. But note carefully that its power is very limited—it leaves us cold. The Reason can state a fact—but it cannot make us experience that fact. A far higher faculty of communion is granted to us—the faculty whereby the Feelings of another can be made to be understood by us. And just as Speech is the means of the communion of Thought, so Art is the means of communion of what we have felt—of the Emotions. For the sensed thing can only be communicated to us by being transferred into our senses in such a way that we are made to feel what another has felt. Of what a man has sensed through his vision he can only make us partakers by and through our faculty of vision—that is to say, by so skilful a use of colour or forms that they arouse in our intelligence the sense of what he personally has felt—through the craftsmanship of Painting. Of what a man has sensed through his hearing he can only make us partakers by and through our faculty of hearing by so skilful a use of sounds that they arouse in our intelligence the sense of what he personally has felt—through the craftsmanship of Music. Or he can conjure up in our senses the emotion that he has felt through the cunning craftsmanship of words, as in the Poetry of Prose or Verse, or by Oratory, or by the Drama or Romance.

This power of communicating to the Intelligence through the senses is Art. This is the whole province of Art, the sole province of Art—outside which Art cannot be, but within which its range is otherwise illimitable. The basic conditions of Art are therefore (1) that the artist can only utter what he himself has felt, and (2) that he can only utter it by means of, and in the realm of, that sense through which he has felt it. It is vital to grasp these two conditions. The sole value of the utterance of an artist lies in its being an impression made by life upon himself, and upon himself alone. He has no power to utter the impression of another—it is outside his ken; and, the moment he attempts it, his essay as art is dead, and becomes but Mimicry. It is without vitality, and is void. And in regard to the means of, and the realm of, the sense through which he has felt the impression, it is equally obvious that, if the artist have sensed an impression through his vision, that impression can only reach our intelligence through our vision—for instance, painting has for its range all impressions aroused by Sight, a range that is limitless within the range of sight, but that does not exist outside sight. Therefore there is no law that can limit the art of the painter, so long as he paints impressions aroused within the field of vision; but the painter essays a bastard endeavour the moment he tries to drag into his work the sensations aroused by the hearing, or touch, or smell, or the like. For instance, if a man paint a field of garlic, with the gatherers singing a folk-song, he is not creating the art of painting if he rub the work with garlic and put a gramophone behind the canvas to reel off a folk-song. Or, to put it in other words, the musician does not create a work of art as music by trying to compel music to paint sunlight on a poppy-field, any more than a painter can make a painting utter the "Marsellaise" into our intelligence.

It may seem a truism to say all this; but the whole of criticism goes boggling into these blunders every day; and thousands of artists to-day, and in all ages, have slain their endeavour by not grasping these basic truths. And a whole wretched, pompous, self-sufficient code of dogma has been set up and codified as a farcical philosophy called Æsthetics, which is built upon the fallacies which this basic concept crashes to pieces the moment it is clearly grasped!

The province of the Arts, then, is to increase the intelligence of man by adding impressions of life to his sensing. Its realm is the Imagination; it is born in the Imagination, rooted in the Imagination, grows in the Imagination, and blossoms and bears fruit in the Imagination—aroused through the senses. Speech is our intellectual means of communion with the intelligence of our fellows. Art is our sensed—or Emotional—means of communion with the intelligence of our fellows. And it is by and through these two means of communion that man has come to mastery over all other created things; but—and let us make no mistake about it—the power of the sensed communion of life is vastly greater than the power of the merely logical Reason. For one act in our day that we do at the urging of Reason, we do a score at the prompting and guidance of our instinct, of our sensing. The value of the sensed communion of life is so great that the acts of Reason have to be compelled into terms of the senses and tested in terms of the senses before we accept them to the extent of admitting them into our experience. The sciences, mechanics, philosophy, logic, and the rest are due to pure Reason, and have done prodigious service to man; but they are small as compared with the acts impelled by the sensed intelligence, for the mightiest acts of man, his supreme endeavour, his wildest adventure, have been the result of his sensed intelligence, his passions, his hopes, his instincts. Left alone with his reason, his life had been a harsh and frigid wayfaring, and a shallow if brilliant enterprise that had left him poor in heart and sordid at best in his intention.

Grasping, then, the basic significance of the Arts, let us now test it by a few general examples, and then by the particular—that is to say, the movements that are rousing so much controversy around us to-day. For I am about to show that all these "isms" and studio wars are but affairs of craftsmanship, whereas their real importance or lack of importance depends on whether they are affairs of art, and whether they are in any way concerned with art or its development.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

"WHAT are they up to now?" said a breathless Unionist, as he hurried late into the division lobby just as the door was closing on Wednesday last. "They are trying to bag the cathedrals," was the reply. The more we dive into the Welsh Bill, the more it becomes apparent that the Welsh Radicals and the English Nonconformists are imbued solely with envy, hatred, and malice against the Church. They want to rob her of her revenues, but they dare not take the money for their own sects, so they propose to devote it, as someone said, "to collecting stuffed birds." What they want is to rob the Church of her status and supposed social superiority. If the Church would admit all dissenting ministers into her communion without further examination, and publicly acknowledge that the Chapel is as good as the Church, I do not believe that the Bill would be pressed through.

Silvester Horne, of the Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, coolly proposed that all the cathedrals in Wales should be retained by the State, and that any religious body could make use of them—that any dogma could be preached from the pulpits. He did not explain how it was to be done, but we throw out the suggestion to help him that a rota might be easily prepared and the Sundays balloted for!

Asquith was dead against it, whatever he had been in the past, and only 56 were induced to go into the lobby in support of the suggestion, the majority of 279 being composed of the regular Government supporters and the Unionists.

The other night, Ward, the Labour man, made an eloquent appeal on behalf of the Church, and urged her friends not to drive too hard a bargain; but he took care to vote against her when it came to the pinch.

The Welsh Radical revolters threatened all sorts of dreadful things if the Government gave away any more, but they never meant it; they toed the line and came in as usual.

The Unionists saved £15,000 out of the fire, with the help of the Liberal Churchmen, although Llewellyn Williams made an impassioned speech, the drift of which I did not understand. He talked with admiration of Edward I, Henry V, and Cromwell crushing Wales, but said "that now Wales had gone down before as ragged a regiment as ever marched to Coventry—a party of young men and old women." Whether he was referring to the Liberal Churchmen or to the Unionists, or both, I do not know, "but that was the reason why they felt humiliated."

On Thursday Empire Jack blandly asked the Prime Minister when he was going to reform the House of Lords. Asquith replied in an equally bland tone that it would be premature at present to make a statement; but in reply to a fuller question as to when the right moment would be, suggested that the hon. member might put the question next session.

Bonar Law objected to the way that the Opposition had to drag information from the Goverment on the question of Indian Finance; "it was as if they were drawing teeth by way of question and answer." Asquith was grieved at the way Bonar Law put things; he could not promise a select committee to enquire, but he promised to give a day to discussion in February if Bonar Law really persisted. Bonar Law replied that he hoped the Prime Minister did not mean that no enquiry could be made except by moving a vote of censure; but that, I think, is exactly what the astute Premier was angling for.

Yesterday they tried to steal the Cathedrals and the Bounty of Good Queen Anne. We rescued the first and partially saved the second. To-day we tried to salvage the Glebe. They allowed the Church to have Queen Anne's Bounty because Parliament voted the money to that particular Church when there were others. They said the Glebe was quite a different pair of shoes. That it was given by pious people to the Church before the days of dissent, when there was only one true Catholic Church, and that since the Reformation had altered things the money ought to be devoted to the benefit of all, meaning thereby the stuffed birds, etc. They also discovered that the Church of England does not say prayers for the dead, and so they are breaking their contract, and ought to be punished. Wyndham said that Ellis Griffith's speech was an amalgam of bad law and bad history which had led him into bad politics. Edgar Jones, who awkwardly imitates the gestures of Lloyd George, said that the incumbent of Merthyr was the most oppressive and exacting landlord in the town, and drew £3,000 a year from slums and public houses. Sir Alfred Cripps said if we took exceptional cases no institution in England would escape similar criticism.

In the Navy the order used to be "Protestants to the right—Roman Catholics to the left—fancy religions, fall out." I do not know what particular brand of fancy religion Daylight Saving Pearce belongs to, but if it is one of the wealthy Nonconformist bodies, they cannot approve of his sentiments; for he urged the Church to be good, and give up all its property; it would be far better for its salvation if it walked about naked, as it were.

There were noises and interjections and epithets. Lyttelton very nearly, if he did not quite, call McKenna an attorney's clerk. Granted that the Government proved every argument they made, which was very far from being the case, they deliberately ignored the Statute of Limitations which is allowed to apply to every institution except the Church—a Church whose income does not exceed the sum that M.P.'s voted for their salaries every year. It was all to no purpose. The debate came in like a lamb, but went out like a lion when the guillotine fell at 10.30; but there were some men with consciences after all, for the Government majority dropped to 55, and would have been only 52 if three men had not been still out through their own carelessness. It was all right, however, from a Government point of view, there were more than 55 Irish Papists present to vote with the Nonconformists and keep the coalition in power.

On Friday the Government Whips believed we should try a snap, and they kept strong reserves in town—but it was to no purpose.

The end was marred by a disagreeable and dramatic incident. Fitzroy, in a very moderate speech inquired into the circumstances of Sir Francis Bridgeman's dismissal. Winston made a very violent attack on Lord Charles Beresford, and Bonar Law called for the whole of the correspondence, which Winston instantly read out. It is clear his first letter was very disingenuous, and Bonar Law summed up the position when he said he (Winston) could have got Sir Francis Bridgeman to tender his resignation without leaving the feeling that a great and distinguished man had been ill-used. If he had received that second letter of Mr. Churchill's after the first letter, he should have considered it most brutal.

The House did not adjourn until half-past four.

Notes and News

Lord Roberts' stirring "Message to the Nation," which Mr. Murray has published in sixpenny form, has roused so much attention that a third impression, numbering several thousands, has been called for.

The Aberdeen Art Gallery committee has been enabled, through the generosity of Mrs. Arthur Melville, to acquire for an almost nominal price the important and masterly drawing by the late Arthur Melville, A.R.S.A., known as "Banderilleros a Pied."

The three-hundredth number of What's On? is issued this week, and London's amusement-journal of reference is to be congratulated. Its usefulness to the visitor is obvious, and it covers so much ground in its articles and suggestions that it forms a valuable record of the every-day life of the city.

An association for the promotion of British interests in Egypt and the Near East—financial, literary, commercial, and scientific—has been formed, with temporary offices at 6, Broad Street Place, E.C. Mr. H. Osman Newland, F.R.Hist.Soc., is the hon. secretary, and Sir John Brickwood is a vice-president. Among the council are Major Searle, F.R.G.S., W. E. Gaze, F.R.G.S., and many other well-known gentlemen. The subscription is £1 1s. yearly to the first 200 members.

A notable union of forces will take place on the occasion of the annual conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians to be held at Birmingham on December 30 and 31, 1912, and January 1, 2, and 3, 1913. At that meeting the Musical League will give a series of concerts in association with the Incorporated Society of Musicians. The mornings will be devoted to the reading and discussion of papers; the afternoons and evenings to performances of music. Thus the theoretical and creative side of art will be represented at the conference.

Miss Margaret Morris's recent series of performances at the Court Theatre has proved so successful that she has secured the same theatre for a month, and will give a series of matinées there, beginning to-day, Saturday, December 28, and continuing until the end of January.

Mr. Forbes-Robertson finished the first part of his successful farewell tour of the provinces at the Theatre Royal, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Wednesday, December 18, having been compelled to give four overflow performances of "Hamlet," "Mice and Men," "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," and "The Light That Failed." In January he continues his farewell tour of the provincial cities he has not yet visited, accompanied by his wife, Miss Gertrude Elliott, starting at Hull on January 20, and including Hanley, Newport (Mon.), Exeter, Bath, Southampton, Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Bournemouth, in the order given.

The first meeting of the Albanian Committee was held in the Whitehall Rooms on Tuesday, December 17, under the presidency of the Hon. Aubrey Herbert, M.P., who was well supported. After the reading of correspondence, the following resolution was unanimously passed, on the motion of Mr. C. F. Ryder, of Leeds, seconded by Mr. Mark H. Judge:—"That this meeting cordially approves of the formation of the Albanian Committee (1912) to assist the establishment of Albanian autonomy, to develop a wider knowledge of the Balkan problem, and to promote a good understanding between Christian and Mohammedan the world over."

A new reciter, the daughter of Mme. Amy Sherwin, made her bow to the public at Steinway Hall on Saturday evening last, when an exceptionally interesting programme of selections from the poets was admirably rendered. For two hours the keen attention of the audience was sustained, while the applause which followed each recital was evidence of the appreciation given to the youthful artiste. Miss Sherwin recited the following selections, among others:—"The Day is Done," Longfellow; "The Forsaken Merman," Matthew Arnold; "The High Tide," Jean Ingelow; music by Liza Lehmann, accompanied by the composer. Variety was added to the programme by Mr. Fraser Gange, who sang selections from Tennyson's "Maud"; from "A Song of Life," by Henley; with some "Cowboy Songs" from the collection by Professor Lomax.

The opening meeting of the winter session of the English Goethe Society was held on December 10, at the Medical Hall, when Mr. Gregory Page gave an interesting lecture on "Wilhelm Meister." A large number of members was present to do honour to the memory of the late Dr. Eugene Oswald, M.A., one of the founders of the Society, and from 1891 till his death last October its distinguished and beloved secretary. Of his life and career Dr. L. T. Thorne, chairman of the council, gave a sympathetic sketch. A brief tribute of praise and appreciation was also paid by Mr. Oscar Gridley, founder of the Carlyle Society, of which Dr. Oswald was president for fifteen years. Prince Lichnowsky is the most recent accession to the Society, which promises some interesting papers this session. Particulars may be obtained from the secretary, Miss Oswald, 129, Adelaide Road, N.W.

By LANCELOT LAWTON.

CHINA'S PERIL.

PUBLIC attention has of late been concentrated upon events in the Near East, to the almost total exclusion of interest in the important developments that have been in progress in the Far East. Thus unobserved, as it were, the first part of the plan long contemplated by certain Powers, and aimed at the suppression of Chinese influence in the outlying dependencies of the Republic, has been quietly and successfully accomplished. Without protest from any quarter, save Peking, Russia has, once and for all, established her domination in the rich and vast region of Mongolia. It is generally assumed that her privileged position is restricted to the area geographically known as Outer Mongolia; but, following a procedure to which Russian diplomatists in their dealings with China are not altogether strangers, the wording of the protocol concluded recently between her plenipotentiary, M. Kowstovetz, and the local authorities is so ambiguous as to leave in some doubt the question whether or not the whole of Mongolia is involved. Indeed, so comprehensive are the provisions of the document that the conclusion would almost seem warranted that Russia has secured for herself in this region a position similar in all essential respects to that which she occupied in Manchuria in the days before the war with Japan.

The salient features of the agreement which has led to this result may be summarised as follows:—(1) Russian banks shall have the right to establish branches; Russian subjects to lease or buy land in all towns and cities, to lease vacant land for agricultural purposes, to establish commercial enterprises, and to arrange for concessions regarding mining, forestry, fishing, and other undertakings. (2) The Russian Government shall have the right to establish Consulates wherever deemed necessary, and at the same time to found trade settlements which shall be under the administration of Russian Consuls. (3) Russian post-offices shall be established. (4) Russian Consuls shall have the right to use Mongolian post-stations without charge. (5) All Mongolian rivers flowing into Russian territory, and the branches thereof, shall be open to navigation by Russian subjects plying Russian vessels. (6) Russian subjects desiring to transport goods and live-stock shall have the right to use rivers and roads in Mongolia, and with their own money are to be permitted to build bridges, establish ferries, and collect fees from the people using these bridges and ferries. (7) Grazing lands shall be reserved for the use of flocks belonging to Russian subjects when migrating, and such lands may be used for three months without payment. (8) All disputes shall be referred to mixed tribunals nominated jointly by Russian Consuls and Mongolian Princes. At the same time, it is known that Russia contemplates the construction of an elaborate railway system in Mongolia. Of this scheme the principal feature will be the building of a line to link her Siberian railway with the Peking-Kalgan line, an undertaking the completion of which would bring Paris within nine and a half days of Peking.

A glance at the map will instantly reveal the tremendous importance to be attached to the new forward policy inaugurated by Russia in the Far East. It cannot be denied that the provisions of the agreement disclosed in this article are a flagrant violation of all international treaties concluded with the object of upholding the sovereignty of China. In the circumstances it would seem to all practical intents and purposes that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance has ceased to exercise any material influence upon the situation in the Far East. The truth of this assertion is rendered all the more apparent when we consider the developments that are taking place behind the diplomatic scene. For by this time the fact, first made known in these columns, has become notorious that there is in existence an agreement between Japan and Russia, which provides for three positive developments:—(1) The annexation by Japan of Korea, and Russia's acquiescence in this measure; (2) Russian liberty of action in Outer Mongolia; and (3) the division of Manchuria between Russia and Japan. The first and second parts of the programme have been carried out. There remains for fulfilment, then, the alienation of Manchuria, and all present indications go to show that this step will not long be delayed. As far as Japan is concerned, we notice signs and portents, in regard to the Three Eastern Provinces, similar to those which heralded the extinction of Korean nationality. Certain influential organs of the Press and prominent publicists are openly advocating annexation. Then petitions from Chinese communities in Manchuria, cleverly engineered as a consequence of Japanese intrigues, are being received in Tokyo, praying the Government to end their trials and tribulations by gathering them within the fold of its beneficent régime. And finally, what is more ominous than all these significant indications, is the announcement that the Japanese Government has applied to Peking for permission to reinforce its already large army in Manchuria, a procedure which, in view of its sinister intent, would appear to be somewhat superfluous. Definite action on the part of Russia and Japan in Mongolia will necessarily involve an important geographical revision in the Far East. The boundary between Manchuria and Mongolia has never been clearly defined. When the time comes for the settling of accounts, this question will give rise to some discussion, and it may be assumed that Japan will endeavour to give a wide interpretation of her claims in the southern sphere. It is clear that the British Foreign Office is aware that the important territorial changes described in this article are in contemplation, and it is within the knowledge of the writer that Sir Edward Grey will not protest against this rearrangement.

For some time past no secret has been made of the fact that Great Britain has abandoned all pretensions to possessing material interests in Manchuria. As compensation for this effacement we retain the friendship of Russia and Japan, so essential to the proper maintenance of our world policy, and it does not seem at all likely that we shall demand any further advantage of an important nature in return for our acquiescence in the designs of these Powers. We are content with the position we hold in Tibet. As far as our interests in other parts of China are concerned, the situation, which remains substantially the same to-day, was lucidly summed up by Sir Valentine Chirol three years ago:—

> That in regard to railway construction and all that railway construction means, the Germans, in the face of their self-denying ordinance, now hold the key to the whole position in the heart of the Yangtze Valley, cannot be denied. . . . Nor is that all. Whilst the Germans have successfully manœuvred us into surrendering our own position in the Yangtze, they show no disposition whatever to surrender any of the exclusive rights which they claim in Shantung, though we recognise the latter only in return for their recognition of the former.

Germany's attitude in the coming territorial changes in China gives rise to not a little speculation. Were she to advance a claim for compensation in Shantung, it is difficult to see how it could be effectually resisted. Yet it is apparent that her interests in the Far East are more or less isolated in character. On the other hand, Japan and Russia are Continental neighbours of China, and something may therefore be said for their claim to possessing an influence in frontier regions. While not going too deeply into this aspect of the case, we cannot escape the reflection that the employment of this influence as a cloak for territorial aggrandisement, and with the tacit sanction of Great Britain, is to be deplored. It means that the doctrine of the Open Door, never much more than a specious formula, is dead and done for. Conceivably it may mean the opening of another sanguinary page in China's troubled history. The plea, so often advanced of late, that her dilatory tactics over the loan negotiations have invited aggression is untenable when we remember that, long before the Republic had dealings with the Consortium, Japan and Russia had formulated their policy in regard to Manchuria. And it is Russia who now stands in the way of China's financial freedom, declaring that she will not consent to any loan that may in part be used in the raising of forces to be employed against her in Mongolia.

MOTORING

THE year 1912 has been one of the most noteworthy in the annals of the motor industry, and in the world-movement towards the universal adoption of mechanically-propelled in place of animal-drawn locomotion. It is not that there have been revolutionary developments in any phase of the mechanism or equipment of the automobile, or even any indication that such developments may be expected to take place. As a matter of fact, in the short space of 20 years the completely satisfactory mode of locomotion has been evolved and practically perfected, and there is really no need for the most exacting to demand anything more than improvements in the details which make for personal comfort, convenience, and luxury.

The closing year has, however, been especially notable because it has determined beyond all doubt the practicability of the self-propelled vehicle as a universal mode of locomotion, and not one merely available for a limited section of the community. And in this connection it is only fair to state that the much-abused, low-priced American car has rendered invaluable service. Before its appearance, the advantages and pleasures of motoring were practically confined to the few, and it seemed to the man in the street that for him they were not likely to materialise. Now, however, everything is altered, thanks to the example of the cheap American car and the determined competition of its makers, and there is no longer any reason why even the man of most moderate means should be debarred from the joys of the open road.

Apart from the all-round cheapening of motoring for which 1912 will always be remembered, the last twelve months have witnessed the inception of a world-wide demand for a motor fuel other than petrol, and it is certain that the agitation for such a fuel will not be abandoned until its object is obtained. At present the whole motoring community, both here and abroad, is in the grip of a "ring," which has shown its determination to exploit the new movement for every farthing it is worth, and this exploiting process will continue so long as petrol remains the only fuel available. The danger is now fully recognised, and in this country especially the representative motoring organisations are actively bestirring themselves to find a solution of the problem. The R.A.C. is engaged in testing scientifically all motor spirits that appear to contain possibilities as alternative fuels; the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders has offered a substantial prize (2,000 guineas) to whoever shall submit the best home-produced motor fuel; and the Automobile Association and Motor Union has for a long time been occupied in efforts to secure supplies of petrol to its members at a reasonable price. It appears likely that before another year is ended the motorist will be buying benzol in place of petrol, and obtaining a satisfactory fuel at a reasonable price. To the outsider it is somewhat mysterious that this spirit, which can be produced in unlimited quantities from ordinary coal dust at very small cost, and which is indisputably as good a motor fuel as petrol, should not be immediately placed on the market in opposition to petrol, and information as to the exact nature and extent of the difficulties is strangely hard to obtain. No doubt, however, the obstacles, whatever they may be, will be overcome and the foreign petrol "ring" broken before another year's record of progress in the motoring world has to be written.

From the point of view of international competition, 1912 has emphasised more than any previous year the success of the British manufacturers. Our imports of foreign cars have been less and our exports of home-made cars greater than in any previous year since the industry assumed importance. Our makers, who were handicapped by the ten years' start of their continental competitors, are now actively carrying the war of competition out of the home market into the enemy's country, and even in France, the real home of the industry, the best British cars find an increasingly wide clientèle of admirers and purchasers. Many of our manufacturers have now their own depôts in Paris, and at the recent international exhibition in the Grand Palais the British exhibitors far outnumbered those of any other nationality, except, of course, those of France itself. From a purely business point of view, the year has been the most prosperous in the history of the trade, so far as the British makers are concerned; and on all sides one hears of the most roseate prospects for the future. In fact, many of our best-known makers have sufficient orders actually in hand to occupy them for the next twelve months. Of the individual makers, some have enhanced and some created reputations. Without being invidious, it is permissible to refer to the Vauxhall and Sunbeam Companies, both of which have been brilliantly successful in the breaking of speed records during the year, and to the Sheffield-Simplex, which has now definitely established its claims to rank as one of the very finest cars in the world. For some reason or other, probably not unconnected with its makers' inadequate appreciation of the value of publicity, this British car, which was the first, we believe, to show what could be done in the way of top-gear long-distance running, has never attracted the popular attention to which it is entitled, and which many inferior cars receive. But under the new management this has already been largely altered, and since the Olympia Show the Sheffield-Simplex has taken the high position to which it is legitimately entitled. Napiers and Rolls-Royces, the other two representative British cars of the highest class, have fully retained their popularity and earned record dividends for their shareholders; so that altogether the British motor industry has every reason to look back upon 1912 with satisfaction.

THE past week is one of those which most people forget as a week of business. It is devoted to assuaging the accumulated miseries of the past twelve months. Yet this year, had it not been for the Balkan war, would have been one of prosperity. In the great manufacturing towns everyone has been working at high pressure, high prices and high profits. Fortunes are being made. A slump may come, but at the moment no one can say from which quarter it will arrive. Given peace, it looks as though 1913 would be a year of continued good trade and high values. But we must have peace. War destroys credit and we cannot make money without credit.

The new issues have not gone at all well. In almost every case underwriters have been left. Even high-yielding, so-called, securities have failed to please. Trade is so good that the public do not want any investment better than their own business. And, frankly, they are wise, for a well-established industrial business in Great Britain is as sound a venture as one can find. But the City does not worry; it knows that sooner or later the shares and bonds it has had to take will be sold through the Stock Exchange. Stockbrokers will send out highly-coloured slips upon which the venture appears better than a trustee stock, and as such slips are usually marked "Private," they assume a gravity which they did not possess when advertised under the name of prospectus in the public Press. The public is very foolish.

Canada is getting ready numberless new issues for the forthcoming year. Her appetite for capital grows with what it feeds on. Canada must have money. Her real estate gamble grows each week. Insane prices are now paid for land in the far western towns. As a serious Toronto paper has pointed out, there are only a few million people in the country, and most of them are in the large towns, therefore the high price of western land is a terrible tax upon those who live upon it. I must warn my readers against the numberless agencies in London now offering land at fabulous prices. One, the Canadian Capital Investments, has been exposed in many Canadian and English newspapers. It offers suburban blocks in Regina, and the Regina Board of Trade have felt compelled to issue a circular warning people against the offers. It is said that the map was not drawn to scale, and that the two sections, Belgravia and Mayfair, will not be ripe for development in this generation, whilst the third, Coronation Park, is priced 100 per cent. too high.

MONEY must come down in price in the New Year, though there are people who say that Bulgaria, Servia, and Greece will require such huge sums to develop their new territory that all the money on the Continent will not suffice. The mercantile marine of Greece is growing rapidly, and with it her trade. But she needs capital. Servia could supply half Europe with pigs and bacon. Bulgaria has wealth not yet explored. But all need money. Enormous sums now being hoarded will be set free when peace is declared, but they will be needed. India, the Argentine, Egypt will want a little more money, and Brazil is in the market. I think the Bank Rate may go down early in January, but only by a half per cent. And even this reduction is by no means sure.

FOREIGNERS.—Really only two gambling counters exist in the Foreign market in London—Tintos and Perus. It is now hoped that Tintos will go up; they have been over-sold, and a rise is due. The copper position is strong, and we shall get a big dividend for the year. Perus have been written up and talked up, but those who buy never pay, and the speculation account is always at the mercy of the money-lender. However, a serious attempt is to be made to deal with the Debenture Debt, and in this assumption Peru Prefs are held up. The Corporation is attempting to get the railways in perpetuity. They will then be able to offer a better security, and can pay off the present 6 per cent issue at 105, offering 4½ per cent. perpetual debentures in exchange. Such an operation, it is claimed, would give the Preference their dividend in full. But the Corporation needs money, and would probably increase the debt. Also there are arrears of Preference dividend amounting to over 70 per cent.

HOME RAILS.—Next week the dividend calculators will be hard at work on the Home Railway Returns. They will have a much easier task than they had last half-year, when the Coal Strike came in and made accurate guessing an impossibility. We must, however, wait for the Christmas week traffics, as they are usually heavy. In the meantime, Great Central comes out the best. Great Western, L.N.W.R., Midland, and North-Eastern are all good, and Lancashire and Yorkshire is also well ahead. Great Eastern is poor and Great Northern does not hold its own. I again say buy Great Central, it is one of the few lines that have big things in front of them.

YANKEES have suddenly improved. The "bears" have overdone the selling, and those who hammered Unions down to 158½ are now sorry for themselves. They had an easy task to get the price down, but when they tried to buy back they found it not quite so easy. The Reading increase in dividend coming on top of its victory in the courts did not affect the market in the least—I should say, did not affect the quotation; possibly the market felt sick. There is still much talk of the attack on Steels, and here I am nervous. I again repeat my advice to buy Unions. They are undervalued.

RUBBER.—The Daejan meeting was stormy. Shareholders are now getting up an agitation for a committee of investigation. There seem some considerable discrepancies between the prospectus promises and the results, and a committee could do no harm. Pataling increased its interim distribution, but I do not see how it can improve upon the 250 per cent. paid last year unless it has some surprise in store in the shape of reduced working costs. It is a splendid little property, and cheap at to-day's prices.

OIL.—The Shell announcement was satisfactory, and I hear that the company is doing extremely well. The Tampico report is good; there are now four wells down on oil, but the company has not enough money to drill with energy. Santa Maria report is atrocious. The first prospectus spoke of huge sums and a huge output; the report cannot give a tenth of what we were asked to expect.

MINES.—The Great Cobar report shows an increase in profits, but no dividends. Neither can I see any dividends in the future for this overrated, ill-managed, over-capitalised venture. The Debenture debt hangs like a millstone round the neck of the company. The New Kleinfontein scandal makes yet another reason why we should abandon all our Kaffirs. The life is now put at 13 years, and actually not many months past we were told by those who were supposed to speak officially that the mine had 25 years longer to live! This is the second time the company has figured in a bad scandal.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The market still takes a gloomy view of the National Telephone, and thinks the quotations for the Deferred over-valued. I cannot agree. I think that those who hold on will find that their patience has been repaid handsomely. North-Eastern Breweries have had a good year in spite of the Government. The Egyptian Salt and Soda increased the dividend to 6½, and carry forward almost as much as they pay away. They have entirely re-organised their balance-sheet, and written down the concessions to a nominal amount. The shares are cheap.

LEAGUE FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE CONSTITUTION AND THE UNION.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The present Government have filled up the cup of unscrupulousness to overflowing, and your suggestion of a Defence League comes not a moment too soon. The exact form the required covenant should take may be a matter to be more precisely determined, especially as the language proposed in your pages is at once declaratory and explanatory, and it is presumable that the covenant will be a declaration only. At the same time the motives of the Defence League are most aptly expounded from the British point of view, and their exposition is all the more refreshing since one is weary of the perpetual insistence that Ulster is the sole obstacle to Home Rule, When it is transparently self-evident that if the Ulster difficulty had no existence at all the impossibility of Home Rule would be every whit as strongly established. What is desirable is to concentrate attention on one or two points which by themselves stamp this Bill as intolerable from the British standpoint, and the retention of the 42 Members, the gross iniquity and chaos of the finance, and the fiscal disunion of the customs are undoubtedly the most salient items of objection, though I would add to this number the hopeless, reactionary, anti-Liberal policy of setting up an Irish Nationalist Government in this twentieth century to rule Ireland and Great Britain as well.

In face, therefore, of this immeasurable public danger it is necessary that a spirit of resolve should be most forcibly proclaimed and that essentially on the primary basis that the resisters are the true law regarders, insisting only that the law should be founded, as it immemorially has been, on the assent of Crown, Lords, and Commons.

For the rest it is a particularly welcome feature of the League's programme that the leaders of the party should be called upon immediately to declare their intention to repeal the Home Rule Bill if passed. This will serve two invaluable purposes. It will prevent any lively anticipation of a Home Rule Parliament occupying the interval before the Act can pass under the Parliament Bill, and, above all, it will frustrate the establishment of a Legislature in Dublin followed by the resignation of the present Ministry, leaving to their successors the munificent legacy of extricating Ireland from the slough and slush into which she is incontinently to be launched. Anyhow, the nauseous tyranny that those manœuvres have engendered can now obviously only be remedied by all liberty-loving Englishmen relying upon themselves as the sole securers of their own freedom and by making it clear to all it may happen to concern that there are an incalculable number of our fellow-countrymen in deadly earnest on this gravest of all Imperial issues. Yours truly,

Dear Sir,—I was much interested in reading the account of the League for the Defence of the Constitution and the Union in your last issue of THE ACADEMY, and I should like to be permitted to propose a third object for the consideration of the League—a copy of which I enclose. No. 3.—To represent respectfully to H.M. the King, that to give the Royal assent—while the constitution of the country is in abeyance—to any of the three great measures now before the House of Commons, and until they have been submitted to the judgment of the people, would be highly unconstitutional.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—To controvert the inferential evidence submitted by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence is not the purpose of this letter, but to establish the fact that Shakespeare was an actor and dramatist and solely connected with the theatrical business. Attention is therefore drawn to the association of John Heminge and Henry Condell with William Shakespeare—these actors are mentioned with the rest of their associates in a Royal Licence for Shakespeare's Company, "The King's Players," dated 19 May, 1603. They are associated as proprietors in the Globe Theatre, c1606, and again as proprietors in the Blackfriars Theatre, c1606. They are remembered by Shakespeare in his will, to whom he left "twenty-six shillings and eightpence to buy them rings." In 1623 Heminge and Condell published Shakespeare's plays, in folio; in the Dedication they say, "We have but collected them and done an office to the dead, to procure his orphans, guardians: without ambition either of self-profit or fame, only to keep the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive as this was our Shakespeare by humble offer of the plays, etc." At this time Bacon, the philosopher, essayist and politician was still living. Heminge and Condell in their address to the reader in the folio solemnly affirm the authenticity of all the several pieces that make up the collection and their care in publishing them. These honest editors acknowledge in terms equally solemn the author's right in his copies, and they lament that he had not exercised that right by a publication of them during his lifetime. Now Bacon could not have had any interest in the plays, or he would have superintended the publication of them. As it is, the text of the folio abounds with errors. Bacon was careful and published his own works. In a play entitled "The Returne from Parnassus," iv., iii (1601), there is a passage where Kemp says to Burbage "Few of the University pen plays well. . . . Why, here's our fellow Shakespeare puts them all down, ay, and Ben Jonson too. O, that Ben Jonson is a pestilent fellow, he brought up Horace, giving the poets a pill, but our fellow Shakespeare hath given him a purge." The incident here mentioned is in Ben Jonson's "Poetaster." The purge is probably to be found in "As You Like It," Jacques' speeches, Act 2. But all this is in connexion with a quarrel known as the War of the Theatres, in which Bacon could not have been concerned. Why Bacon, the philosopher, essayist, and politician should be considered also as a poet and dramatist, and such a dramatist as Shakespeare, is not within my comprehension. "The Philosopher," says Sir Philip Sydney, "teacheth, but he teacheth obscurely, so as the learned only can understand him; that is to say he teacheth them that are already taught. But the poet is the food for the tenderest stomach; the poet is indeed the right popular philosopher." Also Massinger,

> Actors may put in for as large a share
> As all the sects of the philosophers.
> They with cold precepts, perhaps seldom read
> Deliver what an honourable thing
> The Active virtue is. But does that fire
> The blood, or swell the veins with emulation
> To be both good and great, equal to that > Which is presented on our theatres?

Bacon, with some truth, might have expressed himself in these words—on Shakespeare. "Yet he's gentle, never schooled, and yet learned, full of noble device, of all sorts enchantingly beloved, and indeed so much in the heart of the world, and especially of my own people, who best know him, that I am altogether misprised"——. I am, Sir, yours faithfully, TOM JONES.

BACON IS SHAKESPEARE.—THE TESTIMONY OF FLORIO.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Last Saturday you were good enough to print a letter of mine in which I showed that Florio had told us that the author of the Shakespeare plays was "a gentleman," a man of position, "who loved better to be a poet than to be counted so." Bacon himself tells us the same thing in his "A Declaration of the Practices and Treasons Attempted and Committed by Robert, late Earl of Essex, and his Complices," which was published in 1601. In this work Bacon tells us "About the Middle of Michaelmas term, Her Majesty had a purpose to dine at my Lodge at Twickenham Park, at which time I had—though I profess not to be a poet—prepared a sonnet, directly tending and alluding to draw on Her Majesty's reconcilement to my Lord Essex, which I remember I also showed to a great person." Here Bacon, writing in 1601, says: "I profess not to be a poet," which seems to fit in exactly with the testimony of Florio.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Bacon in 1603 repeats again the same story of his being "a concealed poet" in his letter to John Davis, whom he asks to use his good offices on his behalf with King James I, for he concludes, "So desiring you to be good to concealed poets," while Bacon in his last prayer says, "I have, though in a despised weed, procured the good of all men."

"Despised weed" means a mean disguise. And what disguise could be conceived meaner and more degrading than the name of the drunken illiterate clown of Stratford?

Again, the "gentleman," the man of position "who loved better to be a poet than to be counted so," writes in Sonnet 76,

"Why write I still all one, ever the same,
And keepe invention in a noted weed,
That every word doth almost sel* my name,
Shewing their birth and where they did proceed?"

Here we see that the writer of the Sonnets, who is also the writer of the Shakespeare plays, tells us, in the actual words used by Bacon in his last prayer, that he keeps his works of invention, that is, his poetical works, concealed under a "noted weed," a pseudonym, a mean disguise. In Book VII of his "De Augmentes," 1623, which was, however, not translated into English till 1640, Bacon again repeats the same story, for he tells us "that in the works he his now putting forth and in those he proposes to put forth later he has laid aside the glory and dignity of his own name for the good and profit of mankind." And again we get the same story in the beautiful prayer which, although not printed till 1679, was almost certainly written as the dedication of the plays known as Shakespeare's:

"This is the Form and Rule of our Alphabet.

May God the Creator, Preserver, and Renewer of the Universe protect and govern this Work both in its ascent to His Glory and in its descent to the Good of Mankind, for the sake of his Mercy and good Will to Men, through his only Son (Immanuel) God-with-us."

Methinks the above form very strong evidence as to who was the real author of the plays known as Shakespeare's. Yours, EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Mr. Martin has recovered his savoir faire, so that my last letter has at all events accomplished something. There are, however, some other things Mr. Martin has still to recover: one of them is his sense of logic. The beginner of a controversy, let me therefore hasten to assure him, is the person who begins it. It may seem obvious, but I gather from his last letter he has not yet grasped it. Mr. Martin wrote a letter in your columns, into which he imported a cryptic utterance on the subject of Christian Science. When he was good enough to explain the cryptogram, it turned out that he meant that Christian Scientists satisfied themselves of the truth of Chrisitan Science, by a method he was kind enough to evolve for them out of his own consciousness. I merely pointed out that the method evolved out of Mr. Martin's inner consciousness did not happen to be the method employed by Christian Scientists, and I explained what the Christian Science method was. Mr. Martin seems to imagine that because I explained to your readers that the lines along which he kindly arranged that Christian Scientists thought were not the lines they had themselves adopted, I was bound, therefore, to produce the evidence their method of reasoning accumulated.

He has at last, however, made the discovery that I have no intention whatever of doing anything so foolish as attempting to produce in a letter, evidence which would fill very many issues of your paper. He admits that I have "excellent reasons for not producing this evidence." Of course I have, but, on his own showing, it is most unreasonable of him to suffer so severely because those reasons are excellent. He says he denies my moral right to keep this evidence up my sleeve. But he has said that my reasons are excellent. Therefore, how can he reasonably disguise the entire absence of logic in his own position as an immoral proceeding on my part? He says that the withholding of the evidence cannot be justified by the satisfaction a man feels in being the only educated person in the community to which he belongs. Mr. Martin is evidently determined to pose as a minor prophet. First of all, how does he know that I am the only educated person in the Christian Science community? Or, if he does not mean this—and you can never be quite sure of what Mr. Martin does mean, until the Martin Society has elucidated him—he must mean that I think I am the only educated person in the Christian Science community. Now, how can Mr. Martin know what I think? It was knowing how Christian Scientists thought that got him into his original difficulty, and, having made this mistake about Christian Scientists in general, he is now making it about me in particular. One cannot avoid the suspicion that he has been reading the story in Chuang Tzu, of the Chinaman who watched the minnows under a bridge. "See how the minnows are darting about! That is the pleasure of fishes," said Chuang Tzu. "You, not being a fish yourself," returned Hui Tzu, "how can you possibly know in what consists the pleasure of fishes?" "And you, not being I," retorted Chuang Tzu, "how can you know that I do not know?" "If I, not being you, cannot know what you know," urged Hui Tzu, "it follows that you, not being a fish, cannot know in what consists the pleasure of fishes." "Let us go back," said Chuang Tzu, "to your original question. You asked me how I knew in what consists the pleasure of fishes. Your very question shows that you knew I knew. For you asked me how I knew. I knew it from my own feelings on the bridge. From my own feelings above the bridge I infer those of the fishes below." It is just like that with Mr. Martin. His arguments are inferences from his own feelings. However, as Chuang Tzu says, "Let us go back."

Mr. Martin finally says that he must be an unappreciative wretch if he were not grateful for the benefits which this correspondence has vouchsafed to him. Anybody who has ever entered into a correspondence with Mr. Martin will readily admit that the pleasure of writing letters to the paper is not one which he does not appreciate, and does not take full advantage of. AENEID II, 255.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—My attention has been called to a letter by Mr. Dodgson in THE ACADEMY of November 23. While thanking him for his courteous reference to my book, I may perhaps interpret it as indirectly a question to which it is a pleasure to reply.

From the top of Hissarlik the summit of the conical hill of Tenedos is visible—est in conspectu Tenedos—but all the lower part of the island is concealed by the ridge along the western coast. Neither sea nor ships can be seen from Troy except off the mouth of the Scamander and within the Hellespont. But if a signal were to be given to Sinon from the fleet, the information he would require would be not of the departure from Tenedos but of the arrival at the litora nota. This could be well conveyed, at distance of some four miles, by a fire-beacon on a ship. This may have been in Virgil's mind, and is, I think, not inconsistent with his words. But I doubt if he had a clear idea of the geographical facts; for the description of the arrival of the serpents conveys the idea that their whole course from Tenedos was visible:

"Ecce autem gemini a Tenedo tranquilla per alta—
Horresco referens—inmensis orbibus angues Incumbunt pelago pariterque ad litora tendunt."
—(II, 203-5.)

I may add that Tenedos is fully twelve miles from Troy, not eight, as Mr. Dodgson says. Yours faithfully,

WALTER LEAF.

JOTTINGS FOR THE WORD-BOOKS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

MOUSE BUTTOCK.

Sir,—"The Mouse—buttock of beef." In the "Historical English Dictionary," of Oxford, the only authority cited for "mouse buttock" is the English Dialect Dictionary. On turning to that one finds no author, date, or region quoted to prove its use; but it is said to mean: "the fleshy piece which is cut out from a round of beef." On page 150 of "Cookery made Easy," by Michael Willis (London: 1829) in the "Recipes for the sick," and under the item "A Clear Broth to Keep," we are told: "Put the mouse buttock of beef," etc.

"HENNERY" IN 1853.

Some readers of the great Oxonian Dictionary of the English Language may have wondered why no instance of the word "hennery," for "hen-house" or "poultry-yard," earlier than the year 1859, is on record there, and perhaps have surmised that the word was invented by a suffragette, as it is based entirely on the rights and duties of the female biped. It is, therefore, interesting to note its occurrence on page 37 of "Up the River," by F. W. Shelton, printed in New York, in 1853, in the phrase "or scaling the hennery."

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.
